6713. POLICY (American), Principles.—On the question you propose [James Monroe], whether we can, in any form, take a bolder attitude than formerly in favor of liberty, I can give you but commonplace ideas. They will be but the widow's mite, and offered only because requested. The matter which now embroils Europe, the presumption of dictating to an independent nation the form of its government, is so arrogant, so atrocious, that indignation, as well as moral sentiment, enlists all our partialities and prayers in favor of one, and our equal exactions against the other. I do not know, indeed, whether all nations do not owe to one another a bold and open declaration of their sympathies with the one party, and their detestation of the conduct of the other. But farther than this we are bound to go; and indeed, for the sake of the world, we ought not to increase the jealousies, or draw on ourselves the power of this formidable confederacy [The Holy Alliance]. I have ever deemed it fundamental for the United States never to take active part in the quarrels of Europe. Their political interests are entirely distinct from ours. Their mutual jealousies, their balance of power, their complicated alliances, their forms and principles of government, are all foreign to us. They are nations of eternal war. All their energies are expended in the destruction of the labor, property and lives of their people. On our part, never had a people so favorable a chance of trying the opposite system, of peace and fraternity with mankind, and the direction of all our means and faculties to the purposes of improvement instead of destruction. With Europe we have few occasions of collision, and these, with a little prudence and forbearance, may be generally accommodated. Of the brethren of our own hemisphere, none is yet, or for an age to come will be, in a shape, condition, or disposition to war against us. And the foothold which the nations of Europe had in either America, is slipping from under them, so that we shall soon be rid of their neighborhood. Cuba alone seems at present to hold up a speck of war to us. Its possession by Great Britain would indeed be a great calamity to us. Could we induce the Spanish to join us in guaranteeing its independence against all the world, except Spain, it would be nearly as valuable to us as if it were our own.* But should she take it, I would not immediately go to war for it; because the first war on other accounts will give it to us; or the island will give itself to us, when able to do so. While no duty, therefore, calls on us to take part in the present war of Europe, and a golden harvest offers itself in reward for doing nothing, peace and neutrality seem to be our duty and interest. We may gratify ourselves, indeed, with a neutrality as partial to Spain as would be justifiable without giving cause of war to her adversary: we might and ought to avail ourselves of the happy occasion of procuring and cementing a cordial reconciliation with her, by giving assurance of every friendly office which neutrality admits, and especially, against all apprehension of our meddling in the quarrel with her colonies. And I expect daily and confidently to hear of a spark kindled in France, which will employ her at home, and relieve Spain from all further apprehension of danger. That England is playing false with Spain cannot be doubted. Her government is looking one way and rowing another. * * * You will do what is right, leaving the people of Europe to act their follies and crimes among themselves, while we pursue in good faith the paths of peace and prosperity.—To President MO
Roe. viii, 287. FORD ED., x. 257. (M., June 1823.)

6714. POLICY (American), Resistance to wrong.—We believe that the just standing of all nations is the health and security of all. We consider the overwhelming power of England on the ocean, and of France on the land, as destructive of the prosperity and happiness of the world, and wish both to be reduced only to the necessity of observing moral duties. We believe no more in Bonaparte’s fighting for the liberty of the seas, than in Great Britain fighting for the liberties of mankind. The object of both is the same, to draw to themselves the power, the wealth and the resources of other nations. We resist the enterprises of England first, because they first come vitally home to us. And our feelings repel the logic of bearing the lash of George III. for fear of that of Bonaparte at some future day. When the wrongs of France shall reach us with equal force, we shall resist them also. But one at a time is enough; and having offered a choice to the champions, England first takes up the gauntlet.—To James Maury. vi, 52. Ford ed., ix, 349. (M., April 1812.)

6715. POLICY (American), A system of.—America has a hemisphere to itself. It must have its separate system of interests, which must not be subordinated to those of Europe.—To Baron von Humboldt. vi, 268. Ford ed., ix, 431. (Dec. 1813.)

6717. ——. Nothing is so important as that America shall separate herself from the systems of Europe, and establish one of her own. Our circumstances, our pursuits, our interests, are distinct; the principles of our policy should be so also. All entanglements with that quarter of the globe should be avoided if we mean that peace and justice shall be the polar stars of the American Societies. * * * This would be a leading principle with me, I had longer to live. * * * —To J. Correa. vii, 184. Ford ed., x, 164. (M., 1820.)

6718. ——. Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe. Our second, never to suffer Europe to interfere with our Atlantic affairs. America, North and South, has a set of interests distinct from those of Europe, and peculiarly her own. She should therefore have a system of her own, separate and apart from that of Europe. While the last is laboring to become the dominic of despottism, our endeavor should surely be, to make our hemisphere that of freedom.—To President Monroe. vii, 315. Ford ed., x, 277. (M., 1823.)

6719. POLICY (American), Wars of Europe.—The insulated state in which nature has placed the American continent, should so far avail it that no spark of war kindled in the other quarters of the globe should be wafted across the wide oceans which separate us from them. And it will be so. In fifty years more the United States alone will contain fifty millions of inhabitants, and fifty years are soon gone over. The peace of 1763 is within that period. I was then twenty years old, and of course remember well all the transactions of the war preceding it. And you will live to see the period equally ahead of us; and the numbers which will then be spread over the other parts of the American hemisphere, catching long before that the principles of our portion of it, and concurring with us in the maintenance of the same system. * * * I am anxious to see the events of which you will be the bearer to me in the Elysian fields fifty years hence.—To Baron von Humboldt. vi, 268. Ford ed., ix, 431. (Dec. 1813.)

6720. ——. Your exhortations to avoid taking any part in the war * * * in Europe were a confirmation of the policy I had myself pursued, one of which I thought well and think should be the governing canon of our republic.—To Madame de Stael. vi, 481. (M., July 1815.)

6721. ——. I hope no American patriot will ever lose sight of the essential policy of interdicting in the seas and territories of both America, our ferocious and sanctimonious contests of Europe.—To William Short. vii, 168. (M., 1820.)

6722. POLITENESS, European.—With respect to what are termed polite manners, without sacrificing too much the sincerity of language, I would wish my countrymen to adopt just so much of European politeness, as to be ready to make all those little sacrifices of self, which really render European manners amiable. Virtue.—society from the selection of those to which rudeness often subjects it. Here (France), it seems that a man might pass a life without encountering a single rudeness.—To Mr. Bellini. i, 445. (P., 1785.)

6723. POLITENESS, Good humor and. —I have mentioned good humor as one of the preservatives of our peace and tranquillity. It is among the most effectual, and its effect is more sustained and aided, artificially, by politeness, that this also becomes an acquisition of first rate value. In truth, politeness is artificial good humor; it covers the natural want of it, and ends by rendering habitual a substitute nearly equivalent to the real virtue. It is the practice of sacrificing to those whom we meet in society, all the little conveniences and preferences which will gratify them, and deprive us of nothing worth a moment’s consideration; it is the giving a pleasing and flattering turn to our expressions, which will conciliate others, and make them pleased with us as well as themselves. How cheap a price for the good will of another! When this is in return for a rude thing said by another, it brings him to his senses, it mortifies and corrects him in the most salutary way, and places him at the feet of your good nature, in the eyes of the company.—To Thomas Jefferson Randolph. v, 389. Ford ed., ix, 231. (W., 1808.)

6724. POLITICS, Bigotry in.—What an effort of bigotry in politics * * * have we gone through! The barbarians really flattered themselves they should be able to bring back the times of Vandalism, when ignorance put everything into the hands of power and priestcraft. All advances in science were proscribed as innovations. They pretended to praise and encourage education, but it was to be the education of our ancestors. We were to look backwards, not forwards for improvement; the President himself [John Adams] declaring in one of his answers to addresses, that we were never to expect to go beyond them in real science.—To Dr. Joseph Priestley. iv, 373. Ford ed., vii, 211. (W., 1801.)

6725. POLITICS, Commercial influence.—The system of alarm and jealousy which has been so powerfully played off in England has been mimicked here not entirely without success. The most long-sighted politician could not, seven years ago, have imagined that the people of this wide-extended country could have been enveloped in such delusion, and made so much afraid of themselves and their own power, as to surrender it spontaneously to those who are manoeuvring them into a form of government, the principal branches of which may be beyond their control. The commerce of England, however, has spread its roots over the whole face of our country. This is the real source of all the obliquities of the public mind.—To A. H. Rowan. iv, 256. Ford ed., vii, 280. (M., 1798.)

6726. POLITICS, Conversations on.—Political conversations I really dislike, and therefore avoid where I can without affectation. But when urged by others, I have never conceived that having been in public life requires me to belie my sentiments, or even to conceal them. When I am led by conversation to express them, I do it with the same independence here which I have practiced everywhere, and which is inseparable from my nature.—To President Washington. iv, 142. Ford ed., vii, 83. (M., 1796.)

6728. POLITICS, Differences in.—I never suffered a political to become a personal difference.—To Timothy Pickering. vii, 210. (M., 1821.)

6729. POLITICS, Dislike of.—It is a relief to be withdrawn from the torment of the scenes amidst which we are. Spectators of the heats and tumults of conflicting parties, we cannot help participating of their feelings. * * *.—To Martha Jefferson Randolph. Ford ed., v, 487. (Pa., March 1792.)

6730. POLITICS, Divorce from.—In my retirement I shall certainly divorce myself from all part in political affairs. To get rid of them is the principal object of my retirement, and the first thing necessary to the happiness which it is in vain to look for in any other situation.—To Benjamin Stoddert. v, 427. Ford ed., ix, 246. (W., 1809.)

6731. POLITICS, A duty.—Politics is my duty.—To Harry Innes. Ford ed., v, 294. (Pa., 1791.)

6732. POLITICS, Estrangement from.—I think it is Montaigne who has said that ignorance is the softest pillow on which a man can rest his head. I am sure it is true as to everything political, and shall endeavor to estrange myself to everything of that character.—To Edmund Randolph. iv, 101. Ford ed., vi, 408. (M., Feb. 1794.)

6733. POLITICS, French furnace of.—The gay and thoughtless Paris is now become a furnace of politics. All the world is now politically mad. Men and women, children talk nothing else, and you know that naturally they talk much, loud and warm. Society is spoiled by it, at least for those who, like myself, are but lookers on.—To Mrs. William Bingham. Ford ed., v, 9. (P., 1788.)

6734. POLITICS, Hateful.—The ensuing year will be the longest of my life, and the last of such hateful labors. The next we will sow our cabbages together.—To Martha Jefferson Randolph. Ford ed., v, 488. (March 1792.)

6735. ———. I am to thank you for forwarding M. d'Ivernois's book on the French Revolution. But it is on politics, a subject I never loved, and now hate.—To John Adams. Ford ed., vii, 56. (M., Feb. 1796.)

6736. POLITICS, Influencing.—I have made great progress into the MS., and still with the same pleasure. I have a doubt it must produce great effect. But that this may be the greatest possible, its coming out should be timed to the best advantage. It should come out just so many days before the meeting of Congress as will prevent suspicions of its coming with them, yet so as to be a new thing when they arrive, ready to get into their hands while yet unoccupied. * * * I will direct it to appear a fortnight before their meeting unless you order otherwise. It might as well be thrown into a churchyard, as come out now.—To James Madison. Ford ed., vi, 404. (Pa., 1793.)

6737. POLITICS, Knowledge of Europe.—I often doubt whether I should trouble Congress or my friends with * * * details of European politics. I know they do not excite that interest in America of which it is impossible for one to divest himself here. I know, too, that it is a maxim with us, and I think it a wise one, not to entangle ourselves with the affairs of Europe. Still, I think we should know them. The Turks have practiced the same maxim of not meddling in the complicated wranglings of this continent. But they have unwisely chosen to be ignorant of them also, and it is this total ignorance of Europe, its combinations, and its movements which exposes them to that annihilation possibly about taking place. While there are powers in Europe which fear our views, or have views on us, we should keep an eye on them, their connections and oppositions, that in a moment of need we may avail ourselves of their weakness with respect to others as well as ourselves, and calculate their designs and movements on all the circumstances under which they exist. Though I am persuaded, therefore, that these details are read by many with great indifference, yet I think it my duty to enter into them, and to run the risk of giving too much, rather than too little information.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 334. FORD ed., iv, 482. (P., 1787.)

6738. POLITICS, Liberation from.—I shall be liberated from the hated occupations of politics, and remain in the bosom of my family, my farm, and my books.—To MISS. CHURCH. FORD ed., vi, 455. (G., 1793.)

6739. POLITICS, A maxim in.—The maxim of your letter "slow and sure" is not less a good one in agriculture than in politics. I sincerely wish it may extricate us from the event of a war, if this can be done without saving our faith and our rights.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iv, 106. FORD ed., vi, 510. (M., May 1794.)

6740. POLITICS, Moral right and.—Political interest can never be separated in the long run from moral right.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ed., viii, 477. (W., 1806.)

6741. POLITICS, Neutrality in factional.—We must be neutral between the discordant republicans, but not between them and their common enemies.—To ROBERT SMITH. FORD ed., viii, 318. (M., 1804.)

6742. POLITICS, Pamphlets on.—You will receive some pamphlets * * * on the acts of the last session. These I would wish you to distribute, not to sound men who have no occasion for them, but to such as have been misled, are candid, and will be open to the conviction of truth, and are of influence among their neighbors. It is the sick who need medicine, and not the well.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iv, 289. FORD ed., vii, 354. (Pa., 1799.)

6743. POLITICS, Partizan.—You have found on your return [from Europe] a higher style of political difference than you had left here. I fear this is inseparable from the different constitutions of the human mind, and that degree of freedom which permits unrestrained expression.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iv, 176. FORD ed., vii, 128. (Pa., 1797.)

6744. POLITICS, Passions and.—You and I have formerly seen warm debates and high political passions. But gentlemen of different political would then speak to each other, and separate the business of the Senate from that of society. It is not so now. Men who have been intimate all their lives, cross the streets to avoid meeting, and turn their heads another way, lest they should be obliged to touch their hats. This may do for young men with whom passion is enjoyment; but it is afflicting to peaceable minds.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 191. FORD ed., vii, 154. (Pa., June 1797.)

6745. POLITICS, Price of wheat and.—Wherever there was any considerable portion of federalism, it has been so much reinforced by those of whose politics the price of wheat is the sole principle, that federalists will be retained from many districts of Virginia.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 443. (M., April 1809.)

6746. POLITICS, Property and.—I have had a proposition to meet Mr. [Patrick] Henry this month, to confer on the subject of a convention, to the calling of which he is now become a convert; * * * but the impropriety of my entering into consultation on a measure in which I would take no part, is a permanent one.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 118. FORD ed., vii, 11. (M., April 1795.)

6748. POLITICS, Pursuit of.—I am glad to find that among the various branches of science presenting themselves to your mind, you have fixed on that of politics as your principal pursuit. Your country will derive from this a more immediate and sensible benefit. She has much for you to do. For, though we may say with confidence, that the worst of the American constitutions is better than the best which ever existed before in any other country, and that they are wonderfully perfect for a first essay, yet every human essay must have defects. It will remain, therefore, to those now coming on the stage of public affairs, to perfect what has been so well begun by those going off it.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, Jr. ii, 175. FORD ed., iv, 403. (P., 1787.)

6749. ———. Having pursued your main studies [in France] about two years, and acquired a facility in speaking French, take a tour of four or five months through this country and Italy, return then to Virginia, and pass a year in Williamsburg under the care of Mr. Wythe; and you will be ready to enter on the public stage, with superior advantages.—To T. M. RANDOLPH, Jr. ii, 176. FORD ed., iv, 405. (P., 1787.)

6750. POLITICS, Reformation of.—Politics, like religion, holds up the torches of martyrdom to the reformers of error.—To MR. OGILVIE. v, 605. (M., 1811.)

6751. POLITICS, Retirement from.—I ought not to quit the port in which I am quietly moored to commit myself again to the stormy ocean of political or party contest.
to kindle new enmities, and lose old friends. No, tranquillity is the \textit{summum bonum} of old age, and there is a time when it is a duty to leave the government of the world to the existing generation, and to repose one's self under their protecting hand. That time is come with me, and I welcome it.—To \textsc{Samuel H. Smith}. \textit{Ford ed.}, x, 263. (M., Aug. 1823.) See Retirement.

6752. \textsc{Politics}, Revolution in.—Things have so much changed their aspect, it is like a new world. Those who knew us only from 1775 to 1793, can form no better idea of us now than of the inhabitants of the moon; I mean as to political matters.—To \textsc{Colonel Hawkins}. iv. 326. \textit{Ford ed.}, vii, 435. (Pa., March 1800.)

6753. \textsc{Politics}, Taxation and.—The purse of the people is the real seat of sensibility. It is to be drawn upon largely, and they will then listen to truths which could not excite them through any other organ.—To \textsc{A. H. Rowan}. iv. 257. \textit{Ford ed.}, viii, 281. (M., 1798.)

6754. — Excessive taxation  will carry reason and reflection to every man's door, and particularly in the hour of election.—To \textsc{John Taylor}. iv, 259. \textit{Ford ed.}, vii, 310. (M., 1798.)

6755. \textsc{Politics}, Torment of.—It is a relief to be withdrawn from the torment of the scenes amidst which we are. Spectators of the heats and tumults of conflicting parties, we cannot help participating of their feelings.—To \textsc{Martha Jefferson Randolph}. \textit{Ford ed.}, v, 487. (Pa., March 1792.)

6756. — Politics is such a torment that I would advise every one I love not to mix with it.—To \textsc{Martha Jefferson Randolph}. D. L. J., 262. (Pa., 1800.)

— \textsc{Polygraph}.—See \textit{Inventions},\textsc{Polygraphia}, Proposed State of.—See \textit{Western Territory}.

6757. \textsc{Poor}. Care of.—The poor who have neither property, friends, nor strength to labor, are boarded in the houses of good farmers, to whom a stipulated sum is annually paid. To those who are able to help themselves a little, or have friends from whom they derive some succor, inadquate however to their full maintenance, supplementary allowances, which enable them to live comfortably in their own houses, or in the houses of their friends.  From Savannah to Portsmouth, you will seldom meet a beggar. In the larger towns, indeed, they sometimes present themselves. These are usually foreigners, who have never obtained a settlement in any parish. I never yet saw a native American begging in the streets or highways.—Notes on \textit{Virginia}. viii, 375. \textit{Ford ed.}, iii, 230. (1782.)

6758. \textsc{Pope Pius VI.}, Influence of.—A dispute has arisen between the Papal See and the King of Naples, which may in its progress enable us to estimate what degree of influence that See retains at the present day. The Kingdom of Naples, at an early period of its history, became feudatory to the See of Rome, and in acknowledgment thereof, has annually paid a hackney to the Pope in Rome, to which place it has always been sent by a splendid embassy. The hackney has been refused by the King this year, and the Pope, giving him three months to return to obedience, threatens, if he does not, to proceed vigorously against him.—To \textsc{John Jay}. ii. 454. (P., 1788.)

6759. \textsc{Population}, America's capacity for.—The territory of the United States contains about a million of square miles, English. There is, in them, a greater proportion of fertile lands than in any part of the British dominions in Europe. Suppose the territory of the United States, then, to attain an equal degree of population with the British European dominions, they will have an hundred millions of inhabitants. Let us extend our views to what may be the population of North America, if we consider America, supposing them divided at the narrowest part of the Isthmus of Panama. Between this line and that of go° of north latitude, the northern continent contains about five millions of square miles, and south of this line of division the southern continent contains about seven millions of square miles.  Here are twelve millions of square miles which, at the rate of population before assumed, will nourish twelve hundred millions of inhabitants, a greater number than the present population of the whole globe is supposed to amount to. If those who have been awarded medals for the resolution of questions, about which nobody makes any question, those who have invited discussion on the pretended problem, "whether the discovery of America was for the good of mankind," if they, I say, would have viewed it only as doubling the numbers of mankind, and, of course, the quantum of existence and happiness, they might have saved the money and the reputation which their proposition has cost them.—To \textsc{M. de Meunier}. ix, 275. \textit{Ford ed.}, iv, 179. (P., 1786.)

6760. \textsc{Population}, Extension of.—The present population of the inhabited parts of the United States is only about ten to the square mile; and experience has shown that wherever we reach that, the inhabitants become uneasy, as too much compressed, and so go off in great numbers to search for vacant country. With sixty years their whole territory will be peopled at that rate. We may fix that, then, as the term beyond which the people of those States will not be restricted within their present limits; we may fix that population, too, as the limit which they will not exceed till the whole of those two continents are filled up to that mark, that is to say, till they shall contain one hundred and twenty millions of inhabitants.—To \textsc{M. de Meunier}. ix, 275. \textit{Ford ed.}, iv, 180. (P., 1786.)

6761. The soil of the country on the western side of the Mississippi, its climate and its vicinity to the United States, point it out as the first which will receive population from that nest. The British occupants will just have force enough to repress and restrain the emigrations to a certain degree of consistence. —To \textsc{M. de Meunier}. ix, 276. \textit{Ford ed.}, iv, 180. (P., 1786.)

6763. POPULATION, Growth of.—The census just now concluded, shows we have added to our population a third of what it was ten years ago. So far as there will be a duplication in twenty-three or twenty-four years. If we can delay but for a few years the necessity of vindicating the laws of nature on the ocean, we shall be the more sure of doing it with effect.

6764. Our growth is now so well established by regular enumerations through a course of forty years, and the same grounds of continuance so likely to endure for a much longer period, that, speaking in round numbers, we may safely call ourselves twenty millions in twenty years, and forty millions above all years. To Sir John Sinclair. vii, 22. (M., 1816.) See Emigration.

6765. POPULATION, Happiness and. —The increase of numbers during the last ten years, proceeding in a geometrical ratio, promises a duplication in a little more than twenty-two years. We contemplate this rapid growth, and the prospect it holds up to us, not with a view to the injuries it may enable us to do to the settlement of the extensive country still remaining vacant within our limits, to the multiplications of men susceptible of happiness, educated in the love of order, habituated to self-government, and using its blessings above all others. —Per ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 8. Ford ed., vii, 110. (1801.)

6766. POPULATION, Malefactors and. —The malefactors sent to America were not sufficient in number to merit enumeration as one class out of three which peopled America. It was at a late period of their history that this practice began.

I do not think the whole number sent would amount to two thousand, and being principally men, eaten up with disease, they married seldom and propagated little. I do not suppose that themselves and their descendants are at present four thousand, which is little more than one and a half part of the whole inhabitants. —To M. de Meunier. ix, 254. Ford ed., iv, 158. (P., 1786.)

6767. POPULATION, Preventing.—He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose, obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass other laws to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands. —DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

6768. POPULATION, Theories of Malthus.—Malthus's work on Population is a work of sound logic, in which some of the opinions of Adam Smith, as well as of the Economists, are ably examined. * * *

The differences of circumstances between th's and the old countries of Europe, furnish differences of fact whereon to reason in questions of political economy, and will consequently produce sometimes a difference of result. There, for example, the quantity of food is fixed, or increasing in a slow and only arithmetical ratio, and the proportion is limited by the necessary expenditure of births consequently add only to your mortality. Here the immense extent of uncultivated and fertile lands enables every one who will labor to marry young, and to raise a family of any size. Our food, then, may increase geometrically with our laborers, and our births, however multiplied, become effective. Again, there the best distri-

6769. PORTER (David), Complaint against.—Mr. Madison * * * suggests the expediency of immediately taking up the case of Captain Porter, against whom Mr. Erskine (P., 1790) the minister lodged a very serious complaint, for an act of violence committed on a British seaman in the Mediterranean. While Mr. Erskine was reminded of the mass of complaints we had against his government, he says, 'This is not satisfactory; it amounts to an insinuation against our moral and physical preference of the agricultural, over the manufacturing, man.' To M. Say. iv, 526. (W., Feb. 1804.) See Malthus.

6770. PORTUGAL, Commerce with. —I am in hopes Congress will send a minister to Lisbon. I know no country with which we are likely to cultivate a more useful commerce. I have impressed this in my private letters. —To John Adams. i, 536. (P., 1786.)

6771. [In arranging the treaty of commerce] we wished much to have had some privileges in their American possessions: but this was not to be effected. The right to import flour into Portugal, though not conceded by the treaty, we are not without hopes of obtaining. —To William Carmichael. i, 531. (P., 1786.)

6772. — — — While in London we entered into negotiations with the Chevalier Pinto, Ambassador of Portugal at that place. The only article of difficulty between us was a stipulation that our bread stuff should be received in Portugal in the form of flour as well as of grain. He approved of it himself, but observed that several Nobles, of great influence at their court, were the owners of wind-mills in the neighborhood of Lisbon which depended much for their profits on manufacturing our wheat, and that this stipulation would endanger the whole treaty. He signed it, however, and its fate was what he had candidly portended. — AUTOBIOGRAPHY. I. 64. FORD ED., i. 90. (1821.)

6773. PORTUGAL, Government of.— The government of Portugal is so peaceable and inoffensive that it has never any alterations with its friends. If their minister abroad writes them once a quarter that all is well, they desire no more.—To F. W. GILMER. vii. 5. FORD ED., x. 33. (M., 1816.)

6774. ——. During six and thirty years that I have been in situations to attend to the conduct and characters of foreign nations, I have found the government of Portugal the most just, inoffensive, and unambitious of any one with which we had concern, without a single exception. I am sure that this is the character of ours also. Two such nations can never wish to quarrel with each other.—To J. CORREA. vii, 184. FORD ED., x. 64. (M., 1820.)

6775. POSTERITY, Judgment of.—It is fortunate for those in public trust, that posterity will judge them by their works, and not by the malignant vituperations and invectives of the Pickering and Gardiners of their age.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 62. (M., 1817.)

6776. POSTERITY, Sacrifices for.—It is from posterity we are to expect remuneration for the sacrifices we are making for their service, of time, quiet and good will.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vii, 394. (M., 1825.)

6777. ——. It has been a great solace to me to believe that you are engaged in vindicating to posterity the course we have pursued for preserving to them, in all their purity, the blessings of self-government, which we have assisted, too, in acquiring for them.—To JOHN JAMES MADISON. vii, 435. FORD ED., x. 378. (M., 1826.)

6778. POST OFFICE, Appointments.—A very early recommendation * * * [was] given to the Postmaster General to employ no printer, foreman, or revolutionary tory in any of his offices.—To NATHANIEL MACON. iv. 307. (W., May 1801.)

6779. ——. The true remedy for putting those [Post office] appointments into a wholesome state would be a law vesting them in the President, but vesting them in the intervention of the Senate. That intervention would make the matter worse. Every Senator would expect to dispose of all the post offices in his visage, or perhaps in his State. At present the President has some control over those appointments by his will, but it is not collected by the intervention of... To President MADISON. FORD ED., ix. 460. (M., 1814.)

6780. POST OFFICE, Benefits of.—I wish the regulation of the post office, adopted by Congress * * *, could be put in practice. It was for the travel night and day, and to go their several stages three times a week. The speedy communication of intelligence is really of great consequence. So many falsehoods have been propagated that nothing now is believed unless coming from Congress or camp. Our people, merely for want of intelligence which they may rely on, are becoming lethargic and insensible of the state they are in.—To JOHN ADAMS. FORD ED., ii. 130. (May 1777.)

6781. POST OFFICE, The Colonial.— [The] exercises of usurped power [by Parliament] have not been confined to instances alone in which themselves were interested; but they have also intermediately with the regulation of the internal affairs of the Colonies. —RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i. 130. FORD ED., i. 434. (1774.)

6782. ——. The act of the 9th [year] of [Queen] Anne for establishing a post office in America, seems to have had little connection with British convenience, except that of accommodating his Majesty’s ministers and favorites with the sake of luxurious office.—Rights OF BRITISH AMERICA. i. 130. FORD ED., i. 434. (1774.)

6783. POST OFFICE, Expediting mails.—Congress have adopted the late improvement in the British post office, of sending their mails by the stages.—To WM. CARMICHAEL. i. 475. (P., 1785.)

6784. ——. I opened to the President a proposition for doubling the velocity of the post riders, who now travel about fifty miles a day, and might, without difficulty, go one hundred, by taking measures (by way-bills) to know where the delay is, when there is any.—The ANAS. ix, 101. FORD ED., i. 174. (1792.)

6785. ——. I am now on a plan with the Postmaster General to make the posts go from Philadelphia to Richmond in two days and a half instead of six, which I hope to persuade him is practicable.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v. 436. (P., 1792.)

6786. POST OFFICE, Foreign mails.— The person at the head of the post office here says he proposed to Dr. Franklin a convention to facilitate the passage of letters through the British office and ours, and that he delivered a draft of the convention proposed, that it might be sent to Congress. I think it possible he may be mistaken in this, as, on my mentioning it to Dr. Franklin, he did not recollect any such draft having been put into his hands. An answer, however, is expected by them. I mention it, that Congress may decide whether they will make any convention on the subject, and on what principle. The one proposed here was, that, for letters passing hence into America, the French postage should be collected by our post officers, and paid every six months, and for letters coming from America here, the American postage should be collected by the post officers here, and paid to us in like manner. A second plan, however, presents itself; that is, to suppose the sums to be thus collected, on each side, will be equal, or so nearly equal, that the balance will not pay for the trouble of keeping accounts, and for the little bickerings that the settlement of accounts and demands of the balances may occasion; and therefore, to make an exchange of postage. This would better secure our harmony; but I do not know that it would be agreed to here. If not the other might then be agreed to.—To JOHN JAY. i, 410. (P., 1783.)

6787. POST OFFICE, Infidelities in foreign.—The infidelities of the post offices, both of England and France, are not unknown to you. The former are the most rascally, because they retain one’s letters, not choosing to take the trouble of copying them. The latter, when they have taken copies, are so civil as to send the originals, rescaled clumsily with a composition, on which they have previously taken the impression of the seal.—To R. Izard, i, 442. (P., 1785.)

6788. — Send your letters by the French packet. They come by that conveyance with certainty, having first undergone the ceremony of being opened and read in the post office, which I am told is done in every country in Europe.—To James Monroe. Ford ed., iv, 33. (P., 1785.)

6789. — All letters [are] opened which come either through the French or English channel, unless trusted to a messenger. I think I never received one through the post office which was not generally discoverable by the smokiness of the wax and faintness of the reimpersion. Once they sent me a letter open, having forgotten to reseal it. —To Richard H. Lee. Ford ed., iv, 69. (P., 1785.)

6791. POST OFFICE. Newspaper postage.—I desired you * * * to send the newspapers notwithstanding the expense. I had then no idea of it. Some late instances have made me perfectly acquainted with it. I have, therefore been obliged * * * to have my newspapers from the different States, enclosed to the nature of some of my concerns, to desire Mr. Jay to pack the whole in a box, and send it * * * as merchandise. * * * In this way, they will cost me livres where they now cost me guineas.—To F. Hopkinson, i, 441. (P., 1785.)

6792. POST OFFICE. Patronage of.—I said to President Washington that I thought it would be advantageous to declare [that the Post office is included in the Department of State] for another reason, to wit, that the Department of Treasury possessed already such an influence as to swallow up the whole Executive powers, and that even the future Presidents, if they had the weight of character which himself possessed) would not be able to make head against this Department. That in urging this measure I had certainly no personal interest, since, if I was supposed to have any appetite for hawkeyes my career would certainly be exactly as short as his own, the intervening time was too short to be an object. My real wish was to avails the public of every occasion during the residue of the President's periods to place things on a safe footing.—The Anas. ix, 101. Ford ed., i, 174. (Feb, 1792.)

6793. POST OFFICE. Political spies in.—The interruption of letters is becoming so notorious, that I am forming a resolution of declining correspondence with my friends through the channels of the Post Office altogether.—To E. Randolph, iv, 192. Ford ed., vii, 156. (Pa., June 1797.)

6795. — To avoid the suspicions and curiosity of the post office, which would have been excited by seeing your name* and mine on the back of a letter, I have delayed acknowledging the receipt of your favor * * * till an occasion to write to an inhabitant of Wilmington gives me an opportunity of putting my letter under cover to him.—To Archibald Hamilton Rowan. iv, 256. Ford ed., vii, 280. (M., 1798.)

6797. — I shall follow your direction in conveying this [letter] by a private hand, though I know not as yet when one worthy of confidence will occur. * * * Did we ever expect to see the day, when, breathing nothing but sentiments of love, to our country and its freedom and happiness, our correspondence must be as secret as if we were engaged in its destruction!—To Elbridge Gerry, iv, 273. Ford ed., vii, 335. (Pa., 1799.)

6798. — A want of confidence in the post office deters me from writing to my friends on the subject of politics.—To Robert R. Livingston, iv, 297. Ford ed., vii, 368. (Pa., 1799.)

6799. — From the commencement of the ensuing session [of Congress], I shall trust the post offices with nothing confidential, persuaded that during the ensuing twelve months they will lend their inquisitorial aid to furnish matter for newspapers.—To James Madison, iv, 307. Ford ed., vii, 400. (M., Nov. 1799.)

6800. — One of your electors * * * offers me a safe conveyance at a moment when the post offices will be peculiarly suspicious and prying. Your answer may come by post without danger, if directed in some other handwriting than your own.—To Robert Livingston, iv, 339. Ford ed., vii, 466. (W., Dec. 1800.)

6801. — Mr. Brown’s departure for Virginia enables me to write confidentially what I could not have ventured to do in the post at this prying season.—To James Madison, iv, 342. Ford ed., vii, 470. (W., Dec. 1800.)

6802. — I shall neither frank nor subscribe my letter, because I do not choose to commit myself to the fidelity of the post office. For the same reason, I have avoided putting pen to paper through the whole summer, except on mere business, because I knew it was a prying season.—To Tench Coxe, iv, 345. Ford ed., vii, 474. (W., Dec. 1800.)

6803. — I dare not through the channel of the post hazard a word to you on the subject of the [Presidential] election. Indeed the interception and publication of my letters expose the republican cause, as well as my self personally, to such obloquy that I have come to a resolution never to write another sentence of politics in a letter.—To James Madison. Ford ed., vii, 484. (W., Feb. 1801.)

6804. — Several letters from you have not been acknowledged. By the post I dare not.—To James Monroe, iv, 354. Ford ed., vii, 490. (W., Feb. 1801.)

6805. POST OFFICE, Reformed.—Your letters through the post will now come safely.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 393. FORD ED., viii, 43. (W., March 1801.)

6806. ———. I trust that the post is become a safe channel to and from me. I have heard, indeed, of some extraordinary licences practiced in the post offices of your State, and there is nothing I desire so much as information of facts on that subject, to rectify the office. To GIDEON GRANGER. FORD ED., viii, 44. (W., March 1801.)

6807. POST ROADS, Building.—Have you considered all the consequences of your proposition respecting post roads? I view it as a source of boundless patronage to the Executive, jobbing to members of Congress and their friends, and a bottomless abyss of public money. You will begin by appropriating only the surplus of the Post Office revenues; but the other revenues will soon be called into their aid, and it will be the source of eternal scramble among the members, who can get the most money wasted in their State; and they will always get most who are meanest. We have thought, hitherto, that the roads of a State could not be so well administered even by the State Legislature, as by the magistracy of the county, on the spot. How will it be when a member of New Hampshire is to mark out a road for Georgia? Does the power to establish post roads, given you by the Constitution, mean that you shall make the roads, or only select from those already made, those on which there shall be a post? If the term be equivocal (and I really do not think it so,) which is the safer construction? That which permits a majority of Congress to go cutting down mountains and bridging of rivers, or the other, which, if too restricted, may be referred to the States for amendment, securing still due measure and proportion among us, and providing some means of information to the members of Congress tantamount to that ocular inspection, which, even in our county determinations, the magistrate finds cannot be supplied by any other evidence? The fortification of harbors was liable to great objection. But national circumstances furnished some color. In this case there is none. The roads of America are the best in the world except those of France and England. But does the state of our population, the extent of our internal commerce, the want of sea and river navigation, call for such expense on roads here, or are our means adequate to it?—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 131. FORD ED., vii, 63. (M., March 1796.)

6808. POST ROADS, Expense.—I very much fear the road system will be urged. The mines of Peru would not supply the moneys which would be wasted on this object, nor the patience of any people stand the abuses which would be incontrollably committed under it.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 344. FORD ED., vii, 472. (W., Dec. 1800.)

6809. POST ROADS, Robbery.—The Roads bill will be a bottomless abyss for money, the most fruitful field for * and the richest provision for jobs to favorites that has ever yet been proposed.—To CESAR RODNEY. FORD ED., viii, 473. (W., Dec. 1800.)

6810. POSTS (Western), England's detention of.—England shows no dispositions to enter into friendly connections with us. On the contrary, her detention of our posts seems to be the speck which is to produce a storm.—To R. IZARD. i, 442. (P., 1785.)

6812. POSTS (Western), France and.—The question * proposed [by you], "How far France considers herself as bound to insist on the delivery of the posts", would infallibly produce another, "How far we consider ourselves as guarantees of their American possessions, and bound to enter into any future war in which these may be attacked"? The lords of all power would not spring to the without ambiguity on either head, yet I should be afraid to commit Congress by answering without authority, I will endeavor on my return [from London to Paris] to sound the opinion of the minister, if possible without exposing myself to the other question. Should anything forcible be meditated on these posts, it would possibly be thought prudent, previously, to ask the good offices of France to obtain their delivery. In this case, they would probably say, we must first execute the treaty on our part by repealing all acts which have contravened it. Now this measure, if there be any candor in the court of London, would suffice to obtain a delivery of the posts from them without their being on board of the posts. However, if this mediation should be finally needed, I see no reason to doubt our obtaining it, and still less to question its omnipotent influence on the British court.—To JOHN JAY. i, 539. FORD ED., iv, 290. (L., March 1786.)

6813. POSTS (Western), Indian murders.—Were the western posts in our possession, it cannot be doubted but there would be an end to the first execrable committed by the Indians on our Northwestern frontier, and to a great part of the expense of our armaments in that quarter.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. FORD ED., vi, 321. (1793.)

6814. POTATO, Nativity of.—You say in your "General Geography" the potato is a native of the United States. I presume you speak of the Irish potato. I have inquired much into the question, and think I can assure you that the plant is not a native of North America. Zimmerman, in his "Geographical Zoology", says it is a native of Guiana; and Clavigers, that the Mexicans got it from South America, in the "natural canvas of history". The most probable account I have been able to collect is, that a vessel of Sir Walter Raleigh's, returning from Guiana, put into the west of Ireland in distress, having on board some potatoes which they called the "Irish potato", and circumstance of their being already sprouted, induced them to give them all out * Illegible in MS.

6816. POWER, Abuses.—Education is the true corrective of abuses of constitutional power.—To WILLIAM C. JARVIS. vii, 179. FORD ED., x, 161. (M., 1820.)

6817. POWER, Depositories of.—No other depositories of power [than the people themselves] have ever yet been found, which did not end in converting to their own profit the earnings of those committed to their charge.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 36. FORD ED., x, 45. (M., 1816.)

6818. I know no safe depository of the ultimate powers of the society but the people themselves; and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them, but to inform their discretion by education.—To WILLIAM C. JARVIS. vii, 179. FORD ED., x, 161. (M., 1820.)

6819. POWER, Exercise of.—I have never been able to conceive how any rational being could propose happiness to himself from the exercise of power over others.—To M. DESTUJT TRACY. v, 569. FORD ED., ix, 308. (M., 1811.)

6820. An honest man can feel no pleasure in the exercise of power over his fellow citizens. And considering as the only offices of power those conferred by the people directly, that is to say, the Executive and Legislative functions of the General and State Governments, the common refusal of these, and multiplied resignations, are proofs sufficient that power is not alluring to pure minds, and is not with them the primary principle of contest. This is my belief of it; it is that on which I have acted; and had it been a mere contest which should be permitted to administer the Government according to its genuine republican principles, there has never been a moment of my life in which I should have relinquished for it the enjoyments of my family, my farm, my friends and books.—To JOHN MELISH. vi, 96. FORD ED., ix, 376. (M., 1813.)

6821. In one sentiment of [your] speech I particularly concur,—’it if we have a doubt relative to any power, we ought not to exercise it’.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 343. FORD ED., x, 300. (M., 1824.)

6822. POWER, Independent.—It should be remembered, as an axiom of eternal truth in politics, that whatever power in any government is independent, is absolute also; in theory only, at first, while the spirit of the people is up, but in practice, as fast as that relaxes. Independence can be trusted nowhere but with the people in mass. They are inherently independent of all but moral law.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 134. FORD ED., x, 141. (P.F., 1819.)

6823. POWER, Limitation.—In a free country every power is dangerous which is not bound up by general rules.—To PHILIP MAZZEI. FORD ED., iv, 116. (P., 1785.)

6824. POWER, Origin of.—Hume, the great apostle of toryism, says [in his History of England, c. 159] “the Commons established a principle, which is noble in itself, and seems specious, but is belied by all history and experience, that the people are the origin of all just power”. And where else will this degenerate son of science, this traitor to his fellow men, find the origin of just power, if not in the majority of the society? Will it be in the minority? Or in an individual of that minority?—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 356. (M., 1824.)

6826. POWER, Perpetuation of.—The principles of our Constitution are wisely opposed to all perpetuations of power, and to every practice which may lead to hereditary establishments.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. v, 473. (M., 1809.)

6827. POWER, Perversion of.—Even under the best forms of government those entrusted with power have perverted it into tyranny.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. (1779.)

6828. POWER, Shifting.—I have never been so well pleased as when I could shift power from my own, on the shoulders of others.—To M. DESTUJT TRACY. v, 569. FORD ED., ix, 308. (M., 1811.)

6829. POWER, Use of.—I hope our wisdom will grow with our power, and teach us, that the less we use our power, the greater will it be.—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 465. FORD ED., ix, 520. (M., 1815.) See AUTHORITY.

6830. POWERS, Assumed.—I had rather ask an enlargement of power from the nation, where it is found necessary, than to assume it by a construction [of the Constitution] which would make our powers boundless.—To WILSON C. NICHOLAS. iv, 560. FORD ED., viii, 247. (M., 1803.)

6831. If, wherever the Constitution assumes a single power out of many which belong to the same subject, we should consider it as assuming the whole, it would vest the General Government with a mass of powers never contemplated. On the contrary, the assumption of particular powers...
seems an exclusion of all not assumed.—To Joseph C. Cabell. vi, 310. Ford ed., ix, 452. (M., 1814.)

6832. — — If the three powers maintain their mutual independence on each other our Government may last long, but not so if either can assume the authorities of the other.—To William C. Jarvis. vii, 179. Ford ed., x, 161. (M., 1820.)

6833. POWERS, Civil.—Civil powers alone have been given to the President of the United States, and no authority to direct the religious exercises of his constituents.—To Rev. Samuel Millar. v, 237. Ford ed., ix, 175. (W., 1808.) See Religion.

6834. POWERS, Conflicting.—The peculiar happiness of our blessed system is, that in differences of opinion between these different sets of servants [in the three departments of the Federal Government], the appeal is to neither, but to their employers, peaceably assembled by their representatives in convention.—To Spencer Roane. vii, 214. Ford ed., x, 190. (M., 1821.)

6835. POWERS, Constitutional.—To keep in all things within the pale of our constitutional powers, * * * [is one of] the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.—Second Annual Message. viii, 21. Ford ed., viii, 187. (Dec. 1802.)

6836. POWERS, Constructive.—The States supposed that by their Tenth Amendment, they had secured themselves against constructive powers. They were not lessened yet by Cohen's Case, nor aware of the slipperiness of the eels of the law. I ask for no straining of words against the General Government, nor yet against the States. I believe the States can best govern our home concerns, and the General Government our foreign ones. I wish, therefore, to see maintained that wholesome distribution of powers established by the Constitution for the limitation of both; and never to see all offices transferred to Washington, where, further withdrawn from the eyes of the people, they may more secretly be bought and sold as at market.—To William Johnson. vii, 297. Ford ed., x, 232. (M., 1823.)

6837. POWERS, Control by the people.—Unless the mass retains sufficient control over those intrusted with the powers of their government, these will be perverted to their own oppression, and to the perpetuation of wealth and power in the individuals and their families selected for the trust.—To Ma. Van der Kemp. vi, 45. (M., 1812.)

6838. POWERS, Delegated.—The Constitution of the United States * * * [has] delegated to Congress a power to punish treason, counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States,piracies, and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations, and no other crimes whatsoever; and it being true, as a general principle, and one of the amend-give any non-enumerated power, it will go to every one, for there is not one which ingenuity may not torture into a convenience in some instance or other, to some one of so long a list of enumerated powers. It would swallow up all the delegated powers, and reduce the whole to one power. Therefore it was that the Constitution restrained them to the necessary means, that is to say, to those means without which the grant of power would be nugatory.—National Bank Opinion, vii, 558. Ford ed., v, 287. (1791.) See manufactures.

6847. Powers, Nullification.—Where powers are assumed which have not been delegated, a nullification of the act is the rightful remedy.—Kentucky Resolutions, ix, 469. Ford ed., vii, 301. (1798.)

6848. Powers, Organization.—Whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends [life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness], it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.—Declaration of Independence as Drawn by Jefferson.

6849. Powers, Self-constituted.—I shall not undertake to draw the line of demarcation between private associations of laudable views and unimposing numbers, and those whose magnitude may rivalize and jeopardize the march of regular government. Yet such a line does exist. I have seen the days,—they were those which preceded the Revolution,—when even this last and perilous engine became necessary; but they were days which no man would wish to see a second time. That was the case where the regular authorities of the Government had combined against the rights of the people, and no means of correction remained to them but to organize a collateral power, which, with their support, might rescue and secure their violated rights. But such is not the case with our government. We need hazard no collateral power, which, by a change of its original views, and assumption of others we know not how virtuous or how mischievous, would be ready organized and in force sufficient to shake the established foundations of society, and endanger its peace and the principles on which it is based. Is not the machine* now proposed of this gigantic stature?—To Jedediah Morse. vii, 234. Ford ed., x, 204. (M., 1822.)

6850. — . Might we not as well appoint a committee for each department of the Government, to counsel and direct its head separately, as volunteer ourselves to counsel and direct the whole, in mass? And might we not do it as well for their foreign, their fiscal, and their military, as for their Indian affairs? And how many societies, auxiliary to the Government, may we expect to see spring up, in imitation of this, offering to associate themselves in this and that of its functions? In a word, why not take the Government out of its constitutional hands, associate them indeed with us, to preserve a semblance that the acts are theirs, but ensuring them to be our own by allowing them a minor vote only?—To Jedediah Morse. vii, 236. Ford ed., x, 206. (M., 1822.)

6851. Powers, Separation of.—The principle of the Constitution is that of a separation of Legislative, Executive and Judicial functions, except in cases specified. If this principle be not expressed in direct terms, it is clearly the spirit of the Constitution, and it ought to be so commented and acted on by every friend of free government.—To James Madison. iv, 161. Ford ed., vii, 108. (M., Jan. 1797.)

6852. Powers, Undelegated.—Whenever the General Government assumes undelegated powers, its acts are unauthoritative, void, and of no force.—Kentucky Resolutions, ix, 464. Ford ed., vii, 291. (1798.)

6853. — . This Commonwealth [Kentucky] is determined, as it doubts not its co-States are, to submit to undelegated, and consequently unlimited powers in no man, or body of men on earth.—Kentucky Resolutions, ix, 469. Ford ed., vii, 301. (1798.)

6855. Powers, Unlimited.—I have no idea of entering into the contest, whether it be expedient to delegate unlimited powers to our ordinary governors? My opinion is against that expediency; but my occupations do not permit me to undertake to vindicate all my opinions, nor have they importance enough to merit it.—To Noah Webster. iii, 203. Ford ed., v, 275. (Pa., 1790.) See Bank (U. S.), Constitutionality.

6856. PRADT (Abbe de), Writings of.—Of the character of M. de Pradt his political writings furnish a tolerable estimate, but not so full as you have favored me with. He is eloquent, and his pamphlet on colonies shows him ingenious. I was gratified by his Recit Historique, because, pretending, as all men do, to some character, and he to one of some di-
tinction, I supposed he would not place before the world the facts of glaring falsehood, on which so many living and distinguished witnesses could convict him.—To John Quincy Adams, vii, 87. (1784.)

6857. PRAISE, Undeserved.—To give praise where it is not due might be well from the venal, but it would ill become those who are asserting the rights of human nature.—Rights of British America. i, 141. FORD ED., i, 446. (1774.)

6858. PRECEDENT, Oppression and.—For what oppression may not a precedent be found in this world of the bellum omnium in omnii!—Notes on Virginia. viii, 371. FORD ED., iii, 235. (1782.)

6859. PRECEDENT, Power and.—One precedent in favor of power is stronger than an hundred against it.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 367. FORD ED., iii, 230. (1782.)

6860. PREEMPTION, Right of.—If the country, instead of being altogether vacant, is thinly occupied by another nation, the right of the native forms an exception to that of the new comers; that is to say, these will only have a right against all other nations except the natives. Consequently, they have the exclusive privilege of acquiring it by purchase or other just means. This is called the right of preemption, and is become a principle of the law of nations, fundamental with respect to America. There are but two means of acquiring the native title. First, war; for even war may terminate, give a just title. Second, contracts, or treaty.—Opinion on Georgian Land Grants. vii, 467. FORD ED., v, 166. (1790.)

6861. PREROGATIVE, Barriers against.—The privilege of giving or withholding our moneys is an important barrier against the undue exertion of prerogative, which if left altogether without control may be exercised by a despot.—To Lord North's Proposition. FORD ED., i, 477. (July 1775.)

6862. PRESBYTERIAN SPIRIT, Liberty and.—The Presbyterian spirit is known to be so congenial with friendly liberty, that the patriots, after the Restoration, finding that the humor of the people was running too strongly to exalt the prerogative of the crown, promoted the dissenting interest as a check and balance, and thus was produced the Toleration Act.—Notes on Religion. FORD ED., ii, 98. (1770?)

6863. PRESENTS, Declination of.—I return you my thanks for a bust of the Emperor Alexander [of Russia]. These are the more cordial, because of the value the bust derives from the sentiment in which its original is held by the world, and by none more than myself. It will constitute one of the most valued ornaments of the retreat I am preparing for myself at my native home. Since it had lain down as a law for my conduct while in office, and hitherto scrupulously observed, to accept of no present beyond a book, a pamphlet, or other curiosity of minor value; as well to avoid imputation on my motives of action, as to shut out a practice susceptible to such abuse. But manners for public characters in the Emperor, places his image in my mind above the scope of law. I receive it, therefore, and shall cherish it with affection. It nourishes the contemplation of all the good placed in his power, and of his disposition to do it.—To Mr. Harris. v, 6. (W., 1806.)

6864. ———. Mr. Granger has sent me the very elegant ivory staff of which you wished my acceptance. The motives of your wish are honorable to me, and gratifying, as they evidence the approbation of my public conduct by a stranger who has not viewed it through the partialities of personal or party influence. Be assured, Sir, that I am as grateful for the testimony, as if I could have accepted the token of it which you have so kindly offered. On coming into public office, I laid it down as my rule, never could my mind continue in it, to accept no present of any sensible pecuniary value. A pamphlet, a new book, or an article of new curiosity, have produced no hesitation, because of the power, for things of sensible value, however innocently offered in the first examples, may grow at length into abuse, for which I wish not to furnish a precedent. The kindness of the motives which led to this manifestation of your esteem, sufficiently prove there will be no objection to the assumption of the public trusts, which is essential to perfect tranquillity of mind.—To Samuel Hawkins. v, 393. (W., Nov. 1808.)

6865. PRESENTS, Diplomatic.—As custom may have rendered some presents necessary in the beginning or progress of this [negotiation of a treaty with the Emperor of Morocco] and before it is concluded, or even in a way to be concluded, we authorize you to conform to the custom, confiding in your discretion to hazard as little as possible before a certainty of the events, and the trust to be intrusted with the best information as to what persons, and in what form, these presents should be made, and to make them accordingly.—To Thomas Clay. i, 421. (P., 1785.)

6866. PRESENTS, To Foreign Ministers.—It was proposed that the medal [to be given to recalled foreign ministers] should always contain so much dollar worth of gold, as to presumed the gentleman would always keep this. The chain was to contain 365 links always, but these were to be proportioned in value to the time the person had been here, making each link worth so much for the length of residence. No expense was to be bestowed on the making, because it was expected they would turn the chain into money. Note by Jefferson. FORD ED., vi, 263. (1793.)

6867. ———. It has become necessary to determine on a present proper to be given to diplomatic characters on their taking leave of us; and it is concluded that a medal and chain of gold will be the most convenient. I have therefore, to ask the favor of you to order the dies to be engraved with all the dispatch practicable. The medal must be of thirty lines diameter with a loop on the edge to receive the chain. On one side, must be the arms of the United States, of which I send you a written description: * * * round them as a legend must be "The United States of America." The device of the other side will be some suggestion of a Columbia (a fine female figure) delivering the emblems of peace and commerce to a Mercury, and the date of our republic, to wit, 4th July, MDCCCLXXVI.—To William Short. iii, 142. (N.Y., 1790.)

6868. PRESENTS, To Indians.—I hope we shall give the Indians a thorough drubbing this summer, and I should think it better perhaps afterwards to take up the plan of liberal and repeated presents to them. This would be much the cheapest in the end and would save all the $3097 which is now being split; in time, too, it would produce a spirit of peace and friendship between us. The expense of a single expedition would last very long for presents.—To President Washington, iii, 248. Ford ed., v, 321. (Pa., 1791.)

6869. The giving medals and marks of distinction to the Indian chiefs * * * has been an ancient custom among time immemorial. These marks are considered as complimentary things, as marks of friendship to those who come to see us, or who do us good offices, conciliatory of their good will towards us, and not designed to produce a contrary disposition towards others. They confer no power, and seem to have taken their origin in the European practice, of giving medals or other marks of friendship to the negotiators of treaties and other diplomatic characters, or visitors of distinction. The British government, while it possessed here were the only nation who gave medals, gorgets, and bracelets to the savages, invariable, —To Carmichael and Short, iv, 15. Ford ed., vi, 336. (Pa., 1793.)

6870. PRESENTS, Public.—The bounties from one country, expressions of its approbation, are honors which it would be arrogance to refuse, especially where flowing from the willing only.—To Thomas Ritchie. Ford ed., x, 380. (M., 1826.)

6871. PRESENTS, Tribute and.—We rely that you will be able to obtain an acknowledgment of our treaty with Morocco, giving very moderate presents. As the amount of these will be drawn into precedent, on future similar repetitions of them, it becomes important. Our distance, our seclusion from the ancient world, its politics and usages, our agricultural occupations and habits, our poverty, and lastly, our determination to prefer war in all cases, to tribute under any form, and to any people whatever, will furnish you with topics for opposing and refusing high or dishonorable pretensions. —To Thomas Barclay, iii, 162. (Pa., 1791.)

—President, Administration and Cabinet.—See Administration and Cabinet.

6872. President, Depositions by.—If the defendant supposes there are any facts within the knowledge of the heads of departments, or of myself, which can be useful for his defence, from a desire of doing anything our situation will permit in furtherance of justice, we shall be ready to give him the benefit of it, by way of deposition through any persons whom the Court shall authorize to take our testimony at this place [Washington].—To George Hay, v, 97. Ford ed., ix, 57. (W., June 1807.)

6873. President, Direct vote for.—One part of the subject of one of your letters is of a nature which forbids my interference altogether. The amendment to the Constitution of which you speak, would be a remedy to a certain degree. So will a different amendment which I know will be proposed, to wit, to have no electors, but let the people vote directly, and the ticket which has a plurality of the votes of any State to be considered as receiving thereby the vote of the State.—To Albert Gallatin. Ford ed., viii, 94. (M., Sep. 1801.)

6874. ——. The President is chosen by ourselves, directly in practice, for we vote for A as elector only on the condition he will vote for B.—To Dupont de Nemours, vi, 590. Ford ed., x, 23. (P.F., 1816.)

6876. ——. That great opposition is and will be made by federalists to this amendment [to the Constitution], is certain. They know that if it prevails, neither a President nor Vice-President can ever be made but by the fair vote of the majority of the nation, of which they are not. That either their opposition to the principle of discrimination now, or their advocacy of it formerly was on party, not moral motives, they cannot deny. Consequently, they fix for themselves the place in the scale of moral rectitude to which they are entitled. I am a friend to the discriminating principle; and for a reason more than others have, inasmuch as the discriminated vote of my constituents will express unequivocally the verdict they wish to cast on my conduct.—To Thomas McKean. Ford ed., viii, 202. (W., Jan. 1804.)

6877. President, The judiciary and.—The interference of the Executive can rarely be proper where that of the Judiciary is so.—To George Hammond. Ford ed., vi, 298. (Pa., 1793.)

—President, Oath of office.—See Washington.

6878. President, Petitions to.—The right of our fellow citizens to represent to the public functionaries their opinion on proceedings interesting to them, is unquestionably a constitutional right, often useful, sometimes necessary, and will always be respectfully acknowledged by me.—To the New Haven Committee, iv, 402. Ford ed., viii, 68. (W., 1801.)

6879. President, Polish Kings and.—The President seems a bad edition of a Polish King.—To John Adams, ii, 316. (P., Nov. 1787.)

6880. ——. What we have lately read in the history of Holland, in the chapter on the Stadtholder,* would have sufficed to * See "Holland" in this volume.—EDITOR.
set me against a chief magistrate eligible for a long duration, if I had ever been disposed towards one; and what we have always read of the elections of Polish Kings should have forever excluded the idea of one continual for life.—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 318. FORD ED., iv, 466. (P., 1787.) See CONSTITUTION (FEDERAL).

6881. PRESIDENT, Reelection.—I fear much the effects of the perpetual reeligibility of the President. This is not thought of in America, and I have, therefore, no prospect of a change of that article [in the Constitution].—To WILLIAM STEPHENS SMITH. FORD ED., v, 3. (P., 1788.)

6882. ——. There is a strong feature in the new Constitution which I strongly dislike. That is the perpetual reeligibility of the President. Of this I expect no amendment at present because I do not see that anybody has objected to it on your side of the water. But it will be productive of cruel distress to our country, even in your day and mine. The importance to France and England, to have our government in the hands of a friend or a foe, will occasion their interference by money, and even by arms. Our President will be of much more consequence to them than a King of Poland. We must take care, however, that neither this, nor any other objection to the new form produces a schism in our Union.—To A. DONALD. ii, 355. (P., 1788.)

6883. ——. I dislike strongly [in the new Constitution] the perpetual reeligibility of the President. This, I fear, will make that an office for life, first, and then hereditary.  However, I shall hope that before there is danger of this change taking place in the office of President, the good sense and free spirit of our countrymen will make the changes necessary to prevent it.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 375. FORD ED., v, 8. (P., 1788.)

6884. ——. Reeligibility makes the President an officer for life, and the disasters inseparable from an elective monarchy, render it preferable, if we cannot tread back that step, that we should go forward and take refuge in an hereditary one. Of the correction of this article [in the new Constitution], I entertain no present hope, because I find it has scarcely excited an objection in America. And if it does not take place ere long, it assuredly never will. The natural progress of things is for liberty to yield and government to gain ground. As yet our spirits are free. Our jealousy is only put to sleep by the unlimited confidence we all repose in the person to whom we all look as our President. After him inferior characters may perhaps succeed, and awaken us to the danger which his merit has led us into.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 404. FORD ED., v, 20. (P., 1788.)

6885. ——. The perpetual reeligibility of the same President will probably not be cured during the life of General Washington. His merit has blinded our countrymen to the danger of making so important an officer reeligible.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii, 405. (P., Aug. 1788.)

6886. ——. The convention of Virginia annexed to their ratification of the new Constitution  propositions for specific alterations of the Constitution. Among these was one for rendering the President incapable of serving more than eight years in any term of sixteen. New York has followed the example of Virginia, * * * proposing amendments, * * * which concur as to the President, only proposing that he shall be incapable of being elected more than twice. But I own I should like better than either of these, what Luther Martin tells us was repeatedly voted and adhered to by the Federal Convention, and only altered about twelve days before their rising, when some members had gone off; to wit, that he should be elected for seven years, and incapable forever after.—To WILLIAM SHORT. ii, 480. FORD ED., v, 48. (P., 1788.)

6888. ——. The general voice * * * has not authorized me to consider as a real defect [in the new Constitution] what I thought and still think one, the perpetual reeligibility of the President. But three States out of eleven, having declared against this, we must suppose we are wrong, according to the fundamental law of every society, the lex majoris partis, to which we are bound to submit. And should the majority change their opinion, and become sensible that this trait in their Constitution is wrong, I would wish it to remain uncorrected, as long as we can avail ourselves of the services of our great leaders, whose talents and whose weight of character, I consider as peculiarly necessary to get the government so under way, as that it may afterwards be carried on by subordinate characters.—To DAVID HUMPHREYS. iii, 13. FORD ED., v, 90. (P., 1789.) See CONSTITUTION (FEDERAL).

6889. PRESIDENT, The senate and.—The transaction of business with foreign nations is Executive altogether. It belongs, then, to the head of that department, except as to such portions of it as are specially submitted to the Senate. Exceptions are to be construed strictly.—OPINION ON THE POWERS OF THE SENATE. vii, 465. FORD ED., v, 161. (1790.)

* "Not " is omitted in the FORD EDITION. It is in the original MS.—EDITOR.
6891. PRESIDENT, State executives and.—I have the honor to enclose you the draft of a letter to Governor Pinckney, and to observe, that I suppose it to be proper that there should, on fit occasions, be a direct correspondence between the President of the United States and the Governors of the States; and that it will probably be grateful to them to receive from the President, an-wswers to the letters they address to him.
The correspondence with them on any ordinary business, may still be kept up by the Secretary of State, in his own name.—To President
WASHINGTON. iii, 297. 1791.

6892. PRESIDENT, State powers and.
—As to the portions of power within each State assigned to the General Government, the President is as much the Executive of the State, as their particular governor is in relation to State powers.—To Mr. Goonow. vii, 251. (M., 1822.)

6893. PRESIDENT, Subpoenas for.—As to our personal attendance at Richmond, I am persuaded the Court is sensible, that paramount duties to the nation at large contrive the obligation of compliance with their summons in [Burr's] case; as they would, ought to receive a similar one, to attend the trials of Blennerhassett and others in the Mississippi Territory, courts instituted at St.
Louis and other places on the western waters, over any place, other than the sea of government. To comply with such calls would leave the nation without an Executive branch, whose agency, nevertheless, is understood to be so constantly necessary, that it is the sole branch which the Constitution requires to be always in function. It could not then mean that it should be withdrawn from its station by any coordinate authority.—To George HAY. v, 97. FORD ed., ix, 57. (W., June 1807.)

6894. ——. I did not see till last night the opinion of the Judge [Marshall] on the subpna ducem tecum against the President.
Considering the question there as coram non judice, I did not read his argument with much attention. Yet I saw readily enough, that, as is usual where an opinion is to be supported, right or wrong, he dwells much on smaller objections, and passes over those which are solid.
Laying down the position generally, that all persons owe obedience to subpnoeas he admits no exception unless it can be produced in his law books. But if the Constitution enjoins on a particular officer to be always engaged in a particular set of duties imposed on him, does not this supersede the general law, subjecting him to minor duties inconsistent with these?
The Constitution enjoins his constant agency in the concerns of six millions of people.
Is the law paramount to this, which calls on him on behalf of a single one? Let us apply the Judge's own doctrine to the case of himself and his brethren. The sheriff of Henrico summons him from the bench, to quell a riot somewhere in his county. The Federal judge is, by the general law, a part of the posse of the State sheriff. Would the judge abandon major duties to perform lesser ones? Again: the court of Orleans or Maine commands, by subpnoeas, the attendance of all the judges of the Supreme Court. Would they abandon their posts as judges, and the interests of millions committed to them, to serve the purposes of a single sheriff? The leading principle of our Constitution is the independence of the Legislature, Executive, and Judiciary of each other, and none are more jealous of this than the Judiciary. But would the Executive be independent of the Judiciary? Should it have power to the contrary of the latter, and to imprisonfor disobedience; if the several courts could bandy him from pillar to post, keep him constantly trudging from north to south and east to west, and withdraw him entirely from his constitutional duties? The Constitution that each branch should be independent of the others, is further manifested by the means it has furnished to each, to protect itself from enterprises of force attempted on them by the others, and to none has it given more effectual or diversified means than to the Executive. Again, because ministers can go into a court in London as witnesses, without interrupting to their executive duties, it is inferred that they would go to a court one thousand or one thousand five hundred miles off their post, and there to be dragged from Maine to Orleans by every criminal who will swear that their testimony " may be of use to him ". The Judge says, " it is apparent that the President's duties as Chief Magistrate do not demand his whole time, and are not to the neglect of obligations to our annual retirement from the seat of government. during the sickly season, he should be told that such arrangements are made for covering on the public business, at and between the several stations we take, that it goes on as usually there, as if we were at the seat of government. I pass more hours in public business at Monticello than I do here, every day; and it is much more laborious, because all must be done in writing.—To George HAY. v, 103. FORD ed., IX, 59. (W., June 1807.)

6895. As I do not believe that the District Courts have a power of commanding the Executive government to abandon superior duties and attend on them, at whatever distance, I am unwilling, by any notice of to which I am bound to set a stop, however dis-sanction a proceeding so preposterous. I enclose you, therefore, a letter, public and for the court, covering substantially all they ought to desire.—To George HAY. v, 191. (M., Sep-1807.)

6896. The enclosed letter is written in a spirit of conciliation and with the desire to avoid conflicts of authority between the high branches of the government, which would discredit it equally at home and abroad.
That Burr, and his use of force in the New [ struck out " divert the public attention from him to this battle of giants was to be"] I convert his trial into a contest between the Judiciary and Executive authorities, was to be expected.
But that the Chief Justice should consent to it, and take the first step to bring it on, was not expected. Nor can it be now believed that his prudence or good sense will permit him to press it. But should he, contrary to expectation, proceed to issue any process which should involve the presence of force, or to attempt to obligate persons of the Executive or heads of departments, I must desire you to give me instant notice, and by express if you find that can be quicker done than by post ; and that, moreover, you will advise the marshal on his conduct, as he will be critically placed between us. His safest way will be to take no part in the exercise of any act of force ordered in this case. The powers given to the Executive by the Constitution are sufficient to protect the other branches from Judiciary usurpation of preeminence, and even inadmissible also from Judiciary vengeance, and the marshal may be assured of its effectual exercise to cover him. I hope, however, that the discretion of the Chief Justice will suffer this question to lie over for the present, and at the ensuing session of the Legislature he may have means provided for giving to individuals the benefit of the testimony of the Executive functionaries in proper cases, without breaking up the Government. Will not the associate judge assume to divide his court and procure a truce at least in so critical a conjuncture? *

6897. PRESIDENCY, Burden.—I part with the powers entrusted to me by my country, as with a burden of heavy bearing.—R. To A. Citizens of Washington. viii, 158. (March 4, 1809.)

6898. PRESIDENCY, Corruption and.—I sincerely wish we could see our government so secured as to depend less on the character of the person in whose hands it is trusted. Bad men will sometimes get in, and with such an immense patronage, may make great progress in corrupting the public mind and principles. This is a subject with which wisdom and patriotism should be occupied.—To Moses Robinson. iv, 380. (W., March 1801.)

6899. PRESIDENCY, Electoral college.—The contrivance in the Constitution for marking the votes works badly, because it does not enounce precisely the true expression of the public will.—To Tench Coxe. iv, 345. Ford ed., vii, 474. (W., Dec. 1800.)

6900.—I have ever considered the constitutional mode of election ultimately by the Legislature, voting by States, as the most dangerous blot in our Constitution, and one which some unlucky chance will some day hit, and give us a pope and anti-pope. I looked, therefore, with anxiety to the amendment proposed by Colonel Taylor at the last session of Congress, which I thought would be a good substitute, if on an equal division of the electors, after a second appeal to them, the ultimate decision between the two highest had been given by it to the Legislature, voting per capita. But the States are now so numerous that I despair of ever seeing another amendment to the Constitution, although the innovations of time will certainly call, and now already call, for some, and especially the smaller States are so numerous as to render desperate every hope of obtaining a sufficient number of them in favor of "Phocion's" proposition. Another general convention can alone relieve us. What, then, is the best palliative of the evil in the meantime? Another short question points to the answer. Would we rather the choice should be made by the Legislature voting in Congress by States, or in caucus per capita? The remedy is indeed bad, but the disease worse.—To George Hay. Ford ed., x, 264. (M., Aug. 1823.)

6901. PRESIDENCY, Expenses of.—I had hoped to keep the expenses of my office within the limits of its salary, so as to apply my private income entirely to the improvement and enlargement of my estate; but I have not been able to do it.—To Rev. Charles Clay. v, 27. Ford ed., ix, 6. (W., 1807.)

6902. PRESIDENCY, Jefferson, Adams and.—My letters inform me that Mr. Adams speaks of me with * * * satisfaction in the prospect of administering the government in concurrence with me. * * * If by that he meant the Executive Cabinet, both duty and inclination will shut that door to me. I cannot have a wish to see the scenes of 1793 revived as to myself, and to descend daily into the arena, like a gladiator, to suffer martydom in every conflict. As to duty, the Constitution will know me only as the member of a legislative body; and its principle is that of a separation of Legislative, Executive, and Judicial functions, except in cases specified. If this principle be not expressed in direct terms, yet it is clearly the spirit of the Constitution, and it ought to be so commented and acted on by every friend to free government.—To Mr. Madison. iv, 161. Ford ed., vii, 107. (January 1797.)

6903.—No arguments were wanting to reconcile me to a relinquishment of the first office, or acquiescence under the second. As to the first it was impossible that a more solid unwillingness, settled on full calculation, could have existed in any man's mind, short of the degree of absolute refusal. The only view on which I would have gone into it for awhile was to put our vessel on her republican tack, before she should be thrown too much to leeward of her true principles. As to the second, it is the only office in the world which I cannot decide in my own mind, whether I had rather have it or not have it. Pride does not enter into the estimate. For I think with the Romans of old, that the general of to-day should be a common soldier to-morrow if necessary.—To James Madison. iv, 155. Ford ed., vii, 98. (Jan. 1797.)

6905.—As to Mr. Adams, particularly, I could have no feelings which would revolt at being placed in a secondary station to him. I am his junior in life, was his junior in Congress, his junior in the diplomatic line, his junior lately in the civil

6906. PRESIDENCY, Jefferson, Madison and.—I do not see in the minds of those with whom I converse, a greater affliction than the fear of your retirement; but this must not be, unless to a more splendid and a more decided post. There I should rejoice to see you; I hope I may say, I shall rejoice to see you. I have long had much in my mind to say to you on that subject. But double delicacies have kept me silent. I ought perhaps to say, while I would not give up my own retirement for the empire of the universe, how I can justify wishing one whose happiness I have so much at heart as yours, to take the front of the battle which is fighting for my security. This would be easy enough to be done, but not at the heel of a lengthy epistle.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 112. FORD ED., vi, 519. (M., Dec. 1794.)

6907. In my letter * * * I expressed my hope of the only change of position I ever wished to see you make, and I expressed it with entire sincerity, because there is not another person in the United States, who being placed at the helm of our affairs, my mind would be so completely at rest for the fortune of our political bark. The wish, too, was pure, and unmixed with anything respecting myself personally. For as to myself, the subject had been thoroughly weighed and decided on, and my retirement from office had been meant from all office high or low, without exception. I can say, too, with truth, that the subject had not been presented to my mind by any vanity of my own. I know myself and my fellow citizens too well to have ever thought of it. But the idea was forced upon me by continual insinuations in the public papers, while I was in office. As all these came from a hostile quarter, I knew that their object was to poison the public mind as to my motives, when they were not able to charge me with facts. But the idea being once presented to me, my own quiet required that I should face it and examine it. I did so thoroughly, and had no difficulty to see that every reason which had determined me to retire from the office I then held, operated more strongly against that which was insinuated to be my object. I decided then on those general grounds which could alone be present to my mind at the time, that I said, reputation, tranquillity, labor; for as to public duty, it could not be a topic of consideration in my case. If these general considerations were sufficient to ground a firm resolution never to permit myself to think of the office, or to be thought of for it, the special ones which have supervened on my retirement, still more imperiously bar the door to it. My health is entirely broken down within the last eight months; my age requires that I should place my affairs in a clear state; these are sound if taken care of, but capable of considerable dangers if longer neglected; and above all things, the delights I feel in the society of my family, and the agricultural pursuits in which I am so eagerly engaged. The little spice of ambition which I had in my younger days has long since evaporated, and I set still less store by a posthumous than present name. In stating to you the heads of reasons which have produced my determination, I do not mean an opening for future discussion, or that I may be reasoned out of it. The question is forever closed with me; my sole object is to avail myself of the first opening ever given me from a friendly quarter (and I could not with decency do it before), of preventing any division or loss of votes, which might be fatal to the republican interest. If that has any chance of prevailing, it must be by avoiding the loss of a single vote, and by concentrating all its strength on one object. Who this should be, is a question I can more freely discuss with anybody than yourself. In this I feel painfully the loss of Monroe. Had he been here, I should have been at no loss for a channel through which to make myself understood, if I have been misunderstood by anybody through the instrumentality of Mr. Fenno and his abetors.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 116. FORD ED., vii, 8. (M., April 1795.)

6908. — — —. I think our foreign affairs never wore so gloomy an aspect since the year 1783. Let those come to the helm who think they can steer clear of the difficulties. I have no confidence in myself for the undertaking.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 150. FORD ED., vii, 92. (M., Dec. 1796.)

6909. — — —. The honeymoon would be as short in that case [election to the Presidency] as in any other, and its moments of ecstasy would be ransomed by years of torment and hatred.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 152. FORD ED., vii, 93. (M., Dec. 1796.)

6910. You, who know me, know that my private gratifications would be most indulged by that issue, which should leave me most at home. If anything supercedes this propensity, it is merely the desire to see this government brought back to its republican principles.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 309. FORD ED., vii, 402. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

6911. PRESIDENCY, Misery in.—The second office of the government is honorable and easy; the first is but a splendid misery.—To ELERIDGE GERRY. iv, 171. FORD ED., vii, 120. (Pa., 1797.)

6912. PRESIDENCY, Relection to.—I sincerely regret that the unbounded calumnies of the federal party have obliged me to throw myself on the verdict of my country for trial. my great desire having been to retire, at the end of the present term, to a life of tranquillity; and it was my decided purpose when I entered into office. They force my continuance. If we can keep the vessel of State as steadily in her course for another four years, my earthly purposes will be accomplished, and I shall be free to enjoy

6913. PRESIDENCY, Reputation and.

No man will ever bring out of the presidency the reputation which carries him into it.—To Edward Rutledge. iv, 152. Ford ed., vii, 93. (M., 1796.)

6914. — —. I have learned to expect that it will rarely fall to the lot of imperfect man to retire from this station with the reputation and the favor which bring him into it.—First Inaugural Address. viii. 5. Ford ed., viii, 5. (1801.)

6915. PRESIDENCY, Tired of the.—I am tired of an office where I can do no more good than many others, who would be glad to be employed in it. To myself, personally, it brings nothing but unceasing drudgery and daily loss of friends. Every office becoming vacant, every appointment made, me donne un ingrat, et cent ennemis. My only consolation is in the belief that my fellow citizens at large will give me credit for good intentions.—To John Dickinson. v. 31. Ford ed., ix, 10. (W., Jan. 1807.)

6916. PRESIDENCY, Unattractive.—Neither the splendor, nor the power, nor the difficulties, nor the fame or defamation, as may happen, attached to the First Magistracy, have any attractions for me.—To James Sullivan. iv, 168. Ford ed., vii, 117. (M., 1797.)

PRESS (Copying).—See Copying Press and Inventions.

6917. PRESS (Freedom of the), Abolished.—The press, the only tocsin of a nation, is completely silenced in France.—To Thomas Cooper. i, 452. Ford ed., vii, 177. (W., Nov. 1802.)

6918. PRESS (Freedom of the), Abused.—The firmness with which the people have withstood the late abuses of the press, the discernment they have manifested between truth and falsehood, show that they may safely be trusted to hear everything true and false, and to form a correct judgment between them.—To Judge Tyler. iv, 549. (W., 1804.)

PRESS (Freedom of the), Bill of Rights and.—See Bill of Rights.

6919. PRESS (Freedom of the), Control of.—While we deny that Congress have a right to control the freedom of the press, we have ever asserted the right of the States, and their exclusive right, to do so. They have accordingly, all of them, made provisions for punishing slander. * * * In general, the State laws appear to have made the presses responsible for slander as far as is consistent with its useful freedom. In those States where they do not admit even the truth of allegations to protect the printer, they have gone too far.—To Mrs. John Adams. iv, 561. Ford ed., viii, 311. (M., 1804.)

6920. PRESS (Freedom of the), The Constitution and.—It is true as a general principle, and is also expressly declared by one of the amendments to the Constitution, that “the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people; and   no power over the freedom of religion, freedom of speech, or freedom of the press being delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, all lawful powers respecting the same, did right remain, and were reserved to the States or the people.   Thus was manifested their determination to retain to themselves the right of judging how far the licentiousness of speech, and of the press, may be abridged without lessening their useful freedom, and how far those abuses which cannot, be separated from their use should be tolerated, rather than the use be destroyed. And thus also they guarded against all abridgment by the United States of the freedom of religious opinion and exercises, and retained to themselves the right of protecting the same, as this State [Kentucky] by a law passed on the general demand of its citizens, had already protected them from all human restraint or interference.   In addition to this general principle and express declaration, another and more special provision has been made by one of the amendments to the Constitution, which expressly declares, that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press,” thereby guarding in the same sentence, and under the same words, the freedom of religion, of speech and of the press; insomuch, that whatever violates either, throws down the sanctuary which covers the others, and that libels, falsehood, and defamation, equally with heresy and false religion, are withheld from the cognizance of Federal tribunals.

* * * Therefore, the act of Congress of the United States passed on the 14th day of July, 1798, intituled, “An Act in addition to the act intituled ‘An Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,’ which does abridge the freedom of the press, is not law, but is altogether void, and of no force.—Kentucky Resolutions. ix, 465. Ford ed., vii, 294. (1798.)

6921. — —. I am for freedom of the press, and against all violations of the Constitution to silence by force and not by reason the complaints or criticisms, just or unjust, of our citizens against the conduct of their agents.—To Elbridge Gerry. iv, 269. Ford ed., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

6922. PRESS (Freedom of the), Government and.—No government ought to be without censors; and where there is no free, no one ever will.—To President Washington. iii, 457. Ford ed., vi, 108. (M., 1792.)

6923. — —. Conscious that there was not a truth on earth which I feared should be known, I have lent myself willingly as the subject of a great experiment, which was to prove that an administration, conducting itself with integrity and common understanding, cannot be battered down, even by the falsehoods of a licentious press, and consequently still less by the press, as restrained within the legal and wholesome limits of freedom. This experiment was wanting for the world to demonstrate the falsehood of the pretext that freedom of the press is incompatible with orderly government. I have never, therefore, even contradicted the thousands of calumnies so industriously propagated against myself. But the fact being once established, that the press is impotent when it abandons itself to falsehood, I leave it to others to restore it to its strength, by recalling it within the pale of truth. Within that, it is a noble institution, equally the friend of science and of civil liberty.—To Thomas Seymour, v, 43. FORD ED., ix, 30. (W., Feb. 1807.)

6924. PRESS (Freedom of the), Invasions of.—There are rights which it is useless to surrender to the government, and which governments have yet always been found to invade. [Among] are the rights of thinking and publishing, our thoughts by * * * writing.—To David Humphreys, iii, 13. FORD ED., v, 80. (P. 1789.)

6925. PRESS (Freedom of the), Libels.—Printing presses shall be subject to no other restraint than liability to legal prosecution for false facts printed and published.—Proposed Constitution for Virginia, viii, 452. FORD ED., iii, 332. (1783.)

6926. Printing presses shall be free except as to false facts published maliciously, either to injure the reputation of another, whether followed by pecuniary damages or not, or to expose him to the punishment of the law.—Notes on a Constitution. FORD ED., vi, s21. (1794.)

6927. PRESS (Freedom of the), Liberty and.—Our liberty depends on the freedom of the press, and that cannot be limited without being lost.—To Dr. James Currie. FORD ED., iv, 132. (P. 1786.)

6928. The liberty of speaking and writing guards our other liberties.—Reply to Address. viii, 129. (1808.)

6929. PRESS (Freedom of the), Mankind and.—The press is the best instrument for enlightening the mind of man, and improving him as a rational, moral, and social being.—To M. Coray. vii, 324. (M., 1823.)

6930. PRESS (Freedom of the), Principle of government.—Freedom of the press I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently, [one] which ought to shape its administration.—First Inaugural Address. viii, 4. FORD ED., vii, 5. (1801.)

6931. There are certain principles in which the constitutions of our several States all agree, and which all cherish as vitally essential to the protection of the life, liberty, property and safety of the citizens. [One is] Freedom of the Press, subject only to liability for personal injuries.—To M. Coray. vii, 323. (M., 1823.)

6932. PRESS (Freedom of the), Private Injury.—Printing presses shall be free, except so far as, by commission of private injury, causation may be given of private action.—Proposed V. Constitution. FORD ED., ii, 27. (June 1776.)

6933. PRESS (Freedom of the), Reform through.—This formidable censor of the public functionaries, by arraigning them at the tribunal of public opinion, produces reform, if not essential, which must otherwise be done by revolution.—To M. Coray. vii, 324. (M., 1823.)

6934. PRESS (Freedom of the), Safety in.—Where the press is free, and every man able to read, all is safe.—To Charles Yanney. vi, 517. FORD ED., x, 4. (M., 1816.)

6935. PRESS (Freedom of the), Security in.—The only security of all is in a free press. The force of public opinion cannot be resisted, when permitted freely to be expressed. The agitation it produces must be submitted to. It is evident that to keep the waters pure.—To Marquis Lafayette, vii, 325. FORD ED., x, 280. (M., 1823.)

6936. PRESS (Freedom of the), Shackled.—Nor should we wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * [the French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review the shackles * * * on the freedom of the press by the Censures. AUTOBIOGRAPHY, i, 86. FORD ED., i, 118. (1821.) See Editors, Newspapers, and Publicity.

6937. PRICE, Basis of. The adequate price of a thing depends on the capital and labor necessary to produce it. In the term capital, I mean to include science, because capital as well as labor has been employed to acquire it. Two things requiring the same capital and labor, should be of the same price. If a gallon of wine requires for its production the same capital and labor with a bushel of wheat, they should be expressed by the same price, derived from the application of a common measure to them.—To J. W. Eppes. vi, 233. FORD ED., ix, 406. (M., 1813.)

6938. PRICE OF WHEAT.—The average price of wheat on the continent of Europe, at the commencement of its present war with England, was about a French crown, or one hundred and ten cents, the bushel. With us it was one hundred cents, and consequently we could send it there in competition with their own. That ordinary price has now doubled with us, and more than doubled in England; and although a part of this augmentation may proceed from the war demand, yet from the extraordinary nominal rise in the prices of land and labor here, both of which have nearly doubled in that period, and are still rising with every new bank. It is evident that were a general peace to take place to-morrow, and time allowed for the reestablishment of commerce, justice and order, we could not raise wheat for much less than two dollars, while the continent of Europe, having no paper circulation, and that of its specie not being augmented, would raise it at their former price of one hundred and ten cents. It follows, then, that with our redundancy of paper, we cannot, after peace, send a bushel of wheat to Europe, unless extraordinary circumstances double its price in particular places, and that then the exporting countries of Europe could undersell us.—To J. W. EPPS, vi, 242. FORD ED., ix, 414. (M., Nov. 1813.)

6930. PRIESTLEY (Joseph), Author.—The papers of political arithmetic in your pamphlet, and the most precious gifts that can be made us; for we are running navigation mad, and commerce mad, and navy mad, which is worst of all. * * * From the "Porcupines" of our country you will receive no thanks; but the great mass of our nation will edify and thank you.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 311. FORD ED., vii, 406. (Pa., Jan. 1800.) See Government, Works on.

6940. PRIESTLEY (Joseph), Dupont and.—I have a letter from Mr. Dupont [de Nemours], since his arrival at New York. * * * How much it would delight me if a visit from you at the same time, were to show us two such illustrious foreigners embracing each other in my country, would prove what we are and is great and good.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 317. FORD ED., vii, 415. (Pa., 1800.)

6941. PRIESTLEY (Joseph), Persecuted.—How deeply have I been chagrined and mortified at the persecutions which fanaticism and monarchy have excited against you, even here. At first I believed it was merely a continuance of the English persecution. But I observe that on the demise of "Porcupine" and division of his inheritance between Fennó and Brown, the latter (though succeeding only to the federal portion of Porcupinism, not the Anglican, which is Fennó's part) serves up for the palate of his sect, dishes of abuse against you as high seasoned as "Porcupine's" were. You are damned against church and king, and can, therefore, never be forgiven.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. iv, 311. FORD ED., vii, 406. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)

6942. PRIESTLEY (Joseph), Revered.—I reverence the character of no man living more than his.—To THOMAS COOPER. v, 182. (M., 1807.)

6943. PRIESTLEY (Joseph), Services.—No man living had a more affectionate respect for Dr. Priestley. In religion, in politics in physics, no man has rendered more service.—To THOMAS COOPER. v, 121. FORD ED., ix, 102. (W., 1807.)

6944. PRIESTLEY (Joseph), Welcome to.—Yours is one of the few lives precious to mankind, and for the continuance of which every thinking man is solicitous. Bigots may be an exception. What an effort, my dear sir, of bigotry in politics and religion we have gone through. The barbarians really flattened themselves they should be able to back the time of Vandalism with ignorance put everything into the hands of power and priesthood. All advances in science were proscribed as innovations. They pretended to praise and encourage education, but it was to be an edition of our ancestors. We were to look backwards, not forwards, for improvement: the President himself [John Adams] declaring, in one of his answers to addresses, that we were never to expect to go beyond them in real science. This was the real ground of all the attacks on you. * * * Our countrymen have recovered from the alarm into which art and industry had thrown them; science and honesty are now the high ground; and you, as their great apostle, are on the ascent. I have with heartfelt satisfaction that, in the first moments of my public action, I can hail you with welcome to our land, tender to you the homage of its respect and esteem, cover you under the protection of those laws which were made for the wise and good like you, and disclaim the legitimacy of that libel on legislation which under the form of a law was for some time placed among them.—To JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. vii, 373. FORD ED., viii, 21. (W., March 1801.)

6945. PRIMOGENITURE, Abolition of law.—As the law of Descents, and the Criminal law fell, of course, within any portion [in the revision of the Virginia Code]. I wished the Committee to settle the leading principles of these, as a guide for me in framing them; and, with respect to the first, I proposed to abolish the law of primogeniture, and confirm the estate descpicable in parcerary to the next of kin, as personal property, is, by the statute of distribution. Mr. Pendleton wished to preserve the right of primogeniture, but seeing at once that the mode of working it was found, he proposed we should adopt the Hebrew rule, and divide, and give a double portion to the elder son. I observed that if the eldest son could eat twice as much, or do double work, it might be a natural evidence of his right to a double portion; but, living on so much of this, and his brothers and sisters, he should be on a par also in the partition of the patrimony; and such was the decision of the other members. * * *—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 43. FORD ED., i, 59. (1821.)

6946. PRIMOGENITURE, Feudal and unnatural.—The abolition of primogeniture, and equal partition of inheritances, removed the feudal and unnatural distinctions which made one generation the possessors of the rest poor, substituting equal partition, the best of all Agrarian laws.*—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 49. FORD ED., i, 69. (M., 1821.) See Entails.

* Jefferson wrote on the margin "Allen Law".—EDITOR.

* The preamble to this great law is as follows: "Whereas, the perpetuation of property in certain families, by means of gifts made to them in fee tail, is contrary to good policy, tends to deceive fair traders, who give credit on the visible possession of such estates, discourages the holders thereof from taking care and improving the same, and sometimes does injury to the morals of youth, by rendering them independent of, and disobedient to their parents; and whereas, in the former times, such estates tailie, by special act of Assembly, formed for every particular case, employed very much of the time of the Legislative body, and that the method of defeating such estates, when of small value, was burdensome to the public, and also to individuals. Be it therefore enacted."—EDITOR.

It was a grandious move. From generation to generation lards and slaves—almost the only valuable kind of property in Virginia. Vindicated down protesting against creditors, even against the very extravagance of spendthrift owners; and it was largely by this means that the quasi-feudalism of the colony had been overcome, and maintaining itself. A great groan seemed to go up from all respectable society at the terrible suggestion of Jefferson, a suggestion daring that it is a Assembly thickly sprinkled with influential delegates strongly bound by family ties and self-interest to defend the present system. * * * Thus was a great social revolution wrought in a few months by one man.* * * But his brilliant triumph cost him a price. That distinguished class, whose existence as 6947. PRINCIPLE, Departure from.—A departure from principle in one instance becomes a precedent for a second; that second for a third; and so on, till the bulk of the society is reduced to be mere automatons of misery, to have no sensibilities left but for sin and suffering. Then begins, indeed, the bulim in omnium in omnia, which some philosophers observing to be so general in this world, have mistaken it for the natural, instead of the abasing state of man. And the forehorse of this frightful team is public debt. Taxation follows that, and in its train wretchedness and oppression.—To Samuel Kerchival. vii, 14. FORD ED., x, 42. (M., 1816.)

6948. PRINCIPLE, Doubt and.—If doubtful, we should follow principle.—To Samuel Kerchival. vii, 12. FORD ED., x, 40. (M., 1816.)

6949. PRINCIPLE, A guide.—Principle will in most cases open the way for us to correct conclusion.—To Samuel Kerchival. vii, 36. FORD ED., x, 45. (M., 1816.)

6950. PRINCIPLE, Opinion and.—Every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle. We have called by different names brethren of the same principle. We are all republicans: we are all federalists.—First Inaugural Address. viii, 2. FORD ED., viii, 3. (1801.)

6951. PRINCIPLE, Republican vs. Monarchical.—The contests of that day [1793-1800] were contests of principle, between the advocates of republican and those of kingly government, and had not the former made the efforts they did, our government would have been, even at this early day (1818) a very different thing from what the successful issue of those efforts have made it.—The Anas. ix, 88. FORD ED., i, 156. (1818.)

6952. PRINCIPLES, Adherence to.—An adherence to fundamental principles is the most likely way to save both time and disagreement [between legislative bodies]; and as a departure from them may at some time or other be drawn into precedent for dangerous innovations, it is better for both Houses, and for those by whom they are entrusted, to correct error while new, and before it becomes inveterate by habit and custom.—Conference Report. FORD ED., ii, 135. (1777.)

6953. —— I am happy in your approbation of the principles I avowed on entering on the government. Ingenious minds, availing themselves of the imperfections of language, have tortured the expressions out of their plain meaning in order to infer departures from them in practice. If revealed a social caste had been forever destroyed, reviled the destroyer from this time forth with relentless animosity; and, even to the second and third generations, the descendants of many of these patrician families vindictively cursed the statesman who had placed them on a level with the rest of their countrymen.—Morse’s Life of Jefferson.

language has not been able to guard itself against misinterpretations I could not expect it. But if an administration, “quadrating with the obvious import of my language, can conciliate the affections of my opposers”, I will merit that conciliation.—To the Rev. Isaac Story. iv, 423. FORD ED., vii, 107. (W., 1802.)

6954. —— On taking this station [Presidency] on a former occasion, I declared the principles on which I believed it my duty to administer the affairs of our commonwealth. My conscience tells me that I have, on every occasion, acted up to that declaration, according to its obvious import, and to the understanding of every candid mind.—Second Inaugural Address. viii, 40. FORD ED., viii, 342. (1805.)

6955. —— Continue to go straight forward, pursuing always that which is right, as the only clue which can lead us out of the labyrinth.—To Caesar A. Rodney. v, 501. FORD ED., ix, 272. (M., 1810.)

6956. —— Lay down true principles, and adhere to them inflexibly. Do not be frightened into their surrender by the alarms of the timid, or the croakings of wealth against the ascendency of the people.—To Samuel Kerchival. vii, 11. FORD ED., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

6957. PRINCIPLES, Application of.—When principles are well understood their application is less embarrassing.—To Gouverneur Morris. FORD ED., vi, 149. (Pa., 1792.)

6958. PRINCIPLES, Avowal of.—I know my own principles to be pure, and therefore am not ashamed of them. On the contrary, I wish them known, and therefore willingly express them to every one. They are the same I have acted on from the year 1775 to this day, and are the same, I am sure with those of the great body of the American people. I only wish the real principles of those who censure mine were also known.—To Samuel Smith. iv, 254. FORD ED., vii, 277. (M., 1798.)

6959. —— I make no secret of my principles; on the contrary, I wish them known to avoid the imputation of those which are not mine.—To Jeremiah Moor. FORD ED., vii, 454. (M., Aug. 1800.)

6961. PRINCIPLES, Independence and.—The contest which began with us, which ushered in the dawn of our national existence and led us through various and trying scenes, was for everything dear to free-born man.
6962. PRINCIPLES. Jefferson's in 1799.—In confusion of * * * all future calumnies, by way of anticipation. I shall make to you a profession of my political faith: in confidence that you will consider every future imputation on me of a contrary complexion as bearing on its front the mark of falsity and calumny. I do then, with sincere zeal, wish an inviolable preservation of our Federal Constitution, according to the true sense in which it was adopted by the States: that in which it was advocated by its friends, and not that which its enemies ap- preciated, who, therefore, became its enemies; and I am opposed to the monarcaizing its features by the forms of its administration, with a view to conciliate a first transition to a President and Senate for life, and from that to an hereditary tenure of these offices, and thus to worm out the elective principle. I am for preserving to the States the powers not yielded by them to the Union, and to the Legislature of the Union its constitutional share in the division of powers; and I am not for transferring all the powers of the States to the General Government, and all those of that Government to the Executive branch. I am for a government rigorously frugal and simple, applying all the possible savings of the public revenue to the discharge of the national debt; and not for a multiplication of officers and salaries merely to make partizans, and for increasing, by every device, the public debt, on the principle of its being a public blessing. I am for relying for internal defence on our militia solely, till actual invasion, and for such a naval force only as may protect our coasts and harbors from such depredations as we have experienced; and not for a standing army in time of peace, which may overawe the public sentiment; nor for a navy, which, by its own expenses and the eternal wars in which it will implicate us, will grind us with public burdens and sink us under them. I am for free commerce with all, and friendly political connection with none; and little or no diplomatic establishment. And I am not for linking ourselves by new treaties with the quarrels of Europe; entering that field of slaughter to preserve their balance, or joining in the confederacy of kings to war against the principles of liberty. I am for freedom of religion, and against all manoeuvres to bring about a legal ascendency of one sect over another; for freedom of the press, and against all violations of the Constitution to silence by force and not by reason the complaints or criticisms, just or unjust, of our citizens against the conduct of their agents. And I am for encouraging the progress of science in all its branches; and not for raising a hue and cry against the sacred name of philosophy; for awing the human mind by stories of raw-head and bloody bones to a distrust of its own vision, and to repose implicitly on that of others; to go backwards instead of forwards to look for improvement; to believe that government, religion, morality, and every other science were in the highest perfection in the ages of the darkest ignorance, and that nothing can ever be devised more perfect than what was established by our forefathers. To these I will add, that I was a sincere well-wisher to the success of the French Revolution, and still wish it may end in the establishment of a free and well-ordered republic; but I have not been insensible under the atrocious depredations they have committed on our commerce. The first object of my heart is my country. In that is embarked my family, my fortune, and my own existence. I have not one farthing of interest, nor one fibre of attachment out of it. nor a single motive of preference of any one nation to another, but in proportion as they are more or less friendly to us. * * * These are my principles. These are unquestionably the principles of the great body of our fellow-citizens, and I know there is not one of them which is not yours also. In truth, we never differed but on one ground, the Funding System; and, as from the moment of its being adopted by the constituted authorities, I became religiously principled in the sacred discharge of it to the uttermost farthing, we are united now even on that single ground of difference.*—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv. 267. FORD ED. vii. 327. (P.A. January 1799.) See Administration; also Inaugural Addresses, in Appendix.

6963. * * * [our] principles * * * I verily believe the future happiness of our country essentially depends.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii. 136. FORD ED, x. 143. (P.F., 1819.)

6964. PRINCIPLES, Not men.—Two facts are certainly as true as irreconcilable. The people of Massachusetts love economy and freedom, civil and religious. The present legislative and executive functionaries endeavor to practice economy, and to strengthen civil and religious freedom. Yet they are disapproved by the people of Massachusetts. It cannot be that these had rather give 10 principles than men. However the middle is to be solved, one thing is plain, to administer their interests faithfully, and to overcome evil with good.—To JOHN BACON. FORD ED., viii. 228. (W., April 1803.)

6965. * * * If our fellow citizens * * * will sacrifice favoritism towards men for the preservation of principle, we... may hope that no divisions will again endanger a degeneracy in our government.—To Richard M. Johnson, V, 526. (1808.)

6966. PRINCIPLES, Political schism and.—We ought not to schismatize on either men or measures. Principles alone can justify that.—To William Duane, V, 577. Ford Ed., IX, 313. (M., 1811.)

6967. PRINCIPLES, Practice and.—True wisdom does not lie in mere practice without principle.—To John Adams, VII, 39. (M., 1816.)

6968. PRINCIPLES, Tolerance of.—It is time enough, for the rightful purposes of civil government, for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order.—Statute of Religious Freedom. Ford Ed., II, 239. (1779.)

6970. PRINTING, Progress in.—Among the arts which have made great progress among us is that of printing. Heretofore, we imported our books, and with them much political principle from England. We now print a great deal, and shall soon supply ourselves with most of the books of considerable demand. But the foundation of printing, you know, is the type-foundry, and a material essential to that is antimony. Unfortunately that mineral is not among those yet found in the United States, and the difficulty and dearness of getting it from England, will force us to discontinue our type-founderies, and resort to her again for our books, unless some new source of supply can be found.—To Dupont de Nemours, V, 457. (M., June 1809.) See Editors, Newspapers and Press.

6971. PRINTING vs. BARBARISM.—We have seen, indeed, once within the records of history, a complete eclipse of the human mind continuing for centuries. And this, too, by swarms of the same northern barbarians, conquering and taking possession of the countries and governments of the civilized world. Should this be again attempted, should the same nation of ruffians, allured again by the corn, wine, and oil of the south, be able again to settle their swarms in the countries of their growth, the art of printing alone, and the vast dissemination of books, will maintain the mind where it is, and raise the conquering ruffians to the level of the conquered, instead of degrading these to that of their conquerors. And even should the cloud of barbarism and despotism again obscure the science and liberties of Europe, this country remains to preserve and restore light and liberty to them.—To John Adams, VII, 218. (M., 1821.)

6972. PRISON, Breaking.—It is not only vain, but wicked, in a legislator to frame laws in opposition to the laws of nature, and to arm them with the terrors of death. This is truly creating crimes in order to punish them. The law of nature impels every one to escape from confinement; it should not, therefore, be subjected to punishment. Let the legislator restrain his criminal by walls, not by parchment. As to strangers breaking prison to enlarge an offender, they should, and may be fairly considered as accessories after the fact. —John Adams on Crimes Bill, 1, 159. Ford Ed., Ii, 218. (1779.)

— PRISONERS OF WAR.—See War.

6973. PRIVACY, Indispensable.—A room to myself, if it be but a barrack, is indispensible. —To James Madison. Ford Ed., III, 339. (M., 1783.)

6974. PRIVATE LIFE, Contentment.—I thank you * * * for your felicitation on my present quiet. The difference of my present and past situation is such as to leave me nothing to regret, but that my retirement has been postponed four years too long. The principles on which I calculated the value of life, are entirely in favor of my present course.—To John Adams, IV, 103. Ford Ed., VI, 504. (M., April 1794.)

6975. — — — As to the concerns of my own country, I leave them willingly and safely to those who will have a longer interest in cherishing them. My books, my family, my friends, and my farm, furnish more than enough to occupy me the remainder of my life, and of that tranquil occupation most analogous to my physical and moral constitution.—To M. Odin, IV, 123. (M., Oct. 1795.)

6976. My farm, my family, my books and my building, give me more pleasure than any public office would, and, especially, one which would keep me constantly from them.—To Mr. Volney, IV, 158. (M., 1797.)

6977. PRIVATE LIFE, Freedom of.—I am now a private man, free to express my feelings, and their expression will be estimated at neither more nor less than they weigh, to wit, the expressions of a private man. Your struggles for liberty keep alive the only sparks of sensation which public affairs now excite in me.—To M. Odin, IV, 123. (M., Oct. 1795.)

6978. PRIVATE LIFE, Happiness.—The happiness of the domestic fireside is the first boon of heaven; and it is well it is so, since it is that which is the lot of the mass of mankind.—To General Armstrong, VI, 103. (M., Feb. 1813.)

6979. PRIVATE LIFE, Independence of.—The independence of private life, under the protection of republican laws, will I hope yield me the happiness from which no slave is so remote as the minister of a commonwealth.—To Marquis Lafayette. I, 312. Ford Ed., III, 49. (M., 1781.)

6980. PRIVATE LIFE, Public duty and.—You hope I have not abandoned entirely the service of our country. After five and twenty years’ continual employment in it, I trust it will be thought I have fulfilled my tour, like a punctual soldier, and may claim my discharge. But I am glad of the sentiment from you, because it gives a hope you will practice what you preach, and come forward in aid of the public vessel. I will not admit your old excuse that you are in public service though at home. The campaigns which are fought in a man’s own house are not to be counted. The present situation of the President, unable to get the offices filled, really calls with uncommon obligation on those whom nature has fitted for them.—To Edward Rutledge. iv, 124. Ford ed., vii, 39. (M., Nov. 1795.)

6981. PRIVATE LIFE, Retirement to.—My first wish is a restoration of our just rights; my second, a return of the happy period, when, consistently with duty, I may withdraw myself totally from the public stage and pass the rest of my days in domestic ease and tranquility, banishing every desire of ever hearing what passes in the world.—To John Randolph. i, 200. Ford ed., i, 482. (M., 1775.)

6982. — I have laid up my Rosinante in his stall, before his unfitness for the road shall expose him fawning to the world.—To Mann Page. iv, 119. Ford ed., vii, 24. (M., 1795.) See Retirement.

6983. PRIVATE LIFE, Rural.—I am savage enough to prefer the woods, the wilds, and the independence of Monticello, to all the brilliant pleasures of this gay capital.—To Baron Geismar. i, 427. (P., 1785.) See Life and Monticello.

6984. PRIVATE LIFE vs. PUBLIC LIFE.—I had rather be shut up in a very modest cottage, with my books, my family and a few old friends, dining on simple bacon, and letting the world roll on as it liked, than to occupy the most splendid post which any human power can give.—To A. Donald. ii, 356. (P., 1788.)

6985. — I ever preferred the pursuits of private life to those of public life.—Anas. ix, 121. Ford ed., i, 203. (1792.)

6986. —— The pomp, the turmoil, the bustle and splendor of office, have drawn but deeper sighs for the tranquil and irresponsible occupations of private life.—To the Inhabitants of Albermarle County, Va. v, 439. Ford ed., ix, 250. (M., April 1809.)

6987. PRIVATEERING, Abolition of.—If war shall hereafter arise between the two contracting parties. * * * all merchants and traders, exchanging the products of different places, and thereby rendering the necessary, conveniences, and comforts of human life more easy to obtain and more general, shall be allowed to pass free and unmolested, and neither of the contracting powers shall grant or issue any commission to any private armed vessels, empowering them to take or destroy such trading ships, or interrupt such commerce. —Treaty Instructions. Ford ed., iii, 409. (May 1784.)

6988. — I am to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, proposing a stipulation for the abolition of the practice of privateering in times of war. The consideration of this proposition is worthy of the nation [France] from which it comes, and our sentiments on it have been declared in the treaty at which you are pleased to refer, as well as in some others which have been proposed. There are in these treaties some other principles which would probably meet the approbation of your government, as flowing from the same desire to lessen the occasions and the calamities of war. On all these * * * we are ready to enter into negotiation with you, only proposing to take the whole into consideration at once.—To Jean Baptiste Terrant. iii, 477. Ford ed., vi, 122. (Pa., 1792.)

6989. —— During the negotiations for peace [in 1783] with the British Commissioner David Hartley, our Commissioners had proposed, on the suggestion of Dr. Franklin, to insert an article prohibiting capture by the public or private armed ships of any private vessel, at war, when at war, all merchant vessels and their cargoes, employed merely in carrying on the commerce between nations. It was refused by England, and unwisely in my opinion. For, in the case of a war with us, their superior commerce places infinitely more at hazard on the ocean than ours; and, as hawks abound in proportion to game, so our privateers would swarm in proportion to the wealth exposed to their prizing. Ships would be less secure for want of subjects of capture. We [Adams, Franklin and Jefferson] inserted this article in our form, with a provision against the molestation of fishermen, husbandmen, citizens unarmed and following their occupations in unfortified places, for the humane treatment of prisoners of war, the abolition of contraband of war, which exposes merchant vessels to such vexations and ruinous detentions and abuses; and for the principle of free bottoms, free goods.—Autobiography. i, 62. Ford ed., i, 86. (1821.)

6990. PRIVATEERS, Advantages of.—Our ships of force will undoubtedly be blockaded by the enemy, and we shall have no means of annoying them at sea but by small, swift-sailing vessels; these will be better managed and more multiplied in the hands of individuals than of the government. In short, they are our true and only weapon in a war against Great Britain, when once Canada and Nova Scotia shall have been rescued from them. The opposition to them in Congress is merely partial. It is a part of the navy fever, and proceeds from the desire of securing men for the public ships by suppressing all other employments from them. But I do not apprehend that this ill-judged principle is that of a majority of Congress. I hope, on the contrary, they will spare no encouragement to that kind of enterprise. Our public ships, to be sure, are done wonders. They have saved our military reputation sacrificed on the shores of Canada; but in point of real injury and depredation on the enemy, our privateers without question have been most effectual. Both species of force have their peculiar value.—To General Bailey. vi, 100. (M., Feb. 1813.)

6991. PRIVATEERS, Commerce destroyers.—I hope we shall confine ourselves to the conquest of their possessions, and defence of our harbors, leaving the war on the ocean to our privateers. These will immediately swarm in every sea, and do more injury to British commerce than the regular fleets of Europe. To GENET, Kosciusko, vi., 68. Ford Ed., ix. 362. (M., June 1812.)

6992. Our privateers will cut out the vitals of British commerce.—To WILLIAM DUANE, vi. 76. Ford Ed., ix. 366. (M., Aug. 1812.)

6993. Every sea on the globe where England has any commerce, and where any port can be found to sell prizes, will be filled with our privateers.—To General Kosciusko. vi., 77. (M., Aug. 1812.)

6994. PRIVATEERS, Encouragement of.—Privateers will find their own men and money. Let nothing be spared to encourage them. They are the dagger which strikes at the heart of the enemy, their destruction by us, or in concert with the other nations at peace, will be attended with the most favorable consequences.—To JAMES MONROE. vi. 499. Ford Ed., ix. 498. (M., 1815.)

6995. PRIVATEERS, Exclusion of.—Measures are taking far, excluding, from all future asylum in our ports, vessels armed in them to cruise on nations with which we are at peace.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iv., 56. Ford Ed., vi., 408. (Pa., Sep. 1793.)

6996. PRIVATEERS, Fitting out foreign.—By our treaties with several of the belligerent powers, which are a part of the laws of our land, we have established a state of peace with them. But, without appealing to treaties, we are at peace with them all by the law of nature. For by nature’s law, man is at peace with man, till some aggression is committed, which, by the same law, authorizes one to destroy another as his enemy. For our citizens, then, to commit murders and depredations on the members of nations at peace with us or combine to do it, appeared to the Executive, and to those with whom they consulted, as much against the laws of the land, as to murder or rob, or combine to murder or rob its own citizens; and as much to require punishment, if done within their limits, where they have a territorial jurisdiction, or on the high seas, where they have a personal jurisdiction, that is to say, one which reaches their own citizens only, this being an appropriate part of each nation, on an element where all have a common jurisdiction. So say our laws, as we understand them ourselves. To them the appeal is made; and whether we have construed them well or ill, the constitutional judges will decide all that decision shall be obtained. The government of the United States must pursue what they think right with firmness, as is their duty.—To E. C. Genet. iii., 589. Ford Ed., vi., 310. (Pa., June 1793.)

6997. Besides taking efficacious measures to prevent the future fitting out of privateers in the ports of the United States, they will not give asylum therein to any which shall have any time fitted out, and will cause restitution of all such prizes as shall be hereafter brought within their ports by any of the said privateers.—To E. C. Genet. iv., 27. Ford Ed., vi., 366. (Pa., Aug. 1793.)

6998. PRIVATEERS, French.—Some privateers have been fitted out in Charleston by French citizens, with their own money, manned by themselves, and regularly commissioned by their nation. They have taken several prizes, and brought them into our ports. Some native citizens had joined them. These are arrested and useful prosecution and orders are sent to all the ports to prevent the equipping privateers by any persons foreign or native. So far is right. But the vessels so equipped at Charleston are ordered to leave the ports of the United States. This, however, is not the act of the President. Hammond [British Minister] demanded further a surrender of the prizes they had taken. This is refused, on the principle that by the laws of war the property is transferred to the captors.—To JAMES MADISON. iii., 598. Ford Ed., vi., 277. (June 1793.)

6999. The arming and equipping vessels in the ports of the United States to cruise against nations with whom they are at peace, is incompatible with the territorial sovereignty of the United States. It makes them instrumental to the annoyance of those nations and thereby tends to compromise their peace.—To EDMOND CHARLES GENET. iii. 571. Ford Ed., vi., 282. (Pa., June 1793.)

7000. PRIVATEERS, Gulf of Mexico and.—Our [the Cabinet’s] general opinion is that as soundings on our coast cease at the beginning of the Gulf Stream, we ought to endeavour to keep up the same time all the waters within the Gulf Stream as our waters, so far as to exclude privateers from hovering within them.—THE ANAS. Ford Ed., i., 308. (July 1805.)

7001. PRIVATEERS, Merchant vessels and.—Can it be necessary to say that a merchant vessel is not a privateer? That though she has arms to defend herself in time of war, in the course of her regular commerce, this no more makes her a privateer, than a husbandman following his plow, in time of war, with a knife or pistol in his pocket, is, thereby, made a soldier? The occupation of a privateer is attack and plunder, that of a merchant vessel is commerce and self-preservation.—To GOV. HENRY MORRIS. iv., 41. Ford Ed., vi., 385. (Pa., Aug. 1793.)

7002. PRIVATEERS, Prizes.—Encourage the privateers to burn all their prizes, and let the public pay for them. They will enrich us enormously. No matter; they will make the merchants of England feel, and squeal, and cry out for peace.—To JAMES MONROE. vi., 410. Ford Ed., ix., 498. (M., 1815.)

7003. PRIVILEGES, Abolition of.—All pecuniary privileges and exemptions, enjoyed by any description of persons, are abolished.—FRENCH CHARTER OF RIGHTS. iii., 47. Ford Ed., v., 102. (P., 1789.)

7004. PRIVILEGES, Unequal.—To unequal privileges among members of the same society the spirit of our nation is, with one accord, adverse.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. iv., 394. (W., 1801.) See EQUALITY, EQUAL RIGHTS, FAVORITISM AND RIGHTS.

7005. PRIZES, Condemnation of.—The condemnation by the consul of France at Charleston, as legal prize, of a British vessel captured by a French frigate, is not, as you justly [observe], a judicial act warranted by the law of nations, nor by the stipulations existing between the United States and France. I observe further that it is not warranted by any law of the land. It is consequently a mere nullity; as such it can be respected in no court, can make no part in the title to the vessel, nor give to the purchaser any other security than what he would have had ... for what is most perfect in government, in religion and in learning, is worthy of those bigots in religion and gov-

7006. PRIZES, Consular jurisdiction.—
No particular rules have been established by the President for the conduct of consuls with respect to prizes. In one particular case, where a prize is brought into our ports by any of the terior parties, and is claimed of the Excutive, the President has hitherto permitted the consul of the captor to hold the prize until his jurisdiction is known in all cases, respecting a neutral nation, their vessels are placed exactly on the same footing with our own, entitled to the same remedy from our courts of justice, and the same protection from the Executive, as our own vessels in the same situation. The only one which they or our own can have access to, is slower than where it lies with the Executive, but it is more complete, as damages may be given by the Court but not by the Excutive.—To GEORGE HAMMOND, iii, 538. FORD ED., vi, 252. (Pa., May 1793.)

7007. PRIZES, Restitution.—The restitution of the prizes [which French privateers may bring into the ports of the United States], is understood to be inconsistent with the rules which govern such cases, and would, therefore, be unjustifiable towards the other party.—To GEORGE HAMMOND, iii, 573. FORD ED., vi, 286. (Pa., June 1793.)

7008. Restitution of prizes has been made by the Executive of the United States only in the two cases: 1., of capture within in the foreign nation; or out of the arms in their jurisdiction, by armed vessels, originally constituted within the limits of the United States. Such last have been called proscribed vessels.—To GEORGE HAMMOND, iv, 78. FORD ED., vi, 444. (G., Nov.

7009. — Can prizes and the proceeds of them, taken after the date of the treaty [of peace] with France be restored by the Executive, or need an act of the Legislature? The Constitution has authorized the ordinary Legislature alone to act against a foreign nation. If they may enact a perfect, they may a qualified war, and appropriate the proceeds of it. In this state of things, they may modify the acts of war, and appropriate the proceeds of it. This state of affairs is not to be known beforehand. The act authorized in the arms of this country, dividing and appropriating their proceeds, was of this kind. The Constitution has given to the President and Senate alone the power (with the consent of the foreign nation) of enacting peace. Their treaty for this purpose is an alleged repeal of the declaration of war, and of all laws authorizing or modifying war measures. The treaty with France had this effect.
From the moment it was signed all the acts legalizing war measures ceased ipso facto and all subsequent captures became unlawful.

Property wrongfully taken from a friend on the high sea is not thereby transferred to the captor. In whatever hands it is found, it remains the property of those from whom it was taken; and any person possessed of it, private or public, has a right to restore it. If it comes to the hands of the Executive, they may restore it. If into those of the Legislature (as by fortual payment to the Treasury), they may re-

7010. PRIZES, Rules governing.—The doctrine as to the admission of prizes, maintained by the government from the commencement of the war between England and France.
and, to this day, has been the same. The Executive give a right to armed vessels, with their prizes, to go where they please (consequently into our ports), and that these prizes shall not be detained, seized, nor adjudicated; but that the armed vessel may depart as quickly as may with her prize, to the place of her commission; and we are not to suffer their enemies to sell in our ports the prizes taken by their privateers.
Before the British treaty, no stipulation stood in the way of permitting France to sell her prizes here; and we did permit it, but expressly as a favor, not a right. * * * These stipulations admit the prizes to put into our ports in cases of necessity, or perhaps of convenience, but no right to remain if disagreeable to us; and altogether, solidly, by the late AL-BERT GALLATIN. FORD ED., viii, 86. (M., Aug.
1801.) See Privateers and Neutrality.

7011. PROCRASTINATION, Indolence and.—My acknowledgments have been delayed by a blamable spirit of procrastination, forever suggesting to our indolence that we need do not to-day what may be done to-morrow.
To THOMAS Pinckney. iv, 176. FORD ED., vii, 127. (Pa., 1797.)

7012. PRODUCTION, National.—In general, it is a truth that if every nation will employ itself in what it is fittest to produce, a greater quantity will be raised of the things contributing to human happiness, than if every nation attempts to raise everything it wants within itself.—To M. LASTERYE, v, 315. (W., 1808.)

7013. PROGRESS, Constant.—When I contemplate the immense advances in science and discoveries in the arts which have been made within the period of my life, I look forward with joy to the equal advances by the present generation, and have no doubt they will consequently be as much wiser than we have been as we than our fathers were,
and they than the burners of witches.—To DR.
BENJAMIN WATERHOUSE. vii, 101. FORD
ED., x, 103. (M., 1818.)

7014. PROGRESS, Gothic idea of.—The Gothic idea that we were to look backwards instead of forwards for the improvement of the human mind, and to recur to the annals of our ancestors for what is most perfect in government, in religion and in learning, is
7015. Progress, In government.

Laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also, and keep pace with the times. We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him when a boy, as civilized society to remain ever under the regimen of their barbarous ancestors. It is this preposterous idea which has lately deluged Europe in blood. Their monarchs, instead of wisely yielding to the general change of circumstances, of favoring progressive accommodation to progressive improvement, have clung to old abuses, entrenched themselves behind steady habits, and obliged their subjects to seek through blood and violence rash and ruinous innovations, which had they been referred to the peaceful deliberations and collected wisdom of the nation, would have been put into acceptable and salutary forms. Let us follow no such examples, nor weakly believe that one generation is not as capable as another of taking care of itself, and of ordering its own affairs.—To Samuel Kerchival. vii, 15. Ford ed., x, 42. (M., 1816.) See Generations.

7016. Progress, Perseverance and.

In endeavors to improve our situation, we should never despair.—To John Quincy Adams. vii, 89. (M., 1817.)

7017. Progress, In Science.

One of the questions, you know, on which our parties took different sides, was on the improbability of the human mind in science, in ethics, in government, &c. Those who advocated reform of institutions, pari passu with the progress of science, maintained that no definite limits could be assigned to that progress. The enemies of reform, on the other hand, denied improvement, and advocated steady adherence to the principles, practices and institutions of our fathers, which they represented as the consummation of wisdom, and acme of excellence, beyond which the human mind could never advance. Although in the passage of your answer alluded to, you expressly disclaim the wish to influence the freedom of inquiry, you predict that that will produce nothing more worthy of transmission to posterity than the principles, institutions and systems of education received from their ancestors. I do not consider this as your deliberate opinion. You possess, yourself, too much science, not to see how much is still ahead of you, unexplained and unexplored. Your own consciousness must place you as far before our ancestors as in the rear of posterity.—To John Adams. vi, 126. Ford ed., ix, 387. (M., 1813.)

7018. Progress, Sluggish.

There is a snail-paced gait for the advance of new ideas on the general mind, under which we must acquiesce. A forty years' experience of popular assemblies has taught me, that you must give them time for every step you take. If too hard pushed, they balk, and the machine retrogresses.—To Joel Barlow. v, 217. Ford ed., ix, 169. (W., Dec. 1807.)

7019. Progress, Time and.

Time indeed changes manners and notions, and so far we must expect institutions to bend to them.

7020. Property, Acquisition of.

The political institutions of America, its various soils and climates opened a certain resource to the unfortunate and to the enterprising spirit of every country, and insured to them the acquisition and free possession of property.—Declaration on Taking up Arms. Ford ed., i, 465. (July 1775.)

7021. Property, Of aliens.

Resolved, that no right be stipulated for aliens to hold real property within these States, this being utterly inadmissible by their several laws and policy; but when on the death of any person holding real estate within the territories of one of the contracting parties, such real estate would by their laws descend on a subject or citizen of the other, were he not disqualified by alienage, then he shall be allowed reasonable time to dispose of the same, and withdraw the proceeds without molestation.—Commercial Treaties Instructions. Ford ed., iii, 492. (1784.)

7022. ——. It is reasonable that every one who asks justice should do justice; and it is usual to consider the property of a foreigner, in any country, as a fund appropriated to the payment of what he owes in that country exclusively. It is a care which most nations take of their own citizens, not to let the property, which is to answer their demands, be withdrawn from its jurisdiction, and send them to seek it in foreign countries, and before foreign tribunals.

7023. Property, Annihilation of.

They [Parliament] have interdicted all commerce to one of our principal towns, thereby annihilating its property in the hands of the holders.—Declaration on Taking up Arms. Ford ed., i, 468. (July 1775.)

7024. Property, Confiscation of.

[In Lord North's proposition] our adversaries still claim a right of demanding ad libitum, and of taxing us themselves to the full amount of their demand, if we do not comply with it. This leaves us without anything we can call property.—Reply to Lord North's Proposition. Ford ed., i, 481. (July 1775.)

7025. ——. He has incited treasonable insurrections of our fellow citizens, with the allurements of forfeiture and confiscation of our property.*—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

7026. PROPERTY, Defence of.—In defense of our persons and properties under actual violation, we took up arms. When that violence shall be removed, when hostilities shall cease on the part of the aggressors, hostilities shall cease on our part also.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. Ford ed., i, 475. (July 1775.)

7027. PROPERTY, Depreciation.—Money is leaving the remoter parts of the Union, and flowing to this place [Philadelphia] to purchase paper; and here, a paper medium supplying its place, it is shipped off in exchange for luxuries. The value of property is necessarily falling in the places left bare of money. In Virginia, for instance, property has fallen 25 per cent. in the last twelve months.—To William Short. iii, 343. Ford ed., v, 459. (Pa., March 1792.)

7029. PROPERTY, Descent of.—The descent of property of every kind to all the children, or to all the brothers and sisters, or other relations, in equal degree, is a politic measure, and a practicable one.—To Rev. James Madison. Ford ed., vii, 35. (P., 1783.) See DESCENTS, ENTAIL and PRIMOGENITURE.

7030. PROPERTY, Division of.—I am conscious that an equal division of property is impracticable. But the consequences of this enormous inequality [in France] producing so much misery to the bulk of mankind, legislators cannot invent too many devices for subdividing property, only taking care to let their subdivisions go hand in hand with the natural affections of the human mind.—To Rev. James Madison. Ford ed., vii, 35. (P., 1783.) See DESCENTS, ENTAIL and PRIMOGENITURE.

7031. PROPERTY, Equal rights and.—The true foundation of republican government is the equal right of every citizen, in his person and property, and in their management.—To Samuel Kerchival. vii, 11. Ford ed., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

7032. PROPERTY, Federal.—The property of the United States can never be questioned in any court, but in special cases in which, by some particular law, they delegate a special power, as to the boards of commissioners, and in some small fiscal cases. But a general jurisdiction over the national demesnes, being more than half the territory of the United States, has never been by them, and never ought to be, subjected to any tribunal.—Batture Case. viii, 521. (1812.)

7033. PROPERTY, Forfeited.—All forfeitures heretofore going to the king, shall go to the State; save only such as the legislature may hereafter abolish.—Proposed V.A. CONSTITUTION. Ford ed., i, 27. (June 1776.)

7035. PROPERTY, Free Press and.—The functionaries of every government have propensities to command at will the liberty and property of their constituents. There is no safe deposit for these but with the people themselves; nor can they be safe with them without information. Where the press is free, and every man able to read, all is safe.—To Charles Yancey. vi, 517. Ford ed., x, 4. (M., 1816.)

7036. PROPERTY, Impressing.—In a country where means of payment are neither prompt, nor of the most desirable kind, impressing property for the public use has been found indispensable. We have no fears of complaint under your exercise of those powers.—To Major-General Lafayette. Ford ed., ii, 502. (R., 1781.)

7037. PROPERTY, Industry and.—Our wish is that * * * [there be] maintained that state of property, equal or unequal, which results to every man from his own industry, or that of his fathers.—Second Inaugural Address. viii, 44. Ford ed., viii, 347. (1805.)

7038. PROPERTY, Inequality of.—Another means of silently lessening the inequality of property [in France] is to exempt all from taxation below a certain point, and to tax the higher portions of property in geometrical progression as they rise.—To Rev. James Madison. Ford ed., vii, 36. (P., 1785.)

* Quære, if the estates of both parties in a duel, should not be forfeited? The deceased is equally guilty with a suicide.—NOTE BY JEFFERSON.
7039. PROPERTY, Inventions as.—Inventions cannot in nature be a subject of property.—To ISAAC MCPHERSON, vi, 181. (M., 1813.) See INVENTIONS AND PATENTS.

7040. PROPERTY, Jurisdiction over.—The functions of the Executive are not competent to the decision of questions of property between individuals. They are ascribed to the Judiciary alone, and when either persons or property are taken into their custody, there is no power in this country that can take them out.—To EDMOND CHARLES GENET. iii, 586. FORD ED., vi, 312. (PA., 1793.)

7041. PROPERTY, Laws of.—Whenever there is in any country, uncultivated lands and unemployed poor, it is clear that the laws of property have been so far extended as to violate natural right.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. FORD ed., vii, 36. (P., 1785.)

7042. PROPERTY, Life and.—They [Parliament] have deprived us of the inestimable privilege of trial by a jury of the vicinage in cases affecting both life and property.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS. FORD ed., i, 468. (July 1775.)

7043. PROPERTY, Paper money and.—That paper money has some advantages, is admitted. But that its abuses also are inevitable, and, by breaking up the measure of value, makes a lottery of all private property, cannot be denied.—To DR. JOSEPHUS B. STUART. vii, 65. (M., May 1817.) See BANKS AND PAPER MONEY.

7044. PROPERTY, Protection of.—The persons and property of our citizens are entitled to the protection of our government in all places where they may lawfully go.—OPINION ON SHIP PASSPORTS. vii, 624. (May 1793.)

7045. ——. We give you [Choc-taws] a copy of the law, made by our great Council, for punishing our people, who may encroach on your lands, or injure you otherwise. Carry it with you to your homes, and preserve it, as the shield which we spread over you, to protect your land, your property, and persons.—ADDRESS TO THE CHOCTAWS. viii, 192. (1803.)

7046. ——. When once you [the Indians] have property, you will want laws and magistrates to protect your property and persons, and to punish those among you who commit crimes. You will find that our laws are good for this purpose.—ADDRESS TO DELAWARES. viii, 226. (1808.)

7047. ——. We wish to see you [the Indians] possessed of property, and protecting it by regular laws.—INDIAN ADDRESS. viii, 254. (1809.)

7048. ——. The first foundations of the social compact would be broken up, were we definitely to refuse to its members the protection of their persons and property, while in their lawful pursuits.—To JAMES MAURY. vi, 52. FORD ED., ix, 348. (M., 1812.)

7049. PROPERTY, Public office as.—The field of public office will not be perverted by me into a family property.—To DR. HORATIO TURPIN. v, 90. (W., 1807.) See RELATIONS.

7050. PROPERTY, Recovery of.—By nature's law, every man has a right to seize and retake by force, his own property, taken from him by another, by force or fraud. Nor is this natural right among the first which is taken into the hands of regular government, after it is instituted. It was long retained by our ancestors. It was a part of their common law, laid down in their books, recognized by all the authorities, and regulated as to circumstances of practice.—BATTURE CASE. viii, 584. (1812.)

7051. PROPERTY, Representation of.—In some of the American States, the delegates and Senators are so chosen as that the first represent the persons, and the second the property of the State. But with us [Virginia] wealth and wisdom have equal chance for admission into both houses.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 361. FORD ED., iii, 223. (1782.)

7052. PROPERTY, Rescue of.—Nature has given to all men, individual or associated, the right of rescuing their own property wrongfully taken. In cases of forcible entry on individual possessions, special provisions, both of the common and civil law, have restrained the right of rescue by private force, and substituted the aid of the civil power. But no law has restrained the right of the nation itself from removing by its own arm, intruders on its possessions.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 518. (M., 1810.)

7053. PROPERTY, Restitution.—Congress should immediately and earnestly recommend to the legislatures of the respective States to provide for the restitution of all estates, rights and properties which have been confiscated, belonging to British subjects; and also of the estates, rights and properties of persons resident in districts which were in the possession of his Britannic Majesty's arms at any time between the 30th day of November, 1782, and the 14th day of January, 1784, and who have not borne arms against the United States, and that persons of any other description shall have free liberty to go to any part or parts of any of the thirteen United States, and therein to remain twelve months unmolested in their endeavors to obtain the restitution of such of their estates, rights and properties as may have been confiscated.—REPORT ON PEACE TREATY. FORD ED., iii, 349. (Dec. 1783.)

7054. PROPERTY, Restoration.—I am not fond of encouraging an intercourse with the enemy for the recovery of property; however, I shall not forbid it while conducted on principles which are fair and general. If the British commander chooses to discriminate between the several species of property taken from the people; if he chooses to say he will restore all of one kind, and retain all of another, I am contented that individuals shall avoid themselves of this discrimination; but no distinctions of persons must be admitted. The moment it is proposed that the same species of property shall be restored to one which is refused to another, let every application to him for restitution be prohibited. The principles by which his discrimination would be governed are but too obvious, and they are the reverse of what we should approve.—To Colonel John Nicholas. Ford ed., ii, 400. (1781.)

7055. A right to take the side, which every man’s conscience approves in a civil contest, is too precious a right, and too favorable to the preservation of liberty not to be protected by all its well informed friends. The Assembly of Virginia have given sanction to this right in several of their laws, discriminating honorably those who took side against us before the Declaration of Independence, from those who remained among us and strove to injure us by their treacheries. I sincerely wish that you, and every other to whom this distinction applies favorably, may find, in the Assembly of Virginia, the good effects of that justice and generosity which have dictated to them this discrimination. It is a sentiment which will gain strength in their breasts in proportion as they can forget the savage cruelties committed on them, and will, I hope, in the end induce them to restore the property itself wherever it is unsold, and the price received for it, where it has been actually sold.—To Mrs. Sprowle. Ford ed., iv, 66. (P., 1785.)

7056. PROPERTY, Right to. A right to property is founded in our natural wants, in the means with which we are endowed to satisfy these wants, and the right to what we acquire by those means without violating the similar rights of other sensible beings. —To Dupont de Nemours. vi, 501. Ford ed., x, 24. (P.F., 1816.)

7057. PROPERTY, Sale under execu- tion.—The immensity of this [Virginia] debt [to British creditors] was another reason for forbidding such a mass of property to be offered for sale under execution at once, as, from the small quantity of circulating money, it must have sold for little or nothing, whereby the creditor would have failed to receive his money, and the debtor would have lost his whole estate without being discharged of his debt.—Report to Congress. ix, 241. Ford ed., iv, 127. (F., 1785.) See Debts Due British.

—PROPERTY, At sea.—See Treaties.

7058. PROPERTY, Seizure in war. It cannot be denied that a state of war directly permits a nation to seize the property of its enemies found within its own limits or taken in war and in whatever form it exists whether in action or possession.—To George Hammond. iii, 369. Ford ed., vi, 15. (Pa., 1792.)

7059. PROPERTY, Sequestration. For securing to the citizens of the Commonwealth [of Virginia] an indemnification out of the property of British subjects here, * * * in case the sovereign of the latter should confiscate the property of the former in his dominions, as well as to prevent that accession of strength which the enemy might derive by withdrawing their property * * * hence * * * the lands, slaves, flocks, implements of industry * * * of British subjects, shall be sequestered.—British prop- erty bill. Ford ed., ii, 199. (1779.)

7060. PROPERTY, Slaves as.—The cession of that kind of property [Slaves], for so it is misnamed, is a bagatelle which would not cost me a second thought, if, in that way, a general emancipation and expatriation could be effected.—To John Holmes. vii, 150. Ford ed., x, 157. (M., 1820.)

7061. PROPERTY, Stolen. Actual property has been lawfully vested in [negroes] and who can lawfully take it from the possessors?—To Jared Sparks. vii, 333. Ford ed., x, 290. (M., 1824.)

7062. PROPERTY, Stable ownership. By an universal law, indeed, whatever [property], whether fixed or movable, belongs to all men equally and in common, is the property for the moment of him who occupies it; but when he relinquishes the occupation, the property goes with it. Stable ownership is the gift of social law, and is given late in the progress of society.—To Isaac McPherson. vi, 180. (M., 1813.)

7063. PROPERTY, Taxation. I am principally afraid that commerce will be over-loaded by the assumption [of the State debts], believing it would be better that property should be duly taxed.—To Mr. Randolph. iii, 185. (N.Y., 1790.) See Taxation.

7064. PROPERTY, Unequal division. The unequal division of property [in France] * * * occasions numberless instances of wretchedness and is to be observed all over Europe.—To Rev. James Madison. Ford ed., vii, 35. (P., 1785.)

7066. PROPHECY, Conditional. Who can withhold looking into futurity on events which are to change the face of the world, and the condition of man throughout it, without indulging himself in the effusions of the holy spirit of Delphos? I may do it the more safely, as to my vaticinations I always subjoin the proviso "that nothing unexpected happen to change the predicted course of events".—To William Short. Ford ed., x, 249. (M., 1823.)

7067. PROPHECY, Fallacious. Perhaps in that super-mundane region, we may be amused with seeing the fallacy of our own guesses.—To John Adams. vii, 105. Ford ed., x, 109. (M., 1818.)
7068. PROPHET, Wabash.—With respect to the [Wabash] prophet, if those who are in danger from him would settle it in their own way, it would be their affair. But we should do nothing towards it. That kind of policy is not in the character of our government, and still less of the paternal spirit we wish to show towards that people. But could not [General] Harrison gain over the Prophet, who no doubt is a scoundrel, and only needs his price? —To General Dearborn. v. 163. (M., Aug. 1807.)

7069. PROSCRIPTION vs. JUST TRIAL.—To fill up the measure of irritation, a proscription of individuals has been substituted in the room of just trial. Can it be believed that a grateful people will suffer those to be consigned to execution whose sole crime has been the developing and asserting their rights? Had the Parliament possessed the power of reflection, they would have avoided a measure as impotent, as it was inflammatory.—To Dr. William Small. i, 199. Ford ed., i, 454. (May 1775.)

7070. PROSPERITY, American.—There is not a nation under the sun enjoying more present prosperity, nor with more in prospect.—To C. W. F. Dumas. iii, 260. (Pa., 1791.)

7071. PROSPERITY, Basis.—A prosperity built on the basis of agriculture is that which is most desirable to us, because to the efforts of labor it adds the efforts of a greater proportion of soil.—CIRCULAR TO CONSULS. iii, 431. (Pa., 1792.)

7072. PROSPERITY, Concern for.—Affectionate concerns for the prosperity of my fellow citizens will cease but with life to animate my breast.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. v, 262. (W., 1808.)

7073. PROSPERITY, Conditions of.—I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends on a due balance between agriculture, manufactures and commerce.—To THOMAS LEIPER. v, 417. Ford ed., ix, 239. (W., 1809.)

7074. PROSPERITY, Pillars of.—Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, the four pillars of our prosperity, are the most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 13. Ford ed., viii, 123. (Dec. 1801.)

7076. PROTECTION, Commerce and navigation.—We wish [to encourage navigation and commerce] by throwing open all the doors of commerce, and knocking off its shackles. But as this cannot be done for others, unless they will do it for us, and there is no probability that Europe will do this, I suppose we shall be obliged to adopt a system which may shakele them in our ports, as they do us in theirs.—To COUNT VAN HOGENDORP. i, 495. Ford ed., iv, 105. (P., 1785.) See COMMERC AND NAVIGATION.

7077. ——. Should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties and regulations, also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 647. Ford ed., vi, 486. (Dec. 1793.) See Duties and Free Trade.

7078. PROTECTION, Manufactures and.—To protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances * * * [is one of] the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 21. Ford ed., viii, 187. (Dec. 1802.)

7079. ——. Little doubt remains that the [manufacturing] establishments formed and forming will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent.—EIGHTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. vii, 109. Ford ed., ix, 224. (Nov. 1808.) See MANUFACTURES and TARIFF.

7080. PROTECTION, Oppressive.—I do not mean to say that it may not be for the general interest to foster for awhile certain infant manufactures, until they are strong enough to stand against foreign rivals; but when evident that they will never be so, it is against right to make the other branches of industry support them.—To SAMUEL SMITH. vii, 285. Ford ed., x, 252. (M., 1823.)

7081. PROTECTION, Petitions for.—I observe you [Congress] are loaded with petitions from the manufacturing, commercial and agricultural interests, each praying you to sacrifice the others to them. This proves the egoism of the whole and happily balances their canniabal appetites to eat one another. * * * I do not know whether it is any part of the petitions of the farmers that our citizens shall be restrained to eat nothing but bread, because that can be made here. But this is the common spirit of all their petitions.—To HUGH NELSON. Ford ed., x, 156. (M., 1820.)

7082. PROTECTION, Printing and.—None of these [books in foreign living languages] are printed here, and the duty on them becomes consequently not a protecting, but really a prohibitory one.—To vii, 220. (M., 1821.) See Books.

or to worship. It enumerates the humiliations to which they shall remain subject, and the burthen to which they shall continue to be unjustly exposed. What are we to think of the condition of the human mind in a country where such a wretched thing as this has thrown the State into convulsions, and how must we bless our own situation in a country the most illust rate peasant of which is a Solon compared with the authors of this law?—To William Rutledge. ii, 350. Ford ed., v, 4. (P., Feb. 1788.)

7084. PROVIDENCE, An approving.—We remark with special satisfaction those circumstances which, under the smiles of Providence, result from the skill, industry and order of our citizens. managing their own affairs in their own way and for their own use, unembarrassed by too much regulations, unoppressed by fiscal exactions.—Second Annual Message. viii, 15. Ford ed., viii, 182. (Dec. 1802.)

7085. PROVIDENCE, Goodness of.—Providence in His goodness gave it [the yellow fever] an early termination * * * and lessened the number of victims which have usually fallen before it.—Fifth Annual Message. viii, 461. Ford ed., viii, 386. (Dec. 1805.)

7086. PROVIDENCE, Gratitude to.—Let us bow with gratitude to that kind Providence which * * * guarded us hastily entering into the sanguinary contest [between France and England].—Third Annual Message. viii, 28. Ford ed., viii, 272. (Oct. 1803.)

7087. PROVIDENCE, Human happiness and.—An overruling Providence * * * by all its dispensations proves that it delights in the happiness of man here and his greater happiness hereafter.—First Inaugural Address. viii, 3. Ford ed., viii, 4. (1801.)

7088. PROVIDENCE, A just.—You [General Washington] have persevered till these United States, aided by a mag numinous king and nation, have been enabled, under a just Providence, to close the war in freedom, safety, and independence. * * * We join you in commending the interests of our dearest country to the protection of Almighty God, beseeching Him to dispose the hearts and minds of its citizens to improve the opportunity afforded them of becoming a happy and respectable nation.—Congress July 4, 1783. Washington on Surrendering His Commission. (Dec. 23, 1783.)

7089. PROVIDENCE, Prayers to.—I pray that that Providence in whose hands are the nations of the earth, may continue towards ours His fostering care, and bestow on yourselves the blessings of His protection and favor.—R. to A. Massachusetts Legislature. viii, 117. (1807.)

* Thomas Mifflin, the President of Congress, read the reply of Congress to Washington's address on surrendering his commission. It was written by Jefferson, but is not included in the editions of his works.—Editor.

7090. PROVIDENCE, Slavery and.—We must await with patience the workings of an overruling Providence, and hope that that is preparing the deliverance of these suffering brethren [Slaves].—To M. de Meunier. ix, 279. Ford ed., iv, 185. (P., 1786.) See Deity and God.

7091. PROVIDENCE, Supplicating.—I supplicate a protecting Providence to watch over your own and our country's freedom and welfare.—R. to A. N. Y. Tammany Society. vii, 127. (Feb. 1808.)

7092. —I sincerely supplicate that overruling Providence which governs the destinies of men and nations, to dispense His choicest blessings on yourselves and our beloved country.—R. to A. Massachusetts Citizens. xvi, 161. (1809.)

—PRUSSIA.—See Frederick the Great.

7093. PSALMS, Estimate of the.—I acknowledge all the merit of the hymn of Cleanthes to Jupiter, which you add to it. It is as highly sublime as a chaste and correct imagination can permit itself to go. Yet in the contemplation of a Being so superlatively, the hyperbole of the Psalmist may often be followed, with approbation, even with rapture; and I have no hesitation in giving him the palm over all the hymnists of every language and of every time. Turn to the 148th Psalm, in Brady and Tate's version. Have such conception been ever before expressed? Their version of the 15th Psalm is not to be esteemed for its pithiness than its poetry. Even Sterndoll, the leader Sterndoll, kinds, in a single instance, with the sublimity of his original, and expresses the majesty of God descending on the earth, in terms not unworthy of the subject:

"The Lord descended from above, And bowed the heaven's pavilion, And underneath His feet He cast, The darkness of the sky, On Cherubim and Seraphim Full royally He rode; And on the wings of mighty winds Came flying all abroad."—Psalm xviii.

 * * The best collection of these psalms is that of the Octagonian dissenters of Liverpool.  * * Indeed, bad is the best of the English versions; not a ray of poetical genius having ever been employed on them. And how much depends on this, may be seen by comparing Brady and Tate's 15th Psalm with Blacklock's Lutum et tacem propitio virum of Horace. A translation of David in this style, or in that of Pompei's Cleanthes, might give us some idea of the merit of the original. The character, too, of the poetry of these hymns is singular to us: written in monostichs, each divided into strophe and anti-strophe, the sentence of the first member responded with amplification or antithesis in the second.—To John Adams. vi, 220. (M., 1813.)

7094. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Abuse of.—In questions of power * * * let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution.—Kentucky Resolutions. ix, 471. Ford ed., vii, 305. (1798.)

7095. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Acquisition of.—The energy of the government depending mainly on the confidence of the people in the Chief Magistrate, makes it his duty to spare nothing which can strengthen him with that confidence.—To Dr. Horatio Turpin. vi, 90. (W., 1807.)

7097. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Asked for.—Without pretensions to that high confidence you reposed in our first and greatest revolutionary character, * * * I ask so much confidence only as may give firmness and effect to the legal administration of your affairs.—First Inaugural Address. viii, 5. Ford ed., viii, 5. (1801.)

7098. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Dangerous.—It would be a dangerous delusion were a confidence in the men of our choice to silence our fears for the safety of our rights.—Kentucky Resolutions. ix, 470. Ford ed., vii, 303. (1798.)

7099. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Despotism and.—Confidence is everywhere the parent of despotism—free government is founded in jealousy, and not in confidence.—Kentucky Resolutions. ix, 470. Ford ed., vii, 304. (1798.)

7100. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Lack of.—We do not find it easy to make commercial arrangements in Europe. There is a want of confidence in us.—To Nathaniel Greene. Ford ed., iv, 25. (P., 1785.)

7101. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Limits to.—Our Constitution has * * * fixed the limits to which, and no further, our confidence may go; and let the honest advocate of confidence read the Alien and Sedition Acts, and say if the Constitution has not been wise in fixing limits to the government it created, and whether we should be wise in destroying those limits.—Kentucky Resolutions. ix, 470. Ford ed., vii, 304. (1798.)

7102. — — Is confidence or discretion, or is strict limit, the principle of our Constitution?—To Jedediah Morse. vii, 235. Ford ed., x, 205. (M., 1822.)

7103. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Perversion of.—What person, who remembers the times and tempers we have seen, would have believed that within so short a period, not only the jealous spirit of liberty which shaped every operation of our Revolution, but even the common principles of English whigism would be scouted, and the tory principle of passive obedience under the new-fangled names of confidence and responsibility, become entirely triumphant? That the tories, whom in mercy we did not crumble to dust and ashes, could so have entwined us in their scorpion toils, that we cannot now move hand or foot?—To Robert R. Livingston. iv, 297. Ford ed., vii, 369. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

7104. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Preserve.—Let nothing be spared of either passion or reason, to preserve the public confidence entire, as the only rock of our safety.—To Cesar A. Rodney. v, 501. Ford ed., ix, 272. (M., 1810.)

7105. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Sacrifices and.—Bringing into office no desires of making it subservient to the advancement of my own private interests, it has been no sacrifice, by postponing, to strengthen the confidence of my fellow citizens.—To Horatio Turpin. v, 90. (W., 1807.)

7106. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, Wisdom and.—It is not wisdom alone, but public confidence in that wisdom, which can support an administration.—To President Monroe. Ford ed., x, 316. (M., 1824.)

— PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.—See Internal Improvements.

— PUBLIC OFFICE.—See Office and Offices.

7107. PUBLIC WORKS, Government and.—The New Orleans Canal Company ask specifically that we should loan them $50,000, or take the remaining fourth of their shares now on hand. This last measure is too much out of our policy of not embarking the public in enterprises better managed by individuals, and which might occupy as much of our time as those political duties for which the public functionaries are particularly instituted. Some money could be lent them, but only on an assurance that it would be employed so as to secure the public objects.—To Governor Claiborne. v, 319. (W., July 1808.)

7108. PUBLICITY, Adams's administration and.—Reserve as to all their proceedings is the fundamental maxim of the Executive department.—To Benjamin Hallowins. iv, 326. Ford ed., vii, 435. (Pa., March 1800.)

7109. PUBLICITY, Complete.—There is not a truth existing which I fear, or would wish unknown to the whole world.—To Henry Lee. viii, 448. Ford ed., x, 389. (M., 1826.)

7110. PUBLICITY, Darkness and.—Ours, as you know, is a government which will not tolerate the being kept entirely in the dark.—To James Monroe. v, 52. Ford ed., ix, 36. (W., 1807.) See Convention (Federal).

7111. PUBLICITY, Demanded.—The journals of Congress not being printed earlier, gives more uneasiness than I would wish ever to see produced by any act of that body, from whom alone, I know, our salvation can proceed. In our [Virginia] Assembly, even the best affected think it an indignity to freemen to be voted away, life and fortune, in the dark.—To John Adams. Ford ed., ii, 130. (Wg., 1777.)

7112. PUBLICITY, Executive, Congress and. I remember Mr. Gallatin expressed an opinion that our negotiations with England should not be laid before Congress at their meeting, but reserved to be communicated all together with the answer they should send, whenever received. I am not of this opinion. I think, on the meeting of Congress, we should lay before them everything that has passed to that day, and place them on the same ground of information we are on ourselves.—To James Madison. V, 174. Ford ed., ix, 131. (M., 1807.)

7113. I am desirous that nothing shall be omitted on my part which may add to your information on this subject [relations with France], or contribute to the correctness of the views which should be formed.—Special Message. viii, 102. Ford ed., ix, 187. (1808.)

7114. PUBLICITY, Executive support. No ground of support for the Executive will ever be so sure as a complete knowledge of their proceedings by the people; and it is only in cases where the public good would be injured, and because it would be injured, that proceedings should be secret. In such cases it is the duty of the Executive to sacrifice their personal interests (which would be promoted by publicity) to the public interest.—To President Washington. IV, 89. Ford ed., vi, 461. (1793.)

7115. PUBLICITY, Expediency of. If the negotiations with England are at an end, if not given to the public now, when are they to be given? and what moment can be so interesting? If anything amiss should happen from the concealment, where will the blame originate at least? It may be said, indeed, that the President puts it in the power of the Legislature to communicate these proceedings to their constituents; but is it more their duty to communicate to their constituents, than it is the President's to communicate to his constituents? And if they were desirous of communicating them, ought the President to restrain them by making the communication confidential? I think no harm can be done by the publication, because it is impossible England, after doing us an injury, should declare war against us, merely because we tell our constituents of it; and I think good may be done because while it puts it in the power of the Legislature to adopt peaceable measures of doing ourselves justice, it prepares the minds of our constituents to go cheerfully into an acquiescence under these measures, by impressing them with a thorough and enlightened conviction that they are founded in right.—To President Washington. IV, 89. Ford ed., vi, 461. (Dec. 1793.)

7116. On a review of the question, whether the British communication should carry any such mark of being confidential as to prevent the Legislature from publishing them, he is clearly of opinion they ought not. Will they be kept secret if secrets be enjoined? Certainly not, and all the ofence will be given (if it be possible any should be given) which would follow their complete publication. If they would be kept secret, from whom would it be? From our own constituents only, for Great Britain is possessed of every title. Why, then, keep it secret from them?—To President Washington. iv, 89. Ford ed., vi, 461. (Dec. 1793.)

7117. PUBLICITY, Full. I hope that to preserve this weather-gauge of public opinion, and to counteract the slanders and falsehoods disseminated by the English papers, the government will make it a standing instruction to their ministers at foreign courts, to keep Europe truly informed of occurrences here, by publishing in their papers the naked truth always, whether favorable or unfavorable. For they will believe the good, if we candidly tell them the bad also.—To James Monroe. VI, 408. Ford ed., ix, 497. (M., 1815.)

7118. PUBLICITY, The people and. I have not been in the habit of mysterious reserve on any subject, nor of buttoning up my opinions within my own breast. On the contrary, while in public service especially, I thought the public entitled to frankness, and intimately to know whom they employed.—To Samuel Kerchival. VII, 9. Ford ed., x, 37. (M., 1816.)

7119. PUBLICITY, Preservation of order and. The way to prevent these irregular interpositions of the people is to give them full information of their affairs through the channel of the public papers, and to preserve that those papers should penetrate the whole mass of the people.—To Edward Carrington. II, 90. Ford ed., iv, 359. (P., 1787.)

7120. PUBLICITY, War intelligence. When our constituents are called on for considerable exertions to relieve a part of their fellow-citizens, suffering from the hand of an enemy, it is desirable for those entrusted with the administration of their affairs to communicate without reserve what they have done to ward off the evil.—To President Washington. Ford ed., v, 431. (1792.)

* Jefferson was discussing Shays's rebellion.—EDITOR.

The extract is from the draft of a letter written by Jefferson for President Washington, to be sent by him to the Secretary of War, as an introduction to a report on Indian affairs. Hamilton doubted whether 'our constituents' was a proper phrase to be used by the President in addressing a subordinate officer, and suggested instead of it, 'the community'applying to us. Hamilton also suggested that the close of the sentence after "desirable" be made to read, "to manifest that due pains have been taken by those entrusted with the administration of their affairs to avoid the evil". Washington made the change.—EDITOR.
7121. — A fair and honest narrative of the bad, is a voucher for the truth of the good. In this way the old Congress set an example to the world, for which the world amply repaid them, by giving unlimited credit to whatever was stamped with the name of Charles Thomson. It is known that this was never put to an untruth but once, and that where Congress was misled by the credulity of their General (Sullivan). The first misfortune of the Revolutionary war, induced a motion to suppress or garble the account of it. It was rejected with indignation. The whole truth was given in all its details, and there never was another attempt in that body to disguise it.—To Matthew Carr. vi. 133. (M., 1814.)

7122. PUNISHMENT, Excessive.—All excess of punishment is a crime.—Report on Spanish Convention. iii. 354. Ford ed., v. 484. (1792.)

7124. — I sincerely wish the circulation of the letters of “Ceres and Amicus” among the Society of Friends may have the effect you expect, of abating their prejudices against the government of their country. But I apprehend their disease is too deeply seated, that identifying themselves with the mother Society in England, and taking from them implicitly their politics, their principles and passions, it will be long before they cease to be Englishmen in thing but the place of their birth, and to consider List, at least, England, as their real country.—To Mr. Baldwin. v. 494. (M., 1810.)

7125. QUAKERS, Indian civilization and.—In this important work [Indian civilization] I owe to your Society an acknowledgment that we have felt the benefits of their zealous cooperation, and approved its judicious direction towards producing among those people peace, industry, comfortable subsistence, and civilized usages, as preparatory to religious instruction and the cultivation of letters.—Reply to Address. viii. 118. (1807.)

7126. QUAKERS, Jefferson’s administration and.—Conscious that the present administration has been essentially specific, and that in all questions of importance it has been governed by the identical principles professed by the Society of Friends, it has been quite at a loss to conjecture the unknown cause of the opposition of the other part, and bare neutrality of the rest. The hope, however, of the prejudices would at length give way to facts, has never been entirely extinguished, and still may be realized in favor of another administration.—To Mr. Franklin. v. 303. (W., 1808.)

7127. — You observe very truly, that both the late and the present administration conducted the government on principles professed by the Friends. Our efforts to preserve peace, our measures as to the Indians, as to slavery, as to religious freedom, were all in consonance with their principles. If, as we expected we should get a vote from them, and in this I was neither deceived nor disappointed. There is no riddle in this to those who do not suffer themselves to be duped by the professions of religious sectaries. The theory of America, Quakerism is a part of it. The mother Society is in England. Its members are English by birth and residence, devoted to their own country, as good citizens ought to be. The Quakers of these States are colonies or filiations in themother Society, to whom that Society sends its yearly lessons. On these, the Quaker Societies model their opinions, their conduct, their passions and attachments. A Quaker is essentially an Englishman, in every part of the earth he is born or lives. The outrages of Great Britain on our nation, our feelings have kept us in perpetual bickerings with her. The Quakers have taken side against their own government, not on their profession of peace, for they saw that peace was our object also; but from devotion to the views of the mother Society. It was the year 1797-98. Had we not fought war with France, the Quakers were the most clamorous for war. Their principle of peace, as a secondary one, yielded to the primary one of adherence to the Friends in England, and what was patriotism in the original, became treason in the copy. On that occasion, they obliged their good old leader, Mr. Pember ton, to erase his name from a petition to Congress against war, which had been delivered to a representative of Pennsylvania, a member of the late administration; he accordingly permitted the old petition to remain under his name.   I apply this to the Friends in general, not universally. I know individuals among them as good patriots as we have.—To Samuel Kerchival. v. 492. (M., 1810.)

7128. QUAKERS, Oppression of.—The first settlers in this country [Virginia] were emigrants from England, of the English Church, just at a point of time when it was flushed with complete victory over the religions of all other persuasions. Possessed, as they became, of the powers of making, administering, and executing the laws, they showed equal intolerance in this country towards their Presbyterian brethren, who had emigrated to the northen part of the government. The poor Quakers were flying from persecution in England. They cast their eyes on these new countries as asylum of civil and religious freedom; they found them free only for the reigning sect. Several acts of the Virginia Assembly of 1659, 1662, 1664, and 1670. Had imposed capital punishment, with the pen in parents to refuse to have their children baptized; had prohibited the unlawful assembling of Quakers; had made it penal for any master of a vessel to bring a Quaker into the State; had ordered those who did so, ready to pay the penalty. As such should come thereafter, to be imprisoned till they should abjure the country; provided a milder punishment for their first and second refusal, but death for the third; had inhibited all persons from suffering their meetings in or near their houses, whether entertained socially, or disposing of books which supported their tenets. If no capital execution took place here, as did in New England, it was not owing to the moderation of the church, or spirit of the legislature, as may be inferred from the law itself; but to historical circumstances which have not been handed down to us. The Anglicans retained full possession of the country about a century. Other opinions began then to creep in, and the great care of the government to support their own church, having begotten an equal degree of indolence in its clergy, two-thirds of the people had become dissenters at the commencement of the present Revolution. The laws indeed were still oppressive on them, but the spirit of the one party had subsided into moderation, and of the other had risen to a degree of determination which commanded respect.—Notes on Virginia, viii, 398. Ford ed., ii, 261. (1786.)

7129. QUARANTINE, Uniform laws.—Many are the exercises of power preserved to the States, wherein a uniformity of proceeding would be advantageous to all. Such are quarantimes.—To JAMES C. SULLIVAN, v, 101. Ford ed., ix, 76. (W., 1807.)

7130. QUARRELS, Among friends.—The way to make friends quarrel is to put them in disputation under the public eye. An experience of near twenty years has taught me that few friendships stand this test; and that public assemblies, where every one is free to act and speak, are the most powerful looseners of the bonds of private friendship.—To General Washington, i, 334. Ford ed., iii, 466. (A., 1784.)

7131. QUARRELS, Cowards and.—A coward is much more exposed to quarrels than a man of spirit.—To James Monroe. Ford ed., iv, 34. (P., 1785.)

7132. QUARRELS, European.—I am decidedly of opinion we should take no part in European quarrels.—To General Washington, ii, 533. Ford ed., v, 57. (P., 1788.) See Aliances.

7133. QUARRELS, Human nature and.—An association of men who will not quarrel with one another is a thing which never yet existed, from the greatest confederacy of nations down to a town meeting or a vestry.—To John Taylor, iv, 247. Ford ed., vii, 265. (Pa., 1798.)

—QUEBEC, Expedition against.—See Arnold.

7134. QUIET, Love of.—I want to be quiet; and although some circumstances, now and then, excite me to notice them, I feel safe, and happier in leaving events to those whose turn it is to take care of them; and, in general, to let it be understood, that I meddle little or not at all with public affairs.—To Joseph C. Cabell. vi, 310. Ford ed., ix, 452. (M., 1814.)

—QUILLING.—See Music.

7135. QUORUM, Constitution of.—Two-thirds of the members of either house shall be a quorum.—Proposed Va. Constitution. Ford ed., ii, 17. (June 1776.)

7136.—Two-thirds of the members of the General Court, High Court of Chancery, or Court of Appeals, shall be a quorum.—Proposed Va. Constitution. Ford ed., ii, 24. (June 1776.)

7137.—A majority of either house shall be a quorum, but any smaller proportion which from time to time shall be thought expedient by the respective houses, shall be sufficient to call for, and to punish, their non-attending members, and to adjourn themselves for any time not exceeding one week.—Proposed Constitution for Virginia. viii, 444. Ford ed., iii, 324. (1783.)

7138. QUORUM Size of.—The Assembly exercises a power of determining the quorum of their own body at pleasure for us.* After the establishment of the new form they adhered to the Lex majoris partis, founded in common law as well as common right (Bro. abr. Corporations, 31, 34; Hakewell, 93.) Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which names the House of Representatives, and whose numbers are not fixed by any other law. (Puff. Off. hom. 1, 2, c. 6, § 12.) They continued for some time to require the presence of a majority of their whole number to pass an act. But the British parliament fixes its own quorum; our former assemblies fixed their own quorum; and one precedent in favor of power is stronger than an hundred against it. The House of Delegates, therefore, have lately voted (June 4, 1781), that, during the present dangerous invasion, forty members shall be a house to proceed to business. They have been moved to this by the fear of not being able to collect a house. But this danger could not authorize them to call that a house which was none; and they resolved, that at one number, they may at another, till it loses its essential quality of being a representative body. As this vote expires with the present invasion, it is probable the former rule will be permitted to revive; because at present no ill is meant. The power, however, of fixing their own quorum is now avowed, and a precedent set. From forty it may be reduced to four, and from four to one; from a house to a committee, from a committee to a chairman or speaker, and thus anarchy may be substituted under forms supposed to be regular. "Omnia mala exempla ex bonis orta sunt; sed ubi imperium ad ignaros aut minus bonos percvent, notum illud exemplum ab dignis et idoneis ad insignes et non indones fuerit ". When, therefore, it is considered that there is no exception to the ancient assumption by the Assembly of all the powers legislative, executive and judiciary, and that these may come to the hands of the smallest rag of delegation, surely the people will say, and their representatives, while yet they have honest representatives, will advise them to say, that they will not acknowledge as laws any acts not considered and assented to by the major part of their delegates.—Notes on Virginia, viii, 367. Ford ed., iii, 229. (1782.)

taken away. God fulfilled the purpose by making the generations uninterrupted and continuous. This, therefore, we are especially to lay down as a principle, that coition is not for the sake of pleasure". But nature, not trusting to this moral and abstract motive, seems to have provided more securely for the perpetuation of the species, by making it the effect of the ovum in the constitution of both sexes. And not only has the commerce of love been indulged on this unhallowed impulse, but made subservient also to wealth and ambition by marriage, without regard to the beauty, the healthiness, the understanding, or the sake of the same, but for the sake of the issue. The selecting the best male for a harem of well chosen females also, which Theognis seems to recommend from the example of our sheep and asses, would doubtless improve the human, as it does the brute animal, the race of invaluable and perpetual use. For experience proves that the moral and physical qualities of man, whether good or evil, are transmissible in a certain degree from father to son. But I suspect that the equal rights of man will rise up against this privilege, and the human mind be raised to a higher and more perfect understanding than the "Aegean gens yineos aston" which Theognis complains of, and to content ourselves with the accidental aristotle produced by the fortuitous concourse of breeders.—To John Adams, vi, 222.

FORD ED., IX, 424. (M. 1813.)

7140. RACES, Mingling of.—In time, you [Indians] will be as we are; you will become one people with us. Your blood will mix with ours, and will spread with ours, over this great Island.—INDIAN ADDRESS, vii, 234. (1809.)

7141. RAINBOWS, Formation of.—An Abbé here [Paris] has shaken, if not destroyed, the theory of Dominis, Descartes and Newton, for explaining the phenomenon of the rainbow. According to that theory, you know, a cone of rays issuing from the sun, and falling on a cloud in the opposite part of the heavens, is reflected back in the form of a smaller cone, the axis of which is the eye of the observer; so that the eye of the observer must be in the axis of both cones, and unequally distant from every part of the bow. But he observes that he has repeatedly seen bows, the one end of which has been very near to him, and the other at a very great distance. I have often seen the same thing myself. I recollect well to have seen the end of a rainbow between myself and a house, or between myself and a bank, not twenty yards distant; and this repeatedly. But I never saw, what he says he has seen, different rainbows at the same time intersecting each other. I never saw coexistent bows, which were not concentric also. Again, according to the theory, if the sun is in the horizon, the horizon intercepts the lower half of the bow; if above the horizon, that intercepts more than half, in proportion. So that, generally, the bow is less than a semi-circle, and never more. He says he has seen it more than a semi-circle. I have often seen the leg of the bow below my level. My recollection recollects this, because there is a mountain there in the opposite direction of the afternoon's sun, the valley between which and Monticello, is five hundred feet deep. I have seen a leg of a rainbow plunge down on this valley both mornings and evenings. I do not recollect to have remarked at any time that the bow was more than half a circle. It appears to me that these facts demolish the Newtonian hypothesis, but they do not support that in its stead by the Abbé. He supposes a c'ound between the sun and the observer, and that through some opening in that cloud, the rays pass, and form an iris on the opposite part of the heavens, just as a ray of light, when passing through a chutter of a darkened room, and falling on a prism there, forms the prismatic colors on the opposite wall. According to this, we might see bows of more than the half circle, as often as of less. A thousand other objections to this result is that we were wiser than we were, by having an error the less in our catalogue.—To Rev. James Madison, ii, 430. (P. 1788.)

7142. RAINBOWS, Lunar.—I have twice seen bows formed by the moon. They were of the color of the common circle round the moon, and were very near, being within a few paces of me in both instances.—To William Dunbar, iv, 348. FORD ED., vii, 482. (W. Jan. 1801.)

7143. RAINBOWS AT MONTICELLO.—I remark a rainbow of a great portion of the circle is comprised by you when on the line of your observation. I live in a situation which has given me an opportunity of seeing more than the semicircle often. I am on a hill five hundred feet perpendicularly high. On the east side it breaks down abruptly to the base, where a river passes against this hill. A rainbow at sunset, plunges one of its legs down to the river, five hundred feet below the level of the eye on the top of the hill.—To William Dunbar, iv, 348. FORD ED., vii, 482. (W. Jan. 1801.)

7144. RANDOLPH (Edmund), Indecisiveness.—Everything in the cabinet hangs upon the opinion of a single person [Edmund Randolph] and that the most indecisive one I ever had to do business with. He will always contrive to agree in principle with one but not in conclusion with the other.—To James Madison, iii, 556. (1793.)

7145. RANDOLPH (Edmund), Principles and practice.—Though he mistakes his own political character in the aggregate, yet he gives it * * * in the detail [in his pamphlet entitled "Vindication"]). Thus, he supposes himself a man of no party (page 97); that his opinions not containing any systematic adherence to party, fall sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other.—To Secretary of State, 5th Aug. (page 58). He gives you these facts, which show that they fall generally on both sides, and are complete inconsistencies. 1. He never gave an opinion in the cabinet against the rights of the people (page 97); yet he advised the denunciation of the popular [Democratic] societies (page 67). 2. He would not neglect the overtures of a commercial treaty with France (page 76); yet he always opposed it while Attorney General, and never seems to have proposed it while Secretary of State. 3. He is not above the militia to quell the pretended insurrections in the west (page 81), and proposes an augmentation from twelve thousand five hundred to fifteen thousand, to march against men at their ploughs (page 80); yet on the 5th of August he advised the appointment of a secretary to the militia (page 58). 4. He concurs in the measure of a mission extraordinary to London (as inferred from page 58), but objects to the men, to wit, Hamilton with whom he is now on (page 58). 5. He was against granting commercial powers to Mr. Jay, yet he besieged the doors of the Senate to procure their advice to ratify. 6. He advises the President to a ratification on the merits of the [Jay} treaty (page 97), but to a suspension till the provision order is repealed (page 98). The fact is, that he had generelly given on his principles to the one party, and his practice to the other, the oyster to one, the shell to the other. Unfortunately, the shell was generally the lot of his friends, the French and republicans, and the oyster of their antagonists. Had he been firm to the principles he professes in the year 1793, the President would have been kept from an habitual concert with the British and anti-republican party. But at that time I do not know which Randolph feared most, a British fleet, or French disorganizers. Whether his conduct be for or against the view of things, an adherence to right without regard to party, as he pretends, or to an anxiety to trim between both, those who know his character and capacity will decide.—To William B. Giles, iv, 125. Ford ed., vii, 40. (M., Dec. 1795.)

7146. [Edmund Randolph’s] narrative [in his pamphlet] is so straight and plain, that even those who did not know him will generally believe who knew him had done it from the first. To William B. Giles, iv, 125. Ford ed., vii, 41. (M., Dec. 1795.)

7147. RANDOLPH (Edmund), Resignation.—The resignation, or rather the removal, of Randolph, you will have learned. His vindication bears hard on the Executive in the opinions of this quarter, and though it clears him in their judgment of the charge of bribery, it does not give them high ideas of his wisdom or steadiness.—To James Monroe. Ford ed., vii, 59. (M., 1796.)

7148. RANDOLPH (John), Attacks on Jefferson.—That Mr. Randolph has openly attacked the Administration is sufficiently known. We were not disposed to join in league with Britain, under any belief that she is fighting for the liberties of mankind, and to enter into war with Spain, and consequently France. The House of Representatives were in the same sentiment when they rejected Mr. Randolph’s resolutions for raising a body of regular troops for the western service. We are for a peaceable accommodation with all those nations, if it can be effected honorably. This, perhaps, is not the only ground of his alienation: but which side retains its orthodoxy, the vote of eighty-seven to eleven republicans may satisfy you.—To William Duane. iv, 591. Ford ed., viii, 432. (W., March 1806.)

7149. RANDOLPH (John), Defection.—The separation of a member of great talents and weight from the present course of things, scattered dismay for a time among those who had been used to see him with them. A little time, however, enabled them to rally to their own principles, and to resume their track under the guidance of their own good sense. As long as he pursues without deviation the principles we have always professed, I have no fear of deviation from them in the main body of republicans.—To Caesar A. Rodney. Ford ed., viii, 436. (W., March 1806.)

7151. His course [in opposition to the administration] has excited considerable alarm. Timid men consider it as a proof of the weakness of our government, and that it is to be rent into pieces by demagogues, and to end in anarchy. I survey the scene with a different eye and draw a different augury from it. In a House of Representatives of a great mass of good sense, Mr. Randolph’s popular eloquence gave him such advantages as to place him unrivalled as a leader of the House; and although not conciliatory to those whom he led, principles of duty and patriotism induced many of them to swallow humilations he subjected them to, and to vote as was right, as long as he kept the path of right himself. The sudden defection of such a man could not but produce a momentary astonishment, and even dismay; but for a moment. To good sense, the House rallied around its principles, and without any leader pursued steadily the business of the session, did it well, and by a strength which has never before been seen. Upon all trying questions, exclusive of the federalists, the minority of republicans voting with him has been from four to six or eight, against from ninety to one hundred; and although he treats the federalists with ineffable contempt, yet, having declared eternal opposition to this administration, he has consequently associated with them, in his votes, he will * * * with end them. The augury I draw from this is, that there is a steady, good sense in the Legislature, and in the body of the nation, joined with good intentions, which will lead them to discern and to pursue the public good against all obstacles and situations which can arise, and that no ignis fatuus will be able to lead them long astray.—To James Monroe, v, 9. Ford ed., viii, 447. (W., May 1806.)

7152. RANDOLPH (John), Florida purchase.—He speaks of secret communications between the Executive and members [of Congress], of backstairs’ influence, &c. But he never speaks of this while the Mr. Nicholas enjoyed it almost solely. But when he differed from the Executive in a leading measure, and the Executive, not submitting to him, expressed their sentiments to others, the very sentiments (to wit, the purchase of Florida) which he acknowledges they expressed to him, then he roars out upon the backstairs’ influence.—To W. A. Burwell, v, 21. Ford ed., viii, 470. (M., Sep. 1806.) See Congress, Leadership.

7153. RANDOLPH (Peyton), Estimate of.—He was indeed a most excellent man; and none was ever more beloved and respected by his friends. Somewhat cold and coy towards strangers, but in private relations, and when he perceived a friend, he gave a smaller proportion of it at the bar than his abilities would otherwise have commanded. Indeed, after his appointment as Attorney-General
Randolph (Thos. Mann) Rebellion

[of the King], he did not seem to court, nor scarcely to welcome business. In that office, he considered himself equally charged with the rights, duties, and duties of those of the crown, and in criminal prosecutions, exaggerating nothing, he aimed at a candid and just state of the transaction, believing it more a duty to save an innocent than to convict a guilty man. Although not eloquent, his matter was so substantial that no man commanded more attention, which, joined with a sense of his great worth, gave him a weight in the House of Burgesses which few ever attained.—To JOSEPH DELaplaine. FORD ED., x. 59. (M., 1816.)

7154. RANDOLPH (Thomas Mann), Independence.—I am aware that in parts of the Union, and even with persons to whom Mr. Eppes and Mr. [T. M.] Randolph are unknown, and myself little known, it will be presumed, from their connection,* that what comes from them comes from me. No men on earth are more independent in their sentiments than they are, nor any one less disposed than I am to influence the opinions of others. We rarely speak of politics, or of the proceedings of the House, but merely historically, and I carefully avoid expressing an opinion on them in their presence, that we may all be at our ease. With other members [of Congress], I have believed that more unreserved communications would be advantageous to the public.—To JOHN RANDOLPH. D. L. J., 293. (W., Dec. 1803.)

7155. RANDOLPH (Thomas Mann), Tribute to.—A gentleman of genius, science, and honorable mind.† He filled a dignified station in the General Government, and the most dignified in his own State.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY, i, 108. FORD ED., i, 150. (1821.)

—RATIO OF APPORTIONMENT.—See Appor- tionment.

7156. READING, Passion for.—My repugnance to the writing table becomes daily and hourly more deadly and insurmountable. In place of this has come on a canine appetite for reading. I indulge in it, because I see in it a relief against the * tadenum sectus; a lamp to lighten my path through the dreary wilderness of time before me, whose bourne I see not. Losing daily all interest in the things around us, something else is necessary to fill the void. With me it is reading, which occupies the mind without the labor of producing ideas from my own stock.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 104. FORD ED., x, 108. (M., 1818.)

7157. REASON, Action and.—Every one must act according to the dictates of his own reason.—To REV. SAMUEL MILLER. v, 237. FORD ED., ix, 175. (W., 1808.)

7158. REASON, Diverting.—Is reason to be forever amused with the crochets of physical sciences, in which she is indulged merely to divert her from solid speculations on the rights of man, and wrongs of his oppressors? It is impossible. The day of deliverance will come, although I shall no live to see it.—To M. PAGANEL. v, 582. (M., 1811.)

7159. REASON, Fallible.—I have learned to be less confident in the conclusions of human reason, and give more credit to the honesty of contrary opinions.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 342. FORD ED., x, 300. (M., 1824.)

7160. REASON, Government and.—I hope that we have not labored in vain and that our experiment will still prove that men can be governed by reason.—To GEORGE MASON. iii, 209. FORD ED., v, 275. (Pa., 1791.)

7161. REASON, Oracle.—Every man's own reason must be his oracle.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. vi, 106. (M., 1813.)

7162. REASON, Power of.—Truth and reason are eternal. They have prevailed. And they will eternally prevail, however, in times and places they may be overborne for a while by violence, military, civil, or ecclesiastical.—To REV. MR. KNOX. v, 503. (M., 1810.)

7163. REASON, Seeking.—The public say from all quarters that they wish to hear reason and not disgusting blackguardism.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 281. FORD ED., vii, 344. (Pa., 1799.)

7164. REASON, Surrender of.—Man once surrender his reason, has no remaining guard against absurdities the most monstrous, and like a ship without rudder, is the sport of every wind.—To JAMES SMITH. vii, 270. (M., 1822.)

7165. REASON, Umpirage of.—We should be most unwise, indeed, were we to cast away the singular blessings of the position in which nature has placed us, the opportunity she has endowed us with of cultivating general friendship, and of bringing collisions of interest to the umpirage of reason rather than of force.—Third Annual Message. vii, 29. FORD ED., viii, 273. (1803.)

7166. Every man's reason is his own rightful umpire. This principle, with that of acquiescence in the will of the majority, will preserve us free and prosperous as long as they are sacredly observed.—To JOHN F. WATSON. vi, 346. (M., 1814.)

7167. REASON vs. ERROR.—Reason and experiment have been indulge, and error has fled before them.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 401. FORD ED., iii, 264. (1782.)

7169. REASON vs. FORCE.—A government of reason is better than one of force.—To RICHARD RUSH. vii, 183. (M., 1820.)

7170. REBELLION, Bacon's.—I return you the manuscript history of Bacon's rebellion. * * It is really a valuable morsel in the history of Virginia. That transaction is the more marked, as it was the only rebellion or insurrection * * in the colony before the American Revolution.—To RUFUS KING. iv, 528. (W., 1804.)

7171. REBELLION, Freedom from.—We have had thirteen States independent eleven years. There has been one rebellion. That comes to one rebellion in a century and a half for each State. What country before ever existed a century and a half without a rebellion?—To W. S. Smith, ii, 318. Ford Ed., iv, 467. (P. 1787.) See Government.

7172. REBELLION, Necessary.—I hold it that a little rebellion, now and then, is a good thing, and as necessary in the political world as storms are in the physical.—To James Madison, ii, 105. Ford Ed., iv, 362. (P. 1787.)

—REBELLION, Shays's.—See Shays's Rebellion.

7174. REBELLION, Spirit of.—The spirit of resistance to government is so valuable on certain occasions, that I wish it to be always kept up. It will often be exercised when wrong, but better so than not to be exercised at all.—To Mrs. John Adams. Ford Ed., iv, 370. (P. 1787.)

7175. REBELLION, Remedy for.—What country can preserve its liberties if its rulers are not warned, from time to time, that the people preserve the spirit of resistance? Let them take arms. The remedy is to set them right as to facts, pardon and pacify them. To W. S. Smith, ii, 318. Ford Ed., iv, 467. (P. 1787.) See Publicity.

7176. REBELLION, Unsuccessful.—Unsuccessful rebellions generally establish the encroachments on the rights of the people which have produced them. An observation of this truth should render honest republican government so mild in their punishment of rebellions, as not to discourage them too much.—To James Madison, ii, 105. Ford Ed., iv, 362. (P. 1787.)

7177. REBELLION, Useful.—I like a little rebellion now and then. It is like a storm in the atmosphere.—To Mrs. John Adams. Ford Ed., iv, 370. (P. 1787.)

—RECEPTIONS, Presidential.—See Ceremony, Etiquette, Formalities and Levees.

7178. RECIPROCITY, British.—It is with satisfaction I lay before you an act of the British Parliament anticipating this subject so far as to authorize a mutual abolution of the duties and countervailing duties permitted under the treaty of 1794. It shows on their part a spirit of justice and friendly accommodation which it is our duty and our interest to cultivate with all nations. Whether this would produce a due equality in the navigation between the two countries, is a subject for your consideration.—Second Annual Message. viii, 16. Ford Ed., viii, 182. (Dec. 1802.)

7179. RECIPROCITY, Commerce and.—Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce any relaxation of them.—Foreign Commerce Report, vii, 647. Ford Ed., vi, 480. (1793.)

7180. RECIPROCITY, French.—I have been laboring with the ministry to get the trade between France and the United States put on a better footing, by admitting a free importation and sale of our produce, assuring them that we should take their manufactures at whatever extent they would enable us to pay for them.—To Mr. Ottoo, i, 558. (P. 1786.)

7181. RECIPROCITY, Justice and.—On the restoration of peace in Europe, that portion of the general carrying trade which had fallen to our share during the war, was abridged by the returning competition of the belligerent powers. This was to be expected, and was just. But in addition we find in some parts of Europe monopolizing discriminations, which, in the form of duties, tend effectually to prohibit the carrying thither our own produce in our own vessels. From existing amities, and a spirit of justice, it is hoped that friendly discussion will produce a fair and adequate reciprocity. But should false calculations of interest defeat our hope, it rests with the Legislature to decide whether they will not meet inequalities abroad with countervailing inequalities at home, or provide for the evil in any other way.—Second Annual Message. viii, 16. Ford Ed., vii, 182. (Dec. 1802.)

7182. RECIPROCITY, Modification of.—Where the circumstances of either party render it expedient to levy a revenue, by way of impost, on commerce, its freedom might be modified, in that particular, by mutual and equivalent measures, preserving it entire in all others.—Foreign Commerce Report, vii, 646. Ford Ed., vi, 479. (Dec. 1793.)

—RECORDS, Preservation of.—See History, Records of.

7183. RECTITUDE, Contentment and.—Crooked schemes will end by overwhelming their authors and coadjutors in disgrace, and he alone who walks strict and upright, and who, in matters of opinion, will be contented that others should be as free as himself, and acquiesce when his opinion is finally overruled, will attain his object in the end.—To Gideon Granger, iv, 543. Ford Ed., viii, 300. (M., 1804.)

7184. RECTITUDE, Fame and.—Give up money, give up fame, give up science, give the earth itself and all it contains, rather than do an immoral act. And never suppose, that in any possible situation, or under any circumstances, it is best for you to do a dishonorable thing, however slight it may appear to you.*

—To Peter Carr, i, 396. (P. 1785.)

—REDEMPTIONERS.—See Population.

7185. REFORM, Adequate.—The hole and the patch should be commensurate.—To James Madison, ii, 152. Ford Ed., iv, 390. (P. 1787.)

7186. REFORM, Congress and.—The representatives of the people in Congress are alone competent to judge of the general disposition of the people and to what precise point of reformation they are ready to go.—To Mr. Rutherford, iii, 499. (Pa., 1792.)

*Peter Carr was the young nephew of Jefferson.—Editor.
7187. REFORM, Constitutional.—Happily for us that when we find our constitutions defective and insufficient to secure the happiness of our people, we can assemble with all the coolness of philosophers, and set them to rigour while every other nation on earth must have recourse to arms to amend, or to restore their constitutions.—To M. DUMAS. ii, 264. (P., 1787.)

7188. REFORM, In France.—Surely under such a mass of misrule and oppression [as existed in France in 1789] a people might justly press for a thorough reformation, and might even dismount their rough-shod riders and leave them to walk on their own legs.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 86. FORD ED., i, 119. (1821.)

7189. REFORM, Generations and.—The idea that institutions established for the use of the nation cannot be touched nor modified, even to make them answer their end, because of rights gratuitously supposed in those employed to manage them in trust for the public, may perhaps be a salutary provision against the abuses of a monarch, but is most absurd against the nation itself. Yet our lawyers and priests generally inculcate this doctrine, and suppose that preceding generations held the earth more freely than we do; had a right to impose laws on us, unalterable by ourselves, and that we, in like manner, can make laws and impose burthens on future generations, which they will have no right to alter; in fine, that the earth belongs to the dead and not to the living.—To Governor PLUMER. vii, 19. (M., 1816.) See Generations.

7190. REFORM, Government and.—Our citizens may be deceived for awhile, and have been deceived; but as long as the presses can be protected, we may trust to them for light; still more perhaps to the taxgathers; for it is not worth the while of our anti-republicans to risk themselves on any change of government, but a very expensive one. Reduce every department to economy, and there will be no temptation to them to betray their constituents.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. FORD ED., vii, 378. (M., 1792.)

7191. REFORM, Gradual.—A forty years' experience of popular assemblies has taught me, that you must give them time for every step you take. If too hard pushed, they balk, and the machine retrogrades.—To JOEL BARLOW. v, 217. FORD ED., ix, 169. (W., 1807.)

7192. Truth advances, and error recedes step by step only; and to do our fellow-men the most good in our power, we must lead where we can, follow where we cannot, and still go with them, watching always the favorable moment for helping them to another step.—To THOMAS COOPER. vi, 390. (M., 1814.)

7194. REFORM, Necessity for.—I think moderate imperfections [in constitutions and laws] had better be borne with; because, when once known, we accommodate ourselves to them, and find practical means of correcting their ill effects. But I know also, that laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also, and keep pace with the times.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 15. FORD ED., x, 42. (M., 1816.)

7195. REFORM, Peaceable.—Go on doing with your pen what in other times was done with the sword: show that reformation is more practicable by operation on the mind than on the body of man.—To THOMAS Paine. FORD ED., vi, 88. (Pa., 1792.)

7196. All [reforms] can be * * * [achieved] peaceably, by the people confining their choice of Representatives and Senators to persons attached to republican government and the principles of 1776, not office-hunters, but farmers, whose interests are entirely agricultural. Such men are the true representatives of the great American interest, and are alone to be relied on for expressing the proper American sentiments.—To Arthur Campbell. iv, 198. FORD ED., vii, 170. (M., 1797.)

7197. REFORM, People and.—Whenever things get so far wrong as to attract their notice, the people, if well informed, may be relied on to set them to rights.—To Dr. Price. ii, 553. (P., 1789.)

7198. [Reformation] must be brought about by the people, using their elective rights with prudence and self-possession, and not suffering themselves to be duped by treacherous emissaries.—To Arthur Campbell. iv, 198. FORD ED., vii, 170. (M., 1797.)

7199. REFORM, Persistent.—No good measure was ever proposed which, if duly pursued, failed to prevail in the end.—To Edward Coles. FORD ED., ix, 479. (M., 1814.)

suggest, and experience approve, were I free to do whatever I thought best; but when we reflect how difficult it is to move or inflect the great machine of society, how impossible to advance the notions of a whole people suddenly to ideal right, we see the wisdom of Solon's remark, that no more good must be attempted than the nation can bear, and that all will be chiefly to reform the waste of public money, and thus drive away the vultures who prey upon it and improve some little upon old routines. Some new fences for securing constitutional rights may, with the aid of a good Legislature, perhaps be attainable.

—To Dr. Walter Jones. iv, 392. (W., March 1801.)

7209. RELATIONS, Appointment to office.—The public will never be made to believe that an appointment of a relative is made on the ground of merit alone, uninfluenced by family views; nor can they ever see with approbation offices the disposal of which they entrust to their Presidents for public purposes, divided out as family property. Mr. Adams degraded himself infinitely by his conduct on this subject, as General Washington had done himself the greatest honor. With two such examples to prove but I should be doubly inexcusable to err. It is true that this places the relations of the President in a worse situation than if he were a stranger, but the public good, which cannot be affected if its confidence be lost, requires this sacrifice. Perhaps, too, it is compensated by sharing in the public esteem.—To George Jefferson. iv, 388. Ford ed., viii, 38. (W., March 1801.)

7210. I am much concerned to learn that any disagreeable impression was made on your mind, by the circumstances which are the subject of your letter. Permit me first to explain the motives which were the principal ones for my own observance. In a government like ours, it is the duty of the Chief Magistrate, in order to enable himself to do all the good which his station requires, to endeavor, by all honorable means, to unite in himself the confidence of the whole people. This alone, in any case where the energy of the nation is required, can produce a union of the powers of the whole, and point them in a single direction, as if all constituted but one body and one mind. and this alone can render a weaker nation unassailable by a stronger one. Towards acquiring the confidence of the people, the very first measure is to satisfy them of his disinterestedness, and that he is directing their affairs with a single eye to their good, and not to build up fortunes for himself and family, and especially, that the officers appointed to transact their business, are appointed because they are the fittest men, and not because they are his relations. So prone are they to suspicion, that where a President appoints a man of his own choosing, he will say, or they, they will believe that favor and not merit, is the motive. I, therefore, laid it down as a law of conduct for myself, never to give an appointment to a relation. Had I felt any hesitation in adopting this rule, examples were not wanting to admonish me what to do and what to avoid. Still, the expression of your willingness to act in any office for which you were qualified, could not be imputed to you as blame. It would not readily occur that a person qualified for office ought not to be rejected merely because he was related to the President, and the more recent examples favored the other opinion. In this light I considered the case as presenting itself to your mind, and that the application might be perfectly justifiable on your part, while, for reasons occurring to none perhaps, but the person in my situation, the public interest might render it unadvisable. Of this, however, be assured that I considered the proposition as innocent on your part, and that it never lowered my esteem for you or the interest I felt in your welfare.—To J. Garland Jefferson. v, 497. Ford ed., ix, 270. (M., 1810.)

7211. I have never enquired what number of sons, relations and friends of Senators, Representatives, printers, or other useful partisans Colonel Hamilton has provided for among the hundred clerks of his department, the thousand excisemen, custom house officers, loan officers, &c., &c., &c., appointed by him, or at his nod, and spread over the Union; nor could I ever have imagined that the man who has the shuffling of millions backwards and forwards from paper into money and money into paper, from Europe to America, and America to Europe, the dealing out of Treasury-secrets among his friends in what time and measure he pleases, and who never slips an occasion of making friends with his means, that such an one, I say, could have brought forward a charge against me for having appointed the poet. Freneau, translating clerk to my office, with a salary of 250 dollars a year.—To President Washington. iii, 464. Ford ed., vi, 105. (M., 1792.)

7219. ——— I consider the government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from intermeddling with religious institutions, their doctrines, discipline, or exercises. This results not only from the provision that no law shall be made respecting the establishment or free exercise of religion, but from that also which reserves to the States the powers not delegated to the United States. Certainly, no power to prescribe any religious exercise, or to assume any authority in religious discipline, has been delegated to the General Government. It must then rest with the States, as far as it can be in any human authority.—To Rev. Samuel Miller. v. 236. Ford ed., ix, 174. (W., 1808.)

7220. ——— I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the civil magistrate to direct its exercises, its discipline, or its doctrines; nor of the religious societies, that the General Government should be invested with the power of effecting any uniformity of time or matter among them.—To Rev. Samuel Miller. v. 237. Ford ed., ix, 175. (W., 1808.)

7221. RELIGION, Freedom of.—All persons shall have full and free liberty of religious opinion.—Proviso. Va. Constitution. Ford ed., ii, 27. (June 1776.)

7222. ——— From the dissensions among Sects themselves arise, necessarily, a right of choosing and necessity of deliberating to which we will conform. But if we choose for ourselves, we must allow others to choose also. This establishes religious liberty. —Notes on Religion. Ford ed., ii, 98. (1776?)

7223. ——— If I be marching on with my utmost vigor in that way which according to the sacred geography leads to Jerusalem straight, why am I beaten and ill used by others because my hair is not of the right cut; because I have not been dressed right; because I eat flesh on the road; because I avoid certain by-ways which seem to lead into briars; because among several paths I take that which seems shortest and cleanest; because I avoid travellers less grave and keep company with others who are more sour and austere; or because I follow a guide crowned with a mitre and clothed in white? Yet these are the frivolous things which keep Christians at war.—Notes on Religion. Ford ed., ii, 100. (1776?)

7225. ——— I do not like [in the Federal Constitution] the omission of a bill of rights, providing clearly and without the

7226. Almighty God hath created the mind free, and manifested His supreme will that free it shall remain by making it altogether insusceptible of restraint. * * * All attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burthens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy Author of our religion, who, being Lord both of body and mind, yet chose not to exert any coercions on either, as was in His Almighty power to do, but to exalt it by its influence on reason alone.—Statute of Religious Freedom, viii, 454. Ford ed., ii, 237. (1779.)

7227. By a declaration of rights I mean one which shall stipulate freedom of religion.—To A. Donald, ii, 355. (P., July 1788.)

7228. I sincerely rejoice at the acceptance of our new Constitution by nine States. It is a good canvas, on which some strokes only want retouching. What these are, I think are sufficiently manifested by the general voice from north to south, which calls for a bill of rights. It seems pretty generally understood that this should go to * * * religion. * * * The declaration, that religious faith shall be unpunished, does not give impunity to criminal acts, dictated by religious error.—To James Madison, ii, 445. Ford ed., v, 45. (P., July 1788.)

7229. One of the amendments to the Constitution * * * expressly declares, that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press"; thereby guarding in the same sentence, and under the same words, the freedom of religion, of speech and of the press; insomuch, that whatever violates either, throws down the sanctuary which covers the others.—Kentucky Resolutions, ix, 406. Ford ed., vii, 295. (1798.)

7230. I am for freedom of religion, and against all manoeuvres to bring about a legal ascendancy of one sect over another.—To Eberly Gerry, iv, 268. Ford ed., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

7231. Freedom of religion I deem [one of the] essential principles of our government and, consequently, [one] which ought to shape its administration.—First Inaugural Address, viii, 4. Ford ed., viii, 5. (1801.)

7232. Among the most inestimable of our blessings is that * * * of liberty to worship our Creator in the way we think most agreeable to His will; a liberty deemed in other countries incompatible with good government and yet proved by our experience to be its best support.—R. to A. of Baptists, viii, 119. (1807.)

7233. We have solved * * * the great and interesting question whether freedom of religion is compatible with order in government, and obedience to the laws. And we have experienced the quiet as well as the comfort which results from leaving every one to profess freely and openly those principles of religion which are the inclinations of his own reason, and the serious convictions of his own inquiries.—R. to A. Virginia Baptists, viii, 139. (1808.)

7234. Having ever been an advocate for the freedom of religious opinion and exercise, from no person, certainly, was an abridgment of these sacred rights to be apprehended less than from myself.—R. to A. Pittsburgh Methodists, viii, 142. (1808.)

7235. The Constitution has not placed our religious rights under the power of any public functionary.—R. to A. Pittsburgh Methodists, viii, 142. (1808.)

7236. There are certain principles in which the constitutions of our several States all agree, and which all cherish as vitally essential to the protection of the life, liberty, property and safety of the citizen. [One is] Freedom of Religion. restricted only from acts of trespass on that of others.—To M. Coray, vii, 323. (M., 1823.) See Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom, in Appendix.

7237. Religion, Government and.—Whatsoever is lawful in the Commonwealth, or permitted to the subject in the ordinary way, cannot be forbidden to him for religious uses; and whatsoever is prejudicial to the Commonwealth in their ordinary uses and, therefore, prohibited by the laws, ought not to be permitted to churches in their sacred rites. For instance, it is unlawful in the ordinary course of things, or in a private house, to murder a child. It should not be permitted any sect then to sacrifice children; it is ordinarily lawful (or temporarily lawful) to kill calves or lambs. They may, therefore, be religiously sacrificed, but if the good of the State required a temporary suspension of killing lambs, as during a siege, sacrifices of them may then be rightfully suspended also. This is the true extent of toleration.—Notes On Religion. Ford ed., ii, 102. (1776?)

7238. Religion, Growth of.—To me no information could be more welcome than that the minutes of the several religious societies should prove, of late, larger additions than have been usual, to their several associations.—R. to A. New London Methodists, viii, 147. (1809.)

7239. Religion, Honesty of life and.—I must ever believe that religion substantially good which produces an honest life.—To O'Miles King, vi, 388. (M., 1814.)

7240. Religion, Interference with.—No man complains of his neighbor for ill management of his affairs, for an error in sowing his land, or marrying his daughter, for consuming his substance in taverns, pull-
7241. RELIGION, Intermeddling with,—With the religion of other countries my own forbids intermeddling.—To SAMUEL GREENHOW. vi. 308. (M., 1814.)

7242. RELIGION, And law.—I consider * * * religion a supplement to law in the government of men.—To MR. WOODWARD. vii, 339. (M., 1824.)

7243. RELIGION, Opinions respecting.—It is a matter of principle with me to avoid disturbing the tranquillity of others by the expression of any opinion on the innocent questions on which we schismatize.—To JAMES FISHBACK. v, 471. (M., 1809.)

7244. RELIGION, Personal.—Neither of us knows the religious opinions of the other; that is a matter between our Maker and ourselves.—To THOMAS LEIFER. v. 417. FORD ED., ix, 238. (W., 1809.)

7245. ———. I have considered religion as a matter between every man and his Maker, in which no other, and far less the public had a right to intermeddle.—To RICHARD RUSH. FORD ED., ix, 385. (M., 1813.)

7246. ———. Religion is a subject on which I have ever been most scrupulously reserved. I have considered it as a matter between every man and his Maker, in which no other, and far less the public had a right to intermeddle.—To RICHARD RUSH. FORD ED., ix, 385. (M., 1813.)

7247. ———. I inquire after no man’s religion, and trouble none with mine; nor is it given us in this life to know whether yours or mine, our friends’ or our foes’, is exactly the right.—To MILES KING. vi, 388. (M., 1814.)

7249. ———. I have ever thought religion a concern purely between our God and our consciences, for which we were accountable to Him, and not to the priests. I never told my own religion, nor scrutinized that of another. I never attempted to make a convert nor wished to change another’s creed. I have ever judged of the religion of others by their lives * * * for it is in our lives, and not from our words, that our religion must be read.—To MRS. M. HARRISON SMITH. vii, 28. (M., 1816.)

7250. ———. I do not wish to trouble the world with my creed, nor to be troubled for them. These accounts are to be settled only with Him who made us; and to Him we leave it, with charity for all others, of whom, also, He is the only rightful and competent judge.—To TIMOTHY PICKERING. vii, 211. (M., 1821.)

7251. ———. I am of a sect by myself, as far as I know.—To EZRA STILES, vii, 127. (M., 1819.)

7253. RELIGION, Political sermons.—On one question I differ, * * * the right of discussing public affairs in the pulpit. * * * The mass of human concerns, moral and physical, is so vast, the field of knowledge requisite for man to conduct them to the best advantage is so extensive, that no human being can acquire the whole himself, and much less in that degree necessary for the instruction of others. It has of necessity, then, been distributed into different departments, each of which singly, may give occupation enough to the whole time and attention of a single individual. Thus we have teachers of languages, teachers of mathematics, of natural philosophy, of chemistry, of medicine, of law, of history, of government, &c. Religion, too, is a separate department, and happens to be the only one deemed requisite for all men, however high or low. Collections of men associate under the name of congregations, and employ a religious teacher of the particular set of opinions of which they happen to be, and contribute to make up a stipend as a compensation for the trouble of delivering them, at such periods as they agree on, lessons in the religion they profess. If they want instruction in other sciences or arts, they apply to other instructors; and this is generally the business of early life. But I suppose, there is not a single instance of a single congregation which has employed their preacher for the mixed purposes of lecturing them from the pulpit in chemistry in medicine, in law, in the science and principles of government, or in anything but religion exclusively. Whenever, therefore, preachers, instead of a lesson in religion, put them off with a discourse on the Copernican system, on chemical affinities, on the construction of government, or the characters or conduct of those administering it, it is a breach of contract, depriving their audience of the kind of service for which they are salaried, and giving them, instead of it, what they did not want, or, if wanted, would rather seek from better sources in that particular art or science. In choosing our pastor, we look to his religious qualifications, without enquiring into his physical or political dogmas, with which we mean to have nothing to do. I am aware that arguments may be found, which may twist a thread of politics into the core of religious disputes. So may the for every other branch of human art or science. Thus, for example, it is a religious duty to obey the laws of our country; the teacher of religion, therefore, must instruct us in those laws, that we may know how to obey them. It is a religious duty to assist our sick neighbors; the preacher must, therefore, teach us medicine, that we may do it understandingly. It is a religious duty to preserve our health; our religious teacher, then, must tell us what dishes are wholesome, and give us recipes in cookery, that we may learn how to prepare them. And so, ingenuity, by generalizing more and more, may amalgamate all the branches of science into every one of them, and the physician who is paid to visit the sick, may give a sermon instead of medicine; and the merchant to whom money is sent for a hat, may send a handkerchief instead of it. But notwithstanding this possible confusion of all sciences into one, common sense draws the lines between them sufficiently distinct for the general purposes of life, and no one is at a loss to understand that a recipe in medicine or cookery, or a demonstration in geometry, is not a lesson in religion. I do not deny that a congregation may if they please, agree with their preacher that he shall instruct them in medicine also, or, law, or politics. Then, lectures in these, from the pulpit, become not only a matter of right, but of duty also. But this must be with the consent of every individual; because the association being voluntary, the majority has no right to apply the contributions of the minority to purposes unspecified in the agreement of the congregation.—To Mr. WENDOVER, vi, 445. (M., 1815.)

7254. I agree, too, that on all other occasions, the preacher has the right, equally with every other citizen, to express his sentiments, in speaking or writing, on the subjects of medicine, law, politics, &c., his leisure time being his own, and his congregation not obliged to listen to his conversation or to read his writings.—To Mr. WENDOVER, vi, 446. (M., 1815.)

7255. RELIGION, Public office and.—The proscribing any citizen as unworthy the public confidence, by laying upon him an incapacity of being called to offices of trust or emolument, unless he profess or renounce this or that religious opinion, * * * tends to corrupt the principles of that very religion it is meant to encourage, by bribing with a monopoly of worldly honors and emoluments, those who will externally profess and conform to it.—STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM, viii, 455. FORD ED, ii, 238. (1779.)

7256. RELIGION, Public opinion and.—We ought with one heart and one hand to hew down the daring and dangerous efforts of those who would seduce the public opinion to substitute itself into that tyranny over religious faith which the laws have so justly abdicated. For this reason, were my opinions up to the standard of those who arrogate the right of questioning them, I would not countenance that arrogance by descending to an explanation.—To EDWARD DOWSE. iv, 478. (W., 1803.)

7257. RELIGION, Reason and.—Dispute as long as we will on religious tenets, our reason at last must ultimately decide, as it is the only oracle which God has given us to determine between what really comes from Him and the phantasms of a disordered or deluded imagination. When He means to make a personal revelation, He carries conviction of its authenticity to the reason He has bestowed as the umpire of truth. You believe you have been favored with such a special communication. Your reason, not mine, is to judge of this; and if it shall be His pleasure to favor me with a like admonition, I shall obey it with the same fidelity with which I would obey His known will in all cases.—To MILES KING. vi, 387. (M., 1814.)

7258. Hitherto I have been under the guidance of that portion of reason which God has thought proper to deal out to me. I have followed it faithfully in all important cases, to such a degree at least as leaves me without uneasiness; and on minor occasions I have erred from its dictates. I have trust in Him who made us what we are, and I know it was not His plan to make us always unerring.—To MILES KING. vi, 388. (M., 1814.)

7259. RELIGION, Schisms.—It was the misfortune of mankind that during the darker centuries the Christian priests, following their ambition and avarice, combining with the magistrate to divide the spoils of the people, could establish the notion that schisms might be ousted of their possessions and destroyed. This notion we have not yet cleared ourselves from. In this case no wonder the oppressees should rebel, and they will continue to rebel, and raise disturbance, until their civil rights are fully restored to them, and all partial distinctions, exclusions and incapacitations are removed.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED, ii, 103. (1776?)

prejudice another in his civil enjoyments because he is of another church. If any man err from the right way, it is his own misfortune, no injury to thee; nor therefore art thou to punish him in the things of this life because thou supposeth he will be miserable in that which is to come—on the contrary, according to the spirit of the gospel, charity, bounty, liberality are due him.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED., ii, 99. (1776?) See Presbyterian Spirit.

7261. Why have Christians been distinguished above all people who have ever lived, for persecutions? Is it because it is the genius of their religion? No, its genius is the reverse. It is the refusing toleration to those of a different opinion which has produced all the bustles and wars on account of religion.—NOTES ON RELIGION. FORD ED., ii, 103. (1767)

7262. Three of our papers have presented us the copy of an act of the Legislature of New York, which if it has really passed, will carry us back to the times of the darkest bigotry and barbarism, to find a parallel. Its purport is, that all those who shall heretofore join in communion with the religious sect of Shaking Quakers, shall be deemed civilly dead, their marriages dissolved, and all their children and property taken out of their hands. This act being published natively in the paper without the usual signatures, or any history of the circumstances of its passage, I am not without a hope it may have been a mere abortive attempt. It contrasts singularly with a cotemporary vote of the Pennsylvania Legislature, who, on a proposition to make the belief in God a necessary qualification for office, rejected it by a great majority, although assuredly there was not a single atheist in their body. And you may remember to have heard that when the act for Religious Freedom was before the Virginia Assembly, a motion to insert the name of Jesus Christ before the phrase, "the author of our holy religion," which stood in the bill, was rejected, although that was the creed of a great majority of them.—To Al- bert Gallatin. vii, 79. FORD ED., x, 91. (M., 1817.)

7263. RELIGION, Virginia laws respecting.—The present [1782] state of our [Virginia] laws on the subject of religion is this: Millis, in 1776, in the Virginia declaration of rights, declared it to be a truth, and a natural right, that the exercise of religion should be free; but when they proceeded to form on that declaration the ordinance of government, instead of taking up every principle declared in the bill of rights, and guarding it by legislative sanction, they passed over that which asserted our religious rights, leaving them as they found them. The same convention, however, when they met as a member of the General Assembly in October, 1776, repealed all acts of Parliament which had rendered criminal the maintaining any opinions in matters of religion, the forbearing to repair to church, and the exercising any mode of worship; and suspended the laws giving salaries to the clergy, which suspension was made perpetual in October, 1779. Statutory oppressions in religion being thus wipped away, we remain at present only to those only imposed by the common law, or by our own acts of Assembly. At the common law, heresy was a capital offence, punishable by burning. Its definition was left to the ecclesiastical judges, before whom the conviction was, till the statute in 1711, of criminal heresy, by declaring, that nothing should be deemed heresy, but what had been so determined by authority of the canonical Scriptures, or by one of the four first general councils, or by some other council, having for the grounds of their declaration the express and plain words of the Scriptures, as here interpreted, being an offence against the common law, our act of Assembly of October, 1777, c. 17, gives cognizance of it to the General Court, by declaring that the jurisdiction of that Court shall be general 'in all matters at the common law. The execution is by the writ Do not the proceeding for criminal heresy for the first offence by incapacity to hold any office or employment, ecclesiastical, civil, or military; on the second, by disability to sue, to take any gift or legacy, to be guardian, executor, or administrator, and after three years' imprisonment. A father's right to the custody of his own children being founded in law on his right of guardianship, this being taken away, they may, of course, be severed from him, and put by the authority of a court, into more orthodox hands. This is religious slavery under which a people have been willing to remain, who have lavished their lives and fortunes for the establishment of their civil freedom. The error seems not sufficiently eradicated, that the operations of the mind, as well as the acts of the body, are subject to the coercion of the laws. But our rulers can have no authority over such natural rights, only as we have submitted to them. The rights of conscience we never submitted, we could not submit. We are answerable for them to our God. But the exercise of power on the part of the government, not to such acts only as are injurious to others. * But it does me no injury for my neighbor to say there are twenty gods, or no god. It neither picks my pocket nor breaks my legs. If it be said, his testimony in a court cannot be relied on, reject it then, and be the stigma on him. Constraint may make him worse by making him a hypocrite, but it will never make him a truer man. It may fix him obstinately in his errors, but will not cure them.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 398. FORD ED., iii, 262. (1784)

7264. REPARATION, Demand for.—It will be very difficult to answer Mr. Erskine's demand respecting the water casks in the tone proper for such a demand. I have heard of one who, having broken his cane over the head of another, demanded payment for his cane. This demand might well enough have made part of an offer to pay the damages

* Jefferson makes the following note from "Ter- tulliastic authority, he is punishable on the same charge, and such acts as only are injurious to others. * Tamen humani juris et naturalis postestatis est, unicuique quod putaverit, colere; nec aliis obest, aut prodest, alterius religios. done to the Chesapeake, and to deliver up the authors of the murders committed on board her.—To JAMES MADISON. v. 169. FORD ED., ix. 127. (M., Aug. 1807.) See CHESAPEAKE.

7266. REPOSE, Evils of.—Your love of repose will lead, in its progress, to a suspension of healthy exercise, a relaxation of mind, and a different, if not everything around you, and all the deceiving officious and hebetude of mind, the farthest of all things from the happiness which the well-regulated indulgences of Epicurian ensure.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii. 140. FORD ED., x. 145. (M., 1819.)

7267. REPRESENTATION, Apportionment and.—No invasions of the Constitution are fundamentally so dangerous as the tricks played on their own numbers, apportionment, and other circumstances respecting themselves, and affecting their legal qualifications to legislate for the Union.—OPINION on APPOINTMENT BILL. vii. 601. FORD ED., v. 500. (1792.) See APPOINTMENT.

7268. REPRESENTATION, Aristocracy and.—It will be forever seen that bodies of men even elected by the people, there will always be a greater proportion aristocratic than among their constituents.—To BENJAMIN HAWKINS. iv. 466. FORD ED., viii. 212. (W., 1803.)

7269. REPRESENTATION, Broad.—I look for our safety to the broad representation of the people [in Congress]. It will be more difficult for corrupt views to lay hold of so large a mass.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v. 455. (Pa., 1792.)

— REPRESENTATION, In Congress.—See CONGRESS.

7270. REPRESENTATION, Democratic.—The full experiment of a government democratical, but representative, was and is still reserved for us. The idea (taken, indeed, from the little specimen formerly existing in the English constitution, but now lost) has been carried by us, more or less, into all our legislative and executive departments; but it has not yet, by any of us, been pushed into all the ramifications of the system, so far as to leave no authority existing not responsible to the people; whose rights, however, to the exercise and fruits of their own industry, can never be protected against the selfishness of rulers not subject to their control at short periods. The introduction of this new principle of representative democracy has rendered useless almost every thing written before on the structure of government; and, in a great measure, relieves our regret, if the political writings of Aristotle, or of any other ancient, have been lost, or are unfaithfully rendered or explained to us.—To ISAAC H. TIFFANY. vii. 32. (M., 1816.)

7271. ——. My most earnest wish is to see the republican element of popular control pushed to the maximum of its practicable exercise. I shall then believe that our Government may be pure and perpetual.—To ISAAC H. TIFFANY. vii. 32. (M., 1816.)

7272. REPARATION, Deprivation of.—George III. in execution of the trust confided to him, has, within his own day, loaded the inhabitants of Great Britain with debts equal to the whole fee-simple value of their island, and, under pretext of governing it, has alienated its whole soil to creditors who could lend money to be lavished on pensions, plunder and perpetual war. This would not have been so, had the people retained organized means of acting on their agents. In this example, then, let us read a lesson for ourselves, and not "go and do likewise".—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii. 36. FORD ED., x. 45. (M., 1816.) See DEBT, OPPRESSIVE ENGLISH.

7273. REPRESENTATION, Equal.—The French flatter themselves they shall form a better constitution than the English one. I think it will be better in some points, worse in others. It will be better in the article of representation, which will be more equal.—To DR. PRICE. ii. 557. (P., Jan. 1789.)

7274. ——. At the birth of our republic I committed my opinion [an equal representation] to the world in the draft of a constitution annexed to the "Notes on Virginia", in which a provision was inserted for a representation permanently equal. The infancy of the subject at that moment, and our inexperience of self-government, occasioned gross departures in that draft from genuine republican canons. In truth, the abuses of monarchy had so much filled all the space of political contemplation, that we imagined everything republican which was not monarchy. We had not yet penetrated to the mother principle, that "governments are republican only in proportion as they embody the will of their people, and execute it". Hence, our first constitutions had really no leading principles in them. But experience and reflection have but more and more confirmed me in the particular importance of the equal representation then proposed.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii. 9. FORD ED., x. 37. (M., 1816.)

7275. ——. A government is republican in proportion as every member composing it has his equal voice in the direction of its concerns (not indeed in position, which would be impracticable beyond the limits of a city, or small township, but) by representatives chosen by himself, and responsible to him at short periods.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii. 10. FORD ED., x. 38. (M., 1816.)

7277. REPRESENTATION, Freedom and.—To us is committed [by the Constitution] the important task of proving by example that a government, if organized in all its parts on the representative principle, unadulterated by the infusion of spurious elements, if founded, not in the fears and follies of man, but on his reason, on his sense of right, on the predominance of the social over his dispassionate, may be so free as to restrain him in no moral right, and so firm as to protect him from every moral wrong.
—Reply to Vermont Address. iv. 418. (W., 1801.)

7278. REPRESENTATION, Government by.—Modern times have discovered the only device by which the [equal] rights of man can be secured, to wit: government by the people, acting not in person, but by representatives chosen by themselves, that is to say, by every man of ripe years and sane mind, who either contributes by his purse or person to the support of his country.
—To M. Coray. vii. 319. (M., 1823.)

Rights of British America. i, 131. Ford ed., i. 436. (1774.)

7280. Can any one reason be assigned why one hundred and sixty thousand electors in the Island of Great Britain should give law to four millions in the States of America, every individual of whom is equal to every individual of them, in virtue, in understanding, and in bodily strength? Were this to be admitted, instead of being a free people, as we have hitherto supposed, and mean to continue ourselves, we should suddenly be found the slaves not of one but of one hundred and sixty thousand tyrants, distinguished, too, from all others by the singular circumstances, that they are removed from the reach of fear, the only restraining motive which may hold the hand of a tyrant.

7281. REPRESENTATION, Human happiness and.—A representative government, responsible at short intervals of election, produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind.—R. to A. Vermont Legislature. viii. 121. (1807.)

7283. REPRESENTATION, Principles of.—In the structure of our Legislatures, we think experience has proved the benefit of subjecting questions to two separate bodies of deliberants; but in constituting these, natural right has been mistaken, some making one of these bodies, and some both, the representatives of property instead of persons; whereas the double deliberation might be as well obtained without any violation of true principle, either by requiring a greater age in one of the bodies, or by electing a proper number of representatives of persons, dividing them by lot into two chambers, and renewing the division at frequent intervals, in order to break up all cabals.—To John Cartwright. vii. 357. (M., 1824.)

7284. REPRESENTATION, Qualified.—Were our State a pure democracy, in which all its inhabitants should meet together to transact all their business, there would yet be excluded from their deliberations: 1. Infants. until arrived at age of discretion. 2. Women. who, to prevent deprivation of morals and ambiguity of issue, could not mix promiscuously in the public meetings of men. 3. Slaves, from whom the unfortunate state of things with us takes away the rights of will and of property. Those, then, who have no will could be permitted to exercise none in the popular assembly; and, of course, could delegate none to an agent in a representative assembly. The business, in the first case, would be done by qualified citizens only.—To Samuel Kerchival. vii. 36. Ford ed., x. 46. (M., 1816.)

7285. REPRESENTATION, Right of.—Does his Majesty seriously wish, and publish it to the world, that his subjects should give up the glorious right of representation, with all the benefits derived from that, and submit themselves the absolute slaves of his sovereign will?—Rights of British America. i, 136. Ford ed., i. 441. (1774.)

7286. He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by refusing to pass certain laws unless the people thereby benefited by them would relinquish the inestimable right of representation in the Legislature.—Proposed Va. Constitution. Ford ed., ii. 10. (June 1776.)

7288. REPRESENTATION, For slaves.—I have been told, that on the question of equal representation, our fellow-citizens in some sections of the State [Virginia] claim peremptorily a right of representation for their slaves. Principle will, in this, as in most other cases, open the way for us to correct conclusion. * * * It is true, that in the general Constitution, our State is allowed a larger representation on account of its slaves. But every one knows, that that Con-situation was a matter of compromise; a capitulation between conflicting interests and opinion. In truth, the condition of different descriptions of inhabitants in any country is a matter of municipal arrangement, of which no foreign country has a right to take notice. All its inhabitants are men as to them. Thus, in the New England States, none have the powers of citizens but those whom they call freemen; and none are freemen until admitted by a vote of the freemen of the town. Yet, in the General Government, these non-freemen are counted in their quantum of representation and of taxation. So, slaves with us have no powers as citizens; yet, in representation in the General Government, they count in the proportion of three to five; and so also in taxation. Whether this is equal, is not here the question. It is a capitulation of discordant sentiments and circumstances, and is obligatory on that ground. But this view shows there is no inconsistency in claiming representation for them for the other States, and refusing it within our own.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii. 36. FORD ED., x, 45. (M., 1816.)

7289. REPRESENTATION, Taxation and.—Preserve inviolate the fundamental principle that the people are not to be taxed but by representatives chosen immediately by themselves.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 328. FORD ED., iv, 475. (P., 1787.)

7290. REPRISAL, Act of war.—Remonstrance and refusal of satisfaction ought to precede reprisal, and when reprisal follows it is considered as an act of war, and never yet failed to produce it in the case of a nation able to make war.—OPINION ON THE "LITTLE SARAH". vii, 628. FORD ED., vi, 259. (1793.)

7291. REPRISAL, Congress and.—If the case were important enough to require reprisal, and ripe for that step, Congress must be called on to take it; the right of reprisal being expressly lodged with them by the Constitution, and not with the Executive.—OPINION ON THE "LITTLE SARAH". vii, 628. FORD ED., vi, 259. (1793.)

7292. REPRISAL, Retaliation by.—The determination to take all our vessels bound to any other than her ports, amounting to all the war she can make (for we fear no invasion), it would be folly in us to let that war be all on one side only, and to make no effort towards indemnification and retaliation by reprisal.—To CLEMENT CAINE. vi, 14. FORD ED., ix, 330. (M., Sep. 1811.)

7293. REPUBLIC, Definition of.—It must be acknowledged that the term republic is of very vague application in every language. Witness the self-styled republics of Holland, Switzerland, Genoa, Venice, Poland. Were I to assign to this term a precise and definite idea, I would say, purely and simply, it means a government by its citizens in mass, acting directly and personally, according to rules established by the majority; and that every other government is more or less republican, in proportion as it has in its composition more or less of this ingredient of the direct action of the citizens. Such a government is evidently restrained to very narrow limits of space and population. I doubt if it would be practicable beyond the extent of a New England township.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vi, 605. FORD ED., x, 28. (M., 1816.)

7295. ——. Other shades of republican-ism may be found in other forms of government, where the executive, legislative and judiciary functions, and the different branches of the latter, are chosen by the people more or less directly, for longer terms of years, or for life, or made hereditary; or where there are mixtures of authorities, some dependent on, and others independent of the people. The further the departure from direct and constant control by the citizens, the less has the government the ingredient of republicanism; evidently none where the authorities are hereditary, as in France, Venice, &c., or self-chosen, as in Holland; and little, where for life, in proportion as the life continues in being after the act of election.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vi, 606. FORD ED., x, 29. (M., 1816.)

7296. ——. The purest republican feature in the government of our own State is the House of Representatives. The Senate is equally so the first year, less the second, and so on. The Executive still less, because not chosen by the people directly. The judiciary seriously anti-republican, because for life; and the national arm wielded * * * by military leaders, irresponsible but to themselves. Add to this the vicious constitution of our county courts (to whom the justice, the executive administration, the taxation, police, the military appointments of the county, and nearly all our daily concerns are confided), the self-appointed, self-continued, holding their authorities for life, and with an impossibility of breaking in on the perpetual succession of any faction once possessed of the bench. They are in truth, the executive, the judiciary, and the military of their respective counties, and the sum of the counties makes the State. And add, also, that one-half of our brethren who fight and pay taxes, are excluded, like helots, from the rights of representation, as if society were instituted for the soil, and not for the men inhabiting it; or one-half of these could dispose of the rights and the will of the other half, without their consent."—To J ohn Taylor, vi, 606. F ord ed., x, 29. (M., 1816.)

7297. ——. If, then, the control of the people over the organs of their government be the meaning of republican government, and I know no other measure, it must be agreed that our governments have much less of republicanism than ought to have been expected; in other words, that the people have less regular control over their agents than their rights and interests require. And this I ascribe, not to any want of republican dispositions in those who formed these constitutions, but to a submission of true principle to European authorities, to speculators on government, whose fears of the people have been inspired by the populace of their own great cities, and were unjustly entertained against the independent, the happy, and, therefore, orderly citizens of the United States. Much I apprehend that the golden moment is past for reforming these heresies. The functionaries of public power rarely strengthen in their dispositions to abridge it, and an unorganized call for timely amendment is likely to prevail against an organized opposition to it. We are told that things are going on well; why change them? "Chi sta bene, non si muova," said the Italian, "let him who stands well, stand still". This is true; and I verily believe they would go on well with us under an absolute monarch, while our present character remains, of order, industry and love of peace, and restrained, as he would be, by the proper spirit of the people. But it is while it remains such, we should provide against the consequences of its deterioration. And let us rest in the hope that the dose of dispositions be self-poisoning the body and carrying off the pain of evils which may never happen.—To J ohn Taylor, vi, 607. F ord ed., x, 30. (M., 1816.)

7298. ——. In the General Government, the House of Representatives is mainly republican; the Senate scarcely so at all, as not elected by the people directly, and so long secured even against those who do elect them; the Executive more republican than the Senate, from its shorter term, its election by the people, in practice (for they vote for A only on an assurance that he will vote for B) and because, in practice also, a principle of rotation seems to be in a course of establishment; the judiciary independent of the nation, their coercion by impeachment being found nugatory.—To J ohn Taylor, vi, 607. F ord ed., x, 30. (M., 1816.)

7299. ——. On this view of the import of the term republic, instead of saying, as has been said, "that it may mean anything or nothing", we may say with truth and meaning, that governments are more or less republican, as they have more or less of the element of popular election and control in their composition; and believing, as I do, that the mass of the citizens is the safest depository of their own rights, and especially, that the evils flowing from the dupes of the people are less injurious than those from the egoism of their agents, I am a friend to that composition of government which has in it the most of this ingredient. And I sincerely believe * * * that banking establishments are more dangerous than standing armies; and that the principle of spending money to be paid by posterity, under the name of funding, is but swindling futurity on a large scale.—To J ohn Taylor, vi, 608. F ord ed., x, 31. (M., 1816.)

7300. REPUBLIC, Essence of.—Action by the citizens in person, in affairs within their reach and competence, and in all others by representatives, chosen immediately, and removable by themselves, constitutes the essence of a republic.—To Dufont de Ne mours. vi, 501. F ord ed., x, 24. (F.F., 1816.)

7301. REPUBLIC, First principle of.—The first principle of republicanism in that the lex majoris partis is the fundamental law of every society of individuals of equal right; to consider the will of the society enounced by the majority of a single vote, as sacred as if unanimous, is the first of all lessons of importance, yet the last which is thoroughly learnt. This law once disregarded, no other remains but that of force, which ends necessarily in military despotism.—To Baron H umboldt. viii, 75. F ord ed., x, 89. (M., 1817.)

7302. REPUBLIC (American), Establishment of.—In the great work which has been effected in America, no individual has a right to take any great share to himself. Our people in a body are wise, because they are under the unrestrained and unperverted operation of their own understanding. Those whom they have assigned to the direction of their affairs, have stood with a pretty even front. If any one of them was withdrawn, many others entirely equal, have been ready to fill his place with as good abilities. A nation, composed of such materials, and free in all its members from distressing wants, furnishes hopeful implements for the interesting experiment of self-government; and we feel that we are acting under obligations not confined to the limits of our own society. It is impossible not to be sensible that we are acting for all mankind; that circumstances denied to others, but indulged to us, have imposed on us the duty of proving what is the degree of freedom and self-government in which a society may venture to leave its individual members.—To Dr. Joseph Priest ley, iv, 440. F ord ed., viii, 158. (W., 1802.)

7303. REPUBLIC (American), Maintenance of.—Whatever may be the fate of republicanism in France, we are able to preserve it inviolate here.—To J ohn Breckenridge. F ord ed., vii, 418. (Pa., Jan. 1800.)
7304. REPUBLIC (American), A model.
—The spirit of our citizens * * * will make this government in practice, what it is in principle, a model for the protection of man in a state of freedom and order.—To General Kosciusko. iv, 295. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

7305. REPUBLIC (American), Perils of.—I had sent to the President yesterday [May 22] drafts of a letter from him to the Provisory Executive Council of France, and one from myself to Mr. Ternant, both on the occasion of his recall. I called on him to-day [May 22]. He said there was an expression in one of them, which he had never before seen in any of our public communications, to wit, "our republic". The letter prepared for him to the Council, began thus: "The Citizen Ternant has delivered to me the letter wherein you inform me, that yielding, &c., you had determined to recall him from his mission, as your Minister Plenipotentiary to our republic." He had underscored the words, our republic. He said that certainly ours was a republican government, but yet we had not used that style in this way; that if anybody wanted to change its form into a monarchy, he was sure it was only a few individuals, and that no man in the United States would set his face against it more than himself; but that this was not what he was afraid of; his fears were from another quarter; that there was more danger of anarchy being introduced. He adverted to a piece in Freneau's paper of yesterday, said he despised all their attacks on him personally, but that there never had been an act of the government, not meaning in the Executive line only, but in any line, which that paper had not abused. He had also marked the word republic thus V where it was applied to the French republic. He was evidently sore and warm, and I took his intention to be, that I should interpose in some way with Freneau, perhaps withdraw his appointment of translating clerk to my office. But I will not do it. His paper has saved the Constitution, which was galloping fast into monarchy, and has been checked by no means so powerfully as by that paper. It is well and universally known, that it has been that paper which has checked the career of the monocrats; and the President, not sensible of the designs of the party, has not with his usual good sense and sang froid, looked on the efforts and effects of this free press, and seen that, though some bad things have passed through it to the public, yet the good have preponderated immensely.—The Anas. ix, 144. Ford Ed., i, 230. (May 1793.)

7307. REPUBLIC (American), Stability of.—We can no longer say there is nothing new under the sun. For this whole chapter in the history of man is new. The great extent of our Republic is new. Its sparse habitation is new. The mighty wave of public opinion which has rolled over it is new. But the most pleasing novelty is, its so quietly subsiding over such an extent of surface to its true level again. The order and good sense displayed in this recovery from delusion, and in the momentous crisis which lately arose [election of President], really bespeak a strength of character in our nation which augurs well for the duration of our Republic; and I am much better satisfied now of its stability than I was before it was tried.—To Dr. Joseph Priestley. iv, 374. Ford Ed., viii, 22. (W., March 1801.)

7308. — — We may still believe with security that the great body of the American people must for ages yet be substantially republican.—To Robert R. Livingston. iv, 297. Ford Ed., vii, 369. (Pa., 1799.)

7309. — — The resistance which our Republic has opposed to a course of operation, for which it was not destined, shows a strength of body which affords the most flattering presage of duration. I hope we shall now be permitted to steer her in her natural course, and to show by the smoothness of her motion the skill with which she has been formed for it.—To General Warren. iv, 375. (W., March 1801.)

7310. — — We are never permitted to despair of the Commonwealth.—To James Madison. ii, 331. (P., 1787.)

7311. — — The good citizen must never despair of the Commonwealth.—To Nathaniel Niles. iv, 376. Ford Ed., viii, 24. (W., 1801.)

7312. REPUBLIC (American), Triumphant.—The cause of republicanism, triumphing in Europe, can never fail to do so here in the long run.—To Archibald Stuart. Ford Ed., vii, 378. (M., May 1799.)

7313. REPUBLIC (American), Washington and.—I was happy to see that Randolph had, by accident, used the expression "our republic", in the [President's] speech. The President, however, made no objection to it, and so, as much as it had disconcerted him on a former occasion with me, it was now put into his own mouth to be pronounced to the two Houses of Legislature.—The Anas. ix, 183. Ford Ed., i, 270. (Nov. 1793.)

7314. REPUBLIC (English), France and.—Nothing can establish firmly the republican principles of our government but an establishment of them in England. France will be the apostle for this.—To E. Randolph. iv, 192. Ford Ed., vii, 156. (Pa., June 1797.)

7315. REPUBLIC (English), Prospective.—If I could but see the French and Dutch at peace with the rest of their continent, I should have little doubt of dining with Piche.

* Edmund Randolph, Attorney General, had been selected to write the speech, or message, to Congress.—EDITOR.
gru in London, next autumn; for I believe I should be tempted to leave my clover for awhile, to go and hail the dawn of liberty and republicanism in that island.—To William B. Giles. iv, 118. FORD ED., vii, 11. (M., April 1795.)

7316. REPUBLIC (French), America and.—I look with great anxiety for the firm establishment of the new government in France, being perfectly convinced that if it takes place there, it will spread sooner or later all over Europe. On the contrary, a check there would retard the revival of liberty in other countries. I consider the establishment and success of their government as necessary to stay up our own, and to prevent it from falling back to that kind of halfway house, the English constitution.—To George Mason. iii, 209. FORD ED., v, 274. (Pa., Feb. 1791.)

7317. REPUBLIC (French), Bonaparte and.—I fear our friends on the other side of the water, laboring in the same cause, have a great deal of crime and misery to wade through. My confidence has been placed in the head, not in the heart of Bonaparte. I hoped he would calculate truly the difference between the fame of a Washington and a Cromwell. Whatever his views may be, he has transferred the destinies of the republic from the civil to the military arm. Some will use this as a lesson against the practicability of republican government; I read it as a lesson against the danger of standing armies.—To Samuel Adams. iv, 321. FORD ED., vii, 425. (Pa., Feb. 1800.)

7318. REPUBLIC (French), Future.—France will yet attain representative government. You observe it makes the basis of every constitution which has been demanded or offered, and is demanded by their Senate; of that offered by Bonaparte; and of that granted by Louis XVIII. The idea, then, is rooted, and will be established, although rivers of blood may yet flow between them and their object.—To John Adams. vi, 525. (M., 1816.)

7319. REPUBLIC (French), Gratitude to.—I hope you have been sensible of the general interest which my countrymen take in all the successes of your republic. In this no one joins with more enthusiasm than myself, an enthusiasm kindled by our love of liberty, by my gratitude to your nation who helped us to acquire it, by my wishes to see it extended to all men, and first to those whom we love most.—To M. Obrtn. iv, 123. (M., May 1795.)

7320. REPUBLIC (French), Sympathy with.—Be assured that the government and the citizens of the United States view with the most sincere pleasure every advance of France towards its happiness, an object essentially connected with its liberty, and they consider the union of principles and pursuits between our two countries as a link which binds still closer their interests and affections. The genuine and general effusions of joy which you saw overspread our country, on their seeing the liberties of yours rise superior to foreign invasion and domestic trouble, have proved to you that our sympathies are great and sincere, and we earnestly wish on our part that these our natural dispositions may be improved to mutual good, by establishing our commercial intercourse on principles as friendly to natural right and freedom, as are those of our government.—To Jean Baptiste Terrant. iii, 517. FORD ED., vi, 189. (Pa., Feb. 1793.)

7321. REPUBLIC (French), Washington and.—I have laid before the President of the United States your notification, * * * in the name of the Provisory Executive Council charged with the administration of your government, that the French nation has constituted itself into a Republic. The President receives with great satisfaction this attention of the Executive Council, and the desire they have manifested of making known to us the resolution entered into by the National Convention, even before a definitive regulation of their new establishment could take place.—To Jean Baptiste Terrant. iii, 510. FORD ED., vi, 189. (Pa., Feb. 1793.)

7322. REPUBLIC (French), Washington's cabinet and.—We met at the President's to examine by paragraphs the draft of a letter I had prepared to Gouverneur Morris on the conduct of Mr. Genet. There was no difference of opinion on any part of it, except on this expression, ''An attempt to embroil both, to add still another nation to the enemies of his country, and to draw on both a reproach which it is hoped, will never stain the history of either, that of liberty warring on herself". Hamilton moved to strike out these words, "that of liberty warring on herself". He urged generally that it would give offence to the combined powers; that it amounted to a declaration that they were warring on liberty; that we were not called on to declare that the cause of France was that of liberty; that he had at first been with them with all his heart, but that he had long since left them, and was not for encouraging the idea here, that the cause of France was the cause of liberty in general, or could have either connection or influence in our affairs. Knox, according to custom, jumped upon all his propositions. The President with a good deal of positiveness, declared in favor of the expression; that he considered the pursuit of France to be that of liberty, however they might sometimes fail of the best means of obtaining it; that he had never at any time entertained a doubt of their ultimate success, if they hung well together; and that as to their dissensions, there were such contradictory accounts given, that no one could tell what to believe. I observed that it had been supposed among us all along that the present letter might become public; that we had, therefore, three parties to attend to,—1st. France; 2d, her enemies; 3d, the people of the United States; that as to the enemies of France, it ought not to offend them, because the passage objected to, only spoke of an attempt to make the United States, a free nation, war on France, a free nation, which would be liberty warping on herself, and, therefore, a true fact; that as to France, we were taking so harsh a measure (desiring her to recall her minister) that a precedent for it could scarcely be found; that we knew that minister would represent to his government that our Executive was hostile to liberty, leaning to monarchy, and would endeavor to parry the charges on himself, by rendering suspicious the source from which they flowed; that, therefore, it was essential to satisfy France, not only of our friendship to her, but our attachment to the general cause of liberty, and to hers in particular; that as to the people of the United States, we knew there were suspicions abroad that the Executive, in some of its parts, was tainted with a hankering after monarchy, an indisposition towards liberty, and towards the French cause; and that it was important, by an explicit declaration, to remove these suspicions, and restore the confidence of the people in their government. Randolph opposed the passage on nearly the same ground with Hamilton. He added, that he thought it had been agreed that this correspondence should contain no expressions which could give offence to either party. I replied that it had been my opinion in the beginning of the correspondence, that while we were censuring the conduct of the French minister, we should make the most cordial declarations of friendship to them; that in the first letter or two of the correspondence, I had inserted expressions of that kind, but that himself and the other two gentlemen had struck them out; that I thereupon conformed to their opinion in my subsequent letters, and had carefully avoided the insertion of a single term of friendship to the French nation, and the letters were as dry and husky as if written between the generals of two enemy nations; that on the present occasion, however, it had been agreed that such expressions ought to be inserted in the letter now under consideration, and I had accordingly charged it pretty well with them; that I had further thought it essential to satisfy the French and our own citizens of the light in which we viewed their cause, and of our fellow feeling for the general cause of liberty, and had ventured only four words on the subject; that there was not from beginning to end of the letter one other expression or word in favor of liberty, and I should think it singular, at least, if the single passage of that character should be struck out. The President again spoke. He came into the idea that attention was due to the parties who had been mentioned, France and the United States; that as to the former, thinking it certain their affairs would issue in a government of some sort—of considerable freedom—it was the only nation with whom our relations could be counted on; that as to the United States, there could be no doubt of their universal attachment to the cause of France, and of the solidity of their republicanism. He declared his strong attachment to the expression, but finally left it to us to accommodate. It was struck out, of course, and the expressions of affection in the context were a good deal taken down.—THE ANAS. ix. 169. FORD ED., i, 259. (Aug. 1793.)

7323. REPUBLIC OF LETTERS, Dictatorship.—No republic is more real than that of letters, and I am the last in principles, as I am the least in pretensions to any dictatorship in it.—To NOAH WEBSTER. iii, 201. FORD ED., v, 254. (Pa., 1790.)

7324. REPUBLIC OF LETTERS, Wars and.—The republic of letters is unaffected by the wars of geographical divisions of the earth.—To DR. PATTERSON. vi, ii. (M., 1811.)

7325. REPUBLICANISM (Governmental), American.—The light from our West seems to have spread and illuminated the very engines employed to extinguish it. It has given them a glimmering of their rights and their power. The idea of representative government has taken root and growth among them. Their masters feel it, and are saving themselves by timely offers of this modification of their powers. Belgium, Prussia, Poland, Lombardy, &c., are now offered a representative organization; illusive, probably, at first, but it will grow into power in the end. Opinion is power, and that opinion will come. —To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 525. (M., 1816.)

7326. REPUBLICANISM (Governmental) Apostasy from.—An apostasy from republicanism to royalism is unprecedented and impossible.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 5. FORD ED., v, 83. (P., 1789.)

7328. REPUBLICANISM (Governmental), Extension of.—It is hoped that by a due poise and partition of powers between the General and particular governments, we have found the secret of extending the benign blessings of republicanism over still greater tracts of country than we possess, and that a subdivision may be avoided for ages, if not for ever.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. FORD ED., v, 369. (Pa., 1791.)

7329. REPUBLICANISM (Governmental), Happiness and.—I conscientiously believe that governments founded in republican principles are more friendly to the happiness of the people at large, and especially of a people so capable of self-government as ours.—To David Howell. v. 554. (M., 1810.)

7330. REPUBLICANISM (Governmental), Majority rule.—A nation ceases to be republican * * * when the will of the majority ceases to be the law.—Reply to Address. v. 262. (W., 1808.)

7331. REPUBLICANISM (Governmental), Rights of man and,—The republic is the only form of government which is not eternally at open or secret war with the rights of mankind.—Reply to Address. iii, 128. Ford ed., v, 147. (1790.)

7332. REPUBLICANISM (Governmental), Schools of,—The best schools for republicanism are London, Versailles, Madrid, Vienna, Berlin, &c.—To Governor Rutledge. ii, 234. (P., 1787.)

7333. REPUBLICANISM (Governmental), Union and,—It is, indeed, of little consequence who govern us, if they sincerely and zealously cherish the principles of Union and republicanism.—To General Dearborn. vii, 215. Ford ed., x, 192. (M., 1821.)

7334. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Ardent and moderate.—I had always expected that when the republicans should have put down all things under their feet, they would schismatize among themselves. I always expected, too, that whatever names the parties might bear, the real division would be into moderate and ardent republicanism. In this division there is no great evil,—not even if the minority obtain the ascendency by the accession of federal votes to their candidate; because this gives us one shade only, instead of another, of republicanism. It is to be considered as apostasy only when they purchase the votes of federalists with a participation in honor and power.—To Thomas Cooper. v, 121. Ford ed., ix, 102. (W., July 1807.)

7335. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Benefits of,—If we are left in peace, I have no doubt the wonderful turn in the public opinion now manifestly taking place and rapidly increasing, will * * * become so universal and so weighty, that friendship abroad and freedom at home will be firmly established by the influence and constitutional powers of the people at large.—To General Kosciusko. iv, 295. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

7336. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Corruption.—How long we can hold our ground I do not know. We are not incorruptible; on the contrary, corruption is making sensible though silent progress. Offices are as acceptable in Virginia as elsewhere, and whenever a man has cast a longing eye on them, a rottenness begins in his conduct.—To Trench Coxe. Ford ed., vii, 380. (M., May, 1799.)

7337. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Faith in.—The tide against our Constitution is unquestionably strong, but it will turn. Everything tells me so, and everything verifies the prediction.—To William Branch Giles. Ford ed., vi, 516. (M., Dec. 1797.)

7338. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Fidelity to.—I have taken the liberty of referring him [Brissot de Warville] to you for a true state of republicanism here, as for the characters, objects, numbers and force of our parties. It is really interesting that these should be well understood in France, and particularly by their government. Particular circumstances have generated suspicions among them that we are swarming from our republicanism.—To Dr. Enoch Edwards. Ford ed., vi, 248. (Pa., 1793.)

7340. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), The Judiciary and,—The revolution of 1800 was as real a revolution in the principles of our government as that of 1776 was in its form; not effected, indeed, by the sword, as that, but by the rational and peaceable instrument of reform, the suffrage of the people. The nation declared its will by dismissing functionaries of one principle, and electing those of another, in the two branches, Executive and Legislative, submitted to their election. Over the Judiciary department, the Constitution had deprived them of their control. That, therefore, has continued the republif system, and although new matter has been occasionally incorporated into the old, yet the leaven of the old mass seems to assimilate to itself the new, and after twenty years' confirmation of the federal system by the voice of the nation, declared through the medium of elections, we find the Judiciary on every occasion, still driving us into consolidation.—To Spencer Roane. vii, 133. Ford ed., x, 140. (P.F., 1819.) See Centralization, Judiciary and Supreme Court.

7341. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Liberty and,—Under republicanism, our citizens generally are enjoying a very great degree of liberty and security in the most temperate manner.—To M. Pictet. iv, 463. (W., 1803.)

7342. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Missouri question and,—[The Missouri question] has given resurrection to the Hartford Convention men. They have had the address, by playing on the honest feelings of our former friends, to seduce them from their kindred spirits, and to borrow their weight into the federal scale. Desperate of regaining power under political distinctions, they have adroitly wriggled into its seat under the auspices of morality, and are again in the ascendency from which their sins had hurled them. It is, indeed, of little consequence who 7343. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Outlawed.—Repulicanism had been the mark on Cain, which had rendered those who bore it exiles from all portion in the trusts and authorities of their country.—To BENJAMIN HAWKINS. iv, 466. FORD ED., viii, 212. (W., 1803.) See Office and Offices.

7344. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), The people and.—The people are essentially republican. They retain unadulterated the principles of '75, and those who are conscious of no change in themselves have nothing to fear in the long run.—To JAMES LEWIS, Jr. iv, 241. FORD ED., vii, 250. (Pa., May 1798.)

7345. ——. The people through all the States are for republican forms, republican principles, simplicity, economy, religious and civil freedom.—To E. LIVINGSTON. iv, 328. FORD ED., vii, 443. (Pa., 1800.)

7346. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Preservation of.—Whether the surrender of our opponents, their reception into our camp, their assumption of our name, and apparent accession to our objects, may strengthen or weaken the genuine principles of republicanism, may be a good or an evil, is yet to be seen.—To WILLIAM T. BARRY. vii, 255. (M., 1822.)

7347. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Safety in.—So long as the pure principles of our revolution [of 1800] prevail, we are safe from everything which can assail us from without or within.—To MR. LAMBERT. v, 528. (M., 1810.)

7348. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Seeders from.—My opinion is that two or three years more will bring back to the fold of republicanism all our wandering brethren whom the cry of "wolf" scattered in 1798. Till that is done, let every man stand to his post, and hazard nothing by change. And when that is done, you and I may retire to that tranquillity which our years begin to call for, and review with satisfaction the efforts of the age we happened to be born in, crowned with complete success. In the hour of death, we shall have the consolation to see established in the land of our fathers the most wonderful work of wisdom and disinterested patriotism that has ever yet appeared on the globe.—To De WITT CLINTON. iv, 521. (W., 1803.)

7349. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Ship of State and.—The time is coming when we shall fetch up the lee-way of our vessel. The changes in your House [of Representatives] I see, are going on for the better, and even the Augean herd over your heads are slowly purging off their impurities. Hold on, then, that we may not shipwreck in the meanwhile.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 112. FORD ED., vi, 519. (M., Dec. 1794.)

7350. ——. The storm through which we have passed has been tremendous indeed. The tough sides of our Argosy have been thoroughly tried. Her strength has stood the waves into which she was steered, with a view to sink her. We shall put her on her republican tack, and she will now show by the beauty of her motion the skill of her builders.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 365. FORD ED., viii, 7. (W., March 1801.)

7351. ——. The storm is over, and we are in port. The ship was not rigg'd for the service she was put on. We will show the smoothness of her motions on her republican tack.—To SAMUEL ADAMS. iv, 389. FORD ED., viii, 39. (W., March 1801.)

7352. REPUBLICANISM (Partisan), Sincerity in.—That I have acted through life on principles of sincere republicanism, I feel in every fibre of my constitution. And when men, who feel like myself, bear witness in my favor, my satisfaction is complete.—To REV. MR. KNOX. v, 502. (M., 1810.)

7353. REPUBLICANS, Aims of.—Surely we had in view to obtain the theory and practice of good government; and how any, who seemed so ardent in this pursuit, could as shamelessly have apostatized, and supposed we meant only to put our government into other hands, but not other forms, is indeed wonderful.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 424. (W., 1801.)

7354. ——. The federalists wished for everything which would approach our new government to a monarchy. The republicans to preserve it essentially republican. This was the true origin of the division, and remains still the essential principle of difference between the two parties.—NOTES ON MARSHALL'S LIFE OF WASHINGTON. ix, 480. FORD ED., ix, 263. (M., 1809.) See Federalists and Parties.

7355. REPUBLICANS, Antagonistic to England.—The war between France and England has brought forward the republicans and monocrats in every State so openly, that their relative numbers are perfectly visible. It appears that the latter are as nothing.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 9. FORD ED., vi, 326. (June 1793.) See Federalists.

7357. REPUBLICANS, Defeated.—I had always hoped, that the popularity of the late President being once withdrawn from active effect, the natural feelings of the people towards liberty would restore the equilibrium between the Executive and Legislative departments, which had been destroyed by the superior weight and effect of that popularity; and that their natural feelings of moral obligation would disconntuance the ungrateful predilection of the Executive in favor of Great Britain. But, unfortunately, the preceding measures had already alienated the nation which was the object of them, had excited reaction from them and this reaction has on the minds of our citizens an effect which carries with it that of the Washington popularity. This effect was sensible on some of the late congressional elections, and this it is which has lessened the republican majority in Congress. When it will be reinforced, must depend on events, and these are so inacuclable, that I consider the future character of our republic as in the air; indeed its future fortune will be in the air, if war is made on us by France, and if Louisiana becomes a Gallo-American colony.—To Aaron Burr. iv, 185. Ford ed., vii, 147. (Pa., June 1797.) See Federalists.

7358. REPUBLICANS, Dividing.—Little squibs in certain papers had long ago apprised me of a design to sow tares between particular republican characters, but to divide those by lying tales where truths cannot divide, is the hackneyed policy of the gossips of every society. Our business is to march straight forward to the object which has occupied us for eight and twenty years, without turning either to the right or left.—To De Witt Clinton. iv, 520. (W., 1803.)

7359. REPUBLICANS, Divisions among.—The operations of this session of Congress, when known among the people at large, will consolidate them. We shall now—so strangely as to fear no other enemy for freemen, thinking differently and speaking and acting as they think, will form into classes of sentiment, but it must be under another name. That of federalism is become so odious that no party can rise under it.—To Gabriel, iv, 437. Ford ed., viii, 150. (W., May 1802.)

7360. ———. I have for some time been satisfied a schism was taking place in Pennsylvania between the moderates and high-fliers. The same will take place in Congress whenever a proper head for the latter shall start up, and we must expect division of the same kind in other States as soon as the republicans shall be so strong as to fear no other enemy. To Albert Gallatin. Ford ed., viii, 222. (M., March 1803.)

7361. ———. I think it possibly may happen that we shall divide among ourselves; whenever federalism is completely eradicated, yet I think it the duty of every republican to make great sacrifices of opinion to put off the evil day.—To Joseph Story. Ford ed., viii, 505. (W., March 1804.)

7362. ———. The divisions among the republicans are distressing, but they are not unexpected to me. From the moment I foresaw the entire prostration of federalism, I knew that at that epoch more distressing divisions would take its place. The opinions of men are as various as their faces, and they will always find some rallying principle or point at which those nearest to it will unite, reducing themselves to two stations, under a common name for each. These stations, or camps, will be formed of very heterogeneous materials, combining from very different motives, and with very different views. To Wilson C. Nicholas. Ford ed., viii, 348. (M., March 1805.)

7363. ———. I did believe my station in March, 1801, as painful as could be undertaken, having to meet in front all the terrible passions of federalism in the first moment of its defeat and mortification, and to grapple with it until completely subdued. But I consider that as less painful than to be placed between conflicting friends. There my way was clear and my mind made up. I never for a moment have to do with the two opinions. In the new divisions which are to arise the case will be very different. Even those who seem to coalesce will be like the image of clay and brass. However, under difficulties of this kind, I have ever found one, and only one rule, to do by the two parties, and generally we shall disentangle ourselves without almost perceiving how it happens.—To Wilson C. Nicholas. Ford ed., viii, 349. (M., March 1805.)

7364. ———. The duty of an upright Administration is to pursue its course steadily, to know nothing of these family dissensions, and to cherish the good principles of both parties. The war of interest which has been waged against federalism, has filled our later times with strife and unhappiness. We have met it, with pain indeed, but with firmness, because we believed it the last convulsive effort of that hydra, which in earlier times we had combatted that if left alone it would reap the system of principle should ever render it necessary to give ascendency to one of the rising sections over the other, I thank God it will fall to some other to perform that operation. The only cordial I wish to carry into my retirement is the undivided good will of all those with whom I have acted.—To Dr. George Logan. iv, 575. Ford ed., viii, 353. (W., May 1805.)

7365. ———. I see with infinite pain the bloody schism which has taken place among our friends in Pennsylvania and New York, and will probably take place in other States. The main body of both sections mean well, but their good intentions will produce great evil. The minority, whichever section shall be the minority, will end in coalition with the federalists, and some compromise of principle: because these will not sell their aid for nothing. Republicanism will thus lose, and royalism gain, some portion of that ground which we thought we had rescued to good government. I do not express my sense of our misfortunes from any idea that they are remediable. I know that the passions of men will take their course, that the government will be controlled by the despotism, and that this melancholy truth is the pretext for despotism.—To Dr. George Logan. iv, 575. Ford ed., viii, 532. (W., May 1805.)

7366. ———. I see with extreme concern the acrimonious dissensions into which our friends in Pennsylvania have fallen, but I have long since made up my mind on the property of the General Government's taking no side in States, but to respect the government as the government, no with respect to myself particularly, after eight and thirty years in uniform action in harmony with those now constituting the republican party, without any single instant of alienation from them, it can not be but my most earnest desire to carry into retirement with me their undivided approbation.
7367.  — Of the unhappy effects of the schisms in Pennsylvania, and New York, you see the fruit in the State, and between them, where the federalists have recovered a majority in one branch of the legislature, are very near it in the other. and as soon as they shall reach it, they place the executive and every office under it in federal hands. If the two sections of republicans were as uncialable, still the minor one should not have coalesced with, and voted for federalists. If, on the contrary, they would keep themselves independent, and set up their own ticket, their whole body would come forward and vote, which would give them the benefit of that part of their force which kept back because it could not support federalists, and the federalists themselves, having no hope of bringing in men of their own, would have to choose between the two republican tickets that least disagreeable to themselves. This would only bring into the public councils the different shades of republicans so that the whole body should be represented.

To ANDREW ELLIOTT. FORD ed., viii, 479. (W., Nov. 1806.)

7368.  — I determined from the first dawn of the first schism, never to take part in any schism of republicans, nor in distributing the public trusts ever to ask of which section a party was.—To ANDREW ELLIOTT. FORD ed., viii, 480. (W., Nov. 1806.)

7369.  — I have long seen, and with very great regret, the schisms which have taken place among the republicans, and principally those of Pennsylvania and New York. As far as I have been able to judge, they have not been produced by any difference of political principle,—at least, any important difference, but by a difference of opinion as to persons. I determined from the first, that I would talk no part with them, nor that the Government should know nothing of any such differences. Accordingly, it has never been attended to in any appointment, or refusal of appointment.—To JAMES GAMBLE. v, 204. FORD ed., ix, 129. (W., 1811.)

7370.  — If we schismatize on either men or measures, if we do not act in phalanx, as when we rescued the country from the satellitism of monarchy, I will not say our party (the term is false and degrading), but our nation will be undone. For the republicans are the nation. Their opponents are but a faction, weak in numbers, but powerful and profuse in the command of money, and backed by a nation [England], powerful also and profuse in the use of the same means; and the more profuse, in both cases, as the money they thus employ is not their own but their creditors, to be paid off by a bankruptcy which whether it pays a dollar or a shilling in the pound, is of little concern with them. The last hope of human liberty in this world rests on us. We ought, for so dear a stake, to sacrifice every attachment and every enmity. Leave the government free to choose its own course, to pursue his own measures, and support him and them even if we think we are wiser than they, honester than they are, or possessing more enlarged information of the state of things. If we move in mass, be it ever so circuitously, we shall attain our object; but if we break into squads, every one pursuing the path he thinks most direct, we become an easy conquest to those who can now barely hold us in check. I repeat again, that we ought not to schismatize on either men or measures. Principles alone can justify that. If we find our government in all its branches rushing headlong, like our predecessors, into the arms of monarchy, if we find them violating our dearest rights, the trial by our vote, the support of the press, the freedom of opinion, civil or religious, or opening our peace of mind or personal safety the sluces of terrorism; if we see them raising standing armies, when the absence of all other danger points to these as the sole objects on which they are to be employed, then, indeed, let us withdraw and call the nations to their aid. But, while our functionaries are wise, and honest, and vigilant, let us move compactly under their guidance, and we have nothing to fear. Things may here and there go a little wrong. It is not in our power to prevent it. But all will be right in the end, though not, perhaps, by the shortest means. You know that this union of republicans has been the constant theme of my exhortations, that I have ever refused to take any part among them, to take part in any personal differences; and therefore, you will not give to the present observations any other than general application. I may sometimes differ in opinion from some of my friends from those whose views are as pure and sound as my own, or may do homage to everyone's right of opinion.—To WILLIAM DUANE. v, 576. FORD ed., ix, 313. (M., March 1811.)

7372.  — The schism in Massachusetts, when brought to the crisis of principle, will be found to be exactly the same as in the Revolutionary war. The monarchists will be left alone, and will appear to be exactly the tories of the last war.—To THOMAS LETRE. vi, 79. (M., Aug. 1812.)

7373.  — REPUBLICANS, Early contests of. — The inconveniences of an inefficient government, driving the people as is usual, into the opposite extreme, the elections to the first Congress ran very much in favor of those who were known to favor a very strong government. Hence the anti-republicans appeared a considerable majority in both houses of Congress. They pressed forward the plan, therefore, of strengthening all the features of the government which gave it resemblance to an English constitution, of adopting the English forms and principles of administration, and of forming like them a moneyed interest, by means of a funding system, not calculated to pay the public debt, but to render it perpetual, and to make it an engine in the hands of the executive branch of government which, added to the great patronage it possessed in the disposal of public offices, might give it to assume degrees a kingly authority. The biennial period of Congress being too short to betray to the people, spread over this great continent, this train of things during the first Congress, little change was made in members to the second. But, in the meantime, two very distinct parties had formed in Congress; and before the third election, the people in general became apprised of the prime which was playing for drawing over them a kind of government which they never had in contemplation. At the third election, therefore, a decided majority of republicans were sent to the lower House of Congress; and, as information spread still farther among the people, after the fourth election the anti-republican members have become a weak minority.—To C. D. Ebeling. Ford ed., vii. 46. (1795.)

7374. ———. When Congress first met, the assemblage of facts presented in the President's [Adams's] speech [message], with the multiplied accounts of spoliations by the French West Indians, appeared by sundry votes on the address, to incline a majority to put themselves in a posture of war. Under this influence the address was formed, and its spirit would probably have been pursued by corresponding measures, had the events of Europe been of an ordinary train. But this has been so extraordinary, that numbers have gone over to the side in the first, feeling with sensibility the French insults, as they had felt those of England before, thought now as they thought then, that war measures should be avoided, and those of peace pursued. Their favorite engine, on the former occasion, was commercial regulations in preference to negotiations, to war preparations, and increase of debt. On the latter, as we have no commerce with France, the restriction of which could press on them, they wished for negotiation. Those of the opposite sentiment had, on the former occasion, preferred negotiation, but at the same time voted for great war preparations, and increase of debt; now also they were for negotiation, war preparations and debt. The parties have in debate mutually charged each other with inconsistency, and with being governed by an attachment to this or that of the belligerent nations, rather than the dictates of reason and pure Americanism. But, in truth, both have been consistent; the same men having voted for war measures who did before, and the same against them now who did before.—To Edward Rutledge. iv, 190. Ford ed., vii. 152. (Pa., June 1797.)

7375. ———. The spirit of both the speech [message of the President] and the address [of Congress] has been so whittled down by Bonaparte's victories, victories on the Rhine, the Austrian peace, Irish insurgency. English bankruptcy, insubordination of the [British] fleet, &c., that Congress is rejecting, one by one, the measures brought in on the principles of their own address. But nothing less than such miraculous events, as have been pouring in on us from the first of our convening, could have assuaged the fermentation produced in men's minds. In consequence of these events, what was the majority at first, is by degrees become the minority, so that we may say that, in the Representatives, moderation will govern.—To E. Randolph. iv, 192. Ford ed., vii. 155. (Pa., June 1797.) See Federalists.

7376. REPUBLICANS, Federalists vs. —Two parties * * * exist within the United States. They embrace respectively the following descriptions of persons. The anti-republicans consist of: 1. The old refugees and Tories. 2. British merchants residing among us, and composing the main body of our merchants. 3. American merchants trading on British capital, another great portion. 4. Speculators and holders in the banks and public funds. 5. Officers of the Federal Government with some exceptions. 6. Office-hunters, willing to give up principles for places,—a numerous and noisy tribe. 7. Nervous persons, whose languid fibres have more analogy with a passive than active state of things. The republican part of our Union comprehends: 1. The entire body of landholders throughout the United States. 2. The body of laborers, not being landholders, whether in husbanding or the arts. The latter is to the aggregate of the former party probably as 500 to 1; but their wealth is not as disproportionate, though it is, in a great degree, superior, and is in truth the foundation of that of their antagonists. Trifling as are the numbers of the anti-republican party, there are circumstances which give them an appearance of strength and numbers. They all live in cities, together, and can act in a body and readily at all times; they give chief employment to the newspapers, and, therefore, have most of them under their command. The agricultural interest is dispersed over a great extent of country, have little means of intercommunication with each other, and feeling their own strength and will, are conscious that a single exertion of these will at any time, crush the machinations against their government.—To C. D. Ebeling. Ford ed., vii, 47. (1795.)

7377. ———. I trust that no section of republicans will countenance the suggestions of the federalists that there has ever been any difference at all in our political principles, or any sensible one in our views of the public interest.—To James Madison. Ford ed., ix. 242. (M., 1806.)

7378. ———. [It was] a contest* which was to change the condition of man over the civilized globe.—The Anas. Ford ed., i. 156. (1818.) See Monarchy.

7379. REPUBLICANS, Federalist coalition with. —The gross [Chesapeake] insult lately received from the English has forced the federalists into a momentary coalition with the mass of republicans; but the moment we begin to act in the very line they have joined in approving, all will be wrong, and every act the reverse of what it should have been. Still, it is better to admit their coalescence, and leave to themselves their short-lived existence.—To Thomas Cooper. v. 121. Ford ed., ix. 102. (W., July 1807.) See Chesapeake and Federalists.

7380. REPUBLICANS, French victories and. —I think we may safely rely that the

Duke of Brunswick has retreated; and it is certainly possible enough that between famine, disease, and a country abounding with defiles, he may suffer some considerable catastrophe. The monocrats here [Philadelphia] still affect to disbelieve all this, while the republicans are rejoicing and taking to themselves the name of Jacobins, which two months ago was fixed on them by way of stigma. —To John Francis Mercer. iii, 495. Ford ed., vi, 147. (Pa., Dec. 1792.)

7381. REPUBLICANS, Historical misrepresentation of.—Were a reader of this period [immediately following the establishment of the Constitution] to form his idea of it from this history alone [Marshall's Life of Washington] he would suppose the republican party (who were in truth endeavoring to keep the government within the line of the Constitution, and prevent its being monarchised in practice) were a mere set of grumblers, and disinorganizers, satisfied with no government, without fixed principles of any, and, like a British parliamentary opposition, gaping after lafves and fihes, and ready to change principles, as well as position, at any time, with their adversaries. But * * * the contests of that day were contests of principle, between the advocates of republican and those of kingly government, and had not the former made the efforts they did, our government would have been, even at this early day [1818], a very different thing from what the successful issue of those efforts have made it.—The Anas. Ford ed., i, 156. (1818.)

7382. —— We [the republicans] have been too careless of our own future reputation, while our toirs will omit nothing to place us in the wrong.—To William Johnson. vii, 277. Ford ed., x, 247. (M., 1823.)

7383. REPUBLICANS, Leadership of.—The monocrats [in Pennsylvania] have kept up the ball with respect to myself till they begin to be tired of it themselves. Their chief object was to influence the election of this State, by persuading [the people] there was a league against the government, and as it was necessary to designate a head to the league, they did me that honor.—To T. M. Randolph. Ford ed., vi, 128. (Pa., 1792.)

7384. REPUBLICANS, Loyalty of.—Without knowing the views of what is called the republican party here [Philadelphia], or having any communication with them, I could undertake to assure him [President Washington] from my intimacy with that party in the late Congress, that there was not a view in the republican party as spread over the United States, which went to the frame of the government; that I believed the next Congress would attempt nothing material, but to render their own body independent that that party were firm in their dispositions to support the government; that the maneuvers of Mr. Genet might produce some little embarrassment, but that he would be abandoned by the republicans the moment they knew the nature of his conduct.—The Anas. ix, 166. Ford ed., i, 257. (Aug. 1793.)

7385. —— He [President Washington] said he believed the views of the republican party were perfectly pure, but when men put a machine into motion, it is impossible for them to stop it exactly where they would choose, or to say where it will stop. That the Constitution we have is an excellent one, if we can keep it where it is; that it was, indeed, supposed there was a party disposed to change it into a monarchical form, but that he could conscientiously declare there was not a man in the United States who would set his face more decidedly against it than himself. Here, I interrupted him, by saying: "No rational man in the United States suspects you of any other disposition; but there does not pass a week, in which we cannot prove declarations dropping from the monarchical party that our government is good for nothing, is a milk and water thing which cannot support itself, we must knock it down, and set up something of more energy." He said if that was the case, he thought it a proof of their insanity, for that the republican spirit of the Union was so manifest and so solid, that it was astonishing how any one could expect to move it.—The Anas. ix, 166. Ford ed., i, 257. (Aug. 1793.)

7386. REPUBLICANS, New England and.—If a prospect could be once opened upon us of the penetration of truth into the Eastern States; if the people there, who are unquestionably republicans, could discover that they have been duped into the support of measures calculated to sap the very foundations of republicanism, we might still hope for salvation, and that it would come, as of old, from the East. But will that region ever awake to the true state of things? Can the Middle, Southern and Western States hold on till they awake? These are painful and doubtful questions; and if, * * * you can give me a comfortable solution of them, it will relieve a mind devoted to the preservation of our republican government in the true form and spirit in which it was established, but almost oppressed with apprehension that fraud will at length effect what force could not, and that what with currents and counter-currents, we shall, in the end, be driven back to the land which we launched twenty years ago. Indeed, we have been but a sturdy fish on the hook of a dexterous angler, who, letting us slounce till we have spent our force, brings us up at last.—To Aaron Burr. iv, 186. Ford ed., vii, 147. (Pa., June 1797.)

7387. —— The Eastern States will be the last to come over, on account of the dominion of the clergy, who had got a smell of union between Church and State, and began to indulge reviries which can never be realized in the present state of science. If, indeed, they could have prevailed on us, to view all advances in science as dangerous innovations, and to look back to the opinions and practices of our forefathers, instead of looking forward for improvement, a promising groundwork would have been laid. But I am in hopes their good sense will dictate to them, that since the mountain will not come to them, they had better go to the mountain; that they will find their interest in acquiescing in the liberty and science of their country, and that the Christian religion, when divested of the rags in which they have enveloped it, and brought to the original purity and simplicity of its benevolent institution is a religion of all others the most friendly to liberty, science, and the freest expansion of the human mind.—To Moses Robinson. iv, 379. (March 1801.)

7388. REPUBLICANS, Patronage and. We do not mean to leave arms in the hands of active enemies.—To Albert Gallatin. iv, 544. Ford ed., viii, 304. (May 1804.)

7389. That I have denounced republicans by the epithet of Jacobins, and declared I would appoint none but those called moderates of both parties, and that I have avowed or entertain any predilection for those called the third party, or "Quids", is in every tittle of it false.—To William Duane. iv, 592. Ford ed., viii, 433. (W., 1806.) See Office, Offices and Parties.

7391. REPUBLICANS, Relations to Genet. We [the Administration] have decided unanimously to require the recall of Genet. He will sink the republican interest if they do not abandon him.—To James Madison. Ford ed., vi, 361. (Aug. 1793.) See Genet.

7392. REPUBLICANS, Rights of man and. Whether the principles of the majority of our fellow citizens, or of the little minority still opposing them, be most friendly to the rights of man, posterity will judge; and to that arbiter I submit my own conduct with cheerfulness.—To C. F. Welles. v, 484. (M., 1809.) See Rights of Man.

7393. REPUBLICANS, Slandered. They endeavored [in the election] to conjure up the ghost of anti-federalism, and to have it believed that this and republicanism were the same, and that both were Jacobinism. But those who felt themselves republicans and federalists, too, were little moved by this artifice.—To Thomas Pinckney. iii, 494. Ford ed., vi, 143. (Pa., Dec. 1792.)

7394. REPUBLICANS, States rights and. On the eclipse of federalism, although not its extinction, its leaders got up the Missouri question, under the false front of lessening the measure of slavery, but with the real view of producing a geographical division of parties, which might ensure them the next President. The people of the north went blindfolded into the snare, followed their leaders for awhile with a zeal truly moral and laudable, until they became sensible that they were injuring instead of aiding the real interests of the slaves, that they had been used merely as tools for electioneering purposes; and that trick of hypocrisy then fell as quickly as it had been got up. To that is now succeeded a distinction, which, like that of republican and federal, or whig and tory, being equally intermingled through every State, threatens none of those geographical schisms which go immediately to a separation. The line of division now is the preservation of State rights as reserved in the Constitution, or by strained constructions of that instrument, to merge all into a consolidated government. The tories are strengthening the Executive and General Government; the whigs cherish the representative branch, and the rights reserved by the States, as the bulwark against consolidation, which must immediately generate monarchy. And although this division excites, as yet, no warmth, yet it exists, is well understood, and will be a principle of voting at the ensuing election, with the reflecting men of both parties.—To Marquis Lafayette. vii, 326. Ford ed., x, 281. (M., November 1823.) See Centralization, Judiciary, Missouri Question and Supreme Court.

7395. REPUBLICANS, Sympathy with France. Parties seem to have taken a very well defined form in this quarter. The old tories, joined by our merchants who trade on British capital, paper dealers, and the idle rich of the great commercial towns, are with the kings. All other descriptions with the French. The war has kindled and brought forward the two parties with an ardor which our interests merely, could never excite.—To James Monroe. Ford ed., vi, 281. (Pa., June 1793.) See Federalists and Monarchy.

7396. REPUBLICANS, Unaltering. As long as we pursue without deviation the principles we have always professed, I have no fear of deviation from them in the main body of republicans.—To Cesar A. Rodney. Ford ed., viii, 436. (W., March 1806.)

7397. REPUBLICANS, The Union and. Our lot has been cast by the favor of heaven in a country and under circumstances highly auspicious to our peace and prosperity, and where no pretence can arise for the degrading and oppressive establishments of Europe. It is our happiness that honorable distinctions flow only from public approbation; and that finds no object in titled dignitaries and pageants. Let us then endeavor carefully to guard this happy state of things, by keeping a watchful eye over the disaffection of wealth and ambition to the republican principles of our Constitution, and by sacrificing all our local and personal interests to the cultivation of the Union, and maintenance of the authority of the laws.—R. to A. PENNA.

7398. REPUBLICANS, Washington's administration and. —The object of the opposition which was made to the course of administration was to preserve the Legislature pure and independent of the Executive, to restrain the administration to republican forms and principles, and not permit the Constitution to be construed into a monarchy, and to be warped in practice into all the principles and pollutions of their favorite English model. Nor was this an opposition to General Washington. He was true to the republican charge confided to him; and has solemnly and repeatedly protested to me, in our private conversations, that he would lose the last drop of his blood in support of it, and he did this the oftener, and with the more earnestness, because he knew my suspicions of [Alexander] Hamilton's designs against it; and wished to quiet them.—THE ANAS. ix, 95. FORD ED., i, 165. (1818.) See FEDERALISTS, MONARCHY and WASHINGTON.

7399. REPUBLICS, Contending. —I would not gratify the combination of kings with the spectacle of the only two republics on earth destroying each other for two cannon; nor would I infinitely greater cause, add this country to the combination which turns the scale of contest, and let it be from our hands that the hopes of man receive their last stab. —OPINION ON "THE LITTLE SARAH". ix, 155. FORD ED., vi, 343. (July 1793.)

7401. REPUBLICS, Size of. —I suspect that the doctrine, that small States alone are fitted to be republics, will be exploded by experience, with some other brilliant fallacies accredited by Montesquieu and other political writers. Perhaps it will be found, that to obtain a just republic (and it is to secure our just rights that we resort to government at all) it must be so extensive as that local egoisms may never reach its greater part; that on every particular question, a majority may be found in its councils free from particular interests, and giving, therefore, an uniform prevalence to the principles of justice. The smaller the societies, the more violent and convulsive their schisms.—To M. D'ITZENNOIS. iv, 114. FORD ED., vii, 4. (M., Feb. 1795.)

7405. RESIGNATION, To Divine will. —The most fortunate of us, in our journey through life, frequently meet with calamities and misfortunes which may greatly afflict us; and, to fortify our minds against the attacks of these calamities and misfortunes, should be one of the principal studies and endeavors of our lives. The only method of doing this is to assume a perfect resignation to the Divine will, to consider that whatever does happen, must happen; and that, by our unmeaning, we cannot prevent the blow before it does fall, but we may add to its force after it has fallen. These considerations, and others such as these, may enable us in some measure to surmount the difficulties thrown in our way; to bear up with a tolerable degree of patience under this burden of life; and to proceed with a pious and unshaken resignation, till we arrive at our journey's end, when we may deliver up our trust into the hands of Him who gave it, and receive such reward as to Him shall seem proportioned to our merit. Such will be the language of the man who considers his situation in this life, and such should be the language of every man who would wish to render that situation as easy as the nature of it will admit. Few things will disturb him at all: nothing will disturb him much.—To JOHN PAGE. i, 187. FORD ED., i, 349. (S., 1763.)

7406. RESISTANCE, Morality and. —When wrongs are pressed because it is believed they will be borne, resistance becomes morality.—To MADAME DE STAEL. v, 133. (W., 1807.)

7407. RESISTANCE, Spirit of. —What country can preserve its liberties if its rulers are not warned from time to time that its people preserve the spirit of resistance?—To W. S. SMITH. ii, 318. FORD ED., iv, 467. (P., 1787.)

7408. RESOLUTION, Power of. —I do not like your saying that you are unable to read the ancient print of your Livy but with the aid of your master. We are always equal to what we undertake with resolution. A little degree of this will enable you to decipher your Livy. If you always lean on your master, you will never be able to proceed without him. It is part of the American character to consider nothing as desperate, to surmount every difficulty by resolution and contrivance. In Europe there are shops for every want; its inhabitants, therefore, have no idea that their wants can be supplied otherwise. Remote from all other aid, we are obliged to invent and to execute; to find means within ourselves, and not to lean on others. Consider, therefore, the conquering your Livy as an exercise in the habit of surmounting difficulties; a habit which will be necessary to you in the country where you are to live, and without which you will be thought a very helpless animal, and less esteemed.—To Martha Jefferson. Ford ed., iv. 373. (1787.)

7409. RESPECT, A safeguard.—Respect is a safeguard to interest.—To John Adams. i, 592. (P., 1786.)

7410. RESPECT, Strengthening.—Our national respect certainly needs strengthening in Europe.—To James Monroe. Ford ed., iv, 223. (P., 1786.)

7411. RESPONSIBILITY, National.—It should ever be held in mind, that insult and war are the consequences of a want of responsibility in the national character.—To James Madison. i, 531. Ford ed., iv, 192. (P., 1786.)

7412. ———. An alliance* with the Emperor of Austria will give us responsibility in Europe, which we have occasion for.—To Elbridge Gerry. i, 557. (P., 1786.) See Joseph II.

7413. RESPONSIBILITY, Essential principle.—In truth, man is not made to be trusted for life, if secured against all liability to account.—To M. Coray. vii, 322. (M., 1823.)

7414. RESPONSIBILITY, Free Government and.—Responsibility is a tremendous engine in a free government.—To Archibald Stuart. iii, 315. Ford ed., v, 410. (P., 1791.)

7416. RESPONSIBILITY, Official.—I am for responsibilities at short periods, seeing neither reason nor safety in making public functionaries independent of the nation for life, or even for long terms of years.—To James Martin. vi, 213. Ford ed., ix, 420. (M., Sep. 1813.)

7417. ———. That there should be public functionaries independent of the nation, whatever may be their demerit, is a solecism in a republic, of the first order of absurdity and inconsistency.—To William T. Barry. vii. 256. (M., 1822.)

7418. RESPONSIBILITY, People and.—It should be remembered, as an axiom of * By alliance Jefferson meant a commercial treaty.

 eternal truth in politics, that whatever power in any government is independent, is absolute also; in theory only, at first, while the spirit of the people is up, but in practice, and as that is the case. Independence can be trusted nowhere but with the people in mass. They are inherently independent of all but moral law.—To Spencer Roane. vii, 134. Ford ed., x, 141. (P.F., 1819.)

7419. RESPONSIBILITY, Shirking.—Leave no screen of a Council behind which to skulk from responsibility.—To Samuel Kerchival. vii. 12. Ford ed., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

7420. RETALIATION, Barbarous.—The English have burned our Capitol and President's House by means of their force. We can burn the S. J.'s and St. Paul's by means of our money, offered to their own incendiaries, of whom there are thousands in London who would do it rather than starve. But it is against the laws of civilized warfare to employ secret incendiaries. Is it not equally so to destroy by means of any armed incendiaries, in the Bonaparte, possessed at times of almost every capital of Europe, with all his despotism and power, injured no monument of art. If a nation, breaking through all the restraints of civilized character, uses its means of destruction (power, for example) without distinction of objects, may we not use our means (our money and their pauperism) to retaliate their barbarous ravages? Are we obliged to use for resistance exactly the weapons chosen by them for aggression? When they destroyed Copenhagen by superior force, against all the laws of God and man, would it have been unjustifiable for the Danes to have destroyed their ships by torpedoes? Clearly not; and they and we should now be justifiable in the conflagration of St. James's and St. Paul's. And if we do not carry it into execution, it is because we think it more moral and more honorable to set a good example, than follow a bad one.—To Thomas Cooper. vi, 380. (M., 1814.)

7421. RETALIATION, Burning cities.—Perhaps the British fleet will burn New York or Boston. If they do, we must burn the city of London, not by expensive fleets or Congreve rockets, but by employing an hundred or two Jack-the-painters, whom nakedness, famine, desperation, and hardened vice will abundantly furnish from among themselves.—To William Duane. vi. 76. Ford ed., ix, 366. (M., Aug. 1812.)

7422. RETALIATION, Deplorable.—We deplore the event which shall oblige us to shed blood for blood, and shall resort to retaliation but as the means of stopping the progress of despotism.—To James Madison. 192. Ford ed., i, 495. (1775.)

7423. RETALIATION, Destructive.—Humane conduct on our part was found to produce no effect; the contrary therefore was to be tried. If it produces a proper loyalty to our prisoners in captivity, it will have the effect we meant; if it does not, we shall return a severity as terrible as universal. * * * If, determining a tribunal of truth and reason, they choose to perpetrate this into a contest of cruelty and destruction, we will contend with them in that line, and measure out misery to those in our power in that multiplied proportion which the advantage of superior numbers enables us to do. * * * Iron will be retaliated by iron * * * ; prison ships by prison ships, and like for like in general."—To Col. Mathews, i, 234. FORD ED., ii, 262. (1779.)

7424. RETALIATION, A duty.—Retaliation is a duty we owe to those engaged in the cause of their country, to assure them that if any unlucky circumstance, baffling the efforts of their bravery, shall put them in a posture where we will use the pledges in our hands to warrant their lives from sacrifice.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. FORD ED., i, 495. (1775.)

7425. RETALIATION, Effective.—The numbers of our countrymen betrayed into the hands of the enemy by the treachery, cowardice or incompetence of our high officers, reduce us to the humiliating necessity of acquiescing in the brutal conduct observed towards them. When, during the last war, I put Governor Hamilton and Major Hay into a dungeon and in irons for having themselves personally done the same to the American prisoners who had fallen into their hands, and in general, when I was over-ruled by Phillips, then returned to New York, I declared to him I would load ten of their Saratoga prisoners (then under my care and within half a dozen miles of my house) with double irons for every American they should misuse with one. Of retaliation I put full end to the practice. But the ten for one are now with them.—ToWilliam Duane, vi, 211. (M., Sep. 1813.)

7426. RETALIATION, France and. —A recent fact, proving the anxiety of France for a reconciliation with us is the following. You know that one of the armed vessels which we took from her was refitted by us, sent to cruise on them, reconnoitered Guadaloupe under the name of the Retaliation. On the arrival there of Desfoureanux, the new commissioner, he sent Victor Hughes home in irons; called up our captain; told him that he found he had a regular commission as an officer of the United States; that his vessel was then lying in harbor; that he should enquire into no fact preceding his own arrival (by this he avoided noticing that the vessel was really French property) and that therefore, himself and crew were free to depart with their vessel; that a difference occurred between France and the United States, commissioners were coming to settle them, and in the meantime, no injury should be done on their part. The captain insisted on being a prisoner; the other, disclaimed it, and so he arrived here [Philadelphia] the day before yesterday. Within an hour after this was known to the Senate, they passed a retaliation bill. This was the more remarkable, as the bill was founded expressly on the Arret of Oct. 29, which implicated both vessels, was taken as soon as received, and he remarked, "that it could not be too soon communicated to the two Houses and the public". Yet he almost in the same instant received, through the same channel, Mr. King, information that the Arret was withdrawn; that it was only to prevent making it the foundation of a retaliation bill, he has never yet communicated it. But the Senate knew the fact informally from the Secretary of State, and knowing it, passed the bill.—To Edmund Pendleton, iv, 288. FORD ED., vii, 357. (Pa., Feb. 14, 1799.)

7427. — Our government contemplate restoring the Frenchmen taken originally in the same vessel, and kept at Lancaster [Penna.] as prisoners. This has furnished the idea of calling her a cartel vessel, and pretending that she came as such for an exchange of prisoners. Instead of that, she was delivered free and without condition, but it does not suit to let any new evidence appear of the desire of conciliation in France.—To EDMUND PENDELETON, iv, 290. FORD ED., vii, 360. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

7428. Leblanc, an agent from Desfoureanux of Guadaloupe, came in the Retaliation. You will see in the papers Desfoureanux's letter to the President.—* The vessel and crew were liberated without condition. Notwithstanding this, they have obliged Leblanc to receive the French prisoners, and to admit, in the papers, the terms, that "prisoners taken from us", he denying at the same time that he had had them as prisoners, or had any idea of exchange. The object of his mission was not at all relative to that; but they choose to keep up the idea of a cartel, to prevent the transaction from being regarded as evidence of the sincere desire of French towards a reconciliation. He came to assure us of a discontinuance of all irregularities in French privateers from Guadaloupe. He has been received very cavalierly.—To JAMES MADISON, iv, 291. FORD ED., vii, 361. (Pa., Feb. 19, 1799.)

7429. RETALIATION, Governor Hamilton's case.—[I hope you will ascribe the advice of the [Governor's] Council [confining Governor Hamilton], not to a want of regard to the sacred nature of public conventions, of which I hope we shall never, in any circumstances, lose sight, but to a desire of stopping the effusion of the unoffending blood of women and children, and the unjustifiable severities exercised on our captive officers and soldiers in general, by proper severities on our part.—To SIR GUY CARLETON. FORD ED., ii, 256. (1779.) See WAR, PRISONERS OF WAR.

7430. On receipt of your letter of August 6th, during my absence, the Council had the irons taken off the prisoners of war. When your advice was asked, we meant it should decide with us; and upon my return to Williamsburg, the matter was taken into the enclosed advice* given.—To General Washington, i, 230. FORD ED., ii, 258. (1779.)

* The advice was in the form of an Order of Council which was written by Governor Jefferson as follows: "The Board having been fully apprised of the circumstances attending the confinement of Lieutenant Governor Hamilton, Captain Lamothe and Philip DeLancey, and the severe treatment to which those men, as well as the general conduct of the enemy had constrained them to advise; wishing, and willing to expect, that their sufferings may lead them to the practice of humanity, should any future turn of fortune, in their favor, submit to their discretion the fate of their fellow creatures; that it may prove of benefit to others who may be subjected to the cruelties, not to rely for immunity in any circumstances of distance or present security; and that it may induce the enemy to reflect what must be the painful consequences should a continuation of the same conduct on their part impel us again to severe measures, while such multiplied subjects of retaliation are within our power; sensible that no impression can be made on the event of the war by wreaking vengeance on miserable captives; that the great

7431. Governor Hamilton and his companions were imprisoned and ironed, 1st. In retaliation for cruel treatment of our captive citizens by the enemy, General Washington in his address to the nation, April 13, 1779, declared that Retaliation would be a measure of last resort, and that it would not have justified a contrary difference of conduct towards each other? —To GEORGE HAMMOND. FORD ED., vi, 12. (Pa., 1792.)

7434. RETALIATION, Life for life.—If the [British] enemy shall put to death, torture, or otherwise ill-treat any of the hostages in their hands, or of the Canadian, or other prisoners captured by them in the service of the United Colonies, recourse to Retaliation had to retaliation as the sole means of stopping the progress of human butchery, and for that purpose punishments of the same kind and degree shall be inflicted on an equal number of their subjects taken by us, till they shall be taught due respect to the violated rights of nations.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 34. (June 1776.)

7435. RETALIATION, Necessary.—I shall give immediate orders for having in readiness every engine which the enemy have contrived for the destruction of our unhappy citizens, captured by them. The presentment of these operations is shocking beyond expression. I pray heaven to avert them; but nothing in the world will be a proper conduct in the eye of the enemy. In every event, I shall resign myself to the hard necessity under which I shall act.—TO GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 232. FORD ED., ii, 261. (Wg., 1779.)

7436. RETALIATION, Opportunity for.—It is impossible [that the British] can be serious in attempting to bully us * * * We have too many of their subjects in our power and too much iron to clothe them with.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 232. (Wg., 1779.)

7437. RETALIATION, On prisoners of war.—This question [contest with Great Britain] will not be decided by wreaking vengeance on a few helpless captives but by achieving success in the fields of war, and gathering there those laurels which grow for the warrior brave. Under this light we view the object between us, in this line we have neither conducted ourselves nor ourselves of both, to fear their pretended retaliation.—TO GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 231. FORD ED., ii, 250. (Wg., 1779.)

7438. — Should you think proper in these days to revive ancient barbarism and again disgrace our nature with the sacrifice, the fortune of war has put into our power subjects for multiplied retaliation. To them, to you, and to the world we declare they shall not be warded unless their imprudence or your example shall call for it. We shall therefore, in this case, decide that their lives shall teach our enemies to respect the rights of nations.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. FORD ED., i, 494. (1775.)

Benaris, or the extermination of the Rohillas, and say with candor whether the difference of cause which has animated the two nations against each other is not to be decided by unmannerly cruelties on wretches, who have bowed their necks to the power of the victor, but by the exercise of honorable valor in the field; earnestly hoping that the energy of the enemy, in viewing the subject in the same light, will be content to accept the terms of that respective decision, and spare us the pain of a second departure from honorable warfare. It is a possible motive to which can be candidly ascribed, in the present actual circumstances of the war, the advice we are now about to give; the Board does advise the Governor to send Lieutenants Governor Hamilton, and Philip Dejane, to Hanover Court House, there to remain at large, within reasonable limits, taking the parole in the usual manner. —EDITOR.

*From Jefferson's letter to George Hammond, British Minister, on the infractions of the peace treaty. FORD ED., vi, 12. (Pa., 1792.)

† Here Jefferson had written "States of America," which has been stricken out by another hand and "Colonies" written in its place.—NOTE IN FORD EDITION.

‡ Jefferson was then Governor of Virginia, and a controversy had arisen respecting the treatment of prisoners of war.—EDITOR.

§ Ethan Allen and others were at that time prisoners in the hands of the British army. The report was not accepted by Congress.—EDITOR.
7439. — It is my duty, as well as it was my promise to the Virginia captives, to take measures for discovering any change which may be made in their situation. For this purpose, I have, for obtaining knowledge of the situation of the Virginia officers in captivity. If you should think proper, as I could wish, to take upon yourself to retaile any new sufferings which may be imposed on them, it will be more likely to have due weight, and more certain to make the unhappy on both sides, to that benevolent treatment for which all should wish. —To General Washington. i, 237. FORD Ed., ii, 280. (Wg. Nov. 1779.)

7440. RETALIATION, On Savages.—To do wrong is a melancholy resource, even where retaliation renders it indispensably necessary. It is better to suffer much from the scalplings, the conflagrations, the rapes and ravages, than to proceed to punish and restrain such barbarisms by retortion. I have ever deemed it more honorable and more profitable, too, to set a good example than to follow a bad one.—To M. Correa. vi, 405. (M., 1814.)

7441. RETIREMENT, Called from.—I had folded myself in the arms of retirement, and rested all prospects of future happiness on domestic and literary objects. A single event [Mrs. Jefferson’s death] wiped away all my plans, and left me a blank which I had not the spirits to fill up. In this state of mind an appointment [Minister to France] from Congress found me, requiring me to cross the Atlantic.—To M. de Chastellux. i, 322. FORD Ed., iii, 65. (Am., 1782.)

7442. — I had retired after five and twenty years of constant occupation in public affairs, and total abandonment of my own. I retired much poorer than when I entered the public service, and desired nothing but rest and oblivion. My name, however, was annually brought forward [for the Presidency] without concert or expectation on my part. On my salvation I declare it.—To Edward Rutledge. iv, 151. FORD Ed., vii, 93. (M., Dec. 1796.)

7443. RETIREMENT, Desire for.—However ardently my retirement to my own home and my own affairs, may be wished for by others, and there is no one of them who feels the wish once where I do a thousand times.—To Francis Eppes. FORD Ed., v, 507. (Pa., April 1792.)

7444. RETIREMENT, Happiness in.—If I can carry into retirement the good will of my fellow citizens, nothing else will be wanting to my happiness.—To James Sullivan. v, 252. (1808.)

7445. RETIREMENT, Longing for.—Oh for the day when I shall be withdrawn from [office] when I shall have leisure to enjoy my family, my friends, my farm and books! —To Dr. Benjamin Rush. v, 225. (W., January 1808.)

7446. — It is now among my most fervent longings to be on my farm, which, with a garden and fruitery, will constitute my principal occupation in retirement.—To Robert R. Livingston. v, 224. (W., 1808.)

7447. — My longings for retirement are so strong, that I with difficulty encounter the daily drudgeries of my duty.—To James Monroe. v, 248. FORD Ed., ix, 178. (W., Feb. 1808.)

7448. — As the moment of my retirement approaches, I become more anxious for its arrival, and to begin at length to pass what yet remains to me of life and health in the bosom of a family and friends, with whom I may in communication with my friends, undisturbed by political concerns or passions.—To Dr. Logan. v, 405. (W., Dec. 1808.)

7449. — Five weeks more will relieve me from a drudgery to which I am no longer equal, and restore me to a scene of tranquillity, amidst my family and friends, more congenial to my age and natural inclinations.—To James Monroe. v, 420. FORD Ed., ix, 244. (W., Jan. 1809.)

7450. RETIREMENT, Newspaper attacks and.—I have for some time past been under an agitation of mind which I scarcely ever experienced before, peculiarly that which it occurred on my purpose of returning home at the close of this session of Congress. My operations at Monticello had been all made to bear upon that point of time, my mind was fixed on it with a constancy where the extreme, the색 of which I firmly declared to the President, when I became assailed from all quarters with a variety of objections. Among these it was urged that my return when I had been attacked in the public papers, would injure me in the eyes of the public, who would suppose I either had been from investigation, or because I had not tone of mind sufficient to meet slander. The only reward I ever wished on my retirement was to carry with me nothing like a disapprobation of the public. These representations have, for some weeks past, shaken a determination which I had thought the whole world could not have shaken. I have not yet finally made up my mind on the subject, nor changed my declaration to the President. But having, however, long been accustomed to public duties, and to those of the public, who have counselled and urged it strongly; believing that they can see and judge better a question between the public and myself than I can, I feel a possibility that I may be detained here [Philadelphia] for the rest of my life.—To Dr. Rush. vi, 151. (Pa., Jan. 1793.)

7451. — It happened unfortunately that the attack made on me in the newspapers came out soon after I began to speak freely and publicly of my purpose to retire this Spring. I find that as well those who are my friends as those who are not, putting the two things together as cause and effect, concluded I should remain in office. This want of firmness or perhaps fear of investigation. Desirous that my retirement may be clouded by high imputations of this kind, I see not only a possibility, but rather a probability, that I shall postpone it some time.—To Wm. Randolph. D. L. J., 215. (Pa., Feb. 1793.)

7452. RETIREMENT, Occupations in.—In retirement I shall devote myself to occupations much more congenial with my inclinations, than those to which I am become so much attached by the character of the times into which my lot was cast. About to be relieved from this corvée by age and the fulfillment of the quadragenae stipenda, what remains to me of physical activity will chiefly be employed in the amusements of agriculture.

Retirement

Having little practical skill, I count more on the pleasures than the products of my occupation.—To M. Lasteyrie, v. 315. (W., 1808.)

7453. Within a few days I retire to my family, my books and farms; and having gained the harbor myself, I shall look on my friends still buffeting the storm with anxiety indeed, but not with envy.—To Dupont de Nemours, v. 434. (W., March 1809.)

7454. I retire from scenes of difficulty, anxiety, and of contending passions, to the elysium of domestic affections, and of irresponsible direction. Safe in port myself, I shall look anxiously at my friends still buffeting the storm, and wish you all safe in port also.—To General Armstrong, v. 434. (W., 1809.)

7455. I shall now bury myself in the groves of Monticello, and become a mere spectator of the passing events.—To Baron Humboldt, v. 435. (W., 1809.)

7456. I am now retired: I resign myself, as a passenger, with confidence to those at present at the helm, and ask but for rest, peace, and my will.—To Samuel Kercheval, v. 7, x. Ford Ed., x. 37. (M., 1816.)

7457. Retirement, Old age.—I am too desirous of quiet to place myself in the way of contention. Against this I am admonished by bodily decay, which cannot be unaccompanied by corresponding wane of the mind. Of this I am as yet sensible, sufficiently to be unwilling to trust myself before the public, and when I cease to be so, I hope that my friends will be too careful of me to draw me forth and present me, like a Priam in armor, as a spectacle for public compassion. I hope our political bark will ride through all its dangers; but I can in future be but an inert passenger.—To Thomas Ritchie, vii. 193. Ford Ed., x. 171. (M., 1820.)

7458. Retirement, Power and.—Never did a prisoner, released from his chains, feel such relief as I shall on shaking off the shackles of power. Nature intended me for the tranquil pursuits of science, by rendering them my supreme delight. But the enormities of which I have lived, have forced me to take a part in resisting them, and to commit myself on the boisterous ocean of political passions. I thank God for the opportunity of retiring from them without censure, and carrying with me the most consoling proofs of public approbation.—To Dupont de Nemours, v. 432. (W., March 2, 1809.)

7459. Retirement, Principle and.—At the end of the next four years I shall certainly retire. Age, inclination and principle all dictate this.—To Philip Mazzei, iv. 554. (W., July 1804.)

7460. Retirement, Reasons for.—The President [Washington] said, in an affectionate tone, that he had felt much concern at an expression which dropped from me yesterday [Feb. 28, 1792], and which marked my intention of retiring [from the Secretarieship of State] when he would; that as to himself, many motives obliged him to it, * * * yet he should consider it as unfortunate, if that should bring to be so the retirement of the great officers of the government, and that this might produce a shock on the public mind of dangerous consequence. I told him that no man had ever had less desire of entering into public offices than myself; that the circumstance of a perilous war, which had brought everything into danger, and called for all the services which every citizen could render, had induced me to understand the administration of the government of Virginia; that I had both before and after refused repeated appointments of Congress to go abroad in that sort of office, which, if I had consulted my own gratification, would almost have been the most agreeable to me; that at the close of those two years, I resigned the government of Virginia, and retired with a firm resolution never more to appear in public life; that a domestic loss, however, happened, and made me fancy that absence and a change of scene for a time might be a salutary remedy; that I, therefore, accepted a foreign appointment, limited to two years; that at the close of that, Dr. Franklin having left France, I was appointed to supply his place, which I had occupied, and though I continued in it three or four years, it was under the constant idea of remaining only a year or two longer; that the Revolution in France coming on, I had so interested myself in the event of that, that when obliged to bring my family home, I had still an idea of returning and awaiting the result of that war in retirement; that on my arrival here I found he had appointed me to my present office [Secretary of State]; that he knew I had not come into it without some reluctance; that it was, on my part, a sacrifice of inclination to the opinions of my friends, and therefore, I most solemnly declared in that, that he meant to retire from the government ere long, and as to the precise epoch there could be no doubt, my mind was immediately made up, to make that epoch of my own retirement from those labors in which I had been so long engaged.—The Anas. ix, 102. Ford Ed., i, 175. (Feb. 29, 1792.)

7461. I expressed to him [Washington] my excessive repugnance to public life, the particular uneasiness of my situation in Philadelphia, where the fashion of society oblige me always to take a part in the circle which I know to bear me peculiar hatred; I am that, the wealthy aristocrats, the merchants connected closely with England, the new created paper fortunes; that thus surrounding me, I, instead of being esteemed, was mistreated, and even6 fabricated and spread abroad to my injury; that he saw also, that there was an opposition of views between myself and another part of the Administration, as to render it peculiarly unpleasant, and to destroy the necessary harmony. —The Anas. ix. 166. Ford ed., i. 256. (Aug. 1793.)

7462. RETIREMENT, Washington opposed to Jefferson's.—The President calls on me [to-day, August 6], at my house in the country, and introduces my letter of July 31, announcing that I should resign at the close of the next month. He again expressed his re-

7471. REVOLUTION (American), Appeal to British people.—In defence of our persons and properties under actual violation, we took up arms. When that violence shall be removed, when hostilities shall cease on the part of the aggressors, hostilities shall cease on our part also. For the achievement of this happy event, we call for and confide in the good offices of our fellow-subjects beyond the Atlantic. 7472. Revolution (American), Battle of Lexington.—Within this week we have received the unhappy news of an action of considerable magnitude, between the King's troops and our brethren of Boston, in which it is said five hundred of our people, with the EARL of PERCY, were killed. While pity, the resolutions of the cabinet were laid on the table in which he had the acknowledgment of the lead, I used the expression that "Mr. HENRY certainly gave the first impulse to the ball of revolution." (Wirt, page 41.) The expression is, indeed, general, and in all its extension, would comprehend all the statesmen, but in this the construction would restrain it. In some, the word was really meant, to the subject matter under contemplation, which was Virginia alone; according to the rule of the lawyers and a fair canon of general criticism, that every expression should be construed according to its materia. Where the first attack was made, there must have been, of course, the first act of resistance, and that was in Massachusetts. Our [Virginia]'s first overt act of war was Mr. Henry's embodying a force of militia from various counties, regularly armed and organized, marching them in military array and making reprisal on the King's treasury at the seat of government, for the public powder taken away by his Governor. This was in the last days of April, 1775. Your formal battle of Lexington was ten months before, and when overshadowed in importance, as it preceded in time, our little affair, which merely amounted to a levying of arms against the King; and, very possibly, you had had military affairs before the regular battle of Lexington.—To SAMUEL ADAMS. 7477. Revolution (American), Change of government.—With respect to the State of Virginia in particular, the people seem to have taken up the republican government, with as much ease as would have attended their throwing off an old, and putting on a new suit of clothes. Not a single threepence has attended this important transformation. A half-dozen aristocratical gentlemen, agonizing under the lot of preeminence, have sometimes ventured their sarcasms on our political metamorphosis. They have been thought fitter objects of pity, than of punishment.—To BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. i. 204. FORD ED., ii. 131. (1777.)

7481. REVOLUTION (American), Gage's perfidy.—Hostilities thus commenced [at Lexington, &c.], on the part of the minister, who could not proceed without regard to faith or fame. The inhabitants of the town of Boston, in order to procure their enlargement, having entered into treaty with General Gage, their Governor, it was stipulated that the said inhabitants, having found arms with and the said General, or any of his men, should have liberty to depart from out of the said town taking with them their other effects. Their arms they accordingly delivered in, and claimed the stipulated license of departing with their effects. But in open violation of entitled and honor, in defiance of the sacred obligation of treaty which even savage nations observe, their arms, deposited with their own magistrates to be preserved as their property, were immediately seized by a body of armed men under orders from the said Governor, the greater part of the inhabitants were detained in the town, and the few permitted to depart were compelled to leave their most valuable effects behind We leave the world to its own reflections on this atrocious perfidy.—DECLARATION ON TAKING UP ARMS, FORD ed., i. 471. (July 1775.)

7482. REVOLUTION (American), Hopes of reconciliation.—When I saw Lord Chatham's bill, I entertained high hope that a reconciliation could have been made. The difference between his terms and those offered by our Congress might have been accommodated, if entered by both parties with a disposition to accommodate. But the dignity of Parliament, it seems, can look no opposition to its power.—To Dr. WILLIAM SMALL. i, 193.

7483. — Looking with fondness towards a reconciliation with Great Britain, I cannot help hoping that you * may be able to contribute towards expediting this good work. I think it must be evident to yourself, that the Ministry have been deceived by their officers on this side of the water, who (for what purpose I cannot conceive) have misrepresented the American opposition as that of a small faction, in which the body of the people took little part. This, you can inform them, of your own knowledge, is untrue. They have taken it into their heads, too, that we are cowards, and shall surrender at discretion to an armed force. * * * I wish they were thoroughly and minutely acquainted with every circumstance relative to America, as it exists in truth. I am persuaded, this would go far towards disposing them to negotiation.—To JOHN RANDOLPH. i, 200.

7489. REVOLUTION (American), Mythical British victories.—From the kind anxiety expressed in your letter, as well as from other sources of information, we discover that our enemies, as well as those in France with Thrasiasic accounts of victories they had never won and conquests they were fated never to make. While these accounts alarmed our friends in Europe, they afforded us diversion.—To propositions on the subject of peace which do not, as a preliminary, acknowledge these States to be sovereign and independent; and that we should have been authoritatively admitted on the part of Great Britain, they shall at all times and with that earnestness which the love of peace and justice inspires, be ready to enter into conference for treaty for the purpose of shutting up the effusion of so much kind of blood.—Resolutions on Peace Propositions. Ford Ed., ii. 90. (Aug. 1776.)

7402. Revolution (American), Resources of.—The main confidence of the Colonies was in their own resources. They considered foreign aid as probable and desirable, but not essential. I believe the main resource of the whole of what I have seen of our resources and perseverance, is, that we had never received any foreign aid, we should not have obtained our independence; but that we should have made a peace with Great Britain on any terms we pleased, short of that, which would have been a subject to no other king, a union of force in &c. 2. That France supplied us plentifully with money, suppose about four millions of guineas a year, without entering into the war herself at all, we should have established our Independence before we would have lost more time and blood, but less money. 3. That France, aiding us as she did, with money and forces, shortened much the time, lessened the expense of blood, but at a greater expense of money to her than would have otherwise been requisite.—Notes on M. Souls's Work, ix. 297. Ford Ed., iv. 305. (P. 1786.)

7493. The submission of the States would not have been effected but for a long course of disasters, and such, too, as were irreparable in their nature. Their resources were great, and their determination so rooted, that they would have tried the last of them.—Notes on M. Souls's Work. ix. 297. Ford Ed., iv. 305. (P. 1786.)

7494. Revolution (American), Royal Incendiarism.—It is a lamentable circumstance, that the only mediatory power, acknowledged by both parties, as awakening their respective passions, his divided people, should pursue the incendiary purpose of still blowing up the flames, as we find him constantly doing, in every speech and public declaration.—To Dr. William Small. i. 199. Ford Ed., i. 454. (May 1775.) See George III.

7495. Revolution (American), Separation.—There is not in the British empire a man who more cordially loves a union with Great Britain, than I do. But by the God that made me, I will cease to exist before I yield to a connection on such terms as the British Parliament propose; and in this, I think I speak the sentiments of America. We want neither inducement nor power, to declare and assert a separation. It is will, alone, which is wanting, and that is growing apace under the fostering hand of our King.—To John Randolph. i. 203. Ford Ed., i. 493. (Pa. November 1775.)

7496. Revolution (American), Spirit of.—Even those in Parliament who are called friends to America seem to know nothing of our real determinations. I observe, they pronounced in the last Parliament that the Congress of 1774 did not mean to insist rigorously on the terms we yielded out, but kept something in reserve to give up; and, in fact, that they would give up everything but the article of taxation. Now, the truth is far from this, as I can affirm, and put my honor to the assertion. Their continuance in this error may, perhaps, produce very ill consequences. The Congress stated the lowest terms they thought they could be accepted, in order to convince the world they were reasonable. They gave up the monopoly and regulation of trade and all acts of Parliament prior to 1764. leaving to British generosity to render these, at some time, as easy to America as the introduction of a grain would admit. But this was before blood was shed. I cannot affirm, but have reason to think these terms would not now be accepted.—To John Jay. i. 332. Ford Ed., iii. 316. (Pa. 1783.)

7497. Revolution (American), Treaty of peace.—The terms obtained for us are indeed great, and are so deemed by your country, a few ill-designing debtors excepted.—To John Jay. i. 332. Ford Ed., i. 482. (M. August 1775.)

7499. Revolution (American), Washington and.—The moderation and virtue of a single character have probably prevented this Revolution from being closed, as most others have been, by a submission of that Party it was intended to establish.—To General Washington, i. 335. Ford Ed., iii. 467. (A. 1784.) See Colonies, Cornwallis, Declaration of Independence, George III., Parliament, Rights of British America, War and Washington.

7500. Revolution (French), American revolution and.—Celebrated writers of France and England had already sketched good principles on the subject of government; yet the American Revolution considerably changed the thinking part of the French nation in general from the sleep of despotism in which they were sunk. The officers, too, who had been to America, were mostly young men, less shackled by habit and prejudice, and more ready to assent to the sentiments of common sense, and feeling of common rights, than others. They came back with new ideas and impressions. The press, notwithstanding its shackles, began to disseminate them; conversation assumed new freedoms. Politics became the theme of all societies, male and female, and a very extensive and zealous party was formed, which acquired the appellation of the Patriotic Party, who, sensible of the abusive government under which they lived, sighed for occasions of reforming it. This party comprehended all the honesty of the kingdom, sufficiently at leisure to think, the men of letters, the easy Bourgeois, the young nobility, partly from reflection, partly from mode; for these sentiments became matter of mode, and as such, united most of the young women to the party.—Autobiography, i. 69. Ford Ed., i. 96. (1821.)

7502. REVOLUTION (French), Clergy and nobles.—It was imagined the ecclesiastical elections would have been generally in favor of the higher clergy; on the contrary, the lower clergy have obtained five-sixths of these deputations. These are the sons of peasants, who have done all the drudgery of the service for ten, twenty, and thirty guineas a year, and whose oppressions and penury, contrasted with the pride and luxury of the higher clergy, have rendered them perfectly disposed to humble the latter. They have done it, in many instances, with a boldness they were thought insusceptible of. Great hopes have been formed that these would concur with the Tiers État in voting by persons. In fact, about half of them seem as yet so disposed; but the bishops are intriguing, and drawing them over with the address which has ever marked ecclesiastical intrigue.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 27. (P., May 1789.)

7503. — — — — — — The clergy and the nobles, by their privileges and their influence, have hitherto screened their property in a great degree, from public contribution. That half of the orange, then, remains yet to be squeezed, and for this operation there is no agent powerful enough but the Revolution. They are, therefore, brought forward as the favorites of the Court, and will be supported by them.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 561. (P., 1789.)

7504. — — — — — — The clergy will leave nothing unattempted to secure [the voting by orders in the States General]; for they see that the spirit of reformation will not confine itself to the political, but will extend to the ecclesiastical establishment also.—To JOHN JAY. ii, 561. (P., 1789.)

REVOLUTION (French), Famine and and.—We have had such a winter here as is not on record. The mercury was 183° below freezing on Reaumur's scale, and I think it was nearly two months varying between that and zero. It gave occasion for a display of the benevolent character of this nation, which, great as I had thought it, went beyond my expectations. There seems to be a very general apprehension of the want of bread this spring. Supplies are hoped from our country, and indeed they have already reduced the price of flour at Bordeaux from 361. to 3. the barrel.—To COUNT DE MOUSTIER. ii, 596. (P., March 1789.)

7506. — — — — — — We have had such a winter as makes me shiver yet whenever I think of it. All communications, almost, were cut off. Dinners and suppers were suppressed, and the money laid out in feeding and warming the poor, whose labors were suspended by the rigor of the season, To MADAM DE BREAHER. ii, 591. FORD ED., v, 79. (P., 1789.)

7507. — — — — — — The want of bread is very seriously dreaded through the whole kingdom. Between twenty and thirty shiploads of wheat and flour have already arrived from the United States, and there will be about the same quantity of rice sent from Charleston to this country direct. * * Paris consumes about a thousand tons a day (say two hundred and fifty tons).—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. iii, 22. (P., May 1789.)

7508. — — There have been some mobs, occasioned by the want of bread, in different parts of the kingdom, in which there may have been some lives lost, perhaps a dozen or twenty. These had no professed connection, generally, with the constitutional revolution. A more serious riot happened lately in Paris, in which as many as two thousand persons were killed. This execution has been universally approved, as they seemed to have no view but mischief and plunder.—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 34. (P., May 1789.)

7509. — — The want of bread had been foreseen for some time past, and M. de Montmorin had desired me to notify it in America, and that, in addition to the market price, a premium should be given for bread which should be brought from the United States. Notice was accordingly given, and produced considerable supplies. Subsequent information made the importations from America, during the months of March, April and May, into the Atlantic ports of France, and in all other ports of France, to amount to twenty-one thousand barrels of flour, besides what went to other ports, and in other months: while our supplies to their West Indian islands relieved them also from that drain. This dismisses the subject till July.—AUTOGRAPH. i, 89. FORD ED., i, 123. (1817.)

7510. REVOLUTION (French), Financial abuses.—The discovery of the abominable abuse of public money by the late Comptroller General, some new expenses of the Court, not of a piece with the projects of reformation, and the imposition of new taxes, have, in the course of a few weeks, raised a spirit of discontent in the nation, so great and so general, that the threat of insurrections is generally foreseen. The parliaments in general, and particularly that of Paris, put themselves at the head of this effervescence, and direct its object to the calling of the States General, who have not been assembled since 1614. The object is to frame a constitution, and to limit expenses. The King has been obliged to hold a bed of justice, to enforce the registering the new taxes; the parliament on their side, propose to issue a prohibition against their execution. Very possibly this may bring on their exile.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 251. (P., 1787.)

7511. REVOLUTION (French), Flight of the King.—We are now under the first汇报 of the news of the King's flight from Paris, and his recapture. It would be unfortunate were it in the power of any one man to defeat the issue of so beautiful a revolution. I hope and trust it is not, and that, for the good of humanity all over the earth, that revolution will be established and spread through the whole world.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. iii, 284. (Pa., 1791.)

7515. REVOLUTION (French), Influence of women.—In my opinion, a kind of influence which none of their plans of reform take into account, will elude them all; I mean the influence of women in the government. The manners of the nation allow them to visit, alone, all persons in office, to solicit the affaires of the husband. Finally, or friends, and their solicitations bid defiance to laws and regulations. This obstacle may seem less to those who, like our countrymen, are in the precious habit of considering right as a barrier against all solicitation. Nor can such an one, without the evidence of his own eyes, believe—A citizen in the desperate state to which things are reduced in this country from the omnipotence of an influence which, fortunately for the happiness of the sex itself, does not endeavor to extend itself in our country beyond the domestic line.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. iii, 536. (P. Dec. 1788.)

7516. REVOLUTION (French), Jefferson's relations to.—I considered a successful reformation of government in France, as insuring a general reformation through Europe, and the resurrection, to a new life, of their people, now ground to dust by the abuses of the governing powers. I was much acquainted with the patriots of the Assembly. Being from a country which had successfully passed through a similar reformation, they were disposed to my acquaintance, and had some confidence in me. I urged, most strenuously, an immediate compromise; to secure what the government could readily obtain, and to turn to future occasions for what might still be wanting. It was well understood that the King would grant, at this time, 1. Freedom of the person by habeas corpus; 2. Freedom of conscience; 3. Freedom of the press; 4. Trial by jury; 5. A representative legislature; 6. Annual meetings; 7. The origination of laws; 8. The exclusive right of taxation and appropriation; and 9. The responsibility of ministers: and with the exception of the points they could obtain, in future, whatever might be further necessary to improve and preserve their constitution. They thought otherwise, however, and events have proved their lamentable error. For, after thirty years of war, foreign and domestic, the loss of millions of lives, the prostration of private happiness, and foreign subjugation of their own country for a time, they have obtained no more, nor even that securely. They were unconscious of (for who could foresee?) the melancholy sequel of their well-meant perseverance; that their physical force would be usurped by a first tyrant to trample on the existence of other nations; that this would afford a fatal example for the atrocious conspiracy of kings against their people; would generate their unholy and homicide alliance to make common cause among themselves, and to crush, by the power of the whole, the efforts of any nation to moderate their abuses and oppressions.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 93. FORD ED., i, 129. (1821.) See HOLY ALLIANCE.

7517. Possibly you may remember, at the date of the jeu de paume, how earnestly I urged yourself and the patriots of my acquaintance, to enter then into a compact with the King, securing freedom of religion, freedom of business, peace, trial by jury, habeas corpus, and a national legislature, all of which it was known he would then yield, to go home, and let these works on the amelioration of the condition of the people, until they should have rendered the probable rights of man incapable of failure to arise for communicating to them more. This was as much as I then thought them able to bear soberly and usefully for themselves. You thought otherwise, and that the dose might still be larger. And I forecast you, no doubt, that they would prove equal to the constitution of 1791. Unfortunately, some of the most honest and enlightened of our patriotic friends (but closet politicians merely, unpracticed in the knowledge of man), thought more could still be obtained and borne. When you weigh the hazards of a transition from one form of government to another, the value of what they had already rescued from those hazards, and might hold in security if they pleased, nor the imprudence of giving up the certainty of such degrees of liberty under a limited monarchy, for the uncertainty of a little more under the form of a republic. You differed from them. You were for stopping there and for securing the constitution which the National Assembly had obtained. Here, too, you were right; and from this fatal error of their separation from yourself and the constitutionalists, in their councils, flowed all the subsequent sufferings and crimes of the French nation. The hazards of a second change fell upon them the way. The foreigner gained time to anarchy as gold; the government, he could not overthrew by arms, to crush in their own councils the genuine republicans, by the fraternal embraces of exaggerated and hired pretenders, and to turn the machine of Jacobinism from the change to the direction of order; and, in the end, the limited monarchy they had secured was exchanged for the unprincipled and bloody tyranny of Robespierre, and the equally unprincipled and maniac tyranny of Bonaparte. You are now rid of him, as I since liberty under a limited monarchy. But this may depend on the wisdom and moderation of the restored dynasty. It is for them now to read a lesson in the fatal errors of the republicans; to be contented with a certain portion of power, secured by a formal compact with the nation, in which they have an interest in hazard all upon uncertainty, and risk meeting the fate of their predecessor, or a renewal of their own exile.—To MARQUIS Lafayette. vi, 421. FORD ED. IX, 505. (M. Feb. 1815.)

7518. I had no apprehension that the tempest, of which I saw the beginning was to spread over such an extent of space and time.—To COMTE DIODATI. v, 62. (W., 1807.)

in.—I was intimate with the leading characters of the year 1789. So I was with those of the Brissotine party who succeeded them; and have always been persuaded that their views were upright. Those who have followed them have been less known to fame. —To M. de Mounier. Ford Ed., vii. 13. (M. 1795.)

7520. When I left France at the close of '89, your revolution was, as I thought, under the direction of able and honest men. But the madness of some of their successors, the vices of others, the malicious intrigues of an envious and corrupting neighbor, the tracasserie of the Directory, the usurpations, the havoc, and devastations of your Attila, and the equal usurpations, depredations and oppressions of your hypocritical deliverers, will form a mournful period in the history of man, a period of which the last chapter will not be seen in your day or mine, and one which I still fear is to be written in characters of blood. Had Bonaparte reflected that such is the moral construction of the world, that no national crime passes unpunished in the long run, he would not now live with a case of Léna; and were your oppressors to reflect on the same truth, they would spare to their own countries the penalties on their present wrongs which will be inflicted on them in future times. The seeds of hatred and revenge which they are now sowing with a large hand, will not fail to produce their fruits in time. Like their brother robbers on the highway, they suppose the escape of the moment a final escape, and deem infamy and future risk counterbalanced by present gain.—To M. de Marbois. vii. 76. (M. 1817.)

7521. Revolution (French), Lettres de cachet.—Though they see the evil of lettres de cachet, they believe they do more good on the whole. They will think better in time. —To Dr. Currie. ii. 544. (P. 1788.)

7522. Revolution (French), Liberty and.—The liberty of the whole earth was depending on the issue of the contest, and was either to be gained by the good cause or be crushed by the worst. —To William Short. iii. 502. Ford Ed., vi. 154. (Pa. 1793.)

—Revolution (French), Marie Antoinette.—See Marie Antoinette.

7523. Revolution (French), Ministerial reforms.—I hope the internal affairs of this country will be finally arranged without having cost a drop of blood. Looking on as a bystander, no otherwise interested, than as entertaining a sincere love for the nation in general, and a wish to see their happiness promoted, keeping myself clear of the particular views and passions of individuals, I applaud especially the patriots who have in the last months and years, displayed their rights to the people, and of the rights which they retain to the administration, in history.—To William Carmichael. ii. 466. (P., Aug. 1788.)

7524.—The internal good they are doing to their country makes me completely their friend.—To William Carmichael. ii. 462. (P. 1788.)

7525. Revolution (French), Monarchy and parliaments.—The struggle in France is as yet * * * between the monarchy and the parliaments. The nation is no otherwise concerned, but as both parties may be induced to let go some of its abuses, to court the public favor. The danger is that the people, deceived by a false cry of liberty, may be led to take sides with one party, or the other, the pretex for crushing them still more. —To E. Rutledge. ii. 435. Ford Ed., v. 42. (P. July 1788.)

7526.—This nation is * * * under great internal agitation. The authority of the crown on one part, and that of the parliaments on the other, are fairly at issue. Good men on both parties, but those who have raised an opposition, the object of which is to obtain a fixed and temperate constitution. There was a moment when this opposition ran so high as to endanger an appeal to arms, in which case, perhaps, it would have been crushed. The moderation of government has avoided this, and they are yielding daily one right after another. They have given them Provincial Assemblies, which will be very perfect representatives of the nation, and stand somewhat between the palace and the people. They have reformed the criminal laws, acknowledged the King cannot lay a new tax, without the consent of the States General; and they will call the States General the next year. —To Colonel Monroe. ii. 457. (P. 1788.)

7527. ——The contest here is exactly what it was in Holland: a contest between the aristocratical and monarchial government, for a monopoly of despotic power over the people. The aristocracy in Holland, seeing that their common prey was likely to escape out of their clutches, chose rather to retain its former portion, and therefore coalesced with the single head. The people remained victims. Here, I think, it will take a happier turn. The parliamentary part of the aristocracy is alone firmly united. The Noblesse and Clergy, but especially the former, are divided partly between the parliamentary and the despotic party, and partly united with the real patriots, who are endeavoring to gain for the nation what they can, both from the parliamentary and the single despotic. I think I am not mistaken in believing that the King and some of his ministers will affect this division, but surely, that they make great concessions to the people, rather than small ones to the parliament. They are, accordingly, yielding daily to the national reprimands, and will probably end in according a well-tempered constitution. —To M. de Crevecoeur. ii. 457. (P. 1788.)

7529. Revolution (French), National Assembly.—The National Assembly (for that is the name they take), having shown through every stage of these transactions a willingness to be constrained and restrained from the four corners of the kingdom and to perish with it themselves, rather than to relinquish an iota from their plan of a total change of government, are now in complete and undisputed Revolution

7530. — It is impossible to desire better dispositions towards us than prevail in the National Assembly. Our proceedings have been viewed as a model for them on every occasion; and though in the heat of debate men are generally disposed to contradict every authority urged by their opponents, ours has been treated like that of the Bible, open to explanation but not to question. I am sorry that in the moment of such a disposition, anything should come from us to check the placing them on a more footing, with the English will have no effect.—To James Madison. III. 99. FORD ED., v. 110. (P., Aug. 1789.)

7531. The difficulties which now appear threatening to my mind are those which will result from the size of the Assembly. Twelve hundred persons of any rank and of any nation assembled together, is difficult to be preserved, from tumult and confusion. But why are they to compose an assembly for which no rules of debate or proceeding have been yet established, and to consist mainly of Frenchmen, among whom there are always more historians than listeners, I confess to you I apprehend some danger.—To Mr. Shippen. II. 580. (P., March 1789.)

7532. REVOLUTION (French), National debt.—Calonne stated to * * * [the Assembly of Notables] that the annual excess of expenses beyond the revenue, when Louis XVI. came to the throne, was thirty-seven millions; and that about sixty million had been borrowed to reestablish the navy; that the American war had cost them fourteen hundred and forty millions (two hundred and fifty-six millions of dollars), and that the interest of these exceeding with other increases had added forty millions more to the annual deficit. (But a subsequent and more candid estimate made it fifty-six millions.)—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. I. 70. FORD ED., i. 97. (1821.)

7533. REVOLUTION (French), Necker recalled.—The Archbishop [of Toulouse] has been removed * * * and M. Necker called in as Directeur General de finances. To soften the shock of his dismissal, a cardinal's hat is asked for him from Rome, and his nephew promised the succession to the archbishopric of Sens. The public joy, on this change of administration, was very great indeed. The people of Paris were amusing themselves with talking and burning the Archbishop in effigy, and rejoicing on the appointment of M. Necker. The commanding officer of the city guards undertook to forbid this, and not being obeyed, he charged the mob with fixed bayonets, killed two or three, and wounded many. This stopped their rejoicings for that day; but enraged at being thus obstructed in amusements wherein they had committed no disorder whatever, they collected in large numbers the next day, attacked the guards in various places, burned ten or twelve guard houses, killed two or three of the guards, and had about six or eight of their own number killed. The city was, hereupon, put under martial law, and after a while, the tumult subsided, and peace was restored.—To John Jay. II. 471. (P. Sept. 1788.)

7535. REVOLUTION (French), Notables called.—The King has called an Assemblee des Notables. This has not been done for one hundred and sixty years past. Of course it calls all the attention of the people. The objects of this Assembly are not named. Several are projected, viz., Protestation against persecution; removing all the internal customs houses to the frontier; equalizing the gabelles on salt through the kingdom; the sale of the King's domains to raise money; or, finally, the effecting this necessary end by some other means, and talked of nothing is known about it. This government practices secrecy so systematically, that it never publishes its purposes or its proceedings sooner or more extensively than is necessary.—To John Jay. II. 91. (P. 1787.)

7536. The Assemblee des Notables met yesterday [Feb. 22]. The King, in a short but affectionate speech, informed them of his wish to consult with them on the plans that had been formed by himself and his ministers, and how he could contribute to the good of his people, and his desire to imitate the head of his family, Henry IV., whose memory is so dear to the nation. The Garde des Sceaux then spoke about twenty minutes, chiefly in compliment to the orders present. The Controller General, in a speech of about an hour, opened the budget, and enlarged on the several subjects which will be under their deliberation, * * * and the institution of Provincial Assemblies. The Assemblee was then divided into committees, with a prince of the blood at the head of each.—To John Jay. II. 129. (P. 1787.)

7538. — The Assemblee des Notables has been productive of much good. The reformation of some of the most oppressive laws has taken place, and is taking place. The allotment of the State into subordinate governments, the administration of which is committed to persons chosen by the people, will work in time a very beneficial change in their constitution. The expense of the trappings of monarchy, too, is lightening. Many

7539. REVOLUTION (French), Principles of.—I continue eternally attached to the principles of your [the French] Revolution. I hope it will end in the establishment of some firm government, friendly to liberty, and capable some day of overflowing three-fourths of the kingdom. They would be the only law for themselves, and partly an executive council to the Intendant, to whom the executive power, in his province, had been, heretofore, entirely delegated. Chosen by the people, they would prevent the extortion of laws, having a right of representation to the King, they would censure bad laws, suggest good ones, expose abuses, and their representations, when united, would command respect. To the other advantages might be added the precedent itself of calling the Assemblée des Notables, which would perhaps grow into habit. The hope was that the improvements thus promised would be carried into effect; that they would be maintained during the present [Louis XVI.] reign, and that that would be long enough for them to take some root in the constitution, so that they might come to be considered as a part of that, and be protected by time, and the attachment of the nation.—Autobiography. i. 71. Ford Ed., i. 98. (1821.)

7541. REVOLUTION (French), Reform and.—If the people do not obtain now so much as they have a right to, they will in the long run. The misfortune is that they are not yet richly in the broad right to what they are entitled. I doubt, for instance, whether the body of the nation, if they could be consulted, would accept of a habeas corpus law, if offered them by the King.—To James Madison. ii. 506. Ford Ed., v. 53. (P. Nov. 1788.)

7542. REVOLUTION (French), Riots.—We have had in Paris a very considerable riot, in which about one hundred people have been probably killed. It was the most unprompted, and is therefore, justly, the most unpitéed catastrophe of that kind I ever knew. Nor did the wretches know what they wanted, except to do mischief. It seems to have had no particular connection with the great national question now in agitation.—To William Carmichael. iii. 22. (P. May 1789.)

7544. They were the most abandoned banditti of Paris, and never was a riot more wantonly provoked and unpitied. They began, under a pretense that the manufacturer had proposed in an assembly to take their wages to fifteen sous a day. They rifled his house, destroyed everything in his magazine and shops, and were only stopped in their career of mischief by the troops, engaging in regular action with them and killing probably one hundred of them. Neither this nor any of the other riots has had a professed connection with the great national reformation now in progress. They are such as have happened every year since I have been here, and will continue to be produced by common incidents.—To John Jay. iii. 26. (P. May 1780.)

7545. REVOLUTION (French), States General.—The States General were opened on the 5th of May, 1789, by speeches from the King, the Gardé des Sceaux, Lamoignon, and M. Necker. The last was thought to trip too lightly over the constitutional reformations which were expected. His notices of them in this speech was not gambling, as in his former "Rapport au Roi." This was observed to his disadvantage; but much allowance should have been made for the situation in which he was placed, between his own counsels, and those of the ministers and party of the Count. He ruled in his own opinions, compelled to deliver, and to gloss over those of his opponents, and even to keep their secrets, he could not come forward in his own attitude. The composition of the Assemblée, although equivalent on the whole to what had been expected, was something different in its elements. It had been supposed, that a superior education would carry into the scale of the Commons a respectable portion of the Noblesse. It did so as to those of Paris, of its vicinity and of the other considerable cities, whose greater intercourse with enlightened society had liberalized their minds, and prepared them to advance up to the measure of the times. But the Noblesse of the country, which constituted two-thirds of that body, were the more familiar to the peasantry, who are situated on the edge of public liberties, and were more akin to those of the Tiers État. Among the Clergy, on the other hand, it had been apprehended that the higher orders of the hierarchy, by their wealth and connections, would have carried the elections generally; but it proved that in most cases the lower clergy had obtained their peculiar majorities. These consisted of the curés, sons of the peasantry, who had been employed to do all the drudgery of parochial services for ten, twenty, or thirty Louis a year; while their superiors were consuming their princely revenues in palaces of luxury and indolent ease. The objects for which this body was convened, being of the first order of importance, I felt it very interesting to understand the views of the parties of which it was composed, and especially the ideas prevalent as to the organization. I was, therefore, daily, from Paris to Versailles, and attended their debates, generally till the hour of adjournment. Those of the Noblesse were impassioned and tempestuous. They had some attacks on both sides, and actuated by equal zeal. The debates of the Commons were temperate, rational, and inflexibly firm. As preliminary to all other business, the awful questions came on, Shall the States sit in one, or in distinct apartments? And shall the heads of the houses be inviolable? This proposition was soon found to consist of the Episcopal order among the clergy, and two-thirds of the Noblesse; while the Tiers État were to a man united and determined. After various propositions of compromise had failed, the Commons undertook to cut the Gordian Knot. The Abbé Sieyes, the most logical head of the nation (author of the pamphlet "Ouest ce que le Tiers État?" which had electrified that country, as Paine's "Common Sense" did the U. S.) after an impassioned speech, was placed at the head of the latter, and the proposition that a last invitation should be sent to the Noblesse and Clergy, to attend in the hall of the States, collectively or individually, for the verification of powers, to which the Commons would proceed immediately, either in their presence or absence. This verification being finished, a motion was made, on the 15th. that they should constitute themselves a National Assembly; which was decided on the 17th, by a majority of four-fifths. During the debates on this question, abounded pneumonitis, and one proposition was made in the chamber of the Clergy that their whole body should join them. This was rejected at first by a small majority only; but, being afterwards somewhat modified, it was decided affirmatively, by a majority of own accord. While this was under debate and unknown to the court, to wit, on the 10th, a council was held in the afternoon at Marly, wherein it was proposed that the King should interpose by a declaration of his sentiments, in a séance royale. A form of declaration was proposed by Necker, which, while it censured in general the proceedings both of the Nobles and Commons, announced the King's views, such as substantially to coincide with the Commons. It was agreed to, and the meeting was fixed for the 22d, the meetings of the States were till then to be suspended, and everything, in the meantime, kept secret. The members, the next morning (20th), repairing to their house, as usual, found the doors shut and guarded, a proclamation reading the Séance royale of the 22d, and a suspension of their meetings in the meantime. Concluding that their dissolution was now to take place, they repaired to a building called the "Jean de paume" (or Tennis, court) surrounded by favourable notes by each other, never to separate of their own accord, till they had settled a constitution for the nation, on a solid basis, and, if separated by force, that they would reassemble in some other place. The next day they met in the church of St. Louis, and were joined by a majority of the clergy.—_Autobiography._ i. 90. FORD ED., i. 125. (P. 221.)

7546. Viewng it as an opera, it was imposing.—_To William Carmichael. Ford ed., i. 72. (P. May 1789.)

7547. I was present at that august ceremony. Had it been enlightened with lamps and chandeliers, it would have been almost as brilliant as the opera.—_To M. de CREVECOEUR._ iii. 43. (P. 1789.)

7548. I see great difficulty in preventing twelve hundred people from becoming a mob. _To William Carmichael._ FORD ED., v. 73. (P. Mar. 1789.)

7549. Should confusion * * * be prevented, I suppose the States General, with the consent of the King, will establish some of the leading features of a good constitution.—_To William Carmichael._ FORD ED., v. 9. (P. Mar. 1789.)

7550. REVOLUTION (French). Sympathy with.—I still hope the French Revolution will issue happily. I feel that the permanence of our own leanings in some degree on that, and that a failure there would be a powerful argument to prove that there must be a failure here.—_To Edward Rutledge._ iii. 285. FORD ED., v. 377. (Pa. 1791.)

7551. The success of the French Revolution will ensure the progress of liberty in Europe, and its preservation here. The failure of it will have so powerful an effect of argument with those who wish to introduce a king, lords, and commons here, a sect which is all head and no body._—To EDMUND PENLETON._ FORD ED., v. 358. (Pa. 1791.)

7552. I am looking ardentely to the completion of the glorious work in which France is engaged. I view the general condition of Europe as hanging on the success or failure of France. Having set such an example of philosophical arrangement within, I hope it will be extended without your limits also, to your dependents and to your friends in every part of the earth._To Marquis de Condorcet._ FORD ED., v. 379. (Pa. 1791.)

7553. I was a sincere well-wisher to the success of the French Revolution, and still wish it may end in the establishment of a free and well-ordered republic._—To ELBRIDGE GERRY._ iv. 269. FORD ED., vii. 329. (Pa. 1799.)

7554. I have expressed to you my sentiments, because they are really those of ninety-nine in an hundred of our citizens. The universal feasts and rejoicings, which have lately been had on account of the successes of the French, showed the genuine effusions of their heart._To William Short._ iii. 502. FORD ED., vi. 154. (Pa. Jan. 1793.)

7555. The event of the French Revolution is now little doubted of; even by its enemies. The sensations it has produced here, and the indications of them in the public papers, have shown that the form our own government was to take depended much more on the events of France than anybody had before imagined. The tide which, after our former relaxed government, took a violent course towards the opposite extreme, and seemed ready to hang everything round with the tassels and baubles... of monarchy, is now getting back as we hope to a just mean, a government of laws addressed to the reason of the people, and not to their weaknesses.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. III, 504. FORD ED., VI, 157. (Pa., Jan. 1793.)

7556. RHODE ISLAND, Adoption of Constitution.—What do you propose to do with Rhode Island [on the question of the new Federal Constitution]? As long as there is hope, we should give her time. I cannot conceive but that she will come to rights in the long run. Force, in whatever form, would be a dangerous precedent.—To E. CARRINGTON. II, 405. FORD ED., V, 21. (P., 1788.)

7557. The little vautien, Rhode Island, will come over [to the new Constitution] with a little time.—To M. De LAPEYRE. III, 132. FORD ED., V, 152. (N.Y., 1790.)

7559. RHODE ISLAND, Characteristics of.—How happens it that Rhode Island is opposed to every useful proposition? Her geography accounts for it, with the aid of one or two observations. The cultivators of the earth are the most virtuous citizens, and possess now the whole. The Mercury, not my least virtuous, and possess the least of the amor patria. The latter reside principally in the seaboard towns, the former in the interior country. Now, it happened that of the territory constituting Rhode Island and Connecticut passing the whole of the United States, was erected into a State by itself, called Rhode Island, and that containing the interior country was erected into another State called Connecticut. For though it has a little seacoast, there are no good ports in it. Hence it happens that there is scarcely one merchant in the whole State of Connecticut, while there is not a single man in Rhode Island who is not a merchant of some sort. Their whole territory is but a thousand square miles, and what of that is in use is laid out in grass farms almost entirely. Hence they have scarcely anybody employed in agriculture. All exercise some species of commerce. This circumstance has decided the character of these two States. The remedies to this evil are hazardous. One would be to consolidate the two States into one. Another would be to banish Rhode Island from the Union. A third, to compel her submission to the will of the other twelve. A fourth, for the other twelve to govern themselves according to their own dispositions. The latter, it is to say, are very unripe. Rhode Island is now to go on by herself according to the ancient articles. But the dangers and difficulties attending all these remedies are obvious.—ANSWERS TO M. DE MEUNIER. IX, 288. FORD ED., IV, 143. (P., 1786.)

7560. RHODE ISLAND, College of.—I was honored in the month of January last with a letter from the corporation of Rhode Island College to his most Christian Majesty [Louis XVI.] * * * I turned my attention to that object which was the establishment of a professorship of the French language in the college, and the obtaining a collection of the best French authors with the aid of the king. I have the satisfaction of informing you that the collection might be compromised uselessly, I thought it necessary to sound previously those who were able to inform me what would be the success of the application. I was assured so that as to leave no doubt, that it would not be complied with; that there had never been an instance of the king's granting such a demand in a foreign country, and that they would be cautious of setting the precedent; that in this moment, too, they were embarrassed by the difficult operation of putting down all establishments of their own, which could possibly be dispensed with, in order to bring their expenditures down to the level of their receipts. Upon such information I was satisfied, that it was most prudent not to deliver the letter. * * * The President of the two colleges in America copies of the works printed in the public press, * * * of no consequence. * * No endeavors of mine should have been spared, could they have effected their wish.—To RHODE ISLAND DELEGATES. II, 184. (P., 1787.)

7561. RHODE ISLAND, Regeneration of.—A new subject of congratulation has arisen. I mean the regeneration of Rhode Island. I hope it is the beginning of that resurrection of the genuine spirit of New England which arises for life eternal. According to natural order, Vermont will emerge next, because last, after Rhode Island, under the yoke of hierarchy. To GIDEON GRANGER. IV, 395. FORD ED., VIII, 48. (V., 1801.)

7562. RICE, African.—I was fortunate in receiving from the coast of Africa last fall a cask of mountain rice. This I have dispersed into many hands, having sent the mass of it to South Carolina.—To BENJAMIN VAUGHN. FORD ED., V, 332. (Pa., 1791.)

7563. — — — In 1790, I got a cask of heavy upland rice, from the river Denbigh, in Africa, about lat. 30° 30' North, which I sent to Charleston, in hopes it might supersede the culture of the white rice, which renders South Carolina and Georgia so pestilential through the summer.—JEFFERSON'S MSS. I, 176. (M., 1821.)

7564. RICE, Chinese.—In Asia they have several distinct species of this grain. Monsieur Poivre, a former governor of the Isle of France, in travelling through several countries of Asia, observed with particular attention the objects of their agriculture. In China they cultivate six several kinds of rice, which he describes, three of them requiring water, and three growing on highlands. The rice of Carolina is said to come from Madagascar, and De Poivre tells us, it is the white rice which is cultivated there. This favors the probability of its being of a different species originally, from that of Piedmont; and time, culture, and climate may have made it still more different. Under this idea I thought it would be well to write to Mr. GURLAND, at Piedmont, for some rice, husked, but was told it was contrary to the laws to export it in that form. I took such measures as I could, however, to have a quantity brought out, and lest these should fail, I brought myself a few pounds. A part of this I have addressed to you by way of London; a part comes with this letter; and I shall send another parcel by some other conveyance to prevent the danger of miscarriage. Any one of them arriving safe may serve to put in seed. I would the socia—The third.—To WILLIAM DRAYTON. II, 196. (P., 1787.)

7565. — — — The dry rice of Cochín has the reputation of being the whitest to the eye, best flavored to the taste, and most productive. It seems, then, to unite the good qualities of both the others known to us. Could it supplant them, it would be a great happiness, as it would enable us to get rid of those ponds of stagnant water, so fatal to human health and life. But such is the force of habit, and caprice of taste, that six hundred miles would not be sure to forward it would produce this effect. The experiment, however, is worth trying, should it only end in producing a third quality, and increasing the demand. I will endeavor to procure some to be brought from Cochin-China.—To William Drayton. ii. 197. (P., 1787.)

7566. I have considerable hopes of receiving some dry rice from Cochin-China, the young prince of that country lately gone hence [Paris], having undertaken that it shall come to this. These are all but experimental. The precept of cleaning, which directs us to try all things, and hold fast that which is good.—To William Drayton. i. 347. (P., 1788.)

7567. RICE, Egyptian.—I have forwarded to you two couffes of rough rice, which I had brought from Egypt. I wish both may arrive in time for the approaching seed time, and that the trials with this and the Piedmont rice may furnish new advantages to your agriculture.—To William Drayton. ii. 347. (P., 1788.)

7568. RICE, Italian.—I wished particularly to know whether it was the use of a different machine for cleaning, which brought the European rice to market less broken than ours, as had been represented to me by those who deal in that article in Paris. I found several persons who had passed through the rice country of Italy, but not one who could explain to me of the mystery. But I have been given to believe that I might see it myself immediately on entering Piedmont. I determined to go and ascertain this point, as the chance only of placing our rice above all rivalship in quality, as it is in color, by the introduction of a better machine, if a better existing. I found the rice country to be in truth Lombardy, and that though called Piedmont rice, not a grain is made in the country of Piedmont. I passed through the rice fields of the Venellese and Milanese. I found that the machine is absolutely the same as ours. It is a difference in the species of grain, of which the government of Turin is so sensible, that, as I was informed, they prohibited the exportation of rough rice on pain of death. I have taken measures, however, which I think will not fail for obtaining a quantity of it, and I bought on the spot a small parcel. I propose to send the rice to the society at Charleston for promoting agriculture, supposing that they will be best able to try the experiment of cultivating the rice of this quality, and to communicate the species to South Carolina and Georgia, if they find it answer.—To John Jay. ii. 138. Ford Ed., iv. 377. (Mar. 1787.)

7569. I had expected to satisfy myself at Marseilles, of the cause of the difference between the rice of Carolina, and that of Piedmont, which I had brought in small quantities to Marseilles. Not being able to do it, I made an excursion of three weeks into the rice country beyond the Alps, going through it from Venice to Pavia about sixty miles. I found the difference to be not in the management, as had been supposed both here and in Carolina, but in the species of rice; and I hope to enable them in Carolina to begin the cultivation of the Piedmont rice, and carry it on, hand in hand, with their own, that they may supply both qualities; which is absolutely necessary at this market.—To John Adams. ii. 162. Ford Ed., iv. 396. (P., 1787.)

7570. At Marseilles I hoped to learn what the Piedmont machine was, but I could find nobody who knew anything about it. I determined, therefore, to sift the matter to the bottom, by crossing the Alps into the rice country. I found their machine exactly such a one as you had described to me in Congress in the year 1775. There was but one conclusion, that there must be drawn that the Carolina rice was of a different species, and I determined to take enough to put you in seed. They informed me, however, that its exportation in the husk was prohibited, so I could only bring off a portion of it under a coat of paper. I took measures with a muleteer to run a couple of sacks across the Apennines to Genoa, but have not great dependence on its success. The little, therefore, which I brought must be relied on for fear we should not see them, and because I was brought from Vercelli, where the best is made of all the Sardinian Lombardy, the whole of which is considered as producing a better rice than the Milanese. This is assigned as the reason for the strict prohibition. To E. Rundle. ii. 178. Ford Ed., iv. 407. (P., 1787.)

7571. Having observed that the consumption of rice in this country [France], and particularly in this capital [Paris], was very great, I thought it my duty to inform myself from what markets they draw their supplies. I found that the dealers in Paris were in the habit of selling two qualities of rice, that of Carolina, with the husks, and that of Piedmont; that the Carolina rice was long, slender, white and transparent, answers well when prepared with milk, sugar, &c., but not so well when prepared au gras; that the rice of Piedmont was shorter, thicker, and less white; but that it presented its form better when dressed au gras, was better tasted, and, therefore, preferred by good judges for those purposes. The dealers supposed that the difference of quality proceeded from a difference of management; that the Carolina rice was husked with an instrument that broke it more, and that less pains were taken to separate the broken from the unbroken grains, imagining that it was the broken grains which dissolved in oil, and therefore objection to the Carolina rice, then, being that it crumbles in certain forms of preparation, and this supposed to be the effect of a less perfect machine for husking, I flattered myself I should be able to learn what might be the machine of Piedmont, when I should arrive at Marseilles. At Marseilles, however, they differed as much in account of the machines, as at Paris they had differed about other circumstances. Some said it was husked between mill-stones, others rubbed of wood in the form of mill-stones, others of cork. They were all in fact, however, that the machine might be seen by me immediately on crossing the Alps. This would be an affair of three weeks. I crossed them and went through the rice country from Vercelli into the plain above sixty miles. I found the machine to be absolutely the same with that used in Carolina. In some of them, indeed, they arm each pestle with an iron tooth, consisting of nine spikes hooked together. I do not remember in the description of the machines of Mr. Rutledge I therefore, had a tooth made, which I forward you; observing, at the same time, that as many of their machines are without teeth as with them, and of course, that the advantage is not very palpable. It seems to follow, then, that the rice of Lombardy (for though called Piedmont rice, it does not grow in that country, but in Lombardy) is of a different origin from that of Carolina; different in form, in color and in quality.—To William Drayton. ii. 194. (P., 1787.)

7572. RICE, Smuggling.—Poggio, a muleteer who passes every week between Ver- celli and Genoa, will smuggle a sack of rough rice for me to Genoa; it being death to export it in that form.—Travel in Italy. ix. 338. (1789.)

7574. RICE, Upland vs. Swamp.—I first became informed of the existence of a rice which would grow in uplands without any more water than the common rains, by reading a letter from Mr. M. de Poggi, who was Governor of the Isle of France, who mentions it as growing there and all along the coast of Africa successfully, and as having been introduced from Cochin-China. I was at that time (1784-85) in France, and there happening to see there a Prince of Cochin-China, on his travels, and then returning home, I obtained his promise to send me some. I never received it, however, and mention it only as it may have been sent, and furnished the ground for the inquiries of Dr. De Carro, and my return to Cochin-China. When at Havre on my return from France, I found there Captain Nathaniel Cutting, who was the ensuing spring to go on a voyage along the coast of Africa. I engaged him to enquire for this rice. He procured and sent me a thirty gallon cask of it. I divided it between the Agricultural Society of Charleston and some private gentlemen of Georgia, recommending it to their care, in the hope which had induced me to endeavor to obtain it. It was answered as well as I could expect during the swamp rice, it might rid them of that source of their summer diseases. Nothing came of the trials in South Carolina, but being carried into the upper hilly parts of Georgia, it succeeded there perfectly, has spread over the country, and is now commercial. It will, however, for family use chiefly, as they cannot make it for sale in competition with the rice of the swamps.—To Dr. Benjamin Waterhouse. v. 393. (W., 1808.)

7575. RICHMOND (Va.), Capture of.—Is the surprise of an open and unarmored place, although called a city, and even a capital, so unprecedented as to be a matter of indelible remark? What was it answered as well as I could expect during the same war, was not in possession of the same enemy, not merely by surprise and for a day only, but permanently? That of Georgia? Of South Carolina? North Carolina? Pennsylvania? New York? Rhode Island? Massachusetts? And if others were not, it was because the enemy saw no object in taking possession of them. Add to the list in the late war (1812) Washington, the metropolis of the Union, covered by a fort, with troops and a garrison placed upon the continent of Europe (St. Petersburg and its regions of ice excented), did not Bonaparte take and hold at his pleasure? Is it then just that Richmond and its authorities alone should be placed under the reproach of history, because, in a moment of peculiar denudation of resources, by the coup de main of an enemy, led on by the hand of fortune directing the winds and weather to their wishes, it was surprised and held for a whmis-generated? I think, were that enemy with such advantages, should be enabled, then, to get off, without risking the honors he had achieved by burnings and destruc tions of property peculiar to his principles of warfare? We at least, may leave these glories to their own trumpet.—T. H. Lee. vii, 447. Ford ed., x, 388. (M., 1826.)

7576. RICHMOND (Va.), Street architecture.—There is one street in Richmond (from the bridge straight on towards Curries) which would be considered as handsomely built in any city of Europe.—To William Short. Ford ed., v, 137. (1789.)

7577. RIDICULE, Reason and.—Resort is had to ridicule only when reason is against us.—To President Madison. vi, 112. Ford ed., ix, 382. (M., 1813.)

7578. RIDICULE, Reformation and.—The most remarkable effect as yet of the con tention of the Notables is the number of puns and bon mots; and I pronounce that a good punner would disarm the whole nation were they ever so seriously disposed to revolt. Indeed, they are gone, and a measure so capable of doing good, as the calling the Notables, is treated with so much ridicule, we may conclude the nation desperate, and in charity pray that heaven may send them good kings.—To Mrs. John Adams. Ford ed., iv, 370. (P., 1787.)

7579. RIEDESEL (Baron), Jefferson and.—I thank you for your kind congratula tions; though could I wish would be better directed to the government, not only on account of the labors of the office [Governorship] to which I am called, and its withdrawing me from retirement, but also the loss of the agreeable society I have left of which Madame Riedesel and myself were so attached. 7589. RIGHTS, Advancing.—Circumstances sometimes require, that rights the most unquestionable should be advanced with delicacy.—To William Short. iii, 275. Ford ed., v, 304. (Pa., 1791.)

7590. RIGHTS, Aggression on.—No man has a natural right to commit aggression on the equal rights of another; and this is all from which the laws ought to restrain him.—To F. W. Gilmer. vii, 3. Ford ed., x, 32. (M., 1816.)

7591. RIGHTS, Aristocratic encroachments on.—Hereditary bodies * * * always existing, always on the watch for their own aggrandizement, profit of every opportunity of advancing the privileges of their order, and encroaching on the rights of the people.—To M. Coray. vii, 319. (M., 1823.)

7593. RIGHTS, Availability of.—It is a principle that the right to a thing gives a right to the means without which it could not be used, that is to say, that the means follow their end.—Mississippi River Instructions. vii, 579. (1791.)

7594. RIGHTS, Defence of.—We will ever be ready to join with our fellow-subjects in every part of the British empire, in executing all those rightful powers which God has given us, for the reestablishment and guaranteeing their constitutional rights, when, where, and by whomsoever invaded.*—Resolutions of Albemarle County. Ford ed., i, 419. (July 26, 1774.)

7595. RIGHTS, Deprivation of.—The proscribing any citizen as unworthy the public confidence, by laying upon him an incapacity of being called to offices of trust or emolument, unless he profess or renounce this or that religious opinion, is depriving him injudiciously of those privileges and advantages to which, in common with his fellow citizens, he has a natural right.—Statute of Religious Freedom. Ford ed., ii, 238. (1779.)

7596. RIGHTS, Education and.—For promoting the public happiness, those persons, whom nature has endowed with genius and virtue, should be rendered by liberal education worthy to receive, and able to guard the sacred deposit of the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens; and they should be called to that charge without regard to wealth, birth or other accidental condition of circumstance.—Diffusion of Knowledge Bill. 7597. RIGHTS, Establishing.—It can never be too often repeated, that the time for fixing every essential right on a legal basis is while our rulers are honest, and ourselves united.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 402. Ford ed., iii, 266. (1782.)

7598. RIGHTS, Fortifying popular.—I am particularly happy to perceive that you still manfully maintain our good old principle of cherishing and fortifying the rights and authorities of the people in opposition to those who fear them, who wish to take all power from them, and to transfer all to Washington.—To Nathaniel Macon. Ford ed., x, 378. (M., 1826.)

7599. RIGHTS, Inalienable.—We hold these truths to be self-evident that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with inherent and inalienable rights; that among these, are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.—Declaration of Independence as Drawn by Jefferson.

7603. RIGHTS, Money and. — Courtiers had rather give up power than pleasure. They will barter, therefore, the usurped prerogatives of the King for the money of the people. This is the agent by which modern nations will recover their rights.—To Comte de Moustier. ii, 389. Ford ed., v, 12. (P., 1788.)

— RIGHTS, Natural. — See Natural Rights.

7604. RIGHTS, The people and. — The people, especially when moderately instructed, are the only safe, because the only honest, depositaries of the public rights, and should therefore, be introduced into the administration of them in every function to which they are sufficient; they will err sometimes and accidentally, but never designedly, and with a systematic and persevering purpose of overthrowing the free principles of the government.—To M. Coray. vii, 319. (M., 1823.)

7609. RIGHTS, Reserved.—It had become an universal and almost uncontroverted position in the several States, that the purposes of society do not require a surrender of all our rights to our ordinary governors; that there are certain portions of right not necessary to enable them to carry on an effective government, and which experience has nevertheless proved they will be constantly encroaching on, if submitted to them; that there are also certain fences which experience has proved peculiarly efficacious against wrong, and rarely obstructive of right, which yet the governing powers have ever shown a disposition to weaken and remove. Of the first kind, for instance, is freedom of religion; of the second, trial by jury, habeas corpus laws, free presses. These were the settled opinions of all the States,—of that of Virginia, of which I was writing [in the Notes on Virginia], as well as of the others. The others had, in consequence, delineated these unceded portions of right, and these fences, against wrong, which they meant to exempt from the power of their governors, in instruments called declarations of rights and constitutions; and as they did this by conventions, which they appointed for the express purpose of respecting those rights, and of delegating others to their ordinary legislative, executive and judiciary bodies, none of the reserved rights can be touched without resorting to the people to appoint another convention for the express purpose of permitting it. Where the constitutions, then, have been so formed by conventions, named for this express purpose, they are fixed and unalterable but by a convention or other body to be specially authorized; and they have been so formed by I believe, all the States, except Virginia. That State concurs in all these opinions, but has run into the wonderful error that her constitution, though made by the ordinary legislature, cannot yet be altered by the ordinary legislature.—To Noah Webster. iii, 201. Ford ed., v, 254. (Pa., 1790.)

7613. RIGHTS, Suppression of. — It is impossible the world should continue long in-

7617. RIGHTS, Usurpation of. — The royal claim to wrecks, waifs, strays, treasure-trove, royal mines, royal fish, royal birds, are declared to have been usurpations on common right. — Proposed Va. Constitution. Ford ed., ii, 28. (June 1776.)

7618. RIGHTS OF MAN, Appeal to. — The appeal to the rights of man, which had been made in the United States, was taken up by France, first of the European nations. From her, the spirit has spread over those of the South. The tyrants of the North have allied indeed against it; but it is irresistible. Their opposition will only multiply its millions of human victims; their own satellites will catch it, and the condition of man through the civilized world will be finally and greatly ameliorated. This is a wonderful instance of great events from small causes. So inscrutable is the arrangement of causes and consequences in this world, that a two-penny duty on tea, unjustly imposed in a sequestered part of it, changes the condition of all its inhabitants. — Autobiography. i, 106. Ford ed., i, 147. (1821.)

7621. RIGHTS OF MAN, Equal. — The equal rights of man, and the happiness of every individual, are now acknowledged to be the only legitimate objects of government. Modern times have discovered the only device by which these rights can be secured, to wit: government by the people, acting not in person, but by representatives chosen by themselves, that is to say, by every man of ripe years and sound mind, who contributes either by his purse or person to the support of his country. —To M. Coray. vii, 319. (M., 1823.)

7622. RIGHTS OF MAN, Government and. — No interests are dearer to men than those which ought to be secured to them by their form of government, and none deserve better of them than those who contribute to the amelioration of that form. —To M. Ruelle. v, 430. (W., 1809.)

7623. RIGHTS OF MAN, Immortal. — Although the horrors of the French Revolution have damped for awhile the ardor of the patriots in every country, yet it is not extinguished — it will never die. The sense of right has been excited in every breast, and the spark will be rekindled by the very oppressions of that detestable tyranny employed to quench it. The errors of the honest patriots of France, and the crimes of her Dantons and Robespierres, will be forgotten in the more encouraging contemplation of our sober example, and steady march to our object. —To Benjamin Galloway. vi, 41. (M., 1812.)

7624. RIGHTS OF MAN, Immutable. — Nothing is unchangeable but the inherent and inalienable rights of man. —To John Cartwright. vii, 359. (M., 1824.)

7625. RIGHTS OF MAN, Legal. — The laws of the land are the inheritance and the right of every man before whatever tribunal he is brought. — Notes on Stevens Case. ix, 475. (1804.)

7626. RIGHTS OF MAN, Legislators and. — Our legislators are not sufficiently apprized of the rightful limits of their power; that their true office is to declare and enforce only our natural rights and duties, and to take none of them from us. —To F. W. Gilmer. vii, 3. Ford ed., x, 32. (M., 1816.)

7628. RIGHTS OF MAN, Recognition of. — All eyes are opened, or opening, to the rights of man. The general spread of the light of science has already laid open to every view the palpable truth, that the mass of mankind has not been born with saddles on their backs, nor a favored few booted and spurred, ready to ride them legitimately, by

7638. RIVER, James.—James River itself affords a harbor for vessels of any size in Hamilton Road, but not 'n safety through the whole winter. * * * In some future state of population, I think it possible, that its navigation may also be made to interlock with that of the Potomac, and through that to communicate by a short portage with the Ohio.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 251. FORD ED., iii, 89. (1782.)

7639. RIVER, Kanawha.—The Great Kanawha is a river of considerable note for the fertility of its lands, and still more, as leading towards the head waters of James river. Nevertheless it is doubtful whether its great and numerous rapids will admit a navigation, but at an expense to which it will require ages to render its inhabitants equal. The great obstacles begin at what are called the great rapids, ninety miles above the mouth, below which are only five or six rapids, and these passable, with some difficulty, even at low water. * * * It is said, however, that at a very moderate expense the whole current of the upper part of the Kanawha may be turned into the South Fork of Kanawha, the Alleghany there subsiding, and the two rivers approaching so near, that a canal nine miles long, and thirty feet deep, at the deepest part would be made. The water of the Kanawha into this branch of the Western canals would be in Montgomery County, the court-house of which is on the top of the Alleghanies.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. vii, 259. FORD ED., iii, 96. (1782.)

7640. ——. The Little Kanawha  * yields a navigation of ten miles only. Perhaps its northern branch, called Juniuss's Creek, which interlocks with the Western Monongahela, may one day admit a shorter passage from the latter into the Ohio.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 259. FORD ED., iii, 97. (1782.)

7641. RIVER, Mississippi.—The Mississippi will be one of the principal channels of future commerce for the country westward of the Alleghany.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 253. FORD ED., iii, 91. (1782.)

7642. The country watered by the Mississippi and its eastern branches constitutes five-eighths of the United States, two of which five-eighths are occupied by the Ohio and its waters; the residuary streams which run into the Gulf of Mexico, the Atlantic, and the St. Lawrence, water the remaining three-eighths.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii, 261. FORD ED., iii, 98. (1782.)

7643. RIVER, Missouri.—The Missouri is, in fact, the principal river, contributing... more to the common stream than does the Mississippi, even after its junction with the Illinois. It is remarkably cold, muddy and rapid.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii. 254. FORD ED., iii, 92. (1782.)

7644. RIVER, Ohio.—The Ohio is the most beautiful river on earth. Its current gentic waters clear, and bosom smooth and unbroken by rocks and rapids, a single instance only excepted.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii. 256. FORD ED., iii, 93. (1782.)

7645. RIVER, Potomac.—The passage of the Potomac through the Blue Ridge is, perhaps, one of the most stupendous scenes in nature. You stand on the foot of a mountain, and not yet across the divide.
On your left appears the Shenandoah, having ranged along the foot of the mountain for a hundred miles to seek a vent. On your right you approach the Potomac, in quest of a passage also. In the moment of their junction, your participants, shall pass off to the sea. The first of these scenes buries our senses into the opinion, that this earth has been formed in time, that the mountains were formed first, that the rivers then flowed in reverse order in this place. Particularly, they have been dammed up by the Blue Ridge of mountains, and have formed an ocean which filled the whole valley; that continuing to rise they have at length broken over at this spot, and have torn the mountain in its summit to its base.
The piles of rock on each hand, but particularly on the Shenandoah, the evident marks of their disruption and avulsion from their beds by the most powerful agents of nature, corroborate the impression. But the distant finishing which nature has given to the picture, is of a very different character. It is a true contrast to the foreground. It is as placid and delightful as that is wild and tremendous. For the mountain being cloven asunder, she presents to your eye, through the cleft, a small catch of smooth blue horizon, at an infinite distance in the plain country, inviting you as it were, from the riot and tumult roaring around to pass through the breach and participate of the calm below. Here that eye ultimately composes itself; and that way the road happens naturally to lead. You cross the Potomac above the junction, pass along its side through the base of the mountain for three miles, its terrible precipices hanging in fragments over you, and within about twenty miles reach Frederick town, and the fine country round that. This scene is worth a voyage across the Atlantic. Yet here, as in the neighborhood of the Natural Bridge, are people who have passed their lives within half a dozen miles, and have never been to survey these monuments of a war between rivers and mountains, which must have shaken the earth itself to its centre.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. vii.
264. FORD ED., iii, 102. (1782.)

7646. RIVER, Red.—Your observations  have determined me to confine the ensuing mission to the ascent of the Red river to its source, and to descend the same river again, which will give an opportunity of better ascertaining which of the two is next to the Missouri, is the most interesting water of the Mississippi. You will accordingly receive instructions to this effect from the Secretary of War.—To Mr. DUNBAR. iv. 577. (W., May 1805.)

7647. The work we are now doing is,
I trust, done for posterity, in such a way that they need not repeat it. For this we are much indebted to you, not only for the labor and time you have devoted to it, but for the excellent method of which you have set the example, and which I hope will be the model to be followed by others. We shall delineate with correctness the great arteries of this great country. Those who come after us will extend the delineations which you have accented with them, and fill up the canvas we begin.—To Mr. DUNBAR. iv. 580. (W.,

7648. RIVER, Rhone.—Nature never formed a country of more savage aspect, than that on both sides the Rhone. A huge torrent rushes like an arrow between high precipices, often of massive rock, and other times of loose stone, with but little earth. Yet has the hand of man subdued this savage scene, by planting corn where there is little fertility, trees where there is still less, and vines where there is none.
On the whole, it assumes a romantic, picturesque, and pleasing air.—TRAVELS IN FRANCE.
ix. 320. (1787.)

7649. RIVER, St. Croix.—A difference of opinion having arisen as to the river intended by the Penipotentariats [in the treaty of peace] to be the boundary between us and the dominions of Great Britain, and by them called the St. Croix, which name, it seems, is given to two different rivers, the ascertaining of this difference becomes a matter of pre-gency. It has heretofore been the subject of application from us to the Government of Great Brita

n.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. FORD
ED., vi, 460. (Pa., Dec. 1793.)

7650. RIVER, Wabash.—The Wabash is a very beautiful river.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA.
viii. 258. FORD ED., iii, 95. (1782.)

7651. RIVERS, Exploration of.—I should be glad of a copy of any sketch or account you may have made of the river Platte of the passage from its head across the mountains, and of the river Cashecatungo, which you suppose to run into the Pacific. This would probably be among the first exploring journeys we undertake after a settlement with Spain, and as we wish to become acquain ted with all the advantageous water connections across our continent. Anthony G. BETTAY. v. 246. (W., 1808.)

7652. RIVERS, Highways of commerce.—The principal connections of the western waters with the Atlantic are three:
the Hudson River, the Potomac, and the Mississippi itself. Down the last will pass all heavy commodities. But the navigation through the Gulf of Mexico is so dangerous and perilous, that the Mississippi so difficult and tedious, that it is thought probable that Euerpean merchandise will not return through that channel. It is most likely that flour, timber, and other heavy articles will be floated on rafts, which will themselves be an article for sale as well as commodity. Steamer loading, the navigators read by land, or in light bateaux. There will, therefore, be a competition between the Hudson and Potomac rivers for the residue of the commerce of all the country westward of Lake Erie, on the waters of the Lakes, of the Ohio, and upper parts of the Mississippi.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. viii. 261. FORD ED., vi, 98. (1782.)

7653. RIVERS, Increments of.—In granting appropriations [of lands], some sov-eigns have given away the increments of riviers to a greater, some to a lesser extent, and some not at all. Rome, which was not feudal, and Spain and England which were, have granted them largely; France, a feudal country.
has not granted them, at all on navigable rivers. Louis XIV., therefore, was strictly correct when in his edict of 1693, he declared that the increments of rivers were incontestably his, as a necessary consequence of the sovereignty. This is to say that where no right exists to grant them to an individual could be produced, they remained in him, as a portion of the original lands of the nation, or as new created lands, never yet granted to any individual. They are unquestionably a national, or national right, paramount, and pre-existent to the establishment of the feudal system. That system has no fixed principle on the subject, as is evident from the opposite practices of different feudal nations. The position, therefore, is entirely unfounded, that the right to them is derived from the feudal law.—Batture case, viii, 541. (1812.)

7654. RIVERS, Obstructions in.—I think the State should reserve a right to the use of the [river] waters for navigation, and that where an individual landholder impedes that use, he shall remove that impediment, and leave the subject in as good a state as nature formed it.—To Joseph C. Cabell, vi, 541. (M., 1816.)

7656. RIVERS, Right of navigation.—The movements of the King of Prussia to emancipate the navigation of the Vistula, and of the Emperor of [Germany] to free that of the Scheld do not, I believe, threaten the peace of Europe. * * * This assertion, then, of the natural right of the inhabitants of the upper part of a river to an innocent passage through the country below is pleasing to us. It tends to establish a principle favorable to our right of navigating the Mississipp.—To Governor Benj. Harrison. Ford ed., iii, 414. (A., March 1784.)

7657. RIVERS, Velocity of.—I shall forward your ingenious paper on the subject of the Mississipp to the Philosophical Society. To prove the value I set on it, and my wish that it may go to the public without any imputation about it, I will take the liberty of submitting to your consideration the only passage which I think may require it. You say, "the velocity of rivers is greatest at the surface, and generally diminishes downwards." And this principle enters into some subsequent parts of the paper, and has too much effect on the phenomena of that river not to merit mature consideration. I can but suppose it at variance with the law of motion in rivers. In strict theory, the velocity of water at any given depth is the sum of two velocities (one at its surface) whatever a body would have acquired by falling through a space equal to that depth.—To William Dunbar. iv, 537. (W., 1804.)

7658. ROANE (Spencer), Courage of.—Against this [consolidation] I know no one who, equally with Judge Roane, so indecisively possesses the power and the courage to make resistance; and to him I look, and have long looked, as our strongest bulwark.—To Archibald Thwate, vii, 199. Ford ed., x, 184. (M., 1821.)

7659. ROANE (Spencer), Judge Marshall and.—On the decision of the case of Cohens vs. the State of Virginia, in the Supreme Court of the United States, in March, 1821, Judge Roane, under the signature of "Algernon Sidney," wrote for the Enquirer [Richmond] a series of papers on the law of that case. I considered these papers maturely as they came out, and concerted steps to appear to me to pulverize every word which had been delivered by Judge Marshall, of the extra-judicial part of his opinion.—To William Johnson, vii, 294. Ford ed., x, 229. (M., 1823.)

7660. ROBESPRIERRE, Atrocities of.—What a tremendous obstacle to the future attempts at peace will be the atrocities of Robespierre!—To Tench Coxe. Ford ed., vii, 22. (M., 1795.)

7661. ROBESPIERRE, Condemned.—Robespierre met the fate, and his memory the execution, he so justly merited. The rich were his victims, and perished by thousands.—To Madame de Staël. vi, 114. (M., May 1813.)

7662. ROCHAMBEAU (Count), Proposed bust.—Count Rochambeau has really deserved more attention than he has received. Why not set up his bust, that of Gates, Greene, Franklin, and if you have no new capital!—To James Madison. 1, 534. Ford ed., iv, 196. (F., 1786.)

7663. RODNEY (Cæsar A.), Affection for.—I avail myself of this occasion to express all the depth of my affection for you; the sense I entertain of your faithful cooperation in my late labors, and the debt I owe for the valuable aid I received from you [in the cabinet].—To Caesar A. Rodney. v, 502. Ford ed., ix, 272. (M., 1810.)

7664. RODNEY (Cæsar A.), Appeal to.—I am told you are the only person who can unite the greatest portion of the republican votes [in Delaware], and the only one, perhaps, who can procure the dismissal of your present representative [in Congress] to that obscurity of situation where his temper and principles may be disarmed of all effect. You are, then, bound to do this good office to the rest of America. You owe to your State to make her useful to her friends, instead of being an embarrassment and a burden. Her long speeches and wicked workings at this session have added at least thirty days to its length, cost us $30,000, and filled the Union with falsehoods and misrepresentations.—To Caesar A. Rodney. Ford ed., viii, 148. (W., 1802.)

7665. RODNEY (Cæsar A.), Retirement.—I lament the necessity which calls for your retirement, if that necessity really exists. I had looked to you as one of those calculated to give cohesion to our rope of sand.—To Caesar A. Rodney. Ford ed., viii, 296. (W., Feb., 1804.)

7666. ROGUES, Diplomacy and.—Our part of the country [Virginia] is in considerable fermentation, and we suspect that we have a recent roguery of this kind. They say that while all hands were below deck mending sails, splicing ropes, and every one at his own business, and the captain in his cabin attending to his log-book and chart, a rogue of a pilot has run them into an enemy's port. But metaphor apart, there is much dissatisfaction with Mr. Jay and his treaty.—To Mann Page. iv, 120. Ford ed., vii, 25. (M., Aug. 1795.) See Jay Treaty.

7667. ROGUES, Proportion of.—I do not believe with the Rochefoucauld and Mon-
taignes; that fourteen out of fifteen men are rogues; I believe a great abatement from that proportion may be made in favor of general honesty. But I have always found that rogues would be uppermost, and I do not know that the proportion is too strong for the higher orders, and for those who, rising above the swimish multitude, always contrive to nestle themselves into the places of power and profit. These rogues set out with stealing the people's good opinion, and then steal from them the right of withdrawing it, by contriving laws and associations against the power of the people themselves. — To MANY PAGE. iv, 119. FORD ED., vi., 24. (M., 1795.)

7668. ROGUES, Railing.—The rogues may rail without intermission.—To Dr. BENJA-

MIN RUSH. iv, 426. FORD ED., viii, 128. (W., 1801.)

7669. ROHAN (Cardinal de), Imprisonment.—The Cardinal de Rohan and Cagliostro remain * * * in the Bastile; nor do their affairs seem as yet to draw towards a conclusion. It has been a curious matter, in which the circumstances of intrigue and detail have busied all the tongues, the public liberty none. —To MR. OTTO. i, 558. (P., 1786.)

7670. ROTATION IN OFFICE, Abandonment of.—I dislike, and greatly dislike [in the new Federal Constitution] the abandonment in every instance of the principle* of rotation in office, and most particularly in the case of the President.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 330. FORD ED., iv, 477. (P., Dec. 1787.) See PRESIDENT.

7671. — — —. I apprehend that the total abandonment of the principle of rotation in the offices of President and Senator [in the Federal Constitution] will end in abuse.—To E. RUTLEDGE. ii, 435. FORD ED., v, 42. (P., 1788.)

7672. — — —. The abandoning the principle of necessary rotation in the Senate has, I see, been disapproved by many; in the case of the President, by none. I readily, therefore, my opinion wrong, when opposed by the majority, as in the former instance, and the totality, as in the latter. In this, however, I should have done it with more complete satisfaction, had we all judged from the same position.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 447. FORD ED., v, 48. (P., July 1788.)

proval of.—I am for responsibilities at short periods, seeing neither reason nor safety in making the public functionaries independent of the nation for life, or even for a long term of years. On this principle I prefer the Presidential term of four years to that of seven years which I myself had at first suggested, annexing to it, however, ineligibility to it forever after; and I wish it were now annanced to the second quadrennial election of President.—To JAMES MARTIN. vi, 213. FORD ED., ix, 420. (M., 1813.) See THIRD TERM.

7674. ROTATION IN OFFICE, Definition of.—Rotation is the change of officers

* " Necessity " of rotation in FORD EDITION.—EDIT.

required by the laws at certain epochs, and in a certain order. Thus, in Virginia, our justices of the peace are made sheriffs, one after the other, each remaining in office two years, and then yielding it to his next brother in order of seniority. This is the just and classical meaning of the word. But in American, we have extended it (for want of a proper word), to all cases of officers who must be necessarily changed at a fixed epoch, though the successor be not pointed out in any particular order, but comes in by free election. By the term rotation in office, then, we mean an obligation on the holder of that office to go out at a certain period. In our first confederation, the principle of rotation was established in the office of President of Congress, who could serve but one year in the Chair; and in that of a member of Congress, who could serve but three years in six. — To J. SARSFIELD. iii, 17. (P., 1789.)

tion of.—The second amendment [to the new Federal Constitution], which appears to me to be essential, is the restoring the principle of necessary rotation, particularly to the Senate and Presidency, but most of all to the last.—To E. CARRINGTON. ii, 404. FORD ED., v, 20. (P., 1788.)

7676. ROWAN (A. H.), Asylum for.—

Should you choose Virginia for your asylum, the laws of the land, administered by upright judges, would protect you from an exercise of power unauthorized by the Constitution of the United States. The Habeas Corpus secures every man here, alien or citizen, against everything which is not law, whatever shape it may assume. Should this, or any other circumstance, draw your footsteps this way, I shall be happy to be among those who may have an opportunity of testifying, by every attention in our power, the sentiments of esteem and respect which the circumstances of your history have inspired.*—To A. H. ROWAN. iv, 257. FORD ED., vii, 281. (1798.)

7677. RULES, Forming.—The forming a general rule requires great caution.—To PRESI-

DENT WASHINGTON. FORD ED., vi, 408. (P., 1793.)

— RULES, Jefferson's ten.—See ADVICE.

7678. RUSH (Benjamin), Tribute to.—A better man than Rush could not have left us; more benevolent, more learned, of finer genius, or more honest.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 120. (M., 1813.)

7679. RUSH (Benjamin), Virtues.—His

virtues rendered him dear to all who knew him, and his benevolence led him to do all men every good in his power. Much he was able to do, and much, therefore, will be missed. —To RICHARD RUSH. FORD ED., ix, 385. (M., 1813.)

7680. RUSSIA, Empress Catherine.—

The Empress endeavored to bully the Turk, who laughed at her, and she is pockets back. — To J. BANNISTER, Jr. ii, 150. (P., 1787.) See ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA and DASHKOFF.

* Archibald Hamilton Rowan was one of the leaders in the rebellion in Ireland in 1798. He was a refugee in Wilmington, Delaware, when Jefferson wrote to him.—EDITOR.
7681. RUSSIA, United States and.—Russia and the United States being in character and practice essentially pacific, a common interest in the rights of peaceable nations gives us a common cause in their maintenance.
—To M. DASHKOFF. v, 463. (M., 1809.)

7682. RUTLEDGE (Edward), Appeal to.—Would to God yourself, General Pinckney and Major Pinckney, would come forward and aid us with your efforts. You are all known, respected, wished for; but you refuse yourselves to everything. What is to become of us if the vine and the fig tree withdraw, and leave us to the bramble and the thorn?—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iii, 283. FORD ED., v, 376. (Pa., 1791.)

7683. RUTLEDGE (Edward), Politics.—I have often doubted whether most to praise or to blame your line of conduct. If you had lent to your country the excellent talents you possess, on you would have fallen those torrents of abuse which have lately been poured forth on me. So far, I praise the wisdom which has described and steered clear of a waterspout ahead. But now for the blame. There is a debt of service due from every man to his country, proportioned to the bounties which nature and fortune have measured to him. Counters will pay this from the poor of spirit; but from you coin was due. There is no bankrupt law in heaven, by which you may get off with shirlings in the pound; with rendering to a single State what you owed to the whole confederacy. I think it was by the Roman law that a father was denied sepulture, unless his son would pay his debts. Happy for you and us, that you have a son whom genius and education have qualified to pay yours. But as you have been a good father in everything else, be so in this also. Come forward and pay your own debts. Your friends, the Pinckneys, have at length undertaken their tour. My joy at this would be complete if you were in gear with them.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 152. FORD ED., vii, 94. (M., 1796.)

7684. RUTLEDGE (John), Chief Justice.—The rejection of Mr. Rutledge [to be Chief Justice] by the Senate is a bold thing; because they cannot pretend any objection to him but his disapprobation of the [Jay] treaty. It is, of course, a declaration that they will receive none but tories hereafter into any department of the government.—To W. B. GUILL. iv, 127. FORD ED., vii, 44. (M., Dec. 1795.)

7685.—. The appointment of J. Rutledge to be Chief Justice seems to be made merely to establish a precedent against the descent of that office by seniority, and to keep five mouths always gaping for one sugar plum; for it was immediately negatived by the very votes which so implicitly concur with the will of the Executive.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 59. (M., 1796.)

7686. SACRIFICES, Necessary.—Temporary sacrifices are necessary to save permanent rights.—To DR. WILLIAM EUSTIS. v, 417. FORD ED., ix, 439. (W., 1800.)

7687. SACRIFICES, Rewarding.—It is for the public interest to encourage sacrifices and services, by rewarding them, and they should weigh to a certain point, in the decision between candidates.—To JOHN ADAMS. i, 503. (P., 1785.)

7689. SAFETY, Union and.—Our safety rests on the preservation of our Union.—To THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY. iv, 397. (W., May 1801.)

7690. SALARIES, Adequate.—Congress were pleased to order me an advance of two quarters’ salary. At that time, I supposed that I might reduce it, or spare so much from my expenses, by the time the third quarter became due. Probably they might expect the same. But it has been impossible. The expense of my outfit, though I have taken it up, on a scale as small as could be admitted, has been very far beyond what I had conceived. I have, therefore, not only been unable to reduce the advance ordered, but been obliged to go beyond it. I wished to have avoided so much as was occasioned by the purchase of furniture. But those who hire furniture asked me forty per cent. a year for the use of it. It was better to buy, therefore; and this article, clothes, carriage, &c., have amounted to considerably more than the advance ordered. Perhaps, it may be thought reasonable to allow me an outfit. The usage of every other nation has established this, and reason really pleads for it. I do not wish to make a shilling; but only my expenses to be defrayed, and in a moderate style. On the most moderate, which the reputation or interest of those I serve would admit, it will take me several years to liquidate the advances for my outfit. I mention this to enable you to understand the necessities which have obliged me to call for more money than was probably expected, and, understanding them, to explain them to others.—To SAMUEL OSGOOD. i, 452. (P., 1785.)

7691. SALARIES, Competent.—Render the [State] judiciary respectable by every means possible, to wit firm tenure in office, [and] competent salaries.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 315. FORD ED., v, 410. (Pa., 1791.)

7692. SALARIES, Foreign Ministers.—The bill on the intercourse with foreign nations restrains the President from allowing to Ministers Plenipotentiaries, or to Congress, more than $9,000, and $4,500 for their “personal services, and other expenses”. This definition of the object for which the allowance is provided appearing vague, the Secretary of State thought it his duty to confer with the gentlemen heretofore employed as ministers in Europe, to obtain from them, in aid of his own information, an enumeration of the expenses incident to these offices, and their opinion which of them would be included within the fixed salary, and which would be entitled to be charged separately. He, therefore, asked a conference with the

* During his public life Jefferson sometimes lived on his salary, sometimes exceeded it, and only while he was Vice-President saved anything from it.—MORSE’S Life of Jefferson, 335.
Vice-President, who was acquainted with the residences of London and the Hague, and the Chief Justice, who was acquainted with that of Madrid. The Vice-President, Chief Justice, and Secretary of State concurred in the opinion that the salaries named by the act are much below those of the same grade at the courts of Europe, and less than the public good requires they should be. Consequently, that the expenses not included within the definition of the law, should be allowed as an additional charge.—Opinion on Salaries. vii. 501. (1790.)

7693. SALARIES, Increasing.—It  is inconsistent with the principles of civil liberty, and contrary to the natural rights of the other members of the society, that any body of men therein should have authority to enlarge their own powers, prerogatives, or emoluments without restraint, the General Assembly cannot at their own will increase the allowance which their members are to draw from the public treasury for their expenses while in assembly: but to enable them to do so on application to the body of the people  is necessary.—Adequate Allowance Bill. Ford ed., ii, 165. (1778.)

7694. SALARIES, Legislators.—It is just that members of General Assembly, delegated by the people to transact for them the legislative business, should, while attending that business, have their reasonable sustenance defrayed, dedicating to the public service their time and labors freely and without account: and it is also expedient that the public councils should not be deprived of the aid of good and able men, who might be deterred from entering into them by the insufficiency of their private fortunes to [meet] the extraordinary expenses they must necessarily incur.—Adequate Allowance Bill. Ford ed., ii, 165. (1778.)

7695. SALARIES, Multiplication of.—I am not for a multiplication of  salaries merely to make partisans.—To Elbridge Gerry. iv, 268. Ford ed., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.)

7697. ——. No salaries shall be given to the Administrator, members of the legislative houses, judges of the Court of Appeals, judges of the County Courts, or other inferior jurisdictions, privy counsellors, or delegates to the American Congress; but the reasonable expenses of the Administrator, members of the House of Representatives, * There is an impression that we owe to Jefferson the system of paying extravagantly low salaries to members. Not so. He was far too good a republican to favor an idea so aristocratic. Make offices desirable, he says, if you wish to get superior men to fill them. * * * There is nothing in the writings of Jefferson which gives any show of support to temptation salaries or to ignorant suffrage.—James Par- ton’s Life of Jefferson, 378.

judges of the Court of Appeals, privy counsellors, and delegates for subsistence, while acting in the duties of their office, may be borne by the public, if the Legislature shall so direct.—Proposed VA. Constitution. Ford ed., ii, 28. (June 1776.)

7698. SALARIES, Reduction of.—I remark [in your address to the Legislature] the phenomenon of a chief magistrate recommending the reduction of his own compensation. This is a solecism of which the wisdom of our late Congress cannot be accused.—To Governor Plumer. vii, 19. (M., 1816.)

7699. SALT WATER, Distillation.—The obtaining fresh from salt water was for ages considered as an important desideratum for the use of navigators. The process for doing this by simple distillation is so efficacious, but though this has been done for periods of thirty years, though its reality has been established by the actual experience of several vessels which have had recourse to it, yet neither the fact nor the process is known to the mass of seamen, to whom it would be the most useful, and for whom it was principally wanted. The Secretary of State is, therefore, of opinion that since the subject has now been brought under observation, it should be made the occasion of disseminating its knowledge generally and effectually among the seafaring citizens of the United States.—Report to Congress. vii. 459. (1790.)

7700. SAN DOMINGO, Commerce with.—A clause in a bill now under debate for opening commerce with l’oussaint and his black subjects, now in open rebellion against France will be a circumstance of high aggravation to the neutrals, and in our commerce with the islands around their islands will put their patience to a great proof.—To James Monroe. iv, 265. Ford ed., vii, 321. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

7701. ——. As it is acknowledged  that it is impossible the French should invade us since the annihilation of their power on the sea, our constituents will see in the [army and navy] preparations the utmost anxiety to guard them against even impossibilities. The Southern States do not discover the same care, however, in the bill authorizing Toussaint’s subjects to a free commerce with them, and free ingress and intercourse with their brethren in these States. However, if they are guarded against the canibals of the terrible republic, they ought not to object to being eaten by a more civilized enemy.—To Aaron Burr. Ford ed., vii, 348. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

7702. ——. Toussaint’s clause was retained.† Even South Carolinians in the House of Representatives voted for it. We may expect, therefore, black crews, and supercargoes.

† The House of Representatives had referred to Jefferson the petition of Jacob Isaacs of Rhode Island, who claimed to have discovered a method of converting salt water into fresh. Isaacs desired the government to buy his secret.—Editor.

† Jefferson referred to the exemption of San Domingo in the French non-intercourse bill.—Editor.
and missionaries thence into the Southern States; and when that leaven begins to work, I would gladly compound with a great part of our northern country, if they would honestly stand neuter. If this combustion can be introduced among us under any veil whatever, we bow to JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., viii. 349. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

7705. SAN DOMINGO, Exile of aristocrats.—Genet tells me that the Patriot party in St. Domingo had taken possession of six hundred aristocrats and monocrats, had sent two hundred of them to France, and were sending four hundred here.* * * I wish we could distribute our four hundred among the Indians, who would teach them lessons of liberty and equality.—TO MARTHA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH. FORD ED., vi. 268. (Pa., 1793.)

7706. SAN DOMINGO, Military expeditions to.—It is not permitted by the law to prohibit the departure of the emigrants to St. Domingo, according to the wish you express, any more than it is to force them away, according to that expressed by you in a former letter. Our country is open to all men, to come and go peaceably, when they have found your letter does not mention that these emigrants meant to depart armed, and equipped for war. Lest, however, this should be attempted, the Governors of Pennsylvania and Maryland are requested * * * to see that no military expedition be covered or permitted under color of the right which the passengers have to depart from these States.—TO E. C. GENET. iv. 87. FORD ED., vi. 459. (Pa., Nov. 1793.)

7707. SAN DOMINGO, Supplies to.—When the distresses in St. Domingo first broke forth, we thought we could not better evidence our friendship to that, and to the Mother country also, than to step into its relief, on your application, without waiting a formal authorization from the National Assembly. As the case was unforeseen, so it was unprovided for on their part, and we did what we doubted not they would have desired us to do, had there been time to make the application, and what we presumed they would sanction as soon as known to them. We have now been going on more than a twelve-month, in making advances for the relief of the Colony, without having, as yet, received any such sanction for the decreed of four millions of livres in aid of the Colony, besides the circuitous and informal manner by which we became acquainted with it, describes and applies to operations very different from those which have actually occurred. The wants of the Colony appear likely to continue, and their reliance on our supplies to become habitual. We feel every disposition to continue our efforts, for administering to those wants; but that cautious attention to forms which would have been unfriendly in the first moment, becomes a duty to ourselves; when the business assumes the appearance of long continuance, and respectful also to the National Assembly, who have a right to prescribe the line of an interference so materially interest- ing to the Mother country and the Colony. By the estimate you were pleased to deliver me, we perceive that there will be want, to carry the Colony through the month of December, between thirty and forty thousand dol- lars, in addition to the sums before engaged to you. I am authorized to inform you, that the sum of forty thousand dollars shall be paid to your orders at the Treasury of the United States, and to assure you, that we feel no abatement in our dispositions to contribute these aids from time to time, as they shall be wanting, for the necessary subsistence of the Colony; but the want of express approbation from the National Legislature, must ere long produce a presumption that they would adopt the other modes of relieving the Colony and dictate to us the propriety of doing only what they shall have regularly and previously sanctioned. —TO JEAN BAPTISTE TERNANT, iii. 491. FORD ED., vi. 136. (Pa., Nov. 1792.)

7708. —We are continuing our supplies to the island of St. Domingo, at the request of the minister, although it is evident we would wish, however, to receive a more formal sanction from the government of France than has yet been given. Indeed, we know of none but a vote of the late National Assembly for four million livres of our debt, sent to the government of St. Domingo, communicating to them the minister here, and by him to us. And this was in terms not properly applicable to the form of our advances. We wish, therefore, for a full sanction of the past, and a com- plete expression of the desires of our gov- ernment as to future supplies to their colonies.—TO GOVERNEUR MORRIS. FORD ED., vi. 151. (Pa., 1792.)

7709. SARDINIA, Commerce with.—A desire of seeing a commerce commenced be- tween the United States, the kingdom of Sardinia, and the United States of America, and a direct exchange of their respective pro- ductions, without passing through a third nation, led me into the conversation which I had the honor of having with you, with regard to this project, and afterwards with Monsieur Tallon at Turin.

* * * The articles of your produce wanted with us are brandies, wines, oils, fruits, and manufactured silks. Those which we can furnish you are indigo, potash, tobacco, flour, salt fish, furs and peltries, ships and materials for building them.—To M. GUIDE. ii, 146. (Ma., 1787.)

7710. SAUSSURE (Horace B.), Philosopher.—M. Saussure is one of the best philosophers of the present age. Cautious in not letting his assess run before his evidence, he possesses the wisdom which so few possess, of preferring ignorance to error. The contrary disposition in those who call themselves philosophers, is nowhere so manifest as in the present times, when, in fact, with the writers of romance.—To WILLIAM RUTLEDGE. ii, 475. 7711. SCENERY, American.—The Falling Spring, the Cascade of Niagara, the passage of the Potomac through the Blue Mountains, the Natural Bridge—it is a worth a voyage across the Atlantic to see those objects, much more to paint and make them, and thereby to live, known to all ages.—To Mrs. COSWAY. i, 35. FORD ED., iv, 315. (P., 1786.)

7712. SCHISM, Dangers of.—Strong in our numbers, our position and resources, can never be endangered but by schisms at home.—R. TO A. WILMINGTON CITIZENS. viii, 149. (1809.)

7713. SCHISM, Governmental.—Government, as well as religion, has furnished its schisms, its persecutions, and its devices for fattening idleness on the earnings of the people. It has its hierarchy of emperors, kings, princes, and nobles, as that has of popes, cardinals, archbishops, bishops and priests. To CHARLES CLAS. vi, 413. (M., 1815.)

7714. SCHISM, Self-govern ment and.—All these schisms, small or great, only accumulate truths of the solid qualifications of our citizens for self-government.—To THOMAS LEIPER. FORD ED., viii, 503. (W., 1806.)

7715. SCHISM, Silence.—Frown into silence all disorganizing movements.—R. TO A. WILMINGTON CITIZENS. vii, 149. (1809.)

7716. SCHOOLS, Abortive.—The annual reports show that our plan of primary schools [in Virginia] is becoming completely abortive, and must be abandoned very shortly, after costing us this day one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, and yet to cost us forty-five thousand dollars a year more until it shall be discontinued; and if a single boy has received the elements of common education. it must be in some part of the country not known to me. Experience has but too fully confirmed the early predictions of its fate.—To William T. BARRY, vii, 256. (M., 1822.)

7717. SCHOOLS, European.—Why send an American youth to Europe for education? What are the objects of an useful American education? Classical knowledge, modern languages, chiefly French, Spanish and Italian; mathematics, natural philosophy, natural history, civil history and ethics. In natural philosophy, I mean to include chemistry and agriculture; and in natural history to include botany, as well as the other branches of those departments. It is true that the habit of speaking one language cannot be so well acquired in America; but every other article can be as well acquired at William and Mary College, as at any place 'n Europe. When college education is done with, and a young man is to prepare h'mself for public life, he must cast his eyes (for America) either on law or physics. For the former, where can he apply so advantageously as to use his talents? For the latter, he must come to Europe; the medical class of students, therefore, is the only one which need come to Europe.—To J. BANNISTER. i, 457. (P., 1785.)

7718. Let us view the disadvantages of sending a youth to Europe. To enumerate them all would require a volume. I will select a few. If he goes to England, he learns drinking, horse racing and boxing. If it is in a country which partakes of English education. The following circumstances are common to education in that and the other countries of Europe. He acquires a fondness for European luxury and dissipation, and a contempt for the simplicity of his own country; he is fascinated with the privileges of the European aristocrats, and sees, with abhorrence, the lovely equality which the poor enjoy with the rich in his own country; he contracts a partiality for aristocracy or monarchy; he forms foreign friendships which will never be useful to him, and loses the seasons of life for forming, in his own country, those friendships which, of all others, are the most faithful and permanent; * * * and * * * he returns to his own country unacquainted with the practices of domestic economy, necessary to preserve him from ruin, speaking and writing his native tongue as a foreigner, and, therefore, unqualified to obtain those distinctions which elude of the pen and tongue ensures in a free country: for I would observe to you, that what is called style in writing or speaking, is formed very early in life, whereas the imagination is warm, and impressions are permanent.—To J. BANNISTER. i, 468. (P., 1785.)

7719. An American, coming to Europe for education, loses in his knowledge, in his morals, in his health, in his habits, and in his happiness. I had entertained only doubts on this head before I came to Europe; what I see and hear, since I came here, proves more than I had even suspected.—To J. BANNISTER. i, 468. (P., 1785.)

7720. Cast your eye over America; who are the most of learning, of most eloquence, most beloved by their countrymen, and most trusted and promoted by them? They are those who have been educated among them, and whose manners, morals, and habits, are perfectly homogeneous with those of the country. * The consequences of foreign education are alarming to me as an American.—To J. BANNISTER. i, 468. (P., 1785.)

7721. With respect to the schools of Europe, my mind is perfectly made up, and on full enquiry. The best in the world is Edinburgh. Latterly, too, the spirit of republicanism has become that of the students in general, and of the younger professors; so on that account it is eligible for an American. On the continent of Europe there is no country equal to Switzerland, or parable to Geneva. The sciences are there more modernized than anywhere else. There, too, the spirit of republicanism is strong with the body of the inhabitants; but that of the aristocracy is strong also with a particular class; so that it is of some comfort to attend to the class of society in which a youth is made to move.—To Mr. M'ALISTER. iii, 313. (Pa., 1791.)

7722. SCHOOLS, Fostering genius in.—By that part of our plan of education in Vir-7729. SCIENCE. American field of.—What a field have we at our doors to signalize ourselves in. The Botany of America is but far from being exhausted, its Mineralogy is untouched, and its Natural History or Zoology, totally mistaken and misrepresented. As far as I have seen, there is not one single species of terrestrial birds common to our country, its productions and its genius. It is the province of the young men whom you are forming should lay their hands. We have spent the prime of our lives in procuring them the precious blessing of liberty. Let them spend theirs in showing that it is the great parent of science and of virtue; and that a nation will be great in both, always in proportion as it is free.—To Dr. Willard, iii. 16. (P. 1789.}

7730. SCIENCE. Common property.—The field of knowledge is the common property of mankind, and any discoveries we can make in it will be for the benefit of yours and of every other nation, as well as our own.—To Henry Dearborn, v. 111. FORD ED., ix, 86. (W. 1807.}

7731. SCIENCE, Delight in.—Nature intended me for the tranquil pursuits of science, by rendering them my supreme delight. To Dupont de Nemours. v. 432. (W. March 2, 1809.)

7732. SCIENCE. Elementary works.—I have received a copy of your mathematical principles of natural philosophy, which I have carefully inspected, and I have entire confidence in all the amendments to the French, for the want of which, I am pleased to see, you have made some of those alterations which will enable your work for the use of schools to be of the greatest service, and you have not omitted to insert the experiments of M. Monge, which are of the greatest use for the practice of an artist. To Joseph C. Cabell. vi, 189. FORD ED., x, 167. (P.F., 1820.)

7728. SCIENCE. Acquisition of.—The possession of science is, what (next to an honest heart) will above all things render you our countrymen, and give you fame and promotion in your own country.—To Peter Carr. i, 395. (P. 1785.)
which the French have so much cultivated and improved, have now adopted the latter; and that they have also given up the fluxionary, for the differential calculus. To confine a school, therefore, to the obsolete work of Cavallo, is to shut out all advances in the physical sciences which have been so great in latter times. To Patrick K. Rodgers. vi, 327. (M., 1824.)

7735. SCIENCE, Objects of.—The main objects of all science are the freedom and hap-
(M., 1810.)

7736. SCIENCE, Pursuit of.—On the revival of letters, learning became the universal favorite [pursuit]. And with reason, because there was not enough of it existing to manage the affairs of a nation to the best advantage, nor to advance its individuals to the happiness of which they were susceptible, by improvements in their minds, their morals, their health, and in those conveniences which contribute to the comfort and embellishment of life. All the efforts of the society, therefore, were directed to the increase of learning, and the improvements of respect, ease, and profit were held up for its encouragement. Even the charities of the nation forgot that misery was their object, and spent themselves in founding schools to transfer to science the hardy sons of the plow.
To these incitements were added the powerful fascinations of ancient cities. These circumstances have long since produced an overcharge in the class of competitors for learned occupation, and great distress among the supernumerary candidates; and the more, as their habits of life have disqualifed them for reentering into the laborious class. The evil cannot be suddenly, nor perhaps ever entirely cured; nor should I presume to say by what means it may be cured. Doubtless there are many engines which the nation might bring to bear on this object. Public opinion, and public encouragement are among these.—To David Williams.
iv, 513. (W., 1803.)

7737. SCIENCE, Republican government and.—Science is more important in a republican than in any other government.—To vii, 221. (M., 1821.)

7738. Science is important to the preservation of our republican government and It is also essential to its protection against foreign power.—To vii, 222. (M., 1821.)

7739. SCIENCES, Distribution of the.—
I have received the copy of your System of Universal Science. * * * It will be a monument of the learning of the author and of the analyzing powers of his mind. * * * These analytical views indeed must always be ram fied according to their object. Yours is on the great scale of a methodical encyclopedia of all human sciences, taking for the basis of their distribution, matter, mind, and the union of both. Lord Bacon, in his great work, De Sane
v. 1, c. 14, and an imperfect ascription of the sciences to these respective faculties was there attempted. This excellent moral work was published in 1600. Lord Bacon is said not to have entered on his great work until his retirement from public office in 1621. Where sciences are to be arranged in accommodation to the schools of an university, they will be spurred to coincide with the kindred qualifications of professors in ordinary. For a library, which object, the sciences and subdivisions will be made such as to throw convenient masses of books under each separate head. Thus, in the library of a physician, the books of that science, of which he has many, will be subdivided under many heads; and those of large work, being divided, will be placed under a single one. The lawyer, again, will distribute his law books under many subdivisions, his medical under a single one. * * * Your idea of making the subject matter of the sci-cences the basis of their distribution, is certainly more reasonable than that of the faculties to which they are addressed. * * * Were I to re-compose my tabular view of the sciences, I should certainly transpose a certain branch. The naturalists, you know, distribute the history of nature under two kingdoms or departments: zoology, botany, mineralogy, idology, or mind, however, occupies so much space in the field of science, that we might perhaps erect it into a fourth kingdom or department. But, as much as it makes a part of the animal construction only, it would be the proper to subdivide zoology into physical and mental. The latter including ideology, ethics, and mental science generally, in my catalogue, considering ethics, as well as religion, as supplementary sciences to one of the departments of the government of man. I had them in that sequence, for the faculty of thought belongs to animal history, is an important portion of it, and should there find its place.—To Mr. Woodward. vii, 338.

7741. SEAMEN, American.—The seamen which our navigation raises had better be of our own. It is neither our wish nor our interest either to employ [those of England].—To William Short. vi, 128. (M., June 1813.)

7742. SEAMEN, Distressed.—Another circumstance which claims attention, as directly affecting the very source of our navigation, is the defect or the evasion of the law providing for the return of seamen, and particularly of those belonging to vessels sold abroad. Numbers of them, discharged in foreign ports, have been thrown on the hands of our consuls, who, to rescue them from the dangers into which their distresses might plunge them, and save them to their country, have found it necessary in some cases to return them at the public charge.—Second Annual Message, viii, 16. Ford Ed., v ii, 182. (Dec. 1802.)

7743. SEAMEN, Foreign.—Your estimate of the number of foreign seamen in our employ, renders it prudent, in my opinion, to drop the idea of any proposition not to employ them.—To Albert Gallatin. V, 71. (M., April 1807.)

7744. SECESSION. Baleful.—Mr. New showed me your letter * * * which gave me an opportunity of observing what you said as to the effect, with you, of public proceedings, and that it was not unwise* now to estimate the separate mass of Virginia and North Carolina, with a view to their separate existence. It is true that we are completely under the saddle of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and that they ride us very hard, cruelly insulting our feelings, as well as exhausting our strength and subsistence. Their natural friends, the three other Eastern States, join them from a sort of family pride, and they have the art of making certain other parts of the Union, so as to make us use the sword to govern the whole. This is not new, it is the old practice of despots; to use a part of the people to keep the rest in order. And those who have once got an ascendancy, and possessed themselves of all the resources of the nation, their revenues and offices, have immense means of retaining their advantage. But our present situation is not a natural one. The republicans, through every part of the Union, say that it was the irresistible influence and popularity of General Washington played off by the cunning of Hamilton, which turned the government over to antirepublican hands, or turned the republicans chosen by the people into anti-republicans. He delivered it over to his successor in this state, and very untoward events since, improved with great artifice, have produced on the public mind the impressions we see. But, still, I repeat it, this is not the natural state. Time alone would bring round an order of things more correspondent to the sentiments of our constituents. But, are there no events impending, which will do it within a few months? The crisis with England, the public and authentic avowal of sentiments hostile to the leading principles of our Constitution, the prospect of a war, in which we shall stand alone, land tax, stamp tax, increase of public debt, &c. Be this as it may, in every free and deliberating society, there must, from the nature of man, be opposite parties, and violent dissensions and discord; and one of these, for the most part, must prevail over the other for a longer or shorter time. Perhaps this party division is necessary to induce each to watch and debate to the people the proceedings of the other. But if on a temporary superiority of the one party, the other is to resort to a scission of the Union, no federal government can ever exist. If to rid ourselves of the present rule of Massachussetts and Connecticut, we break the Union, will the evil stop there? Suppose the New England States alone cut off, will our nature be changed? Are we not men still to the south of that, and with all the passions of men? Immediately, we shall see a Pennsylvania and a Virginia party arise in the residuary confederacy, and the public mind will be distracted with the same party spirit. What a game, too, will the one party have in their hands, by eternally threatening the other that unless they do so and so, they will join their northern neighbors. If we reduce our Union to Virginia and North Carolina, immediately the conflict will be established between the representatives of these two States, and they will end by breaking into their simple units. Seeing, therefore, that an association of men who will not quarrel with one another is a thing which never existed, from the greatest confederacy of nations down to a town meeting or a vestry; seeing that we must have somebody to quarrel with, I had rather keep our New England associates for that purpose, than to see our bickerings transferred to others. They are circumscribed within such narrow limits, and their population so full, that their numbers will ever be the minority, and they are marked, like the Jews, with such a perversity of character, as to constitute, from that circumstance, the natural division of our parties. A little patience, and we shall see the reign of witches pass over their spells dissolved, and the people recovering their sight, restoring their government to its true principles. It is true that, in the meantime, we are suffering deeply in spirit, and incurring the horrors of a war, and long oppressions of enormous public debt. But who can say what would be the evils of a scission, and when and where they would end? Better keep together as we are, haul off from Europe as soon as we can, and from all attachments to any portions of it; and if they show their power just sufficiently to hoop us together, it will be the happiest situation in which we can exist. If the game runs sometimes against us at home, we must have patience till luck turns, and then we shall have an opportunity of working back the principles we have lost. For this is a game where principles are the stake.—To John Taylor. iv, 245. Ford Ed., vii, 263. (Pa., June 1798.)

—SECESSION, Kentucky and.—See Kentucky.

7745. SECESSION, Local discontentedness and.—Dangers of another kind [than usurpation] might more reasonably be apprehended from this perfect and distinct or-organization, civil and military, of the States; to wit, that certain States from local and occasional discontents, might attempt to separate from the Union. This is certainly possible and would be befriended by this regular [civil and military] organization. But it is not probable that local discontents can spread to such an extent as to be able to faze the sound parts of so extensive a Union; and if ever they should reach the majority, they would then become the regular government, acquire the ascendancy in Congress, and be able to redress their own grievances by laws peaceably and constitutionally passed. And even the States in which local discontents might engender a commencement of fermentation, would be paralyzed and self-checked by that very division into parties into which we have fallen, into which all States must fall wherein men are at liberty to think, speak, and act freely, according to the diversities of their individual confromations, and which are, perhaps, essential to preserve the purity of the government, by the censorship which these parties habitually exercise over each other.—To Destutt Tracy. v. 371. Ford ed., ix, 309. (M., 1811.)

7749. Should the determination of England, now formally expressed, to take possession of the ocean, and to suffer no commerce on it but through her ports, force a war upon us, I foresee a possibility of a separate treaty between her and your Essex men, on the principles of neutrality and commerce. Pickering here, and his nephew Williams there, can easily negotiate this. Such a lure to the quietists in our ranks with you, might recruit theirs to a majority. Yet, excluded as they would be from intercourse with the rest of the Union and of Europe, I scarcely see the gain they would propose to themselves, even for the moment. The defection would certainly disconcert the other States, but it could not ultimately endanger their safety. They are adequate, in all points, to a defensive war. However, I hope your majority, with the aid it is entitled to, will save us from this trial, to which I think it possible we are advancing.—To Henry Dearborn. v. 607. (P.F., Aug. 1811.) See Embargo, Federalists, Hartford Convention and Monarchy.

7750. SECESSION, Suppression of.—What does this English faction with you [in New England] mean? Their newspapers say rebellion, and that they will not remain united with us unless we will permit them to govern the majority. If this be their purpose, their anti-republican spirit, it ought to be met at once. But a government like ours should be slow in believing this, should put forth its whole might, when necessary, to suppress it, and promptly return to the paths of reconciliation. The extent of our country secures it, I hope, from the vindictive passions of the petty incorporations of Greece. I rather suspect that the principal office of the other seventeen States will be to moderate and restrain the excitement of our friends with you, when they (with the aid of their brothers of the other States, if they need it,) shall have brought the rebellious to their feet. They count on British aid. But what can that avail them by land? They would separate from their friends, who alone furnish employment for their navigation, to unite with their only rival for that employment. When interdicted the harbors of their quondam brethren, they will go, I suppose, to ask and share in the carrying trade of their rivals, and a dispensation with their navigation act. They think they will be happier in an association under of your talents and integrity in so important a station, we may hope peculiar effect from it towards restoring deeply wounded amity between your native State [Massachusetts] and her sisters. The design of the leading federalists then having direction of the State, to take advantage of the first war with England to separate the New England States from the Union, has distressingly impaired our future confidence in them. In this, as in all other cases, we must do them full justice, and make the fault all their own, should the last hope of human liberty be destined to receive its final stab from them.—To William Eustis. Ford ed., ix. 306. (M., Oct. 1809.) See Eustis.

7746. SECESSION, Louisiana purchase and.—Whether we remain in one confederacy, or form into Atlantic and Mississippi confederacies, I believe not very important to the happiness of either part.* Those of the Western confederacy will be as much our children and descendants as those of the Eastern, and I feel myself as much identified what that country, in future time, as with this: and did I now foresee a separation at some future day, yet I should feel the duty and the desire to promote the Western interests as zealously as the Eastern, doing all the good for both portions of our future family which should fall within my power.—To Dr. Joseph Priestley. iv. 525. Ford ed., viii. 295. (W., Jan. 1804.)

7747. SECESSION, Missouri question and.—Should time not be given, and the schism [Missouri] be pushed to separation, it will be for a short term only; two or three years' trial will bring them back, like quarrelling lovers to renewed embraces, and increased affections. The experiment of separation would soon prove to both that they had mutually miscalculated their best interests. And even were the parties in Congress to secede in a passion, the soberer people would call a convention and cement again the severance attempted by the insanity of their functionaries.—To Richard Rush. vii. 182. (M., 1820.)

7748. SECESSION, New England and.—I am glad of an occasion of congratulating you [William Eustis] as well as my country, on your accession to a share in the direction of our Executive councils. [Secretaryship of War.] Besides the general advantages we may promise ourselves from the employment

* The opponents of the Louisiana purchase were, at this period, predicting dire disaster to the Union because of its acquisition.—Editor.
the rulers of Ireland, the East and West Indies, than in an independent government, where they are obliged to put up with their proportional share only in the direction of affairs. But, I trust, that such perverseness will not be that of the honest and well-meaning mass of the federalists of Massachusetts; and that when the questions of separation and rebellion shall be mistakenly proposed to them, the Gorges and the Pickering and the chiefs of those crowded with silk stocking gentry, but no yeomanry; an army of officers without soldiers.—To Elbridge Gerry. vi, 63. Ford Ed., ix, 350. (M., 1812.)

The塞ond Law, War with France and Germany.—It is quite impossible when we consider all the existing circumstances, to find any reason in its favor [war against France] resulting from views either of interest or honor, and plausible enough to impose even on the weakest mind; and especially, when it would be undertaken by a majority of one or two only. Whatever it may be of charity and liberality, we must resort to other views. And those so well known to have been entertained at Annapolis, and afterwards in the grand [Philadelphia] convention, by a particular set of men, present themselves as those alone which can account for so extraordinary a degree of impletion. Perhaps, instead of what was then in contemplation, a separation of the Union, which has been so much the topic to the eastward of late, may be the thing aimed at.—To James Madison, iv, 222. Ford Ed., vii, 220. (Pa., March 1798.)

7752. Secrecy, Government and. All nations have found it necessary, that for the advantageous conduct of their affairs, some of their proceedings, at least, should remain known to their executive functionary only.—To George Hay. v, 97. Ford Ed., ix, 57. (W., 1807.)

7753. Secret service money, necessary. That in cases of military operations some occasions for secret service money must arise, is certain. But I think that they should be more fully explained to the government than General Wilkinson has done, seems also proper.—To Henry Dearborn. v, 322. (W., July 1808.)

—SECRETS CIETIES.—See Societies (SECRET).

7754. Secretaries of Legation, training.—I explained to you in my former letter the principles on which [the appointment of Mr. Sumter to be Secretary of Legation] was made, to wit, * * * to teach for public service in future such subjects as from their standing in society, talents, principles and fortune, may probably come into the public councils.—To Robert R. Livingston. Ford Ed., vii, 30. (1801.)

7755. Sectionalism, dangers of.—The idea of a geographical line, once suggested, will brood in the minds of all those who prefer the gratification of their ungovernable passions to the peace and union of their country.—To M. L. Hill. vii, 155. (M., 1820.)

7756. All, I fear, do not see the speck in our horizon which is to burst on us as a tornado, sooner or later. The line of division lately marked out between different portions of our confederacy, is such as will never, I fear, be obliterated, and we are now trusting to those who are against us in position and principle, to fashion to their own form the minds and affections of our youth.—To General Breckenridge. vii, 204. (M., 1821.)

7758. Sectionalism, peace and.—I am so completely withdrawn from all attention to public matters, that nothing less could arouse me than the definition of a geographical line which, as an abstract principle, is to become the line of separation of these States, and to render desperate the hope that man and man ever enjoy the two blessings of peace and self-government.—To H. Nelson. vii, 151. Ford Ed., x, 156. (M., 1820.) See Appomptom and Secession.

7759. Sedition law, Connecticut cases.—With respect to the distribution of the prosecutions for sedition in Connecticut, it is well known to have been a tenet of the republican portion of our fellow citizens, that the Sedition law was contrary to the Constitution and therefore void. On this ground I considered it as a nullity wherever I met it in the course of my duties; and on this ground I directed nolle prosequis in all the prosecutions which had been instituted under it, and as far as the public sentiment can be inferred from the occurrences of the day, we may say that this opinion had the sanction of the nation. The prosecutions, therefore, which were afterwards instituted in Connecticut, of which two were against printers, two against preachers, and one against a judge, were too inconsistent with this principle to be permitted to go on. We were bound to administer to others of the same principle, not which they had meted out to us, but to ourselves, and to extend to all equally the protection of the same constitutional principles. These prosecutions too were chiefly for charges against myself, and I had from the beginning laid it down as a rule to notice nothing of the kind. I believed that the long course of services in which I had acted on the public stage, and under the eye of my fellow citizens, fitted me better to convince them of my character and principles, than the angry invectives of adverse partisans in whose eyes the very acts most approved by the majority were subjects of the greatest demerit and censure. These prosecutions are set them, therefore, were to be dismissed as a matter of duty.—To Gideon Granger. vi, 332. Ford Ed., ix, 456. (M., 1814.) See Libels.

7761. Sedition law, Executive vs. Judiciary.—You seem to think it evolved on the judges to decide on the validity of the Seditious Law. But nothing in the Constitution has given them a right to decide for the Executive, more than the Executive to decide for them. Both are bound, in the sphere of action assigned to them, to follow the Constitution. That instrument meant that coordinate branches should be checks on each other. But the opinion which gives to the judges the right to decide what laws are constitutional, and what not, not only for themselves in their own sphere of action, but for the Legislature and Executive as well, in their spheres, would make the judiciary a despotic branch. Nor does the opinion of the unconstitutionality, and consequent nullity of that law, remove all restraint from the overwhelming torrent of slander, which is confounding all vice and virtue, all truth and falsehood, in this country. The power to do that is fully possessed by the several State Legislatures. It was reserved to them, and was denied to the General Government, by the Constitution, according to our construction of it. While we deny that Congress have a right to control the freedom of the press, we have ever asserted the right of the States, and their exclusive right, to do so.—To Mrs. John Adams, iv, 561. Ford ed., viii, 311. (M., Sep. 1804.)

7762. SEDITION LAW, Unconstitutional.—I found a prosecution going on against Duane for an offence against the Senate, founded on the Sedition act. I affirm that act to be no law, because in opposition to the Constitution, and I shall treat it as a nullity, wherever it comes in the way of my functions.—To Edward Livingston. Ford ed., viii, 58. (W., Nov. 1801.)

7763.—The ground on which I acted in the cases of Duane, Callender, and others [was] that the Sedition law was unconstitutional, and that my obligation to execute what was law, involved that of not suffering rights secured by valid laws to be prostrated by what was no law.—To Wilson C. Nicholas, v, 453. Ford ed., ix, 254. (M., 1809.) See Alien and Sedition Laws.

7764. SELF-GOVERNMENT, America and.—Before the establishment of the American States, nothing was known to history but the man of the old world, crowded within limits either small or overcharged, and steeped in the vices which that situation generates. A government adapted to such men is perhaps the most difficult one, that for the man of these States. Here every man may have land to labor for himself. If he chooses; or, preferring the exercise of any other industry, may exact for it such compensation as not only to afford a comfortable subsistence, but wherewith to provide for a cessation from labor in old age. Every one, by his property, or by his satisfactory situation, is interested in the support of law and order. And such men may safely and advantageously reserve to themselves a wholesome control over their public affairs, and a degree of freedom, which, in the hands of the canaille of the cities of Europe, would be instantly perverted to the demolition and destruction of everything public and private. The history of the last twenty-five years of France, and of the last forty years in America, nay of its last two hundred years, proves the truth of both parts of this observation.—To John Adams. vi, 226. Ford ed., ix, 428. (M., 1813.)

7765. SELF-GOVERNMENT, British parliament and.—The British Parliament has no right to intervene with our provisions for the support of civil government, or administration of justice. * * * While Parliament pursue their plan of civil government, within their own jurisdiction, we, also, hope to pursue ours without molestation.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. Ford ed., i, 479. (July 1775.)

7766.—While Parliament pursue their plan of civil government within their own jurisdiction we hope also to pursue ours without molestation.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. Ford ed., i, 480. (July 1775.)

7767.—The proposition [of Lord North] is altogether unsatisfactory * * * because they [Parliament] do not renounce the power of * * * legislating for us themselves in all cases whatsoever.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. Ford ed., i, 480. (July 1775.)

7768. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Classes vs. Masses.—The general spread of the light of science has already laid open to everyone the palpable truth, that the mass of mankind has not been born with saddles on their backs, nor a favored few booted and spurred, ready to ride them legitimately, by the grace of God.—To Roger C. Weightman. vii, 450. Ford ed., x, 391. (M., June 1826.)

7769. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Connecticut and.—It would seem impossible that an intelligent people [of Connecticut] with the faculty of reading and right of thinking, should continue much longer to slumber under the papilage of an interested aristocracy of priests and lawyers, persuading them to distrust themselves, and to let them think for them. I sincerely wish that your efforts may awaken them from this voluntary degradation of mind, restore them to a due estimate of themselves and their fellow citizens, and a just abhorrence of the falsehoods and sophistries which have seduced them.—To Thomas Seymour. 444. Ford ed., ix, 31. (W., 1807.) See Connecticut.

7770. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Education and.—Whenever the people are well informed, they can be trusted with their own government.—To Dr. Price. ii, 533. (P., 1789.)

7771. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Europe and.—A first attempt to recover the right of self-government may fail, so may a second, a third, etc. But as a younger and more instructed race comes on, the sentiment becomes more and more intuitive, and a fourth, a fifth, or some subsequent one of the ever renewed attempts will ultimately succeed. In France, the first effort was defeated by Robespierre, the second by Bonaparte, the third by Louis XVIII. and his holy allies; another is yet to come, and all Europe, Russia excepted, has caught the spirit; and all cannot attain representative government, more or less perfect. * * * To attain all this, however, rivers of blood must yet flow, and years of desolation pass over; yet the object is worth rivers of blood, and years of desolation. For what inheritance so valuable, can man leave to his posterity? You and I shall look down from another world on these glorious achievements to man, which will add to the joys even of heaven.—To John Adams. vii. 307. FORD ed., x. 270. (M., 1823.)

7772. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Experiments in.—We have no interests nor passions different from those of our fellow citizens. We have the same object, the success of representative government. Nor are we acting for ourselves alone, but for the whole human race. The event of our experiment is to show whether man can be trusted with self-government. The eyes of suffering humanity are fixed on us with anxiety as their only hope, and on such a theatre, for such a cause, we must suppress all smaller passions and local considerations.—To Governor Hall. FORD ed., viii. 156. (W., July 1802.)

7773. SELF-GOVERNMENT, French people and.—The people of France have never been in the habit of self-government, are not yet in the habit of acknowledging that fundamental law of nature, by which alone self-government can be exercised by a society, I mean the lex majoris partis. Of the sacredness of this law, our countrymen are impressed from their cradle, so that with them it is almost innate.—To John Breckenridge. FORD ed., vii. 417. (Pa., 1800.)

7774. — — —. Who could have thought the French nation incapable of self-government?—To Dr. Joseph Priestley. FORD ed., viii. 179. (W., 1802.)

7775. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Generations and.—The present generation has the same right of self-government which the past one has exercised for itself.—To John H. Pleasants. vii. 346. FORD ed., x. 303. (M., 1824.)

7776. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Growth of.—When forced to assume self-government, we were novices in its science. Its principles and forms had entered little into our formal education. We established however some, although not all its important principles.—To John Cartwright. vii. 356. (M., 1824.)

7777. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Interference with.—We [the Virginia House of Burgesses] cannot, my Lord, close with the terms of that resolution [Lord North's Conciliatory Propositions] * * * because the British Parliament has no right to interfere with the support of civil government in the Colonies. For us, not for them, has government been instituted here. Agreeable to our ideas, provision has been made for such officers as we think necessary for the administration of public affairs; and we cannot conceive that any other legislature has a right to prescribe either the number or pecuniary appointments of our offices. As a proof that the claim of Parliament to interfere in the necessary provisions for the support of civil government is novel, and of a late date, we take leave to refer to an Act of our Assembly, passed so long since as the thirty-second year of the reign of King Charles the Second, intituled, "An Act for Raising a Publick Revenue, and for the Better Support of the Government of His Majesty's Colony of Virginia". This act was brought over by Lord Culpepper, then Governor, under the great seal of England, and was enacted in the name of the "King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the consent of the General Assembly."—Address to Governor Dunmore. FORD ed., i. 456. (1775.)

7778. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Irresistible.—Alliances, holy or hellish, may be formed, and retard the epoch of deliverance, may swell the rivers of blood which are yet to flow, but their own will close the scene, and leave to mankind the right of self-government.—To Marquis Lafayette. vii. 324. FORD ed., x. 280. (M., 1823.)

7779. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Limitations of.—The right of self-government does not comprehend the government of others.—OFFICIAL OPINION. vii. 499. FORD ed., v. 208. (1790.)

7780. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Local.—My bill for the more general diffusion of learning had for a further object to impart to these wards those portions of self-government for which they are best qualified, by confiding to them the care of their poor, their roads, police, elections, the nomination of jurors, administration of justice in small cases, elementary exercises of many sorts, to have made them little republics, with a wardens at the head of each, for all those concerns which, being under their eye, they would better manage than the larger republics of the county or State. A general call of ward meetings by their wardens on the same day through the State, would at any time produce the genuine sense of the people on any required point, and would enable the State to act in mass, as [the New England] people have so often done, and with so much effect by their town meetings.—To John Adams. vi. 225. FORD ed., ix. 427. (M., 1813.) See Wards.

7781. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Louisiana and.—Although it is acknowledged that our new fellow citizens [in Louisiana] are as yet as incapable of self-government as children, yet some [in Congress] cannot bring themselves to suspend its principles for a single moment. The temporary or territorial government of that country, therefore, will encounter great difficulty.—To De Witt Clinton. FORD ed., viii. 283. (W., Dec. 1803.)
7782. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Maximum.—My most earnest wish is to see the republican element of popular control pushed to the maximum of its practicable exercise. I shall then believe that our government may be pure and perpetual.—To ISAAC H. TIFFANY. vii, 32. (M., 1816.)

7785. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Men capable of.—I have no fear but that the result of our experiment will be, that men may be trusted to govern themselves without a master. Could the contrary of this be proved, I should conclude, either that there is no God, or that he is a malevolent being.—To DAVID HARTLEY. ii, 165. (P., 1787.)

7786. ——. It is a happy truth that man is capable of self-government, and only rendered otherwise by the moral degradation designedly superinduced on him by the wicked acts of his tyrant.—To M. De MARBOIS. vii, 77. (M., 1817.)

7787. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Natural.—From the nature of things, every society must at all times possess within itself the sovereign powers of legislation.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 138. FORD ED., i, 443. (1774.)

7788. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Preservation of.—It behooves our citizens to be on their guard, to be firm in their principles, and full of confidence in themselves. We are able to preserve our self-government if we will but think so.—To T. M. RANDOLPH. iv, 320. FORD ED., vii, 423. (Pa., Feb. 1800.)

7789. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Purposes of.—The provisions we have made for our government are such as please ourselves; they answer the substantial purposes of government and of justice, and other purposes than these should not be answered.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S PROPOSITION. FORD ED., i, 479. (July 1775.)

7790. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Qualifications for.—Some preparation seems necessary to qualify the body of a nation for self-government.—To DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. FORD ED., viii, 179. (W., 1802.)

7791. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Reason and.—It is honorable for us to have produced the first legislature who had the courage to declare that the reason of man may be trusted with the formation of his own action.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 67. FORD ED., iv, 334. (P., 1786.)

7792. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Right to.—The inhabitants of the several States of British America are subject to the laws which they adopted at their first settlement, and to such others as have since been made by their respective Legislatures, duly constituted and appointed with their own consent. No other Legislature whatever can rightly exercise authority over them; and these privileges they hold as the common rights of mankind, confirmed by the political constitutions they have respectively assumed, and also by several charters of compact from the Crown.—RESOLUTION OF ALBEMARLE COUNTY. FORD ED., i, 418. (July 26, 1774.)

7794. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Rightful limits.—We owe every other sacrifice to ourselves, to our federal brethren, and to the world at large, to pursue with temper and perseverance the great experiment, which shall prove that man is capable of living in society, governing itself by laws self-imposed, and securing to its members the enjoyment of life, liberty, property and peace; and further to show, that even when the government of its choice shall manifest a tendency to degeneracy, we are not at once to despair but that the will and the watchfulness of its sounder parts will reform its aberrations, recall it to original and legitimate principles and restrain it within the rightful limits of self-government.—VIRGINIA PROTEST. ix, 498. FORD ED., x, 351. (M., 1825.)

7795. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Spaniards and.—I fear the Spaniards are too heavily oppressed by ignorance and superstition for self-government, and whether a change from foreign to domestic despotism will be to their advantage remains to be seen.—To DR. SAMUEL BROWN. vi, 165. (M., 1813.)

7796. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Study of.—I sincerely think that the prominent characters of the country where you are could not better prepare their sons for the duties they will have to perform in their new government than by sending them here [the University of Virginia] where they might become familiarized with the habits and practice of self-government. This lesson is scarcely to be acquired but in this country, and yet without it, the political vessel is all sail and no ballast.—To HENRY DEARBORN. FORD ED., x, 237. (M., 1822.)

in society are not innate. They are the result of habit and long training."—To Edward Everett. vii, 341. (M., 1824.)

7798. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Universal.—I wish to see all mankind exercising self-government, and capable of exercising it.—To Marquis Lafayette. vii, 67. Ford ed., x, 85. (M., 1817.)

7799. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Usurpation and.—[The] exercises of usurped power [by Parliament] have not been confined to instances alone in which themselves were interested, but they have also intermeddled with the regulation of the internal affairs of the Colonies.—Rights of British America. i, 130. Ford ed., i, 434. (1774.)

7800. SELF-GOVERNMENT, Voluntary associations and.—If [the society] is merely a voluntary association, the submission of its members will be merely voluntary also, as no act of coercion would be permitted by the general law.—To William Lee. vii, 57. (M., 1817.)

7802. SENATE (French), Plan of.—They [the French] propose a Senate, chosen on the plan of our Federal Senate by the Provincial Assemblies, but to be for life, of a certain age (they talk of forty years), and certain wealth (four or five hundred guineas a year), but to have no other power as to laws but to remonstrate against them to the representatives, who will then determine their fate by a simple majority. This * * * is a mere council of revision like that of New York, which, in order to be something, must form an alliance with the King, to avail themselves of his veto. The alliance will be useful to both, and to the nation.—To James Madison. iii, 97. Ford ed., v, 108. (P., Aug. 1789.)

7803. SENATE (United States), Advice and consent.—When the British treaty of — arrived, without any provision against the impression of our seamen, I determined not to ratify it. The Senate thought I should ask their advice. I thought that would be a mockery of them, when I was predetermined against following it, should they advise ratification.—To Spencer Roane. vii, 135. Ford ed., x, 142. (P.F., Sep. 1819.)

7804. ———. The Constitution has made the advice of the Senate necessary to confirm a treaty, but not to reject it. This has been blamed by some; but I have never doubted its soundness.—To Spencer Roane. vii, 135. Ford ed., x, 142. (P.F., 1819.)

7805. SENATE (United States), Cabal in.—Mischief may be done negatively as well as positively. Of this a cabal in the Senate of the United States has furnished many proofs.—To John Adams. vi, 224. Ford ed., ix, 426. (M., 1813.)

7806. SENATE (United States), Check on House of Representatives.—The Senate was intended as a check on the will of the Representatives when too hasty. They are not only that, but completely so on the will of the people also; and in my opinion are heaping coals of fire, not only on their persons, but on their body, as a branch of the Legislature. * * * It seems to me that the opinion is fairly launched into public that they should be placed under the control of a more frequent recurrence to the will of their constituents.* This seems requisite to complete the experiment, whether they do more harm or good.—To James Madison. iv, 107. Ford ed., vi, 511. (M., May 1794.)

7807. SENATE (United States), Executive and.—The President desired my opinion whether the Senate has a right to negative the grade he may think it expedient to use in a foreign mission as well as the person to be appointed. I think the Senate has no right to negative the grade.—Opinion on the Powers of the Senate. vii, 465. Ford ed., v, 161. (1790.)

7809. ———. It may be objected that the Senate may by continual negatives on the person, do what amounts to a negative on the grade, and so, indirectly, defeat this right of the President. But this would be a breach of trust; an abuse of the power confided to the Senate, of which that body cannot be supposed capable.—Opinion on the Powers of the Senate. vii, 466. Ford ed., v, 162. (1790.) See Appointment.

7810. SENATE (United States), Executive information and.—The Secretary of State, having received a note from Mr. Strong, as chairman of a Committee of the Senate, asking a conference with him on the subject of the late diplomatic nominations to Paris, London and the Hague, he met them in the Senate chamber in the evening of the same day, and stated to them in substance * * * that he should on all occasions be ready to give to the Senate, or to any other branch of the government, whatever information might properly be communicated, and might be necessary to enable them to proceed in the line of their respective offices: that on the present occasion particularly, as the Senate had to decide on the fitness of certain persons to act for the United States at certain courts, they would be the better enabled to decide, if they were informed of the state of our affairs at those courts, and what we had to do there. [Jefferson then explained the situation of affairs.]-The Anas. ix, 420.

FORD ED., i, 170. (W., January 1792.)

7811. SENATE (United States), Firmness.—The Senate alone remained undismayed to the last. Firm to their purposes, regardless of public opinion, and more disposed to coerce than to court it, not a man of their majority gave way in the least.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 330. FORD ED., vii, 447.
(Pa., May 1800.)

7812. SENATE (United States), Honorable.—The Senate is the most honorable and independent station in our government, one where you can peculiarly raise yourself in the public estimation.—To WILLIAM SHORT. FORD ED., v, 244. (M., 1790.)

7813. SENATE (United States), Jefferson's address to.—To give the usual opportunity of appointing a President pro tempore, I now propose to retire from the chair of the Senate; and, as the time is near at hand when the Senate will cease which have for some time subsisted between this honorable house and myself, I beg leave, before I withdraw, to return them my grateful thanks for all the instances of attention and respect with which they have been pleased to honor me. In the discharge of my functions here, it has been my conscientious endeavor to observe impartial justice, without regard to persons or subjects; and if I have failed in impressing this on the mind of the Senate, it will be to me a circumstance of the deepest regret. I may have erred at times. No doubt I have erred. This is the law of human nature. For honest errors, however, indulgence may be hoped. I owe to truth and justice at the same time to declare that the habits of order and decorum, which so strongly characterize the proceedings of the Senate, have rendered the upmbirage of their president an office of little difficulty; that in times and on questions which have severely tried the sensibilities of the house, calm and temperate discussion has rarely been disturbed by departures from order. Should the support which I received from the Senate, in the performance of my duties here, attend me into the new station to which the public will has transferred me, I shall consider it as commeming under the happiest auspices. With these expressions of my dutiful regard to the Senate, as a body, I ask leave to mingle my particular wishes for the health and happiness of the individuals who compose it, and to render them my cordial and respectful adieu.
—Speech to the U. S. SENATE. iv, 362.
FORD ED., vii, 501. (Feb. 28, 1801.)

7814. SENATE (United States), John Adams's opinions.—The system of the Senate may be inferred from their transactions heretofore, and from the following declaration made to me personally by their oracle [President Adams]: "No republic can ever be of any duration without a Senate, and a Senate deeply and strongly rooted; strong enough to bear up against all popular storms and passions. The only fault in the constitution of our Senate is, that their term of office is not durable enough. Hitherto they have done well, but probably they will be forced to give way in time. I suppose "their having done well hitherto", alluded to the stand they made on the British treaty.
This declaration may be considered as their text; that they consider themselves as the bulwarks of the government, and will be rendering that the more secure, in proportion as they can assume greater powers.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 215. FORD ED., vii, 207.
(Pa., Feb. 1798.)

7815. ——. President Adams and I went on the Constitution; and in the course of our conversation he said, that no republic could ever last which had not a Senate, and a Senate deeply and strongly rooted, strong enough to bear up against all popular storms and passions; that he thought our Senate as well constituted as it could have been, being chosen by the Legislatures; for if these could not support them, he did not know what could do it; that perhaps it might have been as well for them to be chosen by the State at large, as that would insure a choice of distinguished men, since none but such could be known to a whole people; that the only fault in our Senate was that it was not durable enough, that, hitherto, it had behaved very well; however, he was afraid they would give way in the end. That as to trusting to a popular assembly for the preservation of our liberties, it was the merest chimera imagi-able; they never had any rule of decision but their own will, that he would as lieve be again in the hands of our old committees of safety, who made the law and executed it at the same time; that it had been observed by some writer * * * that anarchy did more mischief in one night than tyranny in an age; and that in modern times we might say with truth, that in France, anarchy had done more harm in one night, than all the despotism of their kings had ever done in twenty or thirty years. The point in which he views our Senate, as the Colossus of the Constitution, serves as a key to the politics of the Senate,
who are two-thirds of them in his sentiments, and accounts for the bold line of conduct they pursue.—The Anas. ix, 189. FORD ED., i, 377.
(Nov. 1798.)

7816. SENATE (United States), Nominations.—Should the [federalists] yield the election, I have reason to expect, in the outset, the greatest difficulties as to nominations.
The late incumbents, running away from their offices and leaving them vacant, will prevent my filling them without the previous advice of the Senate. How this difficulty is to be got over I know not.—To JAMES MONROE.
iv, 355. FORD ED., vii, 491. (W., Feb. 1801.)

7817. SENATE (United States), People and.—In the General Government, the Senate is scarcely republican at all, as not electing by the people directly, and so long secured even against those who do elect them. —To John Taylor. vi, 607. Ford ed., x, 30. (M., 1816.)

7518. SENATE (United States), Rules of. —The rules of the [British] Parliament are probably as wisely constructed for governing the debates of a considerative body, and obtaining its true sense, as any which can become known to us; and the acquiescence of the Senate hitherto under the references to them, has given them the sanction of their approbation. —Parliamentary Manual. ix, 3. (1797.)

7519. — I have begun a sketch which those who come after me will successively correct and fill up, till a code of rules shall be formed for the use of the Senate. The effects of which may be accuracy in business, economy of time, order, uniformity, and impartiality. —Parliamentary Manual. ix, 4. (1797.)

7520. — In the old Congress [of the confederation] the mode of managing the business of the House was not only unparliamentary, but the forms were so awkward and inconvenient that it was impossible sometimes to get at the true sense of the majority. The House of Representatives of the United States are now pretty much in the same situation. In the Senate it is in our power to get into a better way. Our ground is this: The Senate have established a few rules for their government, and have subjected the decisions on these and on all other points of order without debate, and without appeal, to the judgment of their President. He, for his own sake, as well as theirs, must prefer referring to some system of rules ready formed; and there can be no question that the parliamentary rules are the best known to us for managing the debates, and obtaining the sense of a deliberative body. I have, therefore, made them my rule of decision, rejecting those of the old Congress altogether, and it gives entire satisfaction to the Senate; insomuch that we shall not only have a good system there, but probably, by the example of its effects, produce a conformity in the other branch. But in the course of this business I find perplexities, * * * and so little has the parliamentary branch of the law been attended to, that I not only find no person here [Philadelphia], but not even a book to aid me. * * * You will see by the enclosed paper what they are. I know with what pain you write; therefore, I have left a margin in which you can write a simple negative or affirmative opposite every position. This is what I earnestly solicit from you, and I would not give you the trouble if I had any other resource. But you are, in fact, the only spark of parliamentary science now remaining to us. I am the more anxious, because I have been forming a Manual of Parliamentary Law, which I mean to deposit with the Senate as the standard by which I judge, and am willing to be judged. —To George Wythe. ix, 5. Ford ed., vii, 426. (Pa., Feb. 1800.) See Parliamentary Law.

7521. SENATE (United States), Wisdom. —The Senate * * * must from its constitution be a wise and steady body.—To C. W. F. Dumas. ii, 367. (A., 1788.) See Congress and Judiciary.

7522. SENATE (Virginia), Defects in. —The Senate [of Virginia] is, by its constitution, too homogeneous with the House of Delegates. Being chosen by the same electors, at the same time, and out of the same subjects, the choice falls of course on men of the same description. The purpose of establishing different houses of legislation is to introduce the influence of different interests or different principles. Thus in Great Britain it is said their constitution relies on the House of Commons for honesty, and the Lords for wisdom; which would be a rational reliance, if honesty were to be bought with money, and if wisdom were hereditary. In some of the American States, the delegates and Senators are so chosen, as that the first represent the persons, and the second the property of the State. But with us, wealth and wisdom have equal chance for admission into both houses. We do not, therefore, derive from the separation of our Legislature into two houses, those benefits which a proper complication of principles is capable of producing, and those which alone can compensate the evils which may be produced by their disensions. —To M. FORD. viii, 361. Ford ed., iii, 223. (1782.)

7523. SENATE (Virginia), Election of members.—For the election of Senators, let the several counties be allotted by the Senate, from time to time, into such and so many districts as they shall find best; and let each county at the time of electing its delegates, choose senatorial electors, qualified as themselves are, and four in number for each delegate their county is entitled to send, who shall convene, and conduct themselves in such manner as the legislature shall direct, with the senatorial electors from the other counties of their district, and then choose, by ballot, one senator for every six delegates which their district is entitled to choose. —Proposed Constitution for Virginia. viii, 443. Ford ed., iii, 323. (1783.)

— SENATORS (United States), Election of.—See Constitution (Federal).

7524. SENATORS (United States), Term of office. —The term of office to our Senate, like that of the judges, is too long for my approbation. —To James Martin. vi, 213. Ford ed., ix, 420. (M., Sep. 1813.)

7525. SENECAN, Moral system of. —Seneca is a fine moralist, disfiguring his work at times with some Stoics and affecting too much antithesis and point, yet giving us on the whole a great deal of sound and practical morality. —To William Short. vii, 139. Ford ed., x, 144. (M., 1819.)

7526. SENILITY, Abhorrent. —Badly decay 's gloomy in prospect, but of all human contemplations the most abhorrent is body without mind. —To John Adams. vii, 27. (M., 1816.)
7827. SENILITY, Unconscious.—The misfortune of a weakened mind is an insensibility to its weakness.—To Edward Livingston. vii, 495. (M., 1825.)

7828. SENSE, Directed by.—The good sense of our people will direct the boat ultimately to a proper port.—To Marquis Lafayette. Ford ed., x, 234. (M., 1822.)

7829. SENSE, National.—My chief object is to let the good sense of the nation have fair play, believing it will best take care of itself.—To Dr. Joseph Priestley. Ford ed., viii, 181. (W., 1802.)

7830. SENSE, People and.—I am persuaded myself that the good sense of the people will always be found to be the best army.—To Edward Carrington. ii, 99. Ford ed., iv, 359. (P., 1787.)

7831. —— The operations which have lately taken place in America [adoption of Constitution] fill me with pleasure. They realize the confidence I had, that whenever our affairs go, obviously wrong, the good sense of the people will interpose, and set them to rights. —To David Humphreys. iii, 12. Ford ed., v, 89. (P., 1789.)

7833. SENSE, Republicanism and.—It was by the sober sense of our citizens that we were safely and steadily conducted from anarchy to republicanism, and it is by the same agency alone we can be kept from falling back. —To Arthur Campbell. iv, 198. Ford ed., vii, 170. (M., 1797.) See Common Sense.

7834. SERVICE, Civic.—Every man is under the natural duty of contributing to the necessities of the society; and this is all the laws should enforce on him.—To F. W. Gilmer. viii, 3. Ford ed., x, 32. (M., 1816.) See Duty.

7835. SERVICE, Credit for. —The inquiries in your printed letter * * * would lead to the unhappy history of my whole life, than which nothing could be more repugnant to my feelings. I have been connected, as many fellow laborers were, with the great events which happened to mark the epoch of our lives. But these belong to no one in particular, all of us did our parts, and no one can claim the transactions to himself.—To Skelton Jones. v, 462. (M., 1809.)

7836. —— I was only of a hand devoted to the cause of Independence, all of whom exerted equally their best endeavors for its success, and have a common right to the merits of its acquisition. So also is the civil revolution by very many and very meritorious were the worthy patriots who assisted in bringing back our government to its republican track.—To William T. Barry. vii, 255. (M., 1822.)

7837. SERVICE, Old age and.—Had it been my good fortune to preserve at the age of seventy, all the activity of body and mind with my health. In earlier life, I should have employed it now, as then, in incessant labors to serve those to whom I could be useful.—To M. de Lomerie. vi, 107. (M., 1813.)

7838. SERVICE, Rendering.—Nothing makes me more happy than to render any service in my power, of whatever description.—To Samuel Osgood. i, 451. (P., 1785.)

7840. SERVICE, Tours of.—You say I "must not make my final exit from public life till it will be marked with just lying circumstances which all good citizens will regret, and that my friends can appeal." To my fellow-citizens the debt of service has been fully and faithfully paid. I acknowledge that such debts exist, that a tour of duty, in whatever line he can be most useful to his country, is due from every individual. It is not, however, easy of what length exactly this tour should be, but we may safely say of what length it should not be. Not of our whole life, for instance, for that would be to be born a slave—not even of a very large portion of it. I have not discharged the public duties of twenty years; one-half of which has been spent in important occupation with their affairs, and absence from my own. I have served my tour then. No positive engagement, by word or deed, binds me to a further service. No commitment of any nature exists in any form by me but requires that I should see them through it. I am pledged by no act which gives any tribunal a call upon me before I withdraw. Even my enemies do not pretend this. I stand clear, then, of public right on all points. My friends I have committed to. No circumstances attended my passage from office to office, which could lead them, and others through them, into deception as to the time I might remain, and particularly they and all have known with what reluctance I engaged and have continued in the present one [Secretary of State], and of my uniform determination to retire from it at an early day. If the public, then, has no claim on me, and my friends nothing to justify, the decision will rest on my own feelings alone. The time is near when the world will be all different from what they are now; when perhaps the esteem of the world was of higher value in my eye than everything in it. But age, experience and reflection preserving to that only its due value, have set a higher on tranquillity.—To James Madison. iii, 577. Ford ed., vi, 290. (June 1793.) See Jefferson.

7841. SHAY'S REBELLION, Conduct and motives of.—Can history produce an instance of rebellion so honorably conducted? I say nothing of its motives. They were founded in ignorance, not wickedness. God forbid a war should ever be twenty years without such a rebellion. The people cannot be all, and in all ways, well informed. The part which is wrong will be discontented in proportion to the importance of the facts they misconceive. If they remain quiet under such misconceptions, it is a lethargy, by which a forerunner of death to the public liberty. —To W. S. Smith. ii, 318. Ford ed., iv, 467. (P., 1787.)

7842. SHAY'S REBELLION, European opinion of.—The tumults in America, I expected, would have produced in Europe an unfavorable opinion of our political state. But it has not. On the contrary, the small effect of these tumults seems to have given more confidence in the firmness of our governments. The interposition of the people themselves on the side of government has had a great effect on the opinion here.—To Edward Carrington. ii, 99. Ford ed., iv, 359. (1787.)

7843. SHAY'S REBELLION, Excuse for.—Those people are not entirely without excuse. Before the war, those States depended on the fish and whale fisheries for a large part of their revenue, and the remittances to the mother country were consumed in England, and much of the latter in the Mediterranean. The heavy duties on American whale oil, now required in England, exclude it from that market; and the Algerines exclude them from bringing their fish into the Mediterranean. France has opened her ports for their oil, but in the meanwhile, their ancient debts are pressing them, and they have nothing to pay with. The Massachusetts Assembly, too, in their zeal for paying their public debt had laid a tax too heavy to be paid in the circumstances of their State. The Indians disposed, too, to make war on us. These compl cated causes determined Congress to increase their forces to 2000 men. The latter was the sole object avowed, yet the former entered for something into the measure.—To William Carmichael. ii, 81. Ford ed., iv, 345. (P., 1786.)

7844. SHAY'S REBELLION, Government and.—I am not discouraged by this; for thus I calculate: An insurrection in one of thirteen States in the course of eleven years that they have subsisted, amounts to one in any particular State, in one hundred and forty-three years by a century and a half. This would not be near as many as have happened in every other government that has ever existed. So that we shall have the difference between a light and a heavy government as clear gain.—To David Hartley. ii, 165. (P., 1787.)

7845. —This insurrection will not weigh against the inconveniences of a government of force, such as are monarchies and aristocracies.—To T. B. Hollis. ii, 168. (P., 1787.)

7846. SHAY'S REBELLION, Lessons of.—The commotions that have taken place in America, as far as they are yet known to me, offer nothing threatening. They are a proof that the people have liberty enough, and I could not wish them less than they have. If the happiness of the mass of the people can be secured at the expense of a little tempest now and then, or even of a little blood, it will be a precious purchase. Malo libertatem periculo san quam quietem servaturum. Let common sense and honesty have fair play, and they will soon set things to rights.—To Ezra Stiles. ii, 27. (P., 1786.)

7847. SHAY'S REBELLION, The people and.—The interposition of the people themselves on the side of the government has had the greatest effect on the opinion here [Europe]. I am persuaded myself that the good sense of the people will always be found to be the best army. They may be led astray for a moment, but will soon correct themselves. The petty censures of the people on their errors; and even their errors will tend to keep these to the true principles of their institution. To punish these errors too severely would be to suppress the only safeguard of the public liberty. The way to prevent these irregu intercussions of France is to give them full information of their affairs through the canals of the public papers, and to contrive that those papers should penetrate the whole mass of the people. The basis of our government be- ing the opinion of the people, the very first ob- ject should be to keep that right; and were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers, or newspapers without a government, should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter. But we should understand that every man should receive those papers, and be capable of reading them.—To Edward Carrington. ii, 99. Ford ed., iv, 359. (P., 1787.)

7848. SHAY'S REBELLION, Un-alarmed by.—I had seen without alarm accounts of the disturbances in the East. * * * can never realize how you will go far wrong where common sense has fair play.—To John Adams. ii, 73. (P., 1786.)

7849. —The late rebellion in Massachusetts has given more alarm than I think it should have done. Calculate that one rebellion in thirteen States 'in the course of eleven years, is but one for each State in a century and a half. No country should be so long without a change of government or power in the hands of government: prevent insurrections. France, with all its despotism, and two or three hundred thousand men always in arms, has had three insurrections in the three hundred years that they have been a nation, of which greater numbers were engaged than in Massachusetts, and a great deal more blood was spilt. In Turkey, which Montesquieu supposes more despotie, insurrections are the events of every day. In England, where the hand of power is lighter than here, but heavier than with us, they happen every half dozen years. Compare again the ferocious depredations of their insurgents with the order, the moderation, and the almost self-extinguishment of ours.—To James Madison. ii, 331. Ford ed., iv, 479. (P., 1787.)

7850. SHAY'S REBELLION, Unjustifiable.—I am impatient to learn your sentiments on the late troubles in the Eastern States. So far as I have yet seen, they do not appear to threaten serious consequences. Those States have suffered by the stoppage of the channels of their commerce, which have not yet been found other. This must render money scarce, and make the people uneasy. This un casiness has produced acts absolutely unjustifiable; but I hope they will provoke no severities from their governments. A consciousness of those in power that their administration of the public affairs has been honest may, perhaps, produce too great a degree of indignation; and those characters, wherein fear predominates over hope, may apprehend too much from these instances of irregularity. They may conclude too hastily that nature has formed man insusceptible of any other government than that of force, a conclusion not founded in truth nor experience.—To James Madison. ii, 104. Ford ed., iv, 361. (P., 1787.)

7851. SHEEP, Profits from.—I had never before considered, with due attention, the profit from sheep. I shall not be able to put the subject into that form exactly the ensu- autumn, but against another I hope I shall. —To President Washington. iv, 5. Ford ed., vi, 83. (Pa., 1793.)

7852. SHEEP, Protection of.—If you return to us, bring a couple of pair of true-bred shepherd's dogs. You will add a valuable pos possible: not a moment! I am not without great attention to the raising of sheep.—To Dupont de Nemours. v, 433. (W., 1809.)

7853. SHEEP, Wolves and.—Sheep are subject to many diseases which carry them off in great numbers. In the middle and upper parts of Virginia they are subject to the wolf, and in all parts are subject to dogs. These are great obstacles to their multiplication. — Notes on Arthur Young’s Letter. Ford Ed., vi, 85. (1792.)

7854. SHEEP (Merinos), Importing.—
The necessity we are under, and the determination we have formed of emancipating ourselves from a dependence on foreign countries for manufactures which may be advantageously established among ourselves, has produced a very general desire to improve the quality of our wool, and the breed of the Merino rams of sheep. Your sense of the duties you owe to your station will not permit me to ask, nor yourself to do any act which might compromit you with the government [Spain] with which you reside, or forfeit that confidence on their part which can and must be the support of usefulness to your country. But, as far as that will permit you to give to the procuring and bringing away some of the valuable race, I take the liberty of soliciting you to do so. It will be an important service rendered to your country; to which you will be further encouraged by the assurance that the enterprise is solely on the behalf of agricultural gentlemen of distinguished character in Washington and its neighborhood, with a view of disseminating the benefits of their success as widely as they can. Without any interest in it myself, other than the general one, I cannot help wishing a favorable result.  .—To George W. Irving. V, 479. (M., Nov. 1809.)

7855. SHEEP (Merinos), Present of.—I send you a Merino ram of full blood, born of my imported ewes of the race called Agüerres, by the imported ram of the Paular race which belonged to the Prince of Peace, was sold by order of the Junto of Estremadura, was purchased and sent to me, 1810, by Mr. Jarvis, our consul at Lisbon. The Paulars are deemed the finest race in Spain for size and wool taken together, the Agüerres superior to all in wool, but small.—To Archibald Stuart. Ford Ed., x, 109. (M., 1818.)

7856. SHEEP (Merinos), Raising.—I thank you [President Madison] for your promised attention to my portion of the Merinos.   What shall we do with them? I have been so disgusted with the scandalous extortions lately practiced in the sale of these animals, and with the ascription of patriotism and praise to the sellers, as if the thousands of dollars apiece they have not been ashamed to receive were not rewards enough, that I am disposed to consider as right, whatever is the reverse of what they have done. Since fortune has put the occasion upon us, is it not incumbent upon us so to dispose this benefit to the farmers of our country, and to reward those who, forgetting their own wealth, and the honest simplicity of the farmers, have thought them fit objects of the shaming art, and to excite, by a better example, the condemnation due to theirs? I am more acknowledged in the family of agriculturists than that the few who can afford it should incur the risk and expense of all new improvements, and give the benefit freely to the many, in more restricted circumstances. The question that arises with me, after what I have said, is whether I shall be willing to concur with you in any plan you shall approve, and in order that we may have some proposition to begin upon, I will throw out a first idea, to be modified or postponed to whatever you shall think better. Give all the full-blooded males we can raise to the different counties of our State, one to each, as fast as we can furnish them. And as there must be some rule of priority for the distribution, let us begin with our own counties, which are contiguous and nearly central to the State, and proceed, circle after circle, till we have given a ram to every county in the State. This can be done in about seven years, if we add to the full descendants those which will have passed to the fourth generation from common ewes. To make the benefit of a single male as general as practicable to the county, we may ask some of our best farmers to each county to have a small herd of the best animal and prescribe rules for his care and government. We should retain ourselves all the full-blooded ewes, that they may enable us the sooner to furnish a male to every county. When all shall have been provided with rams, we may take our knees to another measure, in option to give a ewe also to every county, if it be thought necessary.   In the meantime, we shall not be without a profit indemnifying our trouble and expense. For if of our present stock of common ewes, we place with the ram as many which may be copied as the United States may send us, we may sell the male lambs of every year for such reasonable price as, in addition to the wool, will pay for the maintenance of the flock. The first year they will be half-bloods, the second three-quarters, the third seven-eighths, and the fourth full-blooded. If we take care in selling annually half the ewes also, to keep those of the highest blood, this will be a fund for kindnesses to our friends, as well as for indemnification to ourselves; and our whole State may thus be become as this small stone was filled in a very few years with this valuable race, and more satisfaction result to ourselves than money ever administered to the bosom of a shaver. There will be danger that what is here proposed, though but an act of ordinary duty, may, if not regulated into one of instruction, but malice will always find bad motives for good actions. Shall we therefore never do good?—To President Madison. V, 522. (M., 1810.)

7857. SHELLS, Growth of.—It will not be difficult to induce me to give up the theory of the growth of shells, without their being the nidus of animals. It is only an idea, and not an opinion of nature has forced upon parts which had been the bed of the ocean. But have we any better proof of such an effort of nature than of her shooting a lapidic juice into the form of a shell? No such convulsion has taken place in our time, nor within the annals of his- torian is the distance greater between the shooting of the lapidic juice into the form of a crystal or a diamond, which we see, and into the shell, which we do not see, than between the forcing volcanic matter a little above the surface, where it is in fusion, which we see, and the forcing the bed of the earth, fifteen thousand feet above the ordinary surface of the earth, which we do not see. It is not possible to believe any of these hypotheses, and, if we lean towards any of them, it should 7863. — Our ships, though purchased and navigated by their own [British] subjects, are not permitted to be used even in their trade with us. While the vessels of other nations are authorized by standing laws, which cannot be altered but by the consent of the three branches of the British legislature, in carrying thither any produce or manufacture of the country to which they belong, which may be lawfully sold in any vessels, ours, with the same prohibition, are further prohibited by a standing law (12 Car. 2, 18, sect. 3) [the Navigation Act] from carrying thither all and any of our own domestic productions and manufactures. A subsequent act, indeed, has provided the means to permit the carriage of our own productions in our own bottoms, at its sole discretion; and the permission has been given from year to year by proclamation, but subject every moment to be withdrawn on that single will; in which event, our vessels having anything on board, or interdicted from the entry of all British ports. The disadvantage of a tenure which may be so suddenly discontinued, was experienced by our merchants on a late occasion (April 12, 1792), when the act proposed was to have been put strictly into force, gave them just apprehensions for the fate of their vessels and cargoes despatched or destined for the ports of Great Britain. The minister of that court, indeed, frankly expressed his personal conviction that the words of the order went farther than was intended, and so be afterwards officially informed us; but the embarrassments of the moment were real and great, and the possibility of their renewal lays our commerce to that country under the same disfavour as to other countries, where it is regulated by a single legislator; and the distinction is too remarkable not to be noticed, that our navigation is excluded from the security of fixed laws, while that security is given to the navigation of others.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 641. FORD ED., vii, 474. (Dec. 1793.)

7864. SHIPING (American), French decree against. — The French decree making the vessel, friendly or enemy, according to the hands by which the cargo was manufactured, has produced a great sensation among the merchants of Philadelphia. Its operation is not yet perhaps well understood; but it probably will put our shipping out of competition, because British bottoms, which can come under convoy, will alone be trusted with return cargoes. Ours, losing this benefit, would need a higher frequence in which, therefore, they will be underbid by the British. They must then retire from the competition.—TO JAMES MADISON, iv, 220. FORD ED., vii, 216. (Pa., March 1798.)

7865. SHIPING (American), Navigation act. — Our navigation law (if it be wise to have any) should be the reverse of that of England. Instead of confining importations to home-bottoms, or those of the producing nation, I think we should confine exportations to home-bottoms, or to those of nations having treaties with us. Our exportations are heavy, and would nourish a great force of our own, or be a tempting price to the French participation of it, in exchange for free access to all their possessions. This is an object to which our government alone is adequate, in the gross; but I have ventured to pursue it here (France), so far as the consumption of our productions by this country extends. Thus, in our arrangements relative to tobacco, none can be received here, but in French or American bottoms. This is employment for near two thousand seamen, and pro-nearly that number of British out of employ.— To General Washington. ii. 536. Ford Ed.,
v. 58. (P. 1788.)

7866. SHIPPING (American), Peculiarities of.—It is doubted whether it will be ex-cedent to regulate the duty, payable by an American vessel entering a French port, either by her draught or the number of her masts.
If by the draught of water, it will fall unequally on us as a nation; be it related to the eight of her vessels, or their engine, or the swiftness with which she sails, so that they draw more water than those of other nations, of the same burthen. If by the number of masts, it will fall unequally on individuals; because we often see ships of one hundred and eighty tons, and brigs of three hundred and sixty. This, then, would produce an inequality among individuals of six to one.
The present principle is the most just, to regulate by the burthen.—To Count de Montmorin. ii. 172. Ford Ed., iv. 399. (P. 1787.)

7867. SHIPPING (American), Protection of.—When a nation refuses to consider any vessel as ours which has not been built within our territories, we should refuse to call vessels, and vessels built within their territories.—Foreign Commerce Report. vi, 649. Ford Ed., vi. 482. (Dec. 1793.)

7868. SHIPPING (American), Simplici-fication of duties.—It is certainly desirable that these duties should be reduced to a single one. Their names and numbers perplex and harass the merchant more than their amount;
subject him to imposition, and to the suspicion of it when there is none.—To Count de More Montmorin. ii. 172. Ford Ed., iv. 400. (P. 1787.)

7869. SHIPPING (American), West Indian trade.—The British allow our commodities to be taken from our own ports to the West Indies in their vessels only. Let us allow their vessels to take them to no port. The transportation of our own produce is worth seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling annually; it employs about 800,000 tons and 1,200 seamen constantly. It will be no misfortune that Great Britain obliges us to exclude her from a participation in this business. Our own shipping will grow fast under the exclusion, and till it is equal to the object the Dutch will supply us.—To James Madison. See Ford Ed., iv. 37. (P. 1785.) See Commerce. Duties: Discriminating, Flag Protection and Navigation.

7870. SHIPS, Passports.—It has been stated in our treaties with the French, Dutch and Prussians, that when it happens that either party is at war, and the other neutral, the neutral passports only are entitled to the vessels belonging to their subjects, in order to avoid dissension; and it has been thought that passports of such high import to the persons and property of our citizens should have the highest sanction; that of the signature of the president of the United States. The authority of Congress also, in the case of sea letters to East India vessels, was in favor of this sanction. It is now become a question whether these passports shall be given only to ships of less than 100 tons, and only to the United States, or may be given also to those owned in the United States, though built in foreign countries. The persons and property of our citizens are entitled to the protection of our government in all places where they may lawfully go. No laws forbid a merchant to buy, own, and use a foreign-built vessel. She is, then, his lawful property and entitled to the protection of his country wherever he is lawfully using her. The laws, indeed, for the encouragement of shipbuilding, have given to home-built vessels the exclusive privilege of being registered and paying lighter duties. To this end, vessels of the foreign-built vessel, though owned at home, does not pretend. But the laws have not said that they withdraw their protection from the foreign-built vessel. To this protection, then, she retains her title, notwithstanding the preferable rights of the United States. Should it be hard, indeed, because the law has given one valuable right to home-built vessels, to inhibit that it had taken away all rights from those foreign-built. In conformity with the idea that all the vessels in a state are itted, the treaties before mentioned have settled that passports shall be given, not merely to vessels built in the United States, but to the vessels belonging to them:
and when one of these nations shall take a vessel, if it has not yet been in port, we may conclude she does not belong to the United States, and is, therefore, lawful prize; so that to refuse these passports to foreign-built vessels belonging to our merchants, is to give them up to capture with their cargoes.
They are an important part of the produce of our fields to rot on our hands, or lose half its value by subjecting it to high taxation, merely that our ship-builders may have briser employ? Shall the whole mass of our farmers be sacrificed to the class of individuals? Objection. No. We are inclusive transfers of foreign ships to our merchants, merely to obtain for them the cover of our passports. Answer. The same objection lies to giving passports to home-built vessels.
They may be owned, and are owned by foreigners, and may be collusively re-transferred to our merchants to obtain our passports. To lessen the danger of collusion, however, I should be for delivering passports in our own ports only. If they were to be sent blank to foreign ports, to be delivered there, the power of checking collusion would be small and they might be employed to cover purposes of no benefit to us (which we ought not to countenance), and to throw our vessels out of business; but if issued only to vessels in our own ports, besides, shall we permit the ships built in foreign countries, the property of any vessel is our property; and always that the cargo is of our produce. State the case that it shall be found that all our shipping, home-built and foreign-built, is inadequate to the transportation of our produce to market; so that a large list of vessels, at home and abroad, may remain produce on hand. This must be put into vessels owned by foreigners. Should these obtain collusively the protection of our passport, it will cover their vessel, indeed, but it will not cover our vessels at all. It will be the case, if the issuing passports cease to be continued to our ports, it will be our own vessels for the most part, and always our cargoes which will be covered by them. I am, therefore, of opin'on, that passports ought to be issued to all vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, but only on their clearing out from our own ports, and for that voyage only.—OPINION ON SHIP PASSPORTS. vii, 624. (May 1793.)

7871. The most important interests of the United States hang upon this quest on. [Giving passports to foreign-built ships.] The produce of the earth is their principal source of wealth. Our home-built vessels would suffice for the transportation of a very small part of this produce to market, and even a part of these vessels will be withdrawn by high premiums to other lines of business. All the rest of our produce, then, must remain on our hands, or have its price reduced by a war insurance. Many descriptions of our produce will not bear this reduction and would, therefore, remain on hand. We shall lose, also, a great proportion of the profits of navigation. The great harvest for these is when other nations are at war, and our fleet neutral. But if we can augment our stock of shipping only by the slow process of building, the harvest will be over while we are only preparing instruments to reap it. The moment of breeding seamen will be lost for want of bottoms to embalm them.—OPINION ON SHIP PASSPORTS. vii, 625. (May 1793.)

7872. It has been stated in our treaties with the French, Dutch, and Frussians, that when it happens that either party is at war, and the other neutral, the neutral shall give passports of a certain tenor to the vessels belonging to their subjects, in order to avoid disension; and it has been thought that passports of such high import to the persons and property of our citizens should have this sanction; that of the signature of the President, and seal of the United States. The authority of Congress also, in the case of sea letters to East India vessels, was in favor of this sanction. It is now become a question whether these passports shall be given only to ships owned and built in the United States, or may be given also to those owned in the United States, though built in foreign countries. * * * I am of opinion that passports ought to be issued to all vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, but only on their clearing out from our own ports, and for that voyage only.—OPINION ON SHIP PASSPORTS. vii, 624-6. (Dec. 1793.)

7873. As our citizens are free to purchase and use foreign-built vessels, and these, like all their other lawful property, are entitled to the protection of their government, passports will be issued to them as freely as to home-built vessels. This is strictly within our treaties, the letter of which, as well as their spirit, authorizes passports to all vessels belonging to citizens of the United States.—To Thomas Pinckney. iii, 550. FORD ED., vi, 242. (Pa., May 1793.)

7874. Before the receipt of * * * the form of your passports, it had been determined here, that passports should be issued in every case, and several steps were taken against those collusions which would be fraudulent towards our friends, and would introduce a competition injurious to our own vessels, as to induce these to remain in our own service, and thereby give to the productions of our own soil protection of its own flag in its passage to foreign markets.—To Thomas Pinckney. iii, 550. FORD ED., vi, 242. (Pa., May 1793.)

7875. It is determined that passports shall be given in our own ports only, and to serve but for one voyage. It has also been determined that they shall be given to all vessels belonging to American citizens wholly, whether built here or not. Our property, whether in the form of vessels, cargoes, or anything else, has a right to pass the seas untouched by any nation, by the law of nations; and no one has a right to ask where a vessel was built, but where she is owned.—To Gouverneur Morris. iii, 581. FORD ED., vi, 301. (Pa., June 1793.)

7877. SHIPS, Purchase of foreign.—As our home-built vessels are adequate to but a small proportion of our transportation, if we could not suddenly augment the stock of our shipping, it would be subject to war insurance in the vessels of other belligerents, though we remain at peace ourselves.—To Thomas Pinckney. iii, 550. FORD ED., vi, 242. (Pa., May 1793.)

7878. Had it not been in our power to enlarge our national stock of shipping suddenly in the present exigency, a great proportion of our produce must have remained on our hands for want of room in the markets of the world to market.—To Gouverneur Morris. iii, 581. FORD ED., vi, 301. (Pa., June 1793.)

7879. With respect to the increase of our shipping, our merchants have no need * * * of a permission to buy up foreign bottoms. There is no law prohibiting it, and when bought they are American property, and as such entitled to pass freely by our citizens to market.—To Gouverneur Morris. iii, 581. FORD ED., vi, 301. (Pa., June 1793.)

7880. SHIPS, Registers.—Our laws, in deed, indulge home-built vessels with the payment of a lower tonnage, and to evidence their right to this, permit them alone to take out registers from our own offices; but they do not exclude foreign-built vessels owned by our citizens from any other right.—To Thomas Pinckney. iii, 550. FORD ED., vi, 242. (Pa., May 1793.)

7881. The laws of the United States confine registers to home-built vessels belonging to citizens; but they do not make it unlawful for citizens to own foreign-built vessels; and the treaties give the right of sea-letters to all vessels belonging to citizens. But who are citizens? The laws of registry consider a citizenship obtained by a foreigner who comes merely for that purpose, and returns to reside in his own country, as fraudulent, and deny a register to such a person. I consider the distinction as sound and safe, and that we ought not to give sea-letters to a vessel belonging to such a pseudo-citizen. It compromises our peace, by luring our flag to cover the goods of one of the belligerents to the injury of the other. It produces vexatious searches on the vessels of our real citizens, and gives to others the par-participation of our neutral advantages, which belong to the real citizen only.—To Albert Gallatin. iv, 566. (1805.)

—SHIPS, Screw-propeller.—See Inventions.

7882. SHIPS. Sea-letters.—Sea-letters are the creatures of treaties. No act of the ordinary Legislature requires them. The only treaties now existing with us, and calling for them, are those with Holland, Spain, Prussia, and France. In the two former, we have stipulated that when the other party shall be at war, the vessels belonging to our people shall be furnished with sea-letters; in the latter, that the vessels of the neutral party shall be so furnished. France being now at war, the sea-letter is made necessary for our vessels; and consequently it is our duty, furnish them.—To Albert Gallatin. iv, 566. (1805.)

7884. SHIPS, Subsidies for.—I should be happy to hear that Congress thought of establishing packets of their own between New York and Havre. Could not the surplus of the Post Office revenue be applied to this? This establishment would look like the commencement of a little Navy, the only kind of force we ought to possess.—To Richard Henry Lee. Ford ed., iv, 69. (P., 1785.)

7885. SHIPS, Tonnage duties.—The French complain of our tonnage duty; but it is because it is not understood. In the ports of France, we pay fees for anchorage, buoys and beacons, fees to measurers, insurers, and gaugers, and in some countries for light-houses. We have thought it better that the public here should pay all these, and reimburse itself by a consolidation of them into one fee, proportioned to the tonnage of the vessel, and therefore called by the French, Registre. They complain that the foreign tonnage's higher than the domestic. If this complaint had come from the English, it would not have been wonderful, because the foreign tonnage operates really as a tax on commerce. The value of any vessel, however, is paid to pay 16½ dollars for every dollar paid by France.—To William Short, iii, 275. Ford ed., v, 363. (Pa., 1791.)

7886. ——. I like your idea of proportioning the tonnage of the vessel to the value (in some degree) of the property, but its bulk must also be taken into consideration.—To Albert Gallatin. v, 260. (W., 1808.)

7887. SHIPS, Voyage to China.—I have the honor of enclosing to your Excellency [Count de Vergennes] a report of the voyage of an American ship, the first which has gone to China. The circumstances which induce Congress to direct this communication is the very friendly conduct of the consul of his Majesty at Macao, and of the commanders and other officers of the American ships in those seas. It has been with singular satisfaction that Congress have seen these added to the many other proofs of the cordiality of this nation towards our citizens. It is the more pleasing, when it appears in the public transactions of the government, because it is then viewed as an emanation of the spirit of the government. It would be an additional gratification to Congress, in this particular instance, should any occasion arise of notifying those officers, that their conduct has been justly represented to your Excellency on the part of the United States, and has met your approbation.—To Count de Vergennes. 1, 456. (P., 1785.)

—SHIPS, Water for.—See Salt-Water.

7888. SHORT (William), Attachment to. —I see with extreme concern that you have received an impression that my attachment to you has become lessened, and that you have drawn this inference from circumstances taking place while you were in Washington. What these circumstances could be is to me incomprehensible, but one thing I certainly know, that they have been misconstrued. That this change could not be previous to my retirement from the government in 1794, your appointments to France, to Spain are proofs. And if, during my present place in the government, I have not met your desires, the public motives which have been frankly declared have given the real grounds. You think them not founded in fact; but if the testimony of character and compliance is, neither should wonder at the difference of conclusion drawn by the other, and I do trust that you will become sensible that there is no necessity, at least, for supposing a change in intentions, which are the same now as they have ever been. Certainly I shall not, on my part, permit a difference of view on a single subject to efface the recollections and attachments of a whole life.—To William Short. Ford ed., ix, 70. (W., 1807.)

7889. SHORT (William), Diplomatic services.—Mr. Short has desired me to suggest his name as that of a person willing to become a legatine secretary, should these offices become vacant. I have apprised him of the possibility that they may not. You know my high opinion of his abilities and merits; I will, therefore, only add that a peculiar talent for prying into facts seems to mark his character as proper for such a business. He is young and little acquainted with foreign languages, though well prepared for it. These defects can be supplied daily. Should persons be proposed less proper on the whole, you would on motives of public good, knowing his willingness to serve, give him a station and do justice to his character.—To James Madison. Ford ed., iii, 318. (T., May 1783.)

7890. ——. A treaty of commerce between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of Prussia having been arranged with the Baron de Thulemeyer, his Majesty's envoy extraordinary at the Hague, specially empowered for this purpose, and it being convenient to meet with other duties to repair to that place ourselves our duties, the public interest of executing and exchanging the instruments of treaty, we hereby appoint you special secretary for that purpose.—To William Short. 1, 372. (P., 1785.)

7891. ——. The President has appointed you Minister Resident * * * at the Hague which was approved by the Senate on January 16.—To William Short, III, 322. Ford ed., v, 425. (Pa., Jan. 1792.)

7892. ——. The President has joined you in a special and temporary commission with Mr. Carmichael to repair to Madrid, and there negotiate certain matters respecting the navigation of the Mississippi, and other points of common interest between Spain and us.—To William Short, iii, 324. Ford ed., v, 427. (Pa., Jan. 1792.)
7893. SHORT (William), Private Secretary.—I shall, on Mr. Short's return from the Hague, appoint him my private secretary, till Congress shall think proper to notify me to the pleasure.—To James Monroe. i, 407. Ford Ed., iv, 86. (P. 1785.)

7894. —. His talents and character allow me to say, with confidence, [are such] that nothing will suffer in his hands [during my absence from Paris at home]. The friendly dispositions of Monsieur de Montmorin would induce him to maintain it. I desire both Mr. Short in his present character [private secretary to Mr. Jef- ferson] and should any of his applications be necessary to be laid before the Council, they might suffer difficulty; nor could he attend the diplomatic societies, which are the most certain sources of usefulness, and which I think it expedient to remove the difficulties by naming him Secretary of Legation, so that he would act, of course, as Chargé des Affaires during my absence.—To John Jay. ii, 514. (P., 1788.)

7895. SHORT (William), Rejected by Senate.—It is with much concern I inform you that the Senate has negatived your appointment. We once thought it best to keep back the nomination to the close of the session, that the mission might remain secret as long as possible, which you know was our purpose from the beginning. It was then sent in with an explanation of his merits. We took for granted, if any hesitation should arise, that the Senate would take time, and that our friends in that body would make inquiries of us, and give us the opportunity of explaining and removing objections. But to our great surprise, and with an unexampled precipitancy, they rejected it at once. This reception of the last of our official communications to them could not be unfe'é.t nor were the causes of it spoken out by them. Under this uncertainty, Mr. Madison, on his entering into office, proposed another person (John Quincy Adams). He also was negative, and they adjourned sine die. Our subsequent information was that, on your nomination, your long absence from this country, and their idea that you do not intend to return, they had very sensibly thought that all other motives were superseded by an unwillingness to extend our diplomatic connections, and a desire even to recall the foreign ministers we already have. All were sensible of the great virtues, the high character, the powerful influence, and valuable friendship of the Emperor. But riveted to the system of entanglement with Europe, they declined the proposition. * * * I pray you to place me rectus in curiâ in this business with the Emperor, and to assure him that I carry into my retirement the highest veneration for his virtues, and fondly cherish the belief that his dispositions and power are destined by heaven to better, in some degree at least, the condition of oppressed man.—To William Short, v, 435. Ford Ed., iv, 249. (W., March 1809.) See 261.

7896. SHORT (William), Republicanism.—I know your republicanism to be pure, and that it is no decay of that which has embittered your votaries in France, but too great a sensibility at the partial evil [with] which its object has been accomplished there.—To William Short. iii, 503. Ford Ed., vi, 155. (Ps., 1793.)

7897. SHORT (William), Talents.—I wish in the next election of delegates for Congress, Short could be sent. His talents are great, and his weight in our State must be long become principal.—To James Madison. Ford Ed., iii, 403. (A., Feb. 1784.)

7898. —. His talents and merits are such as to have placed him, young as he is, in the Supreme Executive Council of Virginia, an office which he relinquished to visit Europe.—To Baron Thulemeyer. i, 369. (P. 1783.)

7899. SIENYES (Abbe), Logical.—The Abbe Siéyès was the most logical head of the [French] Revolution. His pamphlet "Qu'est-ce que le Tier État?" electrified France, as Paine's Common Sense did us.—Autobiography. i, 91. Ford Ed., i, 127. (1821.)

7900. SILENCE, Golden.—We often repent of what we have said, but never of that which we have not.—To Gideon Granger. vi, 333. Ford Ed., ix, 458. (M., 1814.)

— SILVER, Intrinsic value of.—See Dollar and Money.

7901. SIMPLICITY, Government and.—I am for a government rigorously frugal and simple.—To Elbridge Gerry. iv, 268. Ford Ed., vii, 327. (1799.)

7902. We have suppressed all those public forms and ceremonies which tended to familiarize the public eye to the harbingers of another form of government.—To General Kosciusko. iv, 430. (W., April 1802.)

7903. —. Leavees are done away.—To Nathaniel Macon. iv, 396. Ford Ed., viii, 52. (W., May 1801.)

7905. SINCERITY, Language and.—Such is become the prostitution of language that sincerity has no longer distinct terms in which to express her own truths.—To George Washington, i, 325. Ford Ed., iii, 298. (Ps., 1785.)

7906. SINCERITY, Valued.—Sincerity I value above all things; as between those who practice it, falsehood weighs them in the scale against the fatherless calumnies he hears ut-touched against him. These public acts are known even to those who know nothing of my private life, and surely are better evidence to a mind disposed to truth, than slanders which no man will affirm on his own knowledge, or ever saw one who would.—To Uriah M. GREGORY. iv, 333. (M., 1800.)

7910. SLANDER, Answer to.—As to federal slanders, I never wished them to be answered but by the tenor of my life, half a century of which has been on a theatre at which the public have given spectators, and competent judges of its merit. Their approbation has taught a lesson, useful to the world, that the man who fears no truths has nothing to fear from lies. I should have fancied myself half guilty had I condescended to put pen to paper in refutation of their falsehoods, or drawn to them respect by any notice from myself.—To Dr. George Logan. FORD ED., x, 27. (M., 1816.)

7911. I ascribe these hard expressions to the ardor of his zeal for the public good, and as they contain neither argument nor proof of past events without observation. Indeed, I have not been in their power to notice these morbid ejacations of spleen either with or without the names of those venting them. But I have thought it a duty on the present occasion to relieve my fellow citizens and my country from the palpable misrepresentation of the world, to which this informer is endeavoring to reduce it by representing it as governed hitherto by a succession of swindlers and speculators. Nor shall I notice any further endeavors to prove or to palliate this palpable misinformation. I am too old an actor even to undertake minute investigations of intricate transactions of the last century; and I am not afraid to trust to the justice and good sense of my fellow-citizens on future as on former attempts to lessen me in their estimation.—To Ritchie and Gooch. vii, 242. FORD ED., x, 211. (M., 1822.)

7912. SLANDER, Brutal.—I certainly have known, and still know, characters eminently qualified for the most exalted trusts, who could not bear up against the brutal hatchings and hewings of these heroes of Billingsgate. I may say, from intimate knowledge, that we should have lost the services of the greatest character of our country, had he been assailed with the degree of false zeal and spirit now practised. The torture he felt under rare and slight attacks, proves that under those of which the federal bands have shown themselves capable, he would have thrown up the helm in a burst of indignation.—To James Sullivan. iv, 576. FORD ED., vii, 385. (W., 1805.)

7913. SLANDER, Character vs.—For myself, when placed under the necessity of deciding in a case where on the one hand is a young and worthy person, all the circumstances of whose education and position in life pronounce her virtuous and innocent, and on the other the proclamations of the unblemished and spread slander, there is no hesitation in my mind.—To St. George Tucker. FORD ED., vi, 425. (Pa., 1793.)

7914. SLANDER, Chiasm of.—You have indeed received the federal unctuous of lying and slandering. But who has not? Who will ever again come into eminent office, unannointed with this chasm? It seems to be used as an engine of opposition; engines which will not be entirely without effect. The circle of characters equal to the first stations is not too large, and will be lessened by the voluntary retreat of those whose sensibilities are stronger than their confidence in the justice of public opinion. * * Yet this effect of sensibility must not be yielded to. If we suffer ourselves to be frightened from our post by mere lying, surely the money will be use that weapon; for what one so cheap to those of whose system of politics morality makes no part?—To James Sullivan. iv, 576. FORD ED., vii, 385. (W., 1805.)

7915. SLANDER, Disregard of.—My rule of life has been never to harass the public with fennings and provings of personal slanders. —To Martin Van Buren. vii, 372. FORD ED., x, 315. (M., 1824.)

7916. SLANDER, Hamilton and.—To a thorough disregard of the honors and emoluments of office, I join as great a value for the esteem of my countrymen, and conscious of having merited it by an integrity which cannot be reproached by any and by all, to my rights and liberty, I will not suffer my retirement to be clouded by the slanders of a man [Alexander Hamilton] whose history, from the moment at which history can stand to notice him, is a tissue of machinations, misrepresentations of the conduct of the country, which he has only received and given him bread, but heaped its honors on his head.—To President Washington. iii, 468. FORD ED., vii, 109. (M., 1792.)

7917. SLANDER, Irritating.—I am fond of quiet, willing to do my duty, but irritable by slander, and apt to be forced by it to abandon my post.—To Mrs. John Adams. FORD ED., iv, 100. (P., 1785.)

7918. SLANDER, Newspapers and.—An editor * * * [should] set his face against the demoralizing practice of feeding the public mind habitually on slander, and the depravity of taste which this nauseous aliment induces.—To John Norvell. v, 93. FORD ED., ix, 74. (W., 1807.)

7919. SLANDER, Of patriots.—The patriot, like the Christian, must learn that to bear revilings and persecutions is a part of his duty: and in proportion as the trial is severe, firmness under it becomes more requisite and praiseworthy. It requires, 'indeed, self-command. But that will be fortified in proportion as the calls for its exercise are repeated.—To John Norvell. v, 93. FORD ED., ix, 74. (W., 1807.)

7921. SLANDER, Prevalent.—Defamation is becoming a necessary of life; insomuch, that a large pot of tea in the morning or evening cannot be digested without this stimulating.—To John Norvell. v, 93. FORD ED., ix, 74. (W., 1807.)

7922. SLANDER, Public office and.—It is really a most afflicting consideration, that it is impossible for a man to act in any office for the public without encountering a persecution which even his retirement will not withdraw him from.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., vii, 433. (P., 1798.)

7923. SLANDER, Punishment for.—Slanders I have thought it best to leave to the scourge of public opinion.—To De Witt Clinton. V, 80. FORD ED., ix, 63. (W., 1807.)

7924. SLANDER, Secret.—Secret slanders cannot be disproved because they are secret.—To William Duane. iv, 591. FORD ED., vii, 431. (W., 1807.)

7925. SLANDER, Voluminous.—As to the volume of slanders supposed to have been circulated in abolition newspapers, I need mention no more. If this will not, indeed, have been a single volume, but an encyclopedia in bulk. But I never had such a volume; indeed, I rarely thought those libels worth reading, much less preserving and remembering.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 274. (M., 1816.) See Abuse, Calumny, Libels, and Newspapers.

7926. SLAVE TRADE, Abolition of.—I congratulate you [Congress] on the approach of the period at which you may interpose your authority constitutionally, to withdraw the citizens of the United States from all further participation in those violations of human rights which have been so long continued on the part of our seaports, not only of the free states, but of which the morality, the reputation, and the best interests of our country, have long been eager to proscribe. Although no law you may pass can take prohibitory effect till the first day of the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, yet the impending period is not too long to prevent by timely notice, expeditions which cannot be completed before that day.—Sixth Annual Message. viii, 67. FORD ED., viii, 492. (Dec. 1866.)

7927. I am very sensible of the honor you propose to me of becoming a member of the society for the abolition of the slave trade. You know that nobody wishes more ardently than I an abolition of that traffic; but I cannot, under the circumstances, give it a very strong recommendation. I am here as a public servant, and those whom I serve, having never yet been able to give their voice against this practice, it is decent for me to avoid too public a demonstration of my wishes to see it abolished. Without serving the cause here, it might render me less able to serve it beyond the water. I trust you will be sensible of the prudence of those motives, therefore, which govern my conduct on this occasion.—To J. P. BRISSOT DE WARVILLE. ii, 357. FORD ED., v, 6. (P., Feb. 1788.)

7928. SLAVERY, Abolition of.—After the year 1800 of the Christian era, there shall be no slave trade or slavery in any of the said States, otherwise than in punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted to have been personally guillotine.—Western Territory Report. FORD ED., iii, 406. (March 1, 1874.)

* In 1784, Jefferson was chairman of a committee of Congress devise a plan of compulsory slavery for the western country above the parallel of 31st north latitude. The measure was defeated by one vote. In addition to the Northwestern Territory, the region embraced what afterwards became the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee and Kentucky.—Editor.

7929. The clause respecting slavery was lost by an individual vote only. Ten States were present. The four Eastern States, New York and Pennsylvania, were for the clause; New Jersey would have been for it, but there were but two members of the State, and they were sick in their chambers. South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Virginia voted against it. North Carolina was divided, as would have been Virginia, had not one of its delegates been sick in-bed.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ED., iii, 471. (A., April 25, 1784.)

7930. There were ten States present; six voted unanimously for it, three against it, and one was divided; and the votes being requisite to decide the proposition affirmatively, it was lost. The voice of a single individual of the State which was divided, or of one of those which were of the negative, would have prevented this abominable crime from spreading itself over the new dominion. Thus we see the fate of millions unborn hanging on the tongue of one man, and heaven was silent in that awful moment! But it is to be hoped it will not always be silent, and that the friends to the rights of human nature will, in the end prevail.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 276. FORD ED., iv, 181. (P., 1786.)

7931. What a stupendous, what an incomprehensible machine is man! who can endure toil, famine, stripes, imprisonment, and death itself, in vindication of his own liberty, and, the next moment, be deaf to all those motives which have rendered him and his fellow man the object of sympathy, the friend of liberty, and the dispenser to the last party to be. But interest is really going over to the side of morality. The value of the slave is every day lessening; his burden on his master daily increasing. Interest is, therefore, preparing the disposition to be just; and this will be goaded from time to time by the insurrectionary spirit of the slaves. This is easily quelled in its first efforts; but from being local it will become general, and whenever it does, it will rise more formidable after every defeat than before. It will forced, after dreadful scenes and sufferings, to release them in their own way, which, without such sufferings we might now model our own convenience.—To William A. BURWELL. FORD ED., viii, 340. (W., Jan. 1805.)

7932. I can say with conscious truth that there is none involved in this than a man on earth who would suffer more than an abolitionist from this heavy reproach in any practicable way. The cession of that kind of property, for so it is misnamed, is a bagatelle which would not cost me a second thought, if, in that way, a general emancipation could be effected; and, gradually, and with due sacrifices, I think it might be. But, as it is, we have the wolf by the ears, and we can neither hold him, nor safely let him go. Justice is in one scale and self-preservation in the other. — The JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA, viii, 359. Ford Ed., x, 158. (M., 1820.)

7934. — The abolition of the evil is not impossible; it ought never, therefore, to be despised of. Every plan should be adopted, every experiment tried, which may do something towards the ultimate object, that which you propose is well suited to attain. It has succeeded in certain portions of our white brethren, under the care of a Rapp and an Owen; and why may it not succeed with the man of color? — To Miss Fanny Wright, vii, 408. Ford Ed., x, 344. (M., 1825.)

7935. SLAVERY, Abolition.—This abomination must have an end. And there is a superior bench reserved in heaven for those who hasten it. —To E. Rutledge, ii, 180. Ford Ed., iv, 410. (P., 1787.)

7936. SLAVERY, Colonial condemnation.—The abolition of domestic slavery is the great object of desire in those Colonies, where it was, unhappily, introduced in their infant state. But previous to the enfranchisement of the slaves we have, it is necessary to exclude all further importations from Africa. Yet, instead of efforts to effect this by prohibitions, and by imposing duties which might amount to a prohibition, have been hitherto defeated by his Majesty's negative: Thus preferring the immediate advantages to the few British interests of the American States, and to the rights of human nature, deeply wounded by this infamous practice. *—Rights of British America, i, 135. Ford Ed., i, 440. (1774.)

7937. SLAVERY, Constitutional inhibition.—No person hereafter coming into this country shall be held within the same in slavery under any pretext whatever.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. Ford Ed., ii, 26. (June 1776.)

7938. The General Assembly of Virginia shall not have power to * * * permit the introduction of any more slaves to reside in this State, or the continuance of slavery beyond the generation which shall be living on the 31st day of December, 1800; all persons born after that day being hereby declaimed free.—CONSTITUTION OF VIRGINIA, viii, 446. Ford Ed., iii, 325. (1783.)

7939. SLAVERY, Deplorable results of.—The whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions, the most unremitting despotism on the one part, and degrading submissions on the other. Our children see this, and learn to imitate it; for man is an imitative animal. There is in the boasted term of all education in him. From his cradle to his grave he is learning to do what he sees others do. If a parent could find no motive either in his philanthropy or his self-love, for restraining the intemperance of passion directed towards his slave, it should always be a sufficient one that his child is present. But, generally, it is not sufficient. The parent storms, the child looks on, catches the lineaments of wrath, puts on the same airs in the circle of his acquaintance, shews the worst of passions, and thus nursed, educated, and daily exercised in tyranny, cannot but be stamped by it with odious peculiarities. The man must be a prodigy who can retain his manners and morals unaltered by such circumstances. And with what execrations should the statesman be loaded, who, permitting one-half the citizens thus to trample on the rights of the other, transforms those into despoits, and these into enemies, destroys the morals of the one part, and the amor patria of the other? If a slave can have a certain amount of pride in this world, it must be his to the other in preference to that in which he is born to live and labor for another: in which he must lock up the faculties of his nature, contribute as far as depends on his industrious and individual endeavors to the everlasting increase of human misery, in a known miserable condition on the endless generations proceeding from him.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA, viii, 403. Ford Ed., iii, 266. (1782.)

7940. SLAVERY, Destructive of industry.—With the morals of the people, their industry also is destroyed. For in a warm climate, no man will labor for himself who can make another labor for him. This is so true, that of the population of slaves a very small portion indeed are ever seen to labor.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA, viii, 403. Ford Ed., iii, 267. (1782.)

7941. SLAVERY, Divine justice and.—Can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these rights are天赋神圣? That they are not to be violated but with his wrath? Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just; that his justice cannot sleep forever; that considering numbers, nature and natural means only, a revolution of the whole of our exchange of situation, is among possible events; that it may become probable by supernatural interference! The Almighty has no attribute which can take side with us in such a contest.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA, viii, 404. Ford Ed., i, 267. (1782.)

7942. SLAVERY, Establishment in Virginia.—The first establishment of slavery in Virginia, which became permanent, was made in 1607. I have found no mention of negroes in the Colony until about 1650. The first brought here as slaves were by a Dutch ship: after which the English commenced the trade, and continued it until the Revolutionary war. But that the act of 1720, 1720, and the prohibition, the importation for the present, and the business of the war pressing constantly on the legislature. This subject was not acted on finally until the year 1787, when I brought in a bill to prevent their further importation. This passed without opposition, and stopped the increase of the evil by importation, leaving to future efforts its final eradication.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 38. Ford Ed., i, 51. (1821.)

7943. SLAVERY, Extension of.—Of one thing I am certain, that as the passage of slaves from one State to another, would not make a slave of a single human being, so they would be no more without their diffusion over a greater surface would make them individually happier, and proportionally, facilitate the accomplishment of their emancipation, by dividing the burden on a greater number of communities. An abstinence, too, from this act of power would remove the jealousy excited by the undertaking of Congress to regulate the condition of the different descriptions of men composing a State. This certainly is the exclusive right of every State, which nothing in the Constitution has taken from them, and given to the General Government. Could Congress, for example, say that the non-freemen of Connecticut shall be freemen, or that they shall not emigrate into any other State? —To John Holmes, vii, 159. Ford Ed., x, 158. (M., 1820.)

7945. SLAVERY, Indians and.—An inhuman practice once prevalent in this country, of making slaves of the Indians, has now commenced with the Spaniards with the first discovery of America.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 306. Ford ed., iii, 154. (1782.)

7946. SLAVERY, Lawfulness.—On the question of the awfulness of slavery, that is of the right of one man to appropriate to himself the faculties of another without his consent, I certainly retain my early opinions. On that, however, of third persons to interfere between the parties, and the effect of condemning or modifying our institutions, we are probably nearer together.—To Edward Everett. vii, 437. Ford ed., x, 385. (M., 1826.)

7947. SLAVERY, Moral propbol of.—My sentiments on the subject of slavery of negroes have long since been in possession of the public, and time has only served to give them stronger root. The love of justice and the love of country plead equally the cause of these people, and it is a moral reproach upon us as a nation, that it should have produced not a single effort, nay I fear not much serious willingness to relieve them and ourselves from our present condition of moral and political reprobation. * * * I had always hoped that the younger generation receiving their early impressions after the flame of liberty had been kindled in every breast, and had become, as it were, the vital spirit of every American, that the generous temperament of youth, analogous to the motion of the sun and moon, should have sympathized with oppression wherever found, and proved their love of liberty beyond their own share of it. But my intercourse with them since my return [from Europe] has not been so favorable as accorded this point the progress I had hoped.—To Edward Coles. Ford ed., ix, 477. (M., 1814.)

"This clause," says Jefferson, in his Autobiography (i, 10), "was struck out in compliance to South Carolina and Georgia, who had never attempted to restrain the importation of slaves, and who, on the contrary, still wished to continue it. Our northern brethren, also, I believe, felt a little tender under those censures; but though they had very few slaves of themselves, yet they had been pretty considerable carriers of them to others."—EDITOR.

7948. SLAVERY, Poem against.—I have received a letter from Mr. Thomas Brannagan, * * * Philadelphia, asking my subscription to the work announced in the enclosed paper.* The cause in which he embarks is so holy, the sentiments so just, and the object so noble, that it is highly painful to me to hesitate on a compliance which appears so small. But that is not its true character, and it would be injurious even to his views, for me to commit myself on paper with answering his letter. I have most carefully avoided every public act or manifestation on that subject. Should an occasion ever occur in which I can interpose with decisive effect, I shall certainly know and do my duty with promptitude and zeal. But, in the meantime, after a long pause, I shall answer it; and I do not know how to effect this, unless you would have the goodness * * * to enter into an explanation with him. —To Dr. George Logan. Ford ed., viii, 351. (W., May 1803.)

7949. SLAVERY, Political error of.—Whatever may have been the circumstances which influenced our forefathers to permit the introduction of slavery into North America, with any part of these States, and to participate in the wrongs committed on an unoffending quarter of the globe, we may rejoice that such circumstances, and such a sense of them, exist no longer. It is honorable to the nation at large that their Legislature availed themselves of the first practicable moment for arresting the progress of this great moral and political error.—R. to A. Quakers. viii, 119. (Nov. 1807.)

7950. SLAVERY, Roman.—We know that among the Romans, about the Augustan age especially, the condition of their slaves was much more deplorable than that of the blacks on the continent of America. The two sexes were confined in separate apartments, because to raise a child cost the master more than to buy one. Cato, for a very restricted indulgence to his slaves in this particular, took from them a certain price. But in this country the slaves multiply as fast as the free inhabitants. The same Cato, on a principle of economy, always sold his sick and superannuated slaves. He gives it as a standing precept to a master visiting his farm, to sell his old oxen, old wagons, old tools, old and diseased servants, and everything else becomes useless. The Athenians and the Romans had no such slaves cannot enumerate among the injuries and insults they receive. It was the common practice to expose in the island Aesclapius, in the Tiber, diseased slaves whose cure was likely to become tedious. The Emperor Claudius, by an edict, gave freedom to such of them as should recover, and first declared that if any person chose to kill rather than to expose them, it should be deemed homicide. The exposing them is a crime which of no existence has existed without danger to us. To such of them as might recover, it would be punished capital punishment for exposing them to death, it would be punished capital punishment for exposing them to.
SLAVERY, Sectional views in 1785.—Southward of the Chesapeake, your pamphlet [against slavery] will find but few readers concurring with it in the subject of slavery. From the mouth to the head of the Chesapeake, the bulk of the people will approve it in theory, and it will find a respectable minority ready to adopt it in practice; a minority which for weight and worth of character excites general regard; a number, who have not the courage to divest their families of a property which, however, keeps their conscience unquiet. Northward of the Chesapeake, you may find here and there an exception to your doctrine, as you may find here and there a robber and murderer band no greater number. In that part of America, there being but few slaves, they can easily disencumber themselves of them; and emancipation is put into such a train that in a few years they might be slaves of others. In Maryland. In Maryland, I do not find such a disposition to begin the redress of this enormity as in Virginia. This is the next State to which we may turn our eyes for the interesting spectacle of justice in conflict with avarice and oppression; a conflict wherein the sacred side is gaining daily recruits from the influx into office of young men grown, and growing up. These have sucked in the principles of liberty, as it were, with their mother’s milk, and it is to them I look with anxiety to turn the fate of this question. Be not therefore discouraged. What you have written will do a great deal of good.—To Dr. Price. i, 377. FORD ED., iv, 82. (P., 1785.)

7956. SLAVES, Duty to.—My opinion has ever been that, until more can be done for them, we should endeavor, with those whom fortune has thrown on our hands, to feed and clothe them well, protect them from ill usage, require such reasonable labor only as is formed voluntarily by freemen, and be led by no repugnances to abridge them, and our duties to them. The laws do not permit us to turn them loose, if that were for their good; and to commute them for other prosperity, to commit them to those whose usage of them we cannot control.—To Edward Coles. FORD ED., iv, 479. (M., 1814.)

7957. SLAVES, European laborers and. Our only blot is becoming less offensive by the great improvement in the condition and civilization of that race, who can now more advantageously compare their situation with that of the laborers of Europe. Still it is a hideous blot, as well from the heteromorph peculiarities of the race, as that, with their physical compulsion to action must be substituted for the moral necessity which constrains the laborers to work equally hard. We feel and deplore it morally and politically, and we look without entire desire, but in deeming means not yet specifically foreseen. I am happy in believing that the conviction of the necessity of removing this evil gains ground with time. Their emigration to the westward lightens the difficulty by dividing it, and renders it more practicable on the whole. And the neighborhood of a government of their color promises a more accessible asylum than that from whence they came.—To William Short. vii, 310. (M., 1823.)

7958. SLAVES, Hiring out.—I observe in your letter * * * that the profits of the whole estate [of Monticello] would be no more than the hire of the few negroes hired out would amount to. Would it be better to hire negroes, where though masters could bid little? Would it be better to hire plantations and all, if proper assurance can be provided for the good usage of everything?—To Nicholas Lewis. Ford ed., iv, 342. (P., 1786.)

7959. SLAVES, Importation of.—During the regal government we had, at one time, obtained a law which imposed such a duty on the importation of slaves as amounted nearly to a prohibition, when one inconsiderate assembly, placed tender of the precaution of circumstance, repealed the law. This repeal met a joyful sanction from the then reigning sovereign, and no devices, no expedients which could ever be attempted by subsequent assemblies (and they seldom met without attempting them) could succeed in getting the royal assent to a renewal of the duty. In the very first session held under the republican government, the assembly passed a law for the perpetual prohibition of the importation of slaves. This will, in some measure, stop the increase of this great political and moral evil, while the minds of our citizens may be ripening for a complete emancipation of human nature.—Notes on Virginia. vii, 334. Ford ed., iii, 102. (1782.)

7960. —— I congratulate you on the law of your State [South Carolina] for suspending the importation of slaves, and for the glory you have justly acquired by endeavoring to prevent it. —To E. T. B. VEDDER. ii, 180. Ford ed., iv, 410. (P., 1787.)

7961. SLAVES, Increase of.—Under the mild treatment our slaves experience, and their wholesome food, clothing and lodging, our country increases as fast, or faster than the whites.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 334. Ford ed., iii, 192. (1782.)

7962. SLAVES, Labor and. —An opinion is hazarded by some, but proved by none, that moral urgencies are not sufficient to induce [the negro] to labor; th t nothing can do this but physical coercion. But this is a problem which the present age alone is prepared to solve. It would be of madness to suppose a race of animals created without sufficient foresight and energy to preserve their own existence. It is disproved, too, by the fact that they exist and have existed through all the ages, and are sufficiently acquainted with all the nations of Africa to say that there may not be some in which habits of industry are established, and the arts practiced which are necessary to render life comfortable. The experiment now in progress in Santo Domingo, in the Cape of Good Hope, and South Africa, are but beginning. Your proposition has its aspects of promise also; and should it not answer fully to calculations in figures, it may yet, in its developments, lead to happy results. —To Miss Fanny Wright. vii, 408. Ford ed., x, 344. (M., 1825.)

7964. SLAVES, Masters and.—The inclusion [in your book] on the master of the moral duties which he owes to the slave, in return for the benefits of his service, that is to say, of food, clothing, care in sickness, and maintenance under age and disability, so as to make him in fact as comfortable as the laboring man in most parts of the world, * * * gives great merit to the work, and will, I have no doubt, produce wholesome impressions.—To Clement Caine. vi, 13. Ford ed., ix, 329. (M., 1811.)

7965. SLAVES, Metayers and.—I am decided on my final return to America to try this experiment. I shall endeavor to import as many of the best negroes as I have; and I will settle them and my slaves, on farms of fifty acres each, intermingled, and place all on the footing of the Metayers (Mediati) of Europe. Their children shall be brought up, as others are, as part of the property and foresight, and I have no doubt but that they will be good citizens. Some of their fathers will be so; others I suppose will need government. With these all that can be done is to oblige them to labor as the laboring poor of Europe do, and to apply to their comfortable subsistence, the produce of their labor, retaining such a moderate portion of it as may be a just equivalent for the use of the lands they labor, and the stocks and other necessary advances.—To Dr. Edward Bancroft. Ford ed., v, 67. (P., 1789.)

7966. SLAVES, Property in.—Actual property has been lawfully vested in that form [negroes] and who can lawfully take it from the possessors?—To Jared Sparks. vii, 333. Ford ed., x, 290. (M., 1824.)

7967. SLAVES, Protection of.—In the first or second session of the Legislature after I became a member, I drew to this subject the attention of Colonel Bland, one of the oldest, ablest, and most respected members, and he undertook to move for certain moderate extensions of the protection of the laws to these people. I seconded his motion and, as a younger man, was more sparred in the debate; but he was denounced as an enemy of his country, and was treated with the grossest indecorum.—To Edward Coles. Ford ed., ix, 477. (M., 1814.)

7968. SLAVES, Recovery of fugitive.—We have received with great satisfaction notification of the orders of his Catholic Majesty, not to permit that persons, held in slavery within the United States, 'introduce themselves as free persons into the Province of Florida.' As a corollary to the same principles of justice and friendship, we trust that your Excellency will permit, and aid the recovery of persons of the same description, who have heretofore taken refuge within your government.—To Governor Quesada. iii, 219. Ford ed., v, 296. (Pa., 1791.)

7969. The governor of East Florida informs me that he has received the King's orders, not to permit, under any pretext that persons held in slavery in the United States introduce themselves as free, into the 7970. SLAVES, San Domingo insurrection.—If something is not done, and soon done, there shall be less of the murder of our own children. The "murmura venturos nautili prudentia venos" has already reached us [from San Dom'ngo]; the revolutionary storm, now sweeping the globe, will be upon us, and happy if we make timely provision to give it an easy passage over our land. From the present state of things in Europe and America, the day which begins our combustion must be near at hand; and only a single spark is wanting to make that day to-morrow. If we had begun sooner, we might probably have been allowed a lengthier operation to clear ourselves, but every day's delay lessens the time we may take for emancipation. Some people derive hope from the aid of the confederated States. But this is a delusion. There is no alliance which will aid us sincerely, if an insurrection begins, and that one may, perhaps, have its own fire to quench at the same time.—To St. George Tucker. iv, 196. Ford ed., vii, 168. (M., 1797.)

7971. As to the mode of emancipation, I am satisfied that that must be a matter of compromise between the passions, the prejudices, and the real difficulties which will each have its weight in that operation. Perhaps the first chapter of th's history, which has begun in St. Domingo, and the next succeeding ones, will recount how all the whites were driven from all the other islands, may prepare a precedent for a more formidable dividing between justice, policy and necessity: and furnish an answer to the difficult question, whither shall the colored emigrants go? and the sooner we put some plan under way, the greater hope there is that 't may be permitted to proceed peacefully and be decisive. —To St. George Tucker. iv, 196. Ford ed., vii, 167. (M., 1797.)

7972. SLAVES, Thievery and.—That disposition to theft with which they have been branded, must be ascribed to their situation, and not to any depravity of the moral sense. The man in whose favor no laws of property exist, probably feels himself less bound to respect those made in favor of others. When arguing for ourselves, we lay it down as a fundamental, that laws, to be just, must give a reciprocation of right; that, without this, they are mere arbitrary rules of conduct, founded in force, and not in conscience; and it is a problem which I give to the master to solve, whether the religious precepts against the violation of property were not framed for him as well as his slave? And whether the slave may not as justifiably take a little from one who has taken all from him, as he may slay one who would slay him? That a change in the relations in which a man is placed should change his ideas of moral right or wrong, is neither new nor peculiar to the color of the black: Homer tells us it was so two thousand six hundred years ago.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 385. Ford ed., iii, 249. (1782.)

7973. SLAVES (Emancipation), Bill for.—The bill to emancipate all slaves born after the passing of the act, reported by the revisers [of the Virginia Code] did not contain this proposition; but an amendment containing it was prepared, to be offered to the Legislature whenever the bill should be taken up, and further directing that they should continue with their effort until a certain age, then to be brought up, at the public expense, to tillage, arts, or sciences, according to their genius, till the females should be eighteen, and the males twenty-one years of age, when they should be colonized to such place and of such degree of the time should render most proper, sending them out with arms, implements of household, and of the handicraft arts, seeds, pairs of the useful domestic animals, &c., to declare them a free and independent people, and extend to them our alliance and protection. If this be acquired strength; and to send vessels, at the same time, to other parts of the world for an equal number of white inhabitants; to induce them to migrate hither, proper encouragements were to be proposed.—Notes on Virginia. vii, 380. Ford ed., iii, 243. (1822.)

7974. The separation of infants from their mothers would produce some scruples of humanity. But this would be straining at a gnat, and swallowing a camel.—To JARED SPARKS. vii, 335. Ford ed., x, 292. (M., 1824.)

7975. SLAVES (Emancipation), Blessings of.—Who could estimate its blessed effects? I leave this to the wise man who will live to see their accomplishment, and to enjoy a beatitude forbidden to my age. But I leave it with this admonition,—to rise and be doing. A million and a half are within our control; but six millions (which a majority of those now living will see them attain), if these nations of these fighting men, will say, "we will not go".—To JARED SPARKS. vi, 335. Ford ed., x, 292. (M., 1824.)

7976. SLAVES (Emancipation), Certain.—The hour of emancipation is advancing, in the march of time. It will come; and whether brought on by the generous energy of our own minds; or by the bloody process of St. Domingo, excited and conducted by the power of our present enemy [England], if once stated, and firmly and permanently determined on, offering asylum and arms to the oppressed, is a leaf of our history not yet turned over.—To EDWARD COLES. Ford ed., ix, 478. (M., 1814.)

7977. It was found that the public mind would not bear the proposition [gradual emancipation], nor will it bear it even at this day (1821). Yet the day is not distant, when it must bear and adopt it, or worse will follow. Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate, than that these people are to be free; nor is it less certain, that the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same government. Nature, habit, opinion have drawn indelible lines of distinction between them. It will ill become us as a people to call that process of emancipation and deportation peaceably, and in such slow degree, as that the evil will wear off insensibly, and their place be, pari passu, filled up by free white laborers. If, on the contrary, it is left to force itself on, human reason can do nothing to retard or prevent it. We should in vain look for an example in the Spanish deportation, or detention of the Moors. This precedent would fall far short of our case.—JEFFERSON, M. S. RAYNER, 164.

7978. SLAVES (Emancipation), Defeated.—In 1790, I became a member of the legislature by the choice of the county in which I live [Albemarle], and so continued until it was closed by the Revolution. I made one ef fort in that body for the permission of the emancipation of slaves, which was rejected: and indeed, during the regal government, nothing liberal could expect success. Our minds were influenced by the narrow and habitual belief that it was our duty to be subordinate to the mother country in all matters of government, to direct all our labors in sub-service to her interests, and even to observe a bigoted intolerance for all religions but hers. The difficulties with our representatives were of habit and despair, not of reflection and conviction. Experience soon proved that they could bring their minds to rights on the first summons of their attention. But the King’s Councils of Conscience, against the obstacles of legislation, held the places at will, and were in most humble obediency to that will; the Governor, too, who had a negative on our laws, held by the same tenure, and with still greater devotedness to it; and, last of all, the royal negative time, and the door to every hope of an amelioration.*—AUTobiography, i, 3.

7979. SLAVES (Emancipation), Gradual.—I concur entirely in your leading principles of gradual emancipation, of establishment on the coast of Africa, and the patronage of our nation until the emigrants shall be able to protect themselves.—To Dr. THOMAS HUMPHREYS, vii, 57. FORD ED., x, 76. (M., 1817.)

7980. SLAVES (Emancipation), Methods of.—As to the method by which this difficult work is to be effected, if permitted to be done by ourselves, I have seen no proposition so whole, and of the participation of those born after a given day, and of their education and expatriation after a given age.—To Edward COLES. FORD ED., ix, 478. (M., 1814.)

7981. SLAVES (Emancipation), Prayers for.—It shall have all my prayers, and these are the only weapons of an old man.—To Edward COLES. FORD ED., ix, 479. (M., 1814.)

7982. SLAVES (Emancipation), Preparations for.—Unhappily it is a case for which both parties require long and difficult preparation. The mind of the master is to be apprized by reflection, and strengthened by the exertions against the obstacles of self interest to an acquiescence in the rights of others; that of the slave is to be prepared by instruction and habit for self-government, and for the honest pursuits of industry and social duty. Both of these courses of preparation require time, and the former must precede the latter. Some progress is sensibly made in it; yet not so much as I had hoped and expected. But it will yield in time to temperate and steady pursuit, to the enlargement of the human mind, and its advancement in science. We are not in a world ungoverned by the laws and the power of a Superior Agent. Our efforts are in His hand, and directed by it; and He will give them their effect in his own time. Where the disease is most deeply seated, there it will be slow in eradication. In the Northern States it was merely superficial, and easily corrected. In the Southern it is incorporated with the whole system, and requires time, patience and perseverance in the curative process. Time, it may be truly said, will be the medicine of the disease, and not the dose in the wrong place. To DAVID BARROW, vi, 456. FORD ED., ix, 515. (M., May 1815.)

7983. SLAVES (Emancipation), Principle and.—From those of the former generation who were in the fullness of age when I came into public life, which was while our controversy with England was on paper only, I soon saw that nothing was to be hoped. Nursed and educated in the daily habit of seeing the degraded condition, both bodily and mental, of those unfortunate beings, not reflecting that that degradation was very much the work of themselves and their fathers, few minds have been troubled that they were legitimate subjects of property as their horses and cattle. The quiet and monotonous course of colonial life had been disturbed by no alarm, and little reflection on the value of liberty. And when alarm was taken at an enterprise on their own, it was not another hoop for the whole length of the principles which they invoked for themselves.—To Edward COLES. FORD ED., ix, 477. (M., 1814.)

7984. SLAVES (Emancipation), Propaganda for.—I hope you will reconcile yourself to your country and its unfortunate condition; that you will not lessen its stock of sound disposition by withdrawing your portion from the mass; that the Congress may, with propriety, forward in the public councils, become the missionary of this doctrine truly Christian, insinuate and inculcate it softly but steadily, through the medium of writing and conversation; associate others in your labors, if thus a phalanx is formed, bring on and press the proposition perseveringly until its accomplishment.—To Edward COLES. FORD ED., ix, 479. (M., 1814.)

7985. SLAVES (Emancipation), Providence and.—We must await with patience the workings of an overruling Providence, and hope that that is preparing the delivery of these, our suffering brethren. When the measure of their tears shall be full, when their groans shall have involved heaven itself in darkness, doubtless a God of justice will awaken to their distress, and by diffusing light and liberality among their oppressors, or, at length, by its ultimate termination, make an averse attention to the things of this world, and that they are not left to the guidance of a blind fatality.—To M. DE MEUNIER, ix, 279. FORD ED., iv, 183. (P., 1786.)

7986. SLAVES (Emancipation), Time and.—I have not perceived the growth of this disposition (to emancipate the slaves and settle them elsewhere) in the rising generation, of which I once had sanguine hopes. No symptoms inform me that it will take place in my day. I leave it, therefore, to time, and not at all without hope that the day will come, equally desirable and welcome to us as to them. Perhaps the proposition now on the carpet at Washington, will decide an important question, and the coast of Africa for voluntary emigrations of people of color may be the corner stone of this future edifice.—To Thomas HUMPHREYS, vi, 58. FORD ED., x, 77. (M., 1817.)

7987. At the age of eighty-two, with one foot in the grave and the other uplifted to follow it, I do not permit myself to take part in any new enterprises, even for bettering the condition of man, not even in the great one which is the subject of your letter, and which has been through life that of my greatest anxieties. The march of events has not been such as to render its completion practicable within the limits of time allotted to me; and I leave its accomplishment as the work of another generation.—To Miss Fanny Wright. vii, 408. FORD ED., x, 344. (M., 1825.)

7988. SLAVES (Emancipation), Total.—It is impossible to be temperate and to pursue this subject through the various considerations of policy, of morals, of history, natural and civil. We must be contented to hope they will force their way into every one’s mind. * * * The way, I hope, is preparing, under the auspices of heaven, for a total emancipation, and that this is disposed, in the order of events, to be with the consent of the masters, rather than by their extermination.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA, vii, 404. FORD ED., iii, 267. (1782.)

7989. SLAVES (Emancipation), United States purchase of.—The bare proposition of purchase [of the slaves] by the United States generally would excite infinite indignation in all the States north of Maryland. The sacrifice must fall on the States alone which hold them, or the difficult question will be how to lessen this so as to reconcile our fellow citizens to it. Personally, I am ready and desirous to make any sacrifice which shall ensure their gradual and effectual retirement from the State, and effectually, at the same time, establish them elsewhere in freedom and safety.—To Dr. Thomas Humphreys. vii, 58. FORD ED., x, 76. (M., 1817.)

7991. * * * On the subject of emancipation I have ceased to think because not to be a work of my day. The plan of converting the blacks into serfs would certainly be here the most expedient; but I consider that of expatriation to the governments of the West Indies of their own color as entirely practicable, and greatly preferable to the mixture of color here. To this I have great aversion.—To William Short. FORD ED., x, 362. (M., 1826.) See COLONIZATION.

7992. SLEEP. Habits of.—I am not so regular in my sleep as the doctor [Dr. Rush] says I was; devoting it to from five to eight hours, according as my company or the book I am reading interests me; and never go to bed without an hour, or half hour’s, previous reading of something moral whereon to ruminate in the intervals of sleep. But whether I retire to bed early or late I am up with the sun.—To Doctor Vine Utley. vii, 117. FORD ED., x, 126. (M., 1819.)

7993. SMALL (William), Guide and friend.—Dr. Small was * * * to me as a father. To his enlightened and affectionate guidance of my studies while at college, I am indebted for everything. He was Professor of Mathematicks at William and Mary, and, at some time, was in the philosophical chair. He first introduced into both schools rational and elevated courses of study, and, from an extraordinary conjunction of eloquence and logic, was enabled to communicate them to the students with great effect. He procured for me the patronage of Mr. Wythe, and both of them, the attentions of Governor Faquier, the subtle mind, were filled with scientific knowledge here. They were inseparable friends, and at their frequent dinners with the Governor (after his family had returned to England), he admitted me always, to make it a partie quarrée. At these dinners, I have heard rational and philosophical conversation, than in all my life besides. They were truly Attic societies. The Governor was musical, also, and a good performer, and associated me with two or three other amateurs in his weekly concerts. He merits honorable mention in your history if any proper occasion offers.—To Mr. Girardin. vi, 411. (M., 1815.)

7994. SMALL (William). Jefferson's early companion.—It was my great good fortune, and what probably fixed the destinies of my life, that Dr. William Small of Scotland, was then (1760) professor of mathematics [in William and Mary College], a man profound in all the useful branches of science, and happy talent of communication, correct and gentlemanly manners, and an enlarged and liberal mind. He, most happily for me, became soon attached to me, and made me his daily companion when not engaged in the school; and from his conversation, I got my first notion of the expansion of science, and of the system of things in which we are placed.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY, i, 2. FORD ED., i, 4. (1821.)

—SMITH (Adam).—See Government, Works on.

7995. SMITH (John), Services to Virginia.—Captain Smith, who next to Sir Walter Rale’gh may be considered as the founder of our Colony, has written its history. He was a member of the council, and afterwards president of the Colony; and to his efforts principally may be ascribed its support against the opposition of the natives. He was honest, sensible, and well informed; but his style is barbarous, and his opinions concouch. His History is almost the only source from which we derive any knowledge of the infancy of our State.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA, viii, 415. FORD ED., iii, 281. (1782.)

7996. SMITH (Robert), Estimate of.—I have seen with very great concern the latest address of Mr. [Robert] Smith to the public. He has been very ill-advised, both personally and publicly. As far as I can judge from what I hear, the impression made is entirely unfavorable to him.—To President Madison. v, 600. FORD ED., ix, 325. (M., 1811.)

7997. SMITH (Samuel), Tender of office.—If you can be added to the Administration I am forming it will constitute a magistracy entirely possessed of the public confidence. * * * You will bring us the benefit of adding in a considerable degree the acquiescence, at least, of the leaders who have hitherto opposed our geographical situation [Scotland], too, to our particular interests, and will favor the policy of drawing our naval resources towards the States from which their benefits and production may be extended equally to all parts. If you refuse, I must abandon many necessities, which have been charged with doing from choice, the expectation of procuring to our country such benefits as may compensate the expenses of their navy.—To General Samuel Smith. FORD ED., viii, 13. (W., March 1801.)

person who retires from free communication with it is severely punished afterwards by the state of mind into which he gets, and which can only be prevented by feeding our sociable principles. Socrates was of this opinion on this subject. From 1793 to 1797, I remained closely at home, saw none but those who came there, and at length became very sensible of the ill effect it had on my own mind, and of its direct and irresistible tendency to render me happy to be alone and uneasy when necessarily engaged in it. I felt enough of the effect of withdrawing from the world then to see that it led to an anti-social and misanthropic state of mind, which severely punishes him who gives in to it; and it will be a lesson I never shall forget as to myself.—To Mary Jefferson Eppes. D. L. J. 284. (W., March 1802.) See Social Intercourse.

8014. SOCIETY, Parisian.—To what does the bustle of Paris tend? At eleven o'clock, it is day, chez madame. The curtains are drawn. Propped on bolsters and pillows, and her head scratched into a little order, the bulletins of the sick are read, and the billets of the wives are addressed to some of her acquaintance, and receives the visits of others. If the morning is not very thronged, she is able to get out and hobble round the cage of the Palais Royal; but she must hobble quickly, for the day is in full come; turn it is! Happy, if he does not make her arrive when dinner is half over! The Torpidity of digestion a little passed, she flutters half an hour through the streets, by way of paying visits, and then to the spectacles. These finishead tender half hour is devoted to dodging in and out of the doors of her very sincere friends, and away to supper. After supper, cards; and after cards, bed; to rise at noon the next day, and to tread, like a mill horse, the same trodden circle over again. Thus the days of life are consumed, one by one, without an object beyond the present moment; ever flying from the ennui of that, yet carrying it with us; eternally in pursuit of happiness, which keeps eternally before us. If death or bankruptcy, then, to the trip of the circle. Is it matter for the buzz of the evening, and is completely forgotten by the next morning.—To Mrs. Bingham. ii, 116. (P. 1787.)

SOCIETY OF THE CINCINNATI.—See Cincinnati Society.

8015. SOCRATES, Daemon of.—An expression in your letter * * * that "the human understanding is a revelation from its Maker," gives the best solution that I believe can be given of the question, "what did Socrates mean by his Daemon?" He was too wise to believe the demon most predestined that he had real and familiar converse with the superior and invisible being. He probably considered the suggestions of his conscience, or reason, as revelations, or inspirations from the Supreme Mind, bestowed, on important occasions, by a special and extraordinary Providence.—To John Adams. vi, 220. (M., 1813.)

8016. SOCRATES, Plato and.—The supertative wisdom of Socrates is testified by all antiquity, and placed on ground not to be questioned. When, therefore, Plato puts into his mouth such paradoxes, such quibbles on words, and sophisms as a schoolboy would be ashamed of, we conclude they were the whimsies of Plato's own fragrant brain, and acquit Socrates of puerilities so unlike his character.—To William Short. vii, 165. (M., 1820.) See Philosophy.

8017. SOLITUDE, Philosophy and.—Let the gloomy monk, sequestered from the world, seek unsocial pleasures in the bottom of his cell! Let the timorous Child of the bosom grasp his imaginary from happiness, while pursuing phantoms dressed in the garb of truth! Their supreme wisdom is supreme folly; and they mistake for happiness the mere absence of pain. Had they ever felt the solid pleasure of one generous pang of the heart, they would exchange for it all the frigid speculations of their lives.—To Mrs. Cosway. ii, 39. Ford Ed., iv, 310. (P. 1786.)

8018. SOULS, Transmigration of.—It is not for me to pronounce on the hypothesis you present of a transmigration of souls from one body to another in certain cases. The laws of nature have withheld from us the means of physical knowledge of the country of spirits, and revelation has, for reasons unknown to us, chosen to leave us in the dark as we were. When I was young I was fond of the speculations which seemed to promise some insight into that hidden country, but observing at length that I was in a name ignorance in which they had found me, I have for very many years ceased to read or to think concerning them, and have reposed my head on that pillow of ignorance which a benevolent Creator has made so soft for us, knowing how much we should be forced to use it. I have thought it better, by nourishing the good passions and controlling the bad, to merit an inheritance in a state of being of which I can know so little, and to trust for the future to Him who has been so good for the past.—To Rev. Isaac Stubbs. See Ed., vii, 107. (W., 1801.) See Imortality.

8019. SOUTH AMERICA, Revolt in.—I enter into all your doubts as to the event of the revolution of South America. They will succeed against Spain. But the dangerous enemy is within their own breasts. Ignorance and superstition will chain their minds and bodies. Menstruities, religious and military despotism, I do believe it would be better for them to obtain freedom by degrees only; because that would by degrees bring on light and information, and qualify them to take charge of themselves understandingly; with more certainty, it in the meantime, under so much control as may keep them at peace with one another. Surely it is our duty to wish them independence and self-government, because they wish it themselves, and they have the right, and we none, to choose for themselves; and I wish, more over, that our ideas may be erroneous and theirs prove well-founded. But these are speculations which we may as well deliver over to those who are to see their development.—To John Adams. vi, 104. Ford Ed., x, 108. (M., 1818.) See Spanish America.

8020. SOUTH CAROLINA, Fidelity.—The steady union of our fellow citizens of South Carolina is entirely* in their character. They have never failed in fidelity to the public interest and the republican spirit of its Constution.—To Mr. Letute. v, 384. (W., 1808.)

8021. SOUTH CAROLINA, Free government and.—I see with pleasure another proof that South Carolina is ever true to the principles of free government.—To Henry Middleton. vii, 91. (M., 1813.)

eighty, and particularly so when granted to their own citizens to lead them to act contrary to the duties they owe their own country.—To EDMOND CHARLES GENT. iii. 572. FORD ED., vi, 283. (Pa., June 1793.)

8023. Mr. Hammond says the issuing the commission [to the Citoyen Genet] by M. Genet, within our territory, was an infringement of our sovereignty; therefore, the proceeds of it should be given up to Great Britain. The infringement was a matter between France and us. Had we insisted on any penalty or forfeiture by way of satisfaction to our insulted rights, it would have belonged to us, not to a third party. As between Great Britain and us.  * we deemed we did enough to satisfy her.—To THOMAS PINCKNEY. iii. 583. FORD ED., vi, 302. (Pa., June 1793.)

8024. SOVEREIGNTY, Justice and.—The administration of justice is a branch of the sovereignty over a country, and belongs exclusively to the nation inhabiting it. No foreign power can pretend to participate in their jurisdiction, or that their citizens received there are not subject to it.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii. 415. FORD ED., vi, 56. (Pa., 1792.)

8025. SOVEREIGNTY, Partition of.—I see with great pleasure every testimony to the principles of pure republicanism; and every effort to preserve untouched that partition of the sovereignty which our excellent Constitution has made between the general and particular governments.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. FORD ED., v, 369. (Pa., 1791.)

8026. SPAIN, Bonaparte and.—I suppose Napoleon will get possession of Spain; but her colonies will deliver themselves to another member of the Bourbon family. Perhaps Mexico will choose its sovereign within itself. He will find them much more difficult to subdue than Austria or Prussia; because an enemy (even in peace an enemy) possesses the element over which he is to pass to get at them; and a more powerful enemy (climate) will soon mow down his armies after arrival. This will be, without any doubt, the most difficult enterprise the Emperor has ever undertaken. He may subdue the small colonies; he never can the old and strong; and the former will break off from him the first war he has again with a naval power.—To GENERAL ARMSTRONG. v, 434. (W., March 1809.)

8027. SPAIN, Common interests.—It may happen  * that the interests of Spain and America may call for a concert of proceedings against that State (Algiers).  * May not the affairs of the Mosquito coast, and our western posts, produce another instance of a common interest? Indeed, I meet this correspondence of interest in so many quarters, that I look with anxiety to the issue of Mr. Gardoqui's mission, hoping it will be a removal of that cloud which presents itself between the two nations, or which is likely to arise.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. i. 393. (P., 1785.)

8028. SPAIN, Conciliation of.—We consider Spain's possession of the adjacent country as most favorable to our interests, and should see with extreme pain any other nation substituted for them. In all communications, therefore, with their officers, conciliation and mutual accommodation are to be manly attended to. Everything irritating to be avoided, everything friendly to be done for them.—To WILLIAM C. CLAIORNE. FORD ED., viii, 71. (W., July 1801.)

8029. SPAIN, English alliance against.—I think you have misconceived the nature of the treaty I thought we should have made with England. I have no idea of committing ourselves immediately or independently of our further will to the war. The treaty should be provisional only, to come 'into force on the event of our being engaged in war with either France or Spain.' Prevent her listening to a present war in Europe. In that event we should make common cause, and England should stipulate not to make peace without our obtaining the objects for which we go to war, to wit, the acknowledgment by France of the right and the possession of Louisiana (which we should reduce to our minimum by a second article) and, indemnification for spoliations, for which purpose we should be allowed to make reprisal on the Floridas and retain them as an indemnification. Our cooperation (not more than really enter into it) would be sufficient consideration for Great Britain to engage for its object; and it being generally known to France and Spain that we had entered into treaty with England, would probably ensure us a peaceable and immediate settlement of both points. But another motive much more powerful would indubitably induce England to go much further. Whatever ill-humor may at times have been expressed against us by individuals of Great Britain, the first wish of every Englishman's heart is to see us once more fighting by their sides against France; nor could the King or his ministers do an act so popular as to enter into an alliance with us. The nation would not weigh the consideration by grains and scruples. They would consider it as the price and pledge of an indissoluble friendship. I think it possible that for such a provisional treaty they would give us their general guarantee of Louisiana and the Floridas. We are not content; but our failure would not make our situation worse. If such a one could be obtained, we might await our convenience for calling up the casus foederis. I think it important that England should receive an overture as early as possible, as it might remove us from the danger. **

8030. A letter from Charles Pinckney of May 22 (1803), informs me that Spain refuses to settle a limit, and perseveres in withholding the ratification of the convention. He says not a word of the status quo, from which I conclude it has not been proposed.  * I think the status quo, if proposed, should be immediately offered through Bowdoin. Should it even be refused, the refusal to settle a limit is not of itself a sufficient cause of war, nor is the withholding a ratification worthy of such a redress. Yet these acts show a purpose both in Spain and France which we ought to provide before the conclusion of a peace. I think, therefore, we should take into consideration whether we ought not immediately to propose to England an eventual treaty of alliance. At the same time this war would come to an end, and we should then have the first dignity of a person engaged in this business. If it can be done, it will be an advantage to Spain, and if it can be done, it will be an advantage to Spain.

8032. SPAIN, Friendship with.—Under an intimate conviction of long standing in my mind, of the importance of an honest friendship with Spain, and one which shall identify her American interests with ours, I see in a strong point of view the necessity that the government of Spain shall be friendly to our government. It will be; and it will be the more agreeable to us if it be. * * * From the papers already received I infer a confident reliance on the part of the Spaniards on the omnipotence of Bonaparte, but a desire of preserving the friendship of the United States. I shall leave us without an ally.—To James Madison. iv, 583. Ford ed. viii, 375. (M., Aug. 1805.)

8034. SPAIN, Good faith towards.—No better proof of the good faith of the United States could have been given, than the vigor with which we have acted, and the expense incurred in suppressing the enterprise meditated lately by Burr against Mexico. Although the Chevalier d'Yrujo was not the person to whose consideration the enterprise was addressed, and although he first proposed a separation of the Western country, and on that ground received encouragement and aid from Yrujo, according to the usual spirit of the Spanish government towards us, yet he was as early informed of the fidelity of the Western country as we were, and turned himself wholly towards Mexico. And so popular is an enterprise on that country in this, that we had only to be still, and he would have had followers enough to have been in the city of Mexico in six weeks.—To James Bowdon. v, 64. Ford ed., ix, 41. (W., April 1807.)

8035. SPAIN, Good offices of.—I see with extreme satisfaction and gratitude the friendly interposition of the United States, for the relief of the Moroccans, and I am persuaded it will produce the happiest effects in America. Those, who are intrusted with the public affairs there, are sufficiently sensible how essential it is for our interest to cultivate peace with Spain, and they will be pleased to see a corresponding disposition in that court. The late good offices of emancipating a number of our countrymen from slavery is peculiarly calculated to produce a sensation among our people, and to dispose them to accede to the views of their leaders towards Spain.—To W. Carmichael. i, 392. (P., 1785.)

8036. SPAIN, Government of.—If anything thrasonic and foolish from Spain could add to my contempt of that government, it would be the demand of satisfaction now made by Foronda. However, respecting to ourselves requires that the answer should be decent, and I think it fortunate that the opportunity is given to make a strong declaration of facts, and how far our knowledge of Miranda's objects went, what measures we took to prevent anything further, the negligence of the Spanish agents to give us earlier notice, the measures we took for punishing those guilty, and our quiet abandonment of those taken by the Spaniards.—To James Madison. v, 164. Ford ed. ix, 124. (M., Aug. 1807.) See Miranda expedition.

8037. SPAIN, Honest, but unwise.—Spain is honest if it is not wise.—To John Adams. Ford ed., iv, 295. (P., 1786.)

8038. SPAIN, Hostility of.—Our relations with Spain are vitally interesting. They should be of a peaceable and friendly character, for Spain has been our most earnest desire. Had Spain met us with the same dispositions, our idea was that her existence in this hemisphere and ours should have rested on the same bottom; should have swam or sunk together. We want nothing of hers, and we want no other nation to possess what is hers. But she has met our advances with jealousy, secret malice and ill-faith. Our patience under this unworthy return of disposition is now at its trial. And the issue of what is now depending between us will decide whether our relations with her are to be sincerely friendly, or permanently hostile. I still wish and would cherish the former, but have ceased to expect it.—To James Bowdon. Ford ed. viii, 351. (W., April 1805.)

8039. SPAIN, Incitement of Indians.—With respect to the treaties, the speech and the letter, you will see that they undertake to espouse the concerns of Indians within our limits; to be mediators of boundary between them and us; to guarantee that boundary to those who assist them with their whole power; and hazard the interests of our intimate alliance to avoid disagreeable results. They even propose to extend their intermeddlings to the northern Indians. These are pretensions so totally inconsistent with the usages established among the white nations, with respect to Indians living within their several limits, that it is believed no example of them can be produced, in times of peace; and they are presented to us in 8040. The papers communicated you [in October and November, 1792] made it evident that the Baron de Carondelet, the Governor of New Orleans, had industriously excited the southern Indians to war against us, and furnished them with arms and ammunition in abundance, for that express purpose. We placed this under the view of the commissioners of Spain here, who undertook to communicate our views on the subject to the Baron de Carondelet. They have lately made us communications from both these quarters; the aspect of which, however, is by no means such as to remove the causes of our dissatisfaction. The communications, consisting of treaties between Spain, the Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees, handed us by express order from their court, a speech of Baron de Carondelet to the Creeks, and a letter from Messrs. de Viana and Jaudot, purporting that Spain was prepared by authority from this government. Its instructions to its agents have, on the contrary, been explicitly to cultivate, with good faith, the peace between Spain and the Indians; and from the known prudence and good conduct of Governor Blount, to whom it is supposed it is not believed to have been proposed by him. This proposition, then, you are authorized to disavow to the court of Madrid, in the most unequivocal terms.—To CARMICHAEL AND SHORT, iii, 566. FORD ED., vi, 271. (Pa., May 1793.)

8041. The consequence is that the Indians, and particularly the Creeks, finding themselves encouraged, have passed, without the least provocation on our part, from a state of peace, which appeared to be well settled, to that of serious hostility. Their murders and depredations, which, for some months past, we were willing to believe were only individual aggressions, now assume the appearance of unequivocal war. Yet, such is our desire of courting and cultivating the peace of all our Indian neighbors, that instead of marching at once into their country, and taking satisfaction ourselves, we are peaceably requiring punishment of the individual aggressors; and, in the meantime, are holding ourselves entirely on the defensive. But this state of things cannot continue. Our citizens are entitled to effectual protection, and defensive measures are, at the same time, the most expensive and least effectual. If we find, then, that peace cannot be obtained by the temperate means we are still pursuing, we must proceed to those which are extreme, and meet all the consequences, of whatever nature, or from whatever quarter they may be.—To CARMICHAEL AND SHORT, iii, 507. FORD ED., vi, 272. (Pa., May 1793.)

8042. We have certainly been always desirous to avoid whatever might disturb our harmony with Spain. We should be still more so, at a moment when we see the nation making part of so powerful a confederacy as our own, and under particular good understanding with England, our other neighbor. In so delicate a position, therefore, instead of expressing our sense of these things, by way of answer to Messrs. Viana and Jaudot, the President has thought it better that it should be done to you, and to trust to your discretion the moment, the measure, and the form of communicating it to the Court of Madrid. The actual state of Europe at the time you will receive this, the solidity of the confederacy, and especially, as between Spain and England, the temper and views of the former, or of both, towards us, the state of your negotiation, are circumstances which will enable you better to decide how far it may be necessary to sootin, or even, perhaps, to suppress, the expressions of our sentiments on this subject. To your discretion, therefore, it is committed by the President, to let the Court of Spain see, by impossibility for us to submit with folded arms, to be butchered by the haters, and to prepare them to view, with a just eye, the more vigorous measures we must pursue to put an end to their atrocities, if the moderate ones we are now taking, should fail of that effect.—To CARMICHAEL AND SHORT, iii, 567. FORD ED., vi, 272. (Pa., May 1793.)

8043. SPAIN, Invasion of.—The invasion of Spain has been the most unprecedented and unprincipled of the transactions of modern times. The crimes of its enemies, the licentiousness of its associates in defence, the exertions and sufferings of its inhabitants under slaughter and famine, and its consequent degradation, place it in the baneful ascendency of the tyrants of the sea and continent, and characterize with blood and wretchedness the age in which they have lived.—To LE CHEVALIER DE ONIS, vi, 341. (M., 1814.)

8044. SPAIN, Loss of colonies.—I hail your country as now likely to resume and surpass its ancient splendor among nations. This might perhaps have been greatly confounded if the self-sufficient strength of the peninsula itself; everything without its limits being its weakness, not its force.—To LE CHEVALIER DE ONIS, vi, 342. (M., April 1814.)

8045. SPAIN, Peace with.—Spain is so evidently picking a quarrel with us, that we see a war absolutely inevitable with her. We are making a last effort to avoid it.—To JAMES MONROE, iv, 6. FORD ED., vi, 322. (June 1793.)

8046. We are sending a courier to Madrid to make a last effort for the preservation of honorable peace.—To JAMES MADISON, iv, 8. FORD ED., vi, 325. (June 1793.)

8047. SPAIN, Perfidy of.—Never did a nation act towards another with more perfidy and injustice than Spain has constantly practiced against us; and if we have kept our hands off her till now, it has been purely out of respect to France, which was our only friend. We set one against friendship of France. We expect, therefore, from the friendship of the Emperor, that he will either compel Spain to do us justice, or abandon her to us. We ask but one month to be in possession of the city of Mexico.—To ANAXAGORAS BOWDOIN, v, 64. FORD ED., ix, 49. (W., April 1807.)

8048. SPAIN, Reprisal on.—While war with England is probable, everything leading to it with every other nation should be avoided. except Spain. As to her, I think it the precise moment when we should declare to the French government that we will instantly make the Floridas as reprisal for the spoliations denied us, and, that if by a given day they are paid to us, we will restore all east of the Perdido, and hold the rest subject to amicable decision.
THE JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA

Spain

Otherwise, we will hold them forever as a compensation for the spoliations.—To JAMES MADISON, v. 181. FORD ED., x. 134. (M., Sep. 1807.)

8049. SPAIN. Republicanism in.—The spirit of the Spaniard, and his deadly and eternal hatred to a Frenchman, give me much confidence that he will never submit, but finally defeat this atrocious violation of the laws of God and man, under which he is suffering; and the wisdom and firmness of the nation have afforded reasonable hope that that nation will settle down in a temperate representative government, with an executive properly subordinated to that.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii. 308. FORD ED., x. 270. (M. 1823.)

8050. SPAIN, Spanish America and.—The most advantageous relation in which Spain can stand with her American colonies is that of independent friendship, secured by the ties of consanguinity, sameness of language, religion, manners, and habits, and certain from the influence of these, of a preference in her commerce, if, instead of the eternal irritations, thwitterings, machinations against their new governments, the insults and aggressions by which Great Britain has so long and so wisely practiced towards us, to force us to hate her against our natural inclinations, Spain yields, like a genuine parent, to the forisfamilial of her colonies, now at maturity, if she tends to them her affections, her protection, and its spirit of all countries, it will weave a bond of union indisputable by time.—To DON V. DE TORONDA CORUNA. vi. 274. (M., Dec. 1813.)

8051. That Spain's divorce from its American colonies, which is now unavoidable, will be a great blessing, it is impossible not to pronounce on a review of what she was when she acquired them, and of her gradual descent from that position affecting the condition in which her present war found her. Nature has formed that peninsula to be the second, and why not the first nation in Europe? Give equal habits of energy to the bodies, and of science to the minds of her citizens, and where could she not be produced in any court and country, it will weave a bond of union indisputable by time.—To DON V. DE TORONDA CORUNA. vi. 274. (M., Dec. 1813.)

8052. SPAIN, Spoliations and boundaries.—With Spain our negotiations for a settlement of differences have not had a satisfactory issue. Spoliations during the former war, for which she had formally acknowledged herself responsible, have been refused to be compensated, but on conditions affecting other claims in nowise connected with them. Yet the same practices are renewed in the present war, and are already of great amount. On the Mobile, our commerce passing through that river continues to be obstructed by arbitrary duties and vexatious searches. Propositions for adjusting amicably the boundaries of Louisiana have not been acceded to. While, however, the right is unsettled, we have avoided changing the state of things, by taking new posts, or strongholds in the enemies territories, in the hope that the other power would not, by a contrary conduct, oblige us to meet their example, and endanger conflicts of authority, the issue of which may not be entirely contrary. In this hope, I now rest content to lessen our confidence. Inroads have been recently made into the territories of Orleans and the Mississippi, our citizens have been seized and their property plundered in the very parts of the former which had been actually delivered up to Spain, and this by the regular officers and soldiers of that government. I cannot, therefore, find it necessary at length to give orders to our troops on that frontier to be in readiness to protect our citizens, and to repel by arms any similar aggressions in future.—FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii. 48. FORD ED. viii. 390. (Dec. 3, 1805.)

8053. The depredations which had been committed on the commerce of the United States during a preceding war, by persons under the Spanish government, it became my duty to require from that government indemnifications for our injured citizens. A convention was accordingly entered into * * * by which it was agreed that spoliations committed by Spanish subjects were to be paid for by that nation; and that those committed by French subjects, and carried into Spanish ports should remain for further discussion. Before this convention was returned to Spain with our ratification, the transfer of power from Spain to the United States took place, an event as unexpected as disagreeable to Spain. From that moment she seemed to change her conduct and dispositions towards us. It was first manifested by her protest against the right of France to alienate Louisiana from any nation to war it was rejected, and the right confirmed. Then, high offense was manifested at the act of Congress establishing a collection district on the Mobile, although by an authentic declaration immediately made, it was expressly confined to our acknowledged limits. To obtain now necessity to ratify the convention signed by her own minister under the eye of his sovereign, unless we would relinquish all consent to alterations of its terms which would have affected our claims against her for the spoliations by which she subjected our merchants to. To obtain justice, as well as to restore friendship, I thought a special mission advisable, and accordingly appointed James Monroe, Minister Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, to repair to Madrid, and in conjunction with our representative in Spain, to procure a ratification of the former convention and to come to an understanding with Spain as to the boundaries of Louisiana. It appeared at once that her policy was to reserve herself for events, and in the meantime to keep the dispute open under an understanding with us. This will be evident from the papers now communicated to you. After nearly five months of fruitless endeavor to bring them to some definite and satisfactory result our ministers ended the conversations without having been able to obtain indemnity for spoliations of any description, or any satisfaction as to the boundaries of Louisiana, other than a declaration that we had no rights eastward of the Iberville, and that our line to the west was one which would have been formed by the Spanish States claimed her citizens, and we had no claims to. They authorize the inference that it is their intention to advance on our possessions until they shall be oppressed by an opposing force. Considering that Congress alone is constitutionally invested with the power of changing the Constitution of the United States and that my duty to await their authority for using force in any degree which could be avoided. I have barely instructed the officers stationed in the neighborhood of the aggressions to protect our citizens from violence, to patrol within the borders actually delivered to us, and not to go out of them but when necessary to repel an inroad, or to rescue a citizen or his property.

8054. — — With Spain we are making a last effort at peaceable accommodation. The subject is merely a settlement of the limits of Louisiana, and our right of passing down the rivers of Florida. This negotiation is to be held at Paris, where we may have the benefit of the good offices of Mr. Monroe, but if this will not be to our advantage we will not be party to the contract.—To THOMAS PAINE. FORD ED., viii, 436. (W., March 1806.)

8055. Notwithstanding the efforts made here, and made professedly to assassinate the negotiation on the good sense of Bonaparte should prevail over his temper, the present state of things in Europe may induce him to require of Spain that she should do us justice at least. That he should require her to sell us East Florida, we hail with joy, but yet there are not wanting considerations which may induce him to wish a permanent foundation for peace laid between us.—To MR. BIDWELL. v, 15. (W., July 1806.)

8056. — It is grossly false that our ministers  had proposed to surrender our claims to compensation for Spanish spoliations, or even for French. Their instructions were to make no treaty in which Spanish spoliations were not provided for; and although they were permitted to be silent as to French spoliations carried into Spanish ports, they were not expressly to abandon even them.—To W. A. BURWELL. v, 20. FORD ED., viii, 469. (M., Sep. 1806.)

8057. — Our affairs with Spain laid dormant during the absence of Bonaparte from Paris, because we know Spain would do nothing towards settling them, but by compulsory inroad, only on those terms that were stated to him, and his interposition obtained. If it was with good faith, its effect will be instantaneous; if not with good faith, we shall discover it by affected delays, and must decide accordingly.—To WILLIAM SHOFT. v, 211. (W., Nov. 1807.)

8058. SPAIN, Treaty with.—Some fear our envoys in the wars engendering from the unsettled state of our affairs with Spain, and therefore are anxious for a ratification of our treaty with her. I fear no such thing, and hope that if it rided by Spain, it will be rejected here. We may justly say to Spain, "When this negotiation commenced, twenty years ago, your answer, Mr. Monroe, was acknowledged by those you are selling to us. That authority is now renounced, and their right of self-disposal asserted. In buying them from you, then, we buy but a war title, a right to subdue them, which you can neither convey nor we acquire. This is a family point and we have no right to meddle. Settle it between yourselves, and we will then treat with the party whose right is acknowledged." With whom that will be, no doubt can be entertained. And why should we revolt them by purchasing them from France, rather than receiving them as fellow-men? Spain has held off until she sees they are lost to her, and now thinks it better to get something than nothing for them. When she shall see South America equally desperate, she will be wise to sell that also.—To M. DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 194. FORD ED., x, 179. (M., Dec. 1820.)

8059. SPAIN; War against.—I had rather have war against Spain than not, if we go to war against England. Our southern defensive force can take the Floridas, volunteers for a Mexican army will flock to our standard, and rich pabulum will be offered to our private in the plunder of their commerce and exports. Probably Cuba would add itself to our confederate forces. JAMES MONROE, vi, 164. FORD ED., ix, 124. (M., Aug. 1807.) See FLORIDA, LOUISIANA, MISSISSIPPI RIVER NAVIGATION, NEW ORLEANS AND SPANISH AMERICA.

8060. SPANISH AMERICA, Aid to.—Every kindness which can be shown the South Americans, every friendly office and a'd within the limits of the law of nations, I would extend to them without fearing Spain or her Swiss auxiliaries. For this is but an assertion of our own independence. But to join in their war, as General Scott proposes, and to which even some members of Congress seem to squint, is what we ought not to do as yet.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 550. FORD ED., x, 19. (M., Feb. 1816.)

8061. — That a war is brewing between us and Spain cannot be doubted. When that disposition is matured on both sides, and open rupture can no longer be deferred, then will be the time for our joining the South Americans, and entering into treaties of alliance with them. I say will then be but one opinion, at home or abroad, that we shall be justly in choosing to have them with us, rather than against us. In the meantime, they will have organized regular governments, and perhaps have formed themselves into one or more confederacies which, however more or less detached, yet if united, and in a mass they would be a very formidable neighbor.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 551. FORD ED., x, 19. (M., Feb. 1816.)

8062. — The Spanish Colonies cannot reasonably expect us to sink ourselves uselessly and even injuriously for them by a quixotic encounter of the whole world in arms. Were it not for the interest of Spain, and the motives to which they are urged, I think the whole world should repel us. But Russia is said to have seventy ships of the line; France approaching that number, and what should we be in fronting such a force? It is not for the interest of Spanish America that our Republic should be blotted out of the map, and the rest of the world it would be an act of treason.—To PRESIDENT MONROE. FORD ED., x, 316. (M., July 1824.)

8063. SPANISH AMERICA, Constitution for.—For such a condition of society, the constitution you [Dupont de Nemours] have devised is probably the best imaginable. It is certainly calculated to elicit the best talents; although perhaps not well guarded against the more or less unknown it is possible it will be with that egoism will be light in comparison with the pressure of a military despot and his army of Janizaries. Like Solon to the Athenians, you have given to your Colombians, not the best possible government, but the best they can bear.—To DUPONT DE NEUMOURS. vi, 592. FORD ED., x, 25. (P.P., 1816.)

8064. SPANISH AMERICA, Ignorance in.—Another great field of political experiment is opening in our neighborhood, in Spanish America. I fear the degrading ignorance into which their priests and kings have sunk them, has disqualifying them from the maintenance or even knowledge of their rights, and that much blood may be shed for little improvement in their condition. Should their new rulers honestly lay their shoulders to remove the great obstacles of ignorance, and press the remedies of education and information, they will still be in jeopardy; until another generation be matured, and what may happen in the interval cannot be predicted.—To DUPONT
DE NEUMOURS. vi, 584. FORD ED., IX, 322. (M., 1811.)

8065. — No mortal wishes them more success than I do. But if what I have heard of the ignorance and bigotry of the mass be true, I doubt their capacity to understand and support a free government, and fear any event from the foreign tyranny of Spain, will result in a military despotism at home. Palacios may be great; others may be great; but it is the multitude which possess force; and wisdom must yield to that.—To DUPONT DE NEUMOURS. vi, 592. FORD ED., X, 25. (P.F., 1816.)

8066. SPANISH AMERICA, Independence of.—It is intimated to us, in such a way as to attract our attention, that France means to send a strong force early this spring to offer independence to the Spanish American colonies, beginning with those on the Mississippi and that she will not object to the receiving those on the East side into our compact union. In every consideration that requires that we should keep ourselves free to act in this case according to circumstances, and consequently that you should not, by any clause of treaty, bind us to guarantee any of the Spanish colonies against their own independence; nor indeed against any other nation. For, when we thought we might guarantee Louisiana on their ceding the Floridas to us, we apprehended it would be seized by Great Britain, who would thus completely encircle us with her colonies and fleets. This danger is not removed by the concert between Great Britain and Spain. And the times will soon enough give independence, and consequently free commerce to our neighbors, without our risking the involving ourselves in a war with them.—To CARMICHAEL AND SHORTLII, 534. FORD ED., VI, 266. (Pa, March 1793.)

8067. — On the question of our interest in their independence, were that alone a sufficient motive of action, much may be said on both sides. When they are free, they will draw every article of our produce from every market, by underselling it, and change the condition of our existence. Forcing us into other habits and pursuits. We shall indeed, have no exchange some commerce with them, but in what I know not, for we shall have nothing to offer which they cannot raise cheaper; and their separation from Spain seals our everlasting peace with her. On the other hand, so long as they are dependent, Spain, from her jealousy, is our natural enemy, and always in either open or secret hostility with us. These countries, too, in war will be a powerful weight in the hand of an enemy and in peace totally shut to us. Interest, then, on the whole, would wish their independence. and justice makes the wish a duty. They have a right to be free, and we a right to aid them, as a strong man has a right to assist a weak one assaulted by a robber or murderer.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 550. FORD ED., X, 19. (M., Feb. 1816.)

8068. — We go with you all lengths in friendly affections to the independ-ence of South America. But an immediate acknowledgment of it calls up other considerations. We view Europe as covering at present a smothered fire, which may shortly burst forth and produce general conflagration. From this it is our duty to keep aloof. A formal acknowledgment of the independence of her Colonies would involve us with Spain in peril, too, with England, if she thinks that a war would divert her internal troubles. Such a war would hurt us more than it would help our brethren of the South; and our right may be doubted of mortgaging posterity for the expenses of a war at the moment, and the right to say their interests were not concerned. —To DESTUTT TRACY. FORD ED., IV, 174. (M., 1820.)

8069. SPANISH AMERICA, Interest In.—However distant we may be, both in condition and dispositions, from taking an active part in any commotions in that country [South America], nature has placed it too near us, to make its movements altogether indifferent to our interests, or to our curiosity. —To JON. JAY, ii, 145. FORD ED., IV, 385. (Mar. 1787.)

8070. SPANISH AMERICA, Name for. — I wish you had called them the Columbian republics, distinguishing them from our American republics. Theirs would be the more honorable name, and they best entitled to it: for Columbus discovered their continent, but never saw ours.—To DUPONT DE NEUMOURS. vi, 593. FORD ED., X, 25. (P.F., 1816.)

8071. SPANISH AMERICA, Natural divisions of.—The geography of the Spanish-American] country seems to indicate three confederacies. 1. What is north of the Isthmus. 2. What is south of it on the Atlantic: and 3, the southern part on the Pacific. In this form, we might be the balancing power.—To JAMES MONROE. vi, 551. FORD ED., X, 20. (M., Feb. 1816.)

8072. SPANISH AMERICA, Relations with Spain.—If the mother country [Spain] has not the magnanimity to part with the colonies in friendship, thereby making them what they would certainly be, her natural and firmest allies, these will emancipate themselves, after having given her strength to the current. But such effec-tual efforts to hold them in subjection. They will be rendered enemies of the mother country, as England has rendered us by an unremitting course of insulting injuries and injuries andally; and 3, the southern part on the Pacific. In this form, the United States would find an interest in the independence of neighbor nations, whose produce and commerce would rivalize ours. It could only be that kind of interest which every humane law gives in the happiness and prosper-ity of every other. But if the wrong be rea-son out of the question, I have no doubt that on calculations of interest alone, it is that of Spain to anticipate voluntarily, and as a matter of grace, the independence of her colonies, which is the necessity we have with them. —To CHEVALIER DE ONIS. vi, 342. (M., April 1814.)

8073. SPANISH AMERICA, Revolt of. — Behold another example of man rising in his might and bursting the chains of his oppressor, and in the same way Spain American is all in revolt. The insurgents are triumphant in many of the States, and will be so in all. But there the danger is that the cruel arts of their oppressors have enchained their minds, have kept them in the ignorance of children, and as incapable of self-government as children. If the obstacles of bigotry and priestcraft can be surmounted, we may hope that common sense will suffice to do everything else. God send them a safe deliverance.

—To GEORGE KOSCIUSKO. v. 586. (M. 1811.)

8074. That they will throw off their European dependence I have no doubt; but the kind of government their revolution will end I am not so certain. History, I believe, furnishes no example of a priest-ridden people maintaining a free civil government. This marks the lowest grade of ignorance, of which their civil as well as religious leaders will almost certainly, made them as instruments of enslaving others. * * * But in whatever governments they end they will be American governments, no longer to be involved in the never-ceasing broils of Europe.—To BARON HUMBOLDT. vii. 267. FORD ED., ix. 430. (Dec. 1813.)

8075. SPANISH AMERICA, Self-government and.—The Spanish-American countries are beginning to be interesting to the whole world. They are now rising from the scenes of political revolution, to take their stations as integral members of the great family of nations. All are now in insurrection. In several, the Independents are already triumphant, and they will undoubtedly be so in all. What kind of governments will they have? Will they be formed enough to sustain the unavoidable schisms in that kind of executive shall drive them to something else, their great question will come on whether to substitute an executive elective for years, for life, or an hereditary one. But unless instruction can spread among them more rapidly than the experience promises, despotism may come upon them before they are qualified to save the ground they will have gained.—To BARON VON HUMBOLDT. v. 580. (M. April 1811.)

8076. The achievement [by the Spanish Colonies] of their independence of Spain is no longer a question. But it is a very serious one, what will then become of them? Ignorance and bigotry, like other insanities, are incapable of self-government. They will fall under military despotism, and become the murderous tools of the ambition of their respective Bonapartes; and whether this will be for their greater happiness, the rule of one only has taught you to judge. No one, I hope, can doubt my wish to see them and all mankind exercising self-government, and capable of exercising it. But the question is not what we wish, but what is practicable? As their sincere friend and brother, then, I do believe the best thing for them, would be for themselves to come to an accord with Spain, on the guarantee of France, Russia, Holland, and the United States, allowing, to Spain a nominal supremacy, with authority only to keep the peace among them, leaving them otherwise all the power of self-government, until their experience in them, their emancipation from their priests, and advancement in information, shall prepare them for complete independence. I exclude England from this confederacy, because her selfish principles render her incapable of honorable patronage or disinterested cooperation.—To MARQUIS LAFAYETTE. vii. 67. FORD ED., x. 84. (1817.)

8077. The issue of [Spanish America's] struggles, as they respect Spain, is no longer matter of doubt. As it respects their own liberty, peace and happiness, we cannot be quite so certain. Whether the blinds of bigotry, the shackles of the priesthood, and the fascinating glass of rank and wealth, can give fair play to the common sense of the mass of their people, so far as to qualify them for self-government, is what we do not know. Perhaps our wishes may be stronger than our hopes.—To P. H. ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. vii. 74. FORD ED., x. 88. (M. 1817.)

8078. I feared from the beginning that these people were not yet sufficiently enlightened for self-government; and that after wading through blood and slaughter, they would end in military tyrannies, more or less numerous. Yet, as they wished to try the experiment, I wished them success in it; they have now tried it and will possibly find that their safest road will be an accommodation to, not the country, which shall hold them together by the single link of the same chief magistrate, leaving to him power enough to keep them in peace with one another, and to themselves the essential part of self-government, and self-improvement, until they shall be sufficiently trained by education and habits of freedom, to walk safely by themselves. Representative government, native functionaries, a qualified negative on their laws, with a previous security by compact for freedom of commerce, freedom of the press, habeas corpus and trial by jury, would make a good beginning. This last would be the school in which their people might begin to learn the exercise of the rights and self-rights. For freedom of religion they are not yet prepared. The scales of bigotry have not sufficiently fallen from their eyes, to accept it for themselves individually, much less to trust others with it. But that will come in time, as well as a general common to the rank and file of the parent stem.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii. 200. FORD ED., x. 186. (M. Jan. 1821.)

8079. SPANISH AMERICA, United States and.—I cannot help suspecting the Spanish squadron to be gone to South America, and that some disturbances have been excited there by the British. The Court of Madrid may suppose we would not see this with an unwilling eye. This may be true as to the uninformed part of our people; but those who look into futurity rather than the present moment or age, and who combine well what is,
with what is to be, must see that our interests, well understood, and our wishes are, that Spain shall (not forever, but) very long retain her possessions in that quarter; and that her views and ours must, in a good degree, and for a long time, concur.—To William Carmichael. ii, 398. Ford ed., v, 23. (P., 1788.)

8080. SPECIAL LEGISLATION, Fauvoritism and.—To special legislation we are generally averse, lest a principle of favoritism should creep in and pervert that of equal rights. It has, however, been done on some occasions where a special national advantage has been expected to overthrow that of adhesion to the general rule.—To George Flower. vii, 83. (P.F., 1817.)

— SPECIE.—See Money. Metallic.

8081. SPECULATION, Agriculture vs. —A war wherein France, Holland, and England should be parties, seems, prinâ facie, to promise much advantage to us. But, in the first place, no war can be safe for us which threatens an unfavorable issue; and in the next, it will probably embark us again into the ocean of speculation, engage us to overtrade ourselves, convert us into sea-rovers, under French and Dutch colors, divert us from agriculture, which is our wisest pursuit, because it will in the end contribute most to real wealth, good morals and happiness.—To General Washington. ii, 251. (P., Aug. 1787.)

8082. SPECULATION, A crime.—Wilson Nicholas is attacked in his election. The ground on which the attack is made is that he is a speculator. The explanations which this has produced prove it a serious crime in the eyes of the people.—To James Madison. Ford ed., vii, 1. (M., Feb. 1795.)

8083. SPECULATION, Excessive.—It is impossible to say where the appetite for gambling will stop. The land office, the Federal town, certain schemes of manufacture, are all likely to be converted into an instrument for that rage.—To James Monroe. iii, 268. Ford ed., v, 353. (Pa., 1791.)

8084. ——. The unmoneved farmer, as he is termed, his cattle and crops are no more thought of here [Philadelphia] than if they did not feed us. Scrip and stock are food and raiment here.—To T. M. Randolph. Ford ed., v, 455. (Pa., 1792.)

8085. SPECULATION, In France.—All the money men [in France] are playing deeply in the stocks of the country. The spirit of "agiotage" (as they call it) was never so high in any country before. It will probably produce as total deprivation of morals as the system of [John] Law did. All the money of France is now employed in this, none being free even for the purposes of commerce, which suffers immensely from this cause.—To R. Izard. ii, 206. (P., 1787.)

8086. SPECULATION, Gambling and.—The wealth acquired by speculation and plunder, is fugacious in its nature, and fills society with the spirit of gambling.—To General Washington. ii, 252. (P., 1787.)

8087. ——. A spirit of gambling in the public paper has lately seized too many of our citizens. Commerce, manufactures, the arts and agriculture will suffer from it, if not checked. Many are ruined by it; but I fear that ruin will be no more a correction in this case than in common gaming.—To David Humphreys. Ford ed., v, 372. (Pa., 1791.)

8088. ——. The credit and fate of the nation seem to hang on the desperate throws and plagues of gambling scoundrels.—To T. M. Randolph. Ford ed., v, 455. (Pa., 1792.)

8089. SPECULATION, Land.—You mention that my name is used by some speculators in Western land jobbing, as if they were acting for me as well as for themselves. About the years 1776 or 1777, I consented to join Mr. Harvey and some others in an application for lands there; which scheme, however I believe he dropped on the threshold. I never after heard one syllable on the subject. In 1782, I joined some gentlemen in a project to obtain lands in the western part of North Carolina. But in the winter of 1782 and 1783, while I was in expectation of going to Europe, and that the title to western lands might possibly come under the discussion of the ministers, I withdrew myself from this company. I am further assured that the members never prosecuted their views. These were the only occasions in which I ever took a single step for the acquisition of western lands, and in these I retracted at the threshold. I can with truth, therefore, declare to you, and wish you to repeat it on every proper occasion, that no person on earth is authorized to place my name in any adventure for lands on the western waters, that I am not engaged in any but the two before mentioned. I am one of eight children to whom my father left his share in the loyal company, whose interests, however, I never espoused, and they have long since received their quietus. Excepting these, I never was, nor am I now, interested in one foot of land on earth off the waters of James River.—To James Madison. Ford ed., iv, 2. (P. 1784.)

8090. SPECULATION, Morality and.—Though we shall be neutrals, and as such shall derive considerable pecuniary advantages, yet I think we shall lose in happiness and morals by being launched again into the ocean of speculation, led to overtrade ourselves, tempted to become sea-robbers, under French colors, and to quit the pursuits of agriculture, the surest road to affluence, and best preservative of morals.—To J. Blair. ii, 248. (P., 1787.)

8091. SPECULATION, Stocks.—I wish to God you had some person who could dispose of your paper at a judicious moment for you, and invest it in good lands.

8092. SPELLING, Correct.—Take care that you never spell a word wrong. Always before you write a word, consider how it is spelt; and, if you do not remember it, turn to a dictionary. It produces great praise to a lady to spell well.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iii, 346. (A., 1783.)

8093. SPELLING, Reform of English.—A change has been long desired in English orthography, such as might render it an easy and true index of the pronunciation of words. The act of printing, by its facility of combination of letters, and the sounds they should represent, increases to foreigners the difficulty of acquiring the language, occasions great loss of time to children in learning to read, and renders correct pronunciation, in some cases, a matter of much. In England a variety of plans and propositions have been made for the reform of their orthography. Passing over these, two of our countrymen, Dr. Franklin and Dr. Thornton, have also engaged in the enterprise; the former proposing an addition of two or three new characters only, the latter a reformation of the whole alphabet nearly. But these attempts in England, as well as here, have been without effect. About the middle of the last century, there was a movement to banish the letter d from the words bridge, judge, hedge, knowledge, etc., others of that termination, and to write them as we write age, cage, sacred, privilege; but with little success. The attempt was also made, which you mention, * * * to drop the letter u in words of Latin derivation ending in our, and to write honor, candor, rigor, etc., instead of honour, candour, rigour. But the u having been picked up in the passage of these words from the Latin, through the French, to us, is still preserved by those who consider the original form to be best. Other partial attempts have been made by individual writers, but with as little success. Pluralizing nouns in y and ey, by adding s only, as you propose, would certainly simplify the spelling, analogous to the general idiom of the language. It would be a step gained in the progress of general reformation, if it could prevail. But my opinion being requested I must give it candidly, that judging of the future by the past, I expect no better fortune from this thing, than prece- dents have experienced. It is very difficult to persuade the great body of mankind to give up what they have once learned, and are now masters of, for something to be learned anew. Time alone insensibly wears down old habits, and produces small changes at long intervals, and to this process we must all accommodate ourselves, and be content to follow those who will not follow us. Our Anglo-Saxon ancestors had twenty ways of spelling the word 'many.' Ten spellings was too many, and now we have substituted that which we now use. I now return your MS.* without being able, with the gentlemen whose letters are cited, to encourage hope as to its effect. I am bound, however, to acknowledge that this is a subject to which I have not paid much attention; and that my doubts, therefore, should weigh nothing against their more favorable expectations. That these may be fulfilled, and mine prove unfounded, I sincerely wish, because I am a friend to the reformation generally of whatever can be made better.—To John Wilson. vi, 196. FORD ED., ix, 396. (M., 1813.)

8094. SPIES, Congress and.—As in time of war the enemies of these States might employ emissaries and spies to discover the views and proceedings of Congress, that body should have authority, within a certain distance of the place of their session, to arrest and deal with as they shall think proper, all persons, not being citizens of any of the states entitled to their protection, whom they shall have cause to suspect to be spies.—RESOLVE ON CONTINENTAL CONGRESS. FORD ED., ii, 464. (1784.)

8095. SPIES, Employment of.—Will it not be proper to rebut Foronda's charge [with respect to Lieutenant Pike's expedition] of this government sending a spy to Santa Fé, by saying that that government has never employed a spy in any case?—To JAMES MADISON. V. 178. (Aug. 1807.)

8096. SPIES, Jefferson and.—All my motions at Philadelphia, here [Monticello], and everywhere, are watched and reported. —To SAMUEL SMITH. IV, 253. FORD ED., VII, 276. (M., 1798.)

— SPIES, Treasury.—See NEUTRALITY.

8097. SPIRIT, Party.—The happiness of society depends so much on preventing party spirit from infecting the public mind, and from producing that wrong sense of life, that nothing should be spared to harmonize and amalgamate the two parties in social circles.—To William C. Claiborne. FORD ED., VII, 70. (W., 1801.)

8098. SPIRIT, Of the people.—It is the manners and spirit of the people which preserve a republic in vigor.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. VIII, 496. FORD ED., III, 269. (1782.)

8100. SQUATTERS, Prohibition of.—I do not recollect the instructions to Governor [Meriwether] Lewis respecting squatters. But if he had any they were unquestionably to prohibit them rigorously. I have no doubt, if he had not written instructions, that he was verbally so instructed.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. V. 408. (W., Jan. 1809.)

8101. SQUATTERS, Removal.—The General Government have never hesitated to remove by force the squatters and intruders on the public lands. Indeed, if the nation were put to action against every squatter, for the recovery of their lands, we should have only lawsuits, not lands for sale.—BATTERY CASE. VIII, 588. (1812.)

8102. STABILITY, Laudable.—Perseverance in object, though not by the most direct way, is often more laudable than perpetual changes, as often as the object shifts light.—To Governor Henry. i, 220. Ford
ed., ii, 178. (Alb., 1779.)

8103. STABILITY, of the Republic.—
The order and good sense displayed in this recovery from delusion, and in the momentous crisis which lately arose [Presidential election], really bespeak a strength of character in our nation which augurs well for the duration of our Republic; and I am much better satisfied now of its stability than I was before it was tried.—To Dr. Joseph Priestley. iv, 374. Ford ed., vii, 22. (W., March 1801.)

8104. STAEL (Madame de), Sympathy.—
[I assure you] of my sincere sympathies for the share which you bear in the afflictions of your country, and the deprivation to which a lawless will has subjected you. In return, you enjoy the dignified satisfaction of having met them, rather than be yoked with the abject, to his car; and that, in withdrawing from oppression, you have followed the virtuous example of a father whose name will ever be dear to your country and to mankind.—To MADAME DE STAEL. vi, 119. (May 1813.)

8105. STANDARD, Arbitrary.—The first question to be decided is between those who are for units of measures, weights, and coins, having a known relation to something 'n ature of fixed dimens'on, and those who are for an arbitrary standard. The ancients dice verdicto it is useless to say a word, every one having made up his mind on a view of all that can be said. Mr. Dorsey was so kind as to send me his pamphlet, by which I found he was for the arbitrary standard of one-third of the standard yard of H. G., of England, supposed to be in the Exchequer of that nation, a fac simile of which was to be procured and ledged in Philadelphia. I confess myself to be of the other sect, and to prefer an unit bearing a given relation to something inherent in nature, and thus to be free from all reference to the pendulum, because it may be in the possession of every man, so that he may verify his measures for himself.
I proposed alternative plans to Congress, that they might take the one or the other, according to the degree of courage they felt. We are now to decide, it would be in favor of the first, with this single addition, that each of the denominations there adopted, should be divisible decimally at the will of every individual. The iron-founder deals in tons; let him take the two, three, his unit, and divide it into roths, 100ths, and 1000ths. The dry-goods merchant deals in pounds and yards; let him divide them decimally. The land-measurer deals in miles and poles; divide them decimally, only noting over his figures what the unit is, thus:

Tons. Lbs. Yds. Miles.
18.943. 18.943. 18.943. 18.943. etc.

—To Thomas Cooper. v, 377. (W., 1808.

8106. STANDARD, Decimal system.—
Is it in contemplation with the House of Representatives to adopt this? to arrange our meaures and weights [the same as the coinage] as a decimal ratio? The facility which this would introduce into the vulgar arithmetic would, unquestionably, be soon and sensibly felt by the whole mass of the people, who would thereby be enabled to compute for themselves whatever they should have occasion to buy, to sell, or to measure, which the present complicated and difficult ratios place beyond their computation for the most part.—COINAGE, WEIGHTS AND MEASURES REPORT. vii, 477. (July 1790.)

8107. — It will give me real pleasure to see some good system of measures and weights introduced and combined with the decimal arithmetic. It is in great part a lifting question of value to whatever, only on a half reformation. * * * or, as the French have tried with success, make a radical reform.—To J.
Dorsey. v, 236. (W., 1808.)

— STANDARD, Money.—See DOLLAR and Money.

8108. STANDARD, Regulating.—The Administrator shall not possess the prerogative * * * of regulating weights and measures.
(June 1776.)

8109. STANDARD (Measures), English.—The cogent reason which will decide the fate of whatever you report is, that England has lately adopted the reference of its measures to the pendulum. It is the mercantile part of our community which will have most to do in this innovation; it is that which having command of all the presses can make the loudest outrcy, and you know their identification with English regulations, practices, and prejudices.
It is from this identification alone, you can hope it to be permitted to adopt even the English reference to a pendulum. But the English proposition goes only to say what proportion their measures bear to the second pendulum of their own latitude, and not at all to change their units of measure. Hence it is not necessary that any nation but your own can come at 't; and as that is to say as to one-tenth of the quadrant, and as to the remaining nine-tenths they are to be calculated on conjectural data, presuming the figure of the earth which has not yet been properly determined, it is likely that we shall find that no nation but your own can come at 't; and that yours is the only nation within which a meridian can be found of such extent crossing the 45th degree, and terminating at both ends in a level. We may certainly say, then, that this measure is uncatholic, and I would rather have seen you depart from catholicism in your religion than in your philosophy.—To THE MARQUIS DE CONDORCET. Ford ed., v, 378.
(Pa., 1791.)

8111. STANDARD (Measures), Invariable.—On the subject of weights and measures, you will have, at its threshold, to encounter the question on which Solon and Lycurgus and all who differed with them found their end. It would be hard to find a single more citizens to the law, or the law to our citizens? And in solving this question their peculiar caracter is an element not to be neglected. Of the two only things in nature which can furnish an invariable standard, to wit, the dimensions of the globe itself, and the period of revolution on its axis, it is not perhaps of much importance which we adopt. * * * I sincerely wish you may be able to rally us to either standard, and to give us an unit, the aliquot part of something variable which may be applied simply and conveniently to our measures, weights and coins, and most especially that the decimal divisions may pervade the whole. The convenience of this in our moneyed system has been approved by all, and France has followed the example.—To John Quincy Adams, vii, 87. (M., 1817.)

8112. STANDARD (Measures), Method of obtaining.—To obtain uniformity in measures, weights and coins, it is necessary to find some measure of invariable length, with which, as a standard, they may be compared. There exists not in nature, as far as has been hitherto observed, a single subject or species of subject, as an inch or a minute, which presents one constant and uniform dimension. The globe of the earth itself, indeed, might be considered as invariable in all its dimensions, and that its circumference would furnish an invariable measure: but no one of its circles, great or small, is accessible to admeasurement through all its parts, and the various trials to measure definite portions of them, have been of such various result as to show there is no dependence on that operation for certainty. Matter, then, by its mere extension, gives us a measure of the only remaining resource. The motion of the earth round its axis, though not absolutely uniform and invariable, may be considered as such for every human purpose. It is measured obviously, but only approximately, by the longitudes of a given meridian from the sun, and its returning to it, constituting a solar day. Throwing together the inequalities of solar days, a mean interval, or day, has been found, and divided, by very general consent, into 86,400 equal parts. As nearly as we can, in our present imperfect way of reckoning time, we may divide this motion of the earth into 86,400 equal parts, called seconds of mean time. Such a pendulum, then, becomes itself a measure of determinate length, to which all others may be referred to as to a standard. But even a pendulum is not without its uncertainties.—Coinage, Weights and Measures Report, vii, 473. (July 1790.)

8113. STANDARD (Measures), Odometer.—I have lately had a proof how familiar this division into dimes, cents, and mills, is to the people when transferred from their money to anything else. I have an odometer fixed to my carriage, which gives the distance in miles, dimes, and cents. The people on the road inquire with curiosity what exact distance I have found from such a place to such a place. I answer so many miles, so many cents. I find they universally and at once form a perfect idea of the relation of the cent to the mile as an unit. They would do the same as to yards of cloth, pounds of shot, ounces of silver, or of medicine. I believe, therefore, they are susceptible of this degree of approximation to a standard rigorously philosophical; beyond that, I might add.—To Thomas Cooper, v, 378. (W., 1808.)

8114. STANDARD (Measures), Pendulum.—But why leave this adaption to the tardy will of governments which are always, in their rock of constitution, a century or two behind the intelligent part of mankind, and who have interests against touching ancient institutions? Why should not the college of the literary societies of the world adopt the second pendulum as the unit of measure on the authorities of reason, convenience and common consent? And why should not our Society [American Philosophical] open the proposition by a circular letter to the other learned institutions of the earth? If men of science, in their publications, would express measures always in multiples and decimals of the pendulum, animning the value in municipal measures and botanists add the feet, inches, yards, etc., the common measures of plants, they would soon become familiar to all men of instruction, and prepare the way for legal adoptions. At any rate, it would render the writers of every nation intelligible to the readers of every other, when expressing the measures of things.—To Dr. Patterson, vi, 12. (M., 1811.)

8115. — In favor of the standard to be taken from the time employed in a revolution of the earth on its axis. It may be urged that this revolution is a matter of fact present to all the world, that its division into seconds of time is known and received by all the world, that the length of a pendulum vibrating seconds in the different circles of latitude is already known to all, and can at any time and in any place be ascertained by any nation or individual, and inferred by known laws from their own to that of the medium of 45°, which (it may be supposed) may make this desirable; and that this is the particular standard which has at different times been contemplated and desired* by the philosophers of every nation, and even by those of France, except at the particular moment when this change was thought only preferable to the last, and under circumstances peculiar to the history of the moment.—To John Quincy Adams, vii, 88. (M., 1817.)

8116. — [The standard based on] the dimensions of the globe, preferred ultimately by the French, after first adopting the other [that founded on the time of the diurnal revolution] in 1791. It has been objected to from the difficulty, not to say impracticability, of the verification of their admeasurement by other nations. Except the portion of a meridian which they adopted for their operation, there is not another on the globe which fulfills the requisite condition, viz., of so considerable length, that length too divided, not very unequally, by the 45th degree of latitude, and terminating at each end in the ocean. Now, this singular line lies wholly in France and Spain. Besides expense and time which a verification would always require, it cannot be undertaken by any nation without the joint consent of these two powers. France having once performed the work, and refusing, as she may, to let any other nation examine it, she makes herself the sole depository of the original standard for all nations; and all must send to her to obtain, and from time to time to prove their standards. To this, indeed, it may be answered, that there can be no objection to duplicate verification, for this has been as accurately performed as the intervention of numerous waters and of high ridges of craggy mountains would admit; that all the calculations have been free of error, their coincidences faithful and unexampled, whether in peace or war to foes as well as friends, free access to the original will at all times be admitted.—To John Quincy Adams, vii, 88. (M., 1817.) See Pendulum.

8117: STANDARD (Measures), Rod.—Congress having referred to me to propose a plan of invariable measures. I have considered naturally your proposition, and am abundantly

* If, conforming to this desire of other nations, we adopted the second pendulum, 3/10 of that for our foot will be the same as 1-1/4 or 2 1/10 of the second rod, because that rod is to the pendulum, as 5 to 3. This would make our foot 1-1/4 inch less than the present one.—Note by Jefferson.
8118. STANDARD (Measures), Universal.—The pendulum is equally [with the meridian] fixed by the laws of nature, is in the possession of every nation, may be verified everywhere and everywhere, and at an expense to every one's means. I am not, therefore, without a hope that the other nations of the world will still concur, some day, in making the pendulum the basis of a common system of measures, weights and coins, which applied to the present metrical systems of France and of other countries, will render them all intelligible to one another. England and this country may give it a beginning, notwithstanding the war they are entering into. The republic of letters is uniformly divided by the meridian of Paris, and by the division of the earth by the geographical divisions of the earth.—To Dr. Patterson. vi. i. (M., 1811.)

8119. weights.—I do not like the new system of French measures, because not the best, and adapted to a standard accessible to themselves exclusively, and to be obtained by other nations only from them. For, on examining the map of the earth, you will find no meridian on it but the one passing through their country, offering the extent of land on both sides of the 45th degree, and terminating at both ends in a portion of the ocean which the conditions of the problem for an universal standard of measures require. Were all nations to agree, therefore, to adopt this standard, they must go to Paris to ask it; and they might as well long ago have all agreed to adopt the French foot, the standard of which they could equally have obtained from Paris.—To Dr. Patterson. vi. ii. (M., 1811.)

8120. STANDARD (Weights), Avoirdupois and Troy.—It would be for their [the people’s] convenience to suppress the pound and ounce troy, and the drachm and quartar Troy; and to divide the series the avoirdupois pound and ounce, and the troy pennyweight and quarter.—COINAGE, Weights and Measures Report. vii. 486. (1790.)

8121. STANDARD (Weights), Basis.—Let it be established that an ounce is of the weight of a cube of rain water of one-tenth of a foot; or, rather, that it is the thousandth part of the weight of a cubic foot of rain water, weighed in the standard temperature; that the series of weights of the United States shall consist of pounds, ounces, pennyweights and grains; wherof 24 grains shall be one pennyweight, and 20 one ounce; 16 ounces one pound.—COINAGE, Weights and Measures Report. vii. 487. (1790.)

8122. STANDARD (Weights), Ratios.—The weight of the pound troy is to that of the pound avoirdupois as 144 to 175. It is remarkable that this is exactly the proportion of the ancient liquid gallon of Guildhall of 24 cubic inches to the corn gallon of 272. It is further remarkable still that this is also the exact proportion between the specific weight of any measure of wheat and of the same measure of water,  This seems to have been so combined as to render it indifferent whether a thing were dealt out by weight or measure.—COINAGE, Weights and Measures Report. vii. 484. (1790.)

8123. —— Another remarkable correspondence is that between weights and measures. For 1,000 ounces avoirdupois of pure water fills a cubic foot, with mathematical exactness. What circumstances of the times, or purpose of barter or commerce, called for this combination of weights and measures, with the subjects to be exchanged or purchased, are not now to be ascertained. But a triple set of exact proportions representing weights, measures and the things to be weighed and measured so integral between weights and solid measures, must have been the result of design and scientific calculation and not a mere coincidence of hazard.—COINAGE, Weights and Measures Report. vii. 485. (1790.)

8124. STATE RIGHTS, Coercion.—Respect and friendship should, I think, mark the conduct of the General towards the particular government, and explanations should be asked and time and color given them to tread back their steps before coercion is held up to their view.—Opinion on Georgian Land Grants. vii. 468. Ford ed., v. 167. (1790.) See Coercion of a State.

8125. STATE RIGHTS, Congress and.—Can it be thought that the Constitution intended that for a shade or two of convenience, more or less, Congress should be authorized to break down the most ancient and fundamental laws of the several States; such as those against Mortmain, the laws of Alienage, the rules of Descent, the acts of Distribution, the laws of Escheat and Forfeiture, the laws of Monopoly? Nothing but a necessity invincible by any other means, can justify such a prostitution of laws, which constitute the pillars of our whole system of jurisprudence. Will Congress be too straightforward to carry the Constitution into honest effect, unless they may pass over the foundation-laws of the State government for the slightest convenience of theirs?—National Bank Opinion. vii. 560. Ford ed., v. 289. (1791.) See Bank (U. S.). Constitutionality of.

8126. —— [The States] alone being parties to the [Federal] compact, * * * [are] solely authorized to judge in the last resort of the powers exercised under it. Congress being not a party, but merely the creature of the compact, and subject as to its assumptions of power to the final judgment of those by whom, and for whose use itself and its powers were all created and modified.—Kentucky Resolutions. ix. 469. Ford ed., vii. 301. (1798.) See Kentucky Resolutions.

8127. STATE RIGHTS, Constitution and.—I am firmly persuaded that it is by giving due tone to the particular governments that the general one will be preserved in vigor also, the Constitution having foreseen its incompetency to all the objects of government, and, therefore, confined it to those specially described.—To James Sulli-

8128. STATE RIGHTS, Encroachments on.—Whilst the General Assembly [of Vir-
Virginia] thus declares the rights retained by the States, rights which they have never yielded, and which this State will never voluntarily yield, they do not mean to raise the banner of disaffection, or to separate from their sisters; States, coparties with themselves to this compact. They know and value too highly the blessings of their Union as to foreign nations and questions arising among themselves, to consider every infraction of it as to be met by actual resistance. They respect too affectionately the opinions of those possessing the same rights under the same instrument, to make that difference of construction a ground of immediate rupture. They would, indeed, consider such a rupture as among the greatest calamities which could befal them; but not the greatest. There is yet one greater, submission to a government of unlimited powers. It is only when the hope of avoiding this shall have become absolutely desperate, that further forbearance could not be indulged. Should a majority of the coparties, therefore, contrary to the expectation and hope of this Assembly, prefer, at this time acquiescence in these assumptions to the loss of power by the Federal member of the government, we will be patient and suffer much under the confidence that time, ere it be too late, will prove to them also the bitter consequences in which that usurpation will involve us all. In the meantime we will bear with them, rather than separate from them, every misfortune, save that only of living under a government of unlimited powers. We owe every other sacrifice to ourselves, to our Federal brethren, and to the world at large, to pursue with temper and with perseverance the great experiment which shall prove that man is capable of living in society, governing itself by laws self-imposed, and securing to its members the enjoyment of life, liberty, property, and peace, and further to show, that even when the government of its choice shall manifest a tendency to degeneracy we are not at once to despair, but that the will and the watchfulness of its sounder parts will reform its aberrations, recall it to original and legitimate principles, and restrain it within the rightful limits of self-government.—Virginia Protestant, ix, 498. FORD Ed., x, 351. (1825.)

8129. STATE RIGHTS, Freedom and. —The States should be left to do whatever acts they can do as well as the General Government.—To John Harvie. FORD Ed., v, 214. (N.Y., 1790.)

8130. STATE RIGHTS, General welfare. —This Assembly [of Virginia] does disavow and declare to be most false and unfounded, the doctrine that the compact, in authorizing its Federal branch to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, has given them thereby a power to do whatever they may think, or pretend, would promote the general welfare, which construction would make that of itself, a complete government, without limitation of powers; but that the plain sense and obvious meaning were, that they might levy the taxes necessary to provide for the general welfare, by the various acts of power therein specified and delegated to them, and by no others.—Virginia Protestant, ix, 497. FORD Ed., x, 350. (1825.) See General Welfare Clause.

8131. STATE RIGHTS, Home rule.—I believe the States can best govern our home concerns.—To William Johnson. vii, 397. FORD Ed., x, 232. (M., 1823.)

8132. —To the State governments are reserved all legislation and administration, in affairs which concern their own citizens only.—To John Cartwright. vii, 350. (M. 1824.)

8133. STATE RIGHTS, Interior Government.—Interior government is what each State should keep to itself.—To James Madison. i, 531. FORD Ed., iv, 192. (P., 1786.)

8134. STATE RIGHTS, Lines of demarcation.—I have always thought that where the line of demarcation between the powers of the General and the State governments was doubtfully or indistinctly drawn, it would be prudent and praiseworthy in both parties never to approach it but under the most urgent necessity.—To J. C. Cabell. vi, 310. FORD Ed., ix, 452. (M., 1814.)

8135. STATE RIGHTS, Metallic money and. —I recollect but one instance of control vested in the Federal over the State authorities, in a matter purely domestic, which is that of metallic tenders.—To Robert J. Garnett. vii, 336. FORD Ed., x, 295. (M., 1824.)

8136. STATE RIGHTS, National bank and.—The bill for establishing a National Bank undertakes * * * to form the subscribers into a corporation [and] * * * communicates to them, in their corporate capacities, a power to make laws paramount to the laws of the States; for so they must be construed, to protect the institution from the control of the State legislatures; and so, probably, they will be construed.—National Bank Opinion. vii, 555-6. FORD Ed., v, 285. (1791.) See Bank (U. S.), Constitutionality of.

8137. STATE RIGHTS, Nullification. —Every State has a natural right in cases not within the compact (casus non faderis) to nullify of their own authority all assumptions of power by others within their limits: without this right, they would be under the dominion, absolute and unlimited, of whoever might exercise this right of judgment for them.—Kentucky Resolutions. ix, 469. FORD Ed., vii, 301. (1798.)

8138. STATE RIGHTS, Preservation of.—I am for preserving to the States the powers not yielded by them to the Union and to the Legislature of the Union its constitutional share in the division of powers; and I am not for transferring all the powers of the States to the General Government, and a1

those of that government to the Executive branch.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. iv, 268. FORD ED., vii, 327. (1799.) See CENTRALIZATION.

8139. — —. I wish to preserve [in a new constitution for Virginia] the line drawn by the Federal Constitution between the General and particular governments as it stands at present, and to take every prudent means of preventing either from stepping over it.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 314. FORD ED., v, 499. (Pa., 1791.) See CONSTITUTION (FEDERAL).

8140. STATE RIGHTS, Judiciary and. —It is of immense consequence that the States retain as complete authority as possible over their own citizens. The withdrawing themselves under the shelter of a foreign jurisdiction, is so subversive of order and so pregnant of abuse, that it may not be amiss to consider how far a law of pre tumure should be revised and modified, against all citizens who attempt to carry their causes before any other than the State courts, in cases where those other courts have no right to their cognizance. A plea to the jurisdiction of the courts of their State, or a declaration of a foreign jurisdiction, if adjudged valid, would be safe; but if adjudged invalid, would be followed by the punishment of pre tumure for the attempt.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 200. FORD ED., vii, 173. (M., 1797.) See JUDICIARY and SUPREME COURT.

8141. STATE RIGHTS, Reserved. —Nor is it admitted   that the people of these States, by not investing their Federal branch with all the means of bettering their condition, have denied to themselves any which may effect that purpose; since in the distribution of those means they have given to that branch those which belong to its department, and to the States have reserved separately the residue which belong to them separately. And thus by the organization of the two branches taken together, they have completely secured the first object of human association, the full improvement of their condition, and reserved to themselves all the faculties of multiplying their own blessings.
—VIRGINIA PROTEST. ix, 497. FORD ED., x, 351. (1825.)

8143. STATE RIGHTS, Sovereignty. — The States should severally preserve their sovereignty in whatever concerns themselves alone, and whatever may concern another State, or any foreign nation, should be made a part of the Federal sovereignty.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 267. FORD ED., iv, 445. (P., Sep. 1787.)

8145. STATE RIGHTS, Surrender of. — Can it be believed, that under the jealousies prevailing against the General Government, at the adoption of the Constitution, the States meant to surrender the authority of preserving order, of enforcing moral duties and restraining vice within their own territories?—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 297. FORD ED., x, 231. (M., 1823.) See FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND UNION (FEDERAL).

8146. STATES, Admission of new. — The 11th Article of Confederation admits Canada toaccede to the Confederation at its own will, but adds that, “no other Colony shall be admitted to the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine States”. When the plan of April, 1784, for establishing new States was on the carpet, the committee who framed the report of that plan, had inserted this clause, “provided nine States agree to such admission, according to the reservation of the 11th of the Articles of Confederation”. It was objected, 1. That the words of the Confederation, “no other Colony”, could only refer to the residuary possessions of Great Britain, as the two Floridas, Nova Scotia, &c., not being already parts of the Union; that the law for “admitting” a new member into the Union, could not be applied to a territory which was already in the Union, as making part of a State which was a member of it. 2. That it would be improper to allow “nine” States to receive a new member, because the same reasons which rendered that number proper now, would render a greater one proper when the number composing the Union should be increased. They, therefore, struck out this paragraph, and inserted a proviso, that “the admission of any States, in Congress, shall be first obtained, as may, at the time be competent”; thus leaving the question, whether the 11th Article applies to the admission of new States? to be decided when that admission shall be asked. (See the Journal of Congress of April 20, 1784.) Another doubt was started in this debate, viz.: whether the agreement of the nine States, required by the Confederation, was to be made by their legislatures, or by their delegates in Congress? The expression adopted, viz.: “so many States in Congress is first obtained”, shows what was their sense in this matter. If it be agreed that the 11th Article of the Confederation is not to be applied to the admission of these new States, then it is contended that their admission comes within the 13th Article, which forbids "any alteration, unless agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State".

8147. STATES, Barriers of liberty.—The true barriers of our liberty are our State governments; and the wisest conservative power ever contrived by man, is that of which our Revolution and present government found us possessed. Seventeen distinct States, amalgamated into one as to their foreign concerns, but single and independent as to their internal administration, regularly organized with legislature and governor resting on the choice of the people, and enlightened by a free press, can never be so fascinated by the arts of one man, as to submit voluntarily to his usurpation. Nor can they be constrained to it by any force he can possess. While that may paralyze the single State in which it happens to be encamped, sixteen others, spread over a country of two thousand miles diameter, rise up on every side, ready organized for deliberation by a constitutional legislature, and for action by their governor, constitutionally the commander of the militia of the State, that is to say, of every man in it able to bear arms; and that militia, too, regularly formed into regiments and battalions, into infantry, cavalry and artillery, trained under officers general and subordinate, legally appointed, always in readiness, and to whom they are already in habits of obedience. The republican government of France was lost without a struggle, because the party of "un et indivisible" had prevailed; no provision or organizations existed to which the people might rally under authority of the laws, the seats of the directory were virtually vacant, and a small force sufficed to turn the legislature out of their chamber, and to salute its leader chief of the nation. But with us, sixteen out of seventeen States rising in mass, under regular organization, and legal commanders, united in object and action by their Congress, or, if that be in duresse, by a special convention, present such obstacles to an usurper as forever to stifle ambition in the first conception of that object.—To M. DESTUFT TRACY. V, 570. FORD ED., ix, 308. (M., 1811.)

8149. STATES, Cooperation of.—Your opinion of the propriety and advantage of a more intimate correspondence between the Executives of the several States, and that of the Union, as a central point, is precisely that which I have ever entertained; and on coming into office I felt the advantages which would result from that harmony. I had it even in contemplation, after the annual recommendation to Congress of those measures called for by the times, which the Constitution had placed within their power, to make communications in like manner to the Executives of the several States, as to any parts of them to which the legislatures might be alone competent. For many are the exercises of power reserved to the States, wherein an uniformity of proceeding would be advantageous to all. Such are quarantines, health laws, regulations of the press, banking institutions, training militia, &c., &c. But you know what was the state of the several governments when I came into office. That a great proportion of them were federal, and would have been delighted with such opportunities of proclaiming their contempt, and of opposing republican men and measures. Opportunities so furnished and used by some of the State governments, would have produced an ill effect, and would have insured the failure of the object of uniform proceeding. If it could be ventured even now (Connecticut and Delaware being still hostile) it must be on some greater occasion than is likely to arise within my time. I look to it, therefore, as a course which will probably be left to the consideration of my successor.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. V, 100. FORD ED., ix, 76. (W., 1807.)

8150. STATES, Commerce between.—Experience shows that the States never bought foreign goods of one another. The reasons are, that they would, in so doing, pay double freight and charges; and again, that they would have to pay mostly in cash, what they could obtain for commodities in Europe.—To JOHN ADAMS. I, 493. (P., 1785.)

8152. STATES, Common interests.—The interests of the States ought to be made joint in every possible instance, in order to cultivate the idea of our being one nation, and to multiply the instances in which the people shall look up to Congress as their head.—To JAMES MONROE. I, 347. FORD ED., iv, 52. (P., 1785.)

8153. STATES, Correspondence between Executives.—As to the mode of correspondence between the general and particular executive, I do not think myself a good judge. Not because my position gives me any prejudice on the occasion; for if it be possible to be certainly conscious of anything, I am conscious of feeling no difference between writing to the highest or lowest being on earth; but because I have ever thought that forms should yield to whatever should facilitate business. Comparing the two governments together, it is observable that in all those cases where the independent or reserved rights of the States are in question, the two Executives, if they are to act together, must be exactly coordinate; they are, in those cases, each the supreme head of an independent government. Such is the case in the beginning of this letter where the two Executives were to treat de pair en pair. In other cases, to wit, those transferred by the Constitution to the General Government, the general Executive is certainly preordinate: e. g., in a question respecting the militia, and others easily to be recollected. Were these, therefore, to be a stiff adherence to etiquette, I should say that in the former cases the correspondence should be between the two heads, and that in the latter, the Governor must be subject to receive orders from the War Department as any other subordinate officer would. And were it observed that either party set up unjustifiable pretensions, perhaps the other might be right in opposing them by a tenaciousness of his own rigorous right. But I think the practice in General Washington's administration was most friendly to business, and was absolutely equal. Sometimes he wrote to the Governors, and sometimes the heads of departments wrote. If a letter is to be on a general subject, I see no reason why the President should not write; but if it is to go into details, these being known only to the head of the department, it is better he should write directly. Otherwise, the correspondence must involve circuses. If this be practiced promiscuously in both classes of cases, each party setting examples of neglecting etiquette, both will stand on equal ground, and convenience alone will dictate through whom any particular communication is to be made. All the governors have freely corresponded with the heads of departments, except Hancock, who refused it. But his Legislature took advantage of a particular case which justified them in interfering, and they obliged him to correspond with the head of a department. General Washington sometimes wrote to them. I presume Mr. Adams did, as you mention his having written to you. On the whole, I think a free correspondence best, and shall never hesitate to write myself to the Governors even in a federal case, where the occasion presents itself to me particularly. —To Governor Monroe. iv, 401. Ford ed., viii, 59. (W., May 1801.)

8154. STATES, Counties and. —A county of a State cannot be governed by its own laws, but must be subject to those of the State of which it is a part.—To William Lee. vii, 57. (M., 1817.) See Counties.

8155. STATES, Division of authority. —The way to have good and safe government, is not to trust it all to one, but to divide it among the many, distributing to every one exactly the functions he is competent to. Let the National Government be entrusted with the defence of the nation, and its foreign and federal relations; the State governments with the civil rights, laws, police, and administration of what concerns the State generally; the counties with the local concerns of the counties, and each ward direct the interests within itself. It is by dividing and subdividing these republics from the great national one down through all its subordinations, until it ends in the administration of every man's farm by himself; by placing under every one what his own eye may superintend, that all will be done for the best.—To Joseph C. Cabell. vi, 543. (M., 1816.) See Centralization.

8156. STATES, Equality in size. —In establishing new States regard is had to a certain degree of equality in size.—To William Lee. vii, 57. (M., 1817.)

8157. STATES, Federal government and. —I [shall] consider the most perfect harmony and interchange of accommodations and good offices with the State governments, as among the first objects [of my administration].—To Governor Thomas McKean. iv, 350. Ford ed., vii, 487. (W., 1801.)

8158. — — . Considering the General and State governments as co-operators in the same holy concerns, the interest and happiness of our country, the interchange of mutual aid is among the most pleasing of the exercises of our duty.—To W. H. Cabell. v, 114. Ford ed., ix, 87. (W., 1807.)

8160. — — — — . The extent of our country was so great, and its former division into distinct States so established, that we thought it better to confederate as to foreign affairs only. Every State retained its self-government in domestic matters, as better qualified to direct them to the good and satisfaction of their citizens, than a general government so distant from its remoter citizens, and so little familiar with the local peculiarities of the different parts.—To M. Coray. vii, 320. (M., 1823.)

8161. — — — if the Federal and State governments should claim each the same subject of power, where is the common umpire to decide ultimately between them? In cases of little importance or urgency, the prudence of both parties will keep them aloof from the questionable ground; but if it can neither be avoided nor compromised, a convention of the States must be called, to ascribe the doubtful power to that department which they may think best.—To John Cartwright. vii. 358. (M., 1824.) See Federal Government.

8162. STATES, Fundamental principles of new.—The temporary and permanent governments* [shall] be established on these principles as their basis. 1. They shall forever remain a part of the United States of America. 2. In their persons and territory, they shall be subject to the Government of the United States in Congress assembled, and to the Articles of Confederation in all those cases in which the original States shall be so subject. 3. They shall be subject to pay a part of the Federal debts, contracted or to be contracted, to be apportioned on them by Congress, according to the same common rule and measure by which apportionments thereof shall be made on the other States. 4. Their respective governments shall be in republican forms, and shall admit no person to be a citizen, who holds any hereditary title. 5. After the year 1800 of the Christian era, there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the said States, otherwise than in punishment of crimes, wherein the party shall have been duly convicted to have been personally guilty. —Western Territory Report. Ford ed., iii, 409. (Mar. 1784.) See Slavery, Abolition.

8163. Whenever any of the said States shall have, of free inhabitants as many as shall then be in any one of the least numerous of the thirteen original States, such State shall be admitted by its delegates into the Congress of the United States, on an

* Of the States to be formed out of the Western Territory.—EDITOR.

* Note to the Declaration of Independence (if indeed standing second to that), this document ranks in historical importance of all those drawn by Jefferson; and, (as for its being superseded by the Ordinance of 1787), would rank among all American State papers immediately after the National Constitution. * * * That as a body every part of this country has made the latter ordinance famous, has been carefully overlooked by those who have desired to give the credit of them to Northerners. Still more have these special plasters suppressed the fact that Jefferson proposed to interdict slavery in all the Western Territory and not merely in the Northwest Territory, as the ordinance of 1787 did. Had it been adopted as Jefferson reported it, slavery would have died a natural death, and secession would have been impossible. There is another reason, however, for the little reputation this paper has brought to Jefferson, aside from the studious suppression of its importance by George the great, New England's friend. This is with its limitations of slavery, though failing by only one vote of adoption in 1784, was unpopular at the South and increasingly so as slavery became more and more profitable—and more and more a southern institution. As early as 1790, Jefferson's partisans were already his apologists for this document, and from that time forth he carefully avoided any public utterance on slavery. This change of attitude is alone sufficient explanation why Southerners acquiesced with this in the absence of the original paper, and of Jefferson's drafting of it. In Jefferson's memoranda of the services which he took pride in having rendered his country, written in 1820, he carefully omitted all mention, as also in his autobiography written in 1821. And thus it has been left to the Massachusetts orators to glorify King, Dane, and Cutter for clauses in the Ordinance of 1787, which the latter had in truth taken from the Ordinance of 1784, and which they made sectional, while Jefferson had made them national.—Note in Ford Edition, iii, 439.

equal footing with the said original States.—Western Territory Report. Ford ed., iii, 409. (1784.)

8164. STATES, Government of.—Though the experiment has not yet had a long enough course to show us from which quarter encroachments are most to be feared, yet it is easy to foresee, from the nature of things, that the encroachments of the State governments will tend to an excess of liberty which will correct itself (as in the late instance), while those of the General Government will tend to monarchy, which will fortify itself from day to day, instead of working its own cure, as all experience shows. I would rather be exposed to the inconveniences attending too much liberty, than those attending too small a degree of it. Then it is important to strengthen the State governments, and as this cannot be done by any change in the Federal Constitution (for the preservation of that is all we need contend for), it must be done by the States themselves, erecting such barriers at the constitutional line as cannot be surmounted either by themselves or by the General Government. The only barrier in their power is a wise government. A weak one will lose ground in every contest. To obtain a wise and a safe government, I consider the following changes as important: Render the legislature a desirable station by lessening the number of representatives (say to 100) and lengthening somewhat their term, and proportion their salaries equally among the electors. Adopt also a better mode of appointing senators. Render the Executive a more desirable post to men of abilities by making it more independent of the legislature. To wit, let him be chosen by other electors, for a longer time, and ineligible forever after. Responsibility is a tremendous engine in a free government. Let him feel the whole weight of it then, by taking away the shelter of his Executive Council. Experience both ways has already established the superiority of this measure. Render the judiciary respectable by every means possible, to wit, firm tenure in office, competent salaries, and reduction of their numbers. Men of high learning and abilities are few in every country; and by taking in those who are not so, the able part of the body have their hands tied by the unable. This branch of the government will have the weight of the conflict on their hands because they will be the last appeal of reason. These are my general ideas of amendments; but, preserving the ends, I should be flexible and conciliatory as to the means.—To Archibald Stuart. iii, 314. Ford ed., v, 409. (Pa., 1791.)

8165. STATES, Kentucky's appeal to.—  *  This Commonwealth * * * calls on its co-States for an expression of their sentiments on the acts concerning aliens, and for the punishment of certain crimes hereinafter specified, plainly declaring whether these acts are or are not authorized by the Federal compact. And it doubts not that their sense will be so announced as to prove their attachment unaltered to limited government, whether general or particular. And that the rights and liberties of their co-States, will be exposed to no dangers by remaining embarked in a common bottom with their own. That they will concur with this Commonwealth in considering the said acts as so palpably against the Constitution as to amount to an undisguised declaration that that compact is not meant to be the measure of the powers of the General Government, but that it will proceed in the exercise over these States, of all powers whatsoever: that they will view this as seizing the rights of the States, and consolidating them in the hands of the General Government, with a power assumed to bind the States (not merely in the cases made Federal (casus faderis), but, in all cases whatsoever, by laws made, not with their consent, but by others against their consent: that this would be to surrender the form of government they have chosen, and live under one deriving its powers from its own will, and not from our authority; and that the co-States recurring to their natural right in cases not made federal, will concur in declaring these acts void, and of no force, and will each take measures of its own for providing that neither these acts, nor any others of the General Government, not plainly and intentionally authorized by the Constitution, shall be exercised within their respective territories. —KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix. 471. FORD ED., VII. 305. (1798.) See KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS.

8166. STATES, Power of.—As long as the States exercise, separately, those acts of power which respect foreign nations, so long will there continue to be irregularities committed by some one or other of them, which will constantly keep us on an ill-footing with foreign nations.—To JAMES MADISON. I. 331. FORD ED., IV. 192. (P. February 1786.)

8167. STATES, Respect for.—I do not think it for the interest of the General Government itself, and still less of the Union at large, that the State governments should be so little respected as they have been. However, I dare say that in time all these as well as their central government, like the planets revolving round their common sun, acting and acted upon according to their respective weights and distances, will produce that beautiful equilibrium on which our Constitution is founded, and which, I believe, it will exhibit to the world in a degree of perfection, unexampled but in the planetary system itself. The enlightened statesman, therefore, will endeavor to preserve the weight and influence of every part, as much given to any member of it would destroy the general equilibrium.—To PEREGRINE FITZHUGH. iv. 217. FORD ED., VII. 210. (Pa. 1798.)

8168. STATES, Safety of citizens.—For the ordinary safety of the citizens of the several States, whether against dangers within or without, their religion must be on the means to be provided by their respective States.—To GOVERNOR TOMPKINS. v. 239. (W. 1808.)

8169. STATES, Sovereignty of.—The several States, now comprising the United States of America, were, from their first establishment, separate and distinct societies, dependent on no other society of men whatever. They continued at the head of their respective governments the executive Magistrate who presided over the one they had left. * * * The part which our chief magistrate took in a war waged against us by the nation among whom he resided, obliged us to discontinue him, and to name one within every State.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS, vii. 570. FORD ED., v. 461. (1792.)

8170. STATES, Union of.—We are so * * * sincerely disposed to render the union of the States more perfect that we shall, on all occasions, endeavor to render to our neighbors every friendly office which circumstances shall bring within the compass of our powers.—To THE PRESIDENT OF PENNSYLVANIA. iii. 17. (R., 1781.)

8171. — — Our citizens have wisely formed themselves into one nation as to others, and several States as among themselves. To the united nation belong our external and mutual relations; to each State, severally, the care of our persons, our property, our reputation, and religious freedom. This wise distribution, if carefully preserved, will prove, I trust from example, that while smaller governments are better adapted to the ordinary objects of society, larger confederations more effectually secure independence, and the preservation of republican government.—To THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY, iv. 397. (W. May 1801.) See STATE RIGHTS AND UNION (FEDERAL).

8172. STATES, Vermont and Franklin.—I am anxious to hear what is done with the States of Vermont and Franklin. I think that the former is the only innovation on the system of April 23, 1784, which ought ever possibly be admitted. If Congress are not firm on that head, our several States will crumble to atoms by the spirit of establishing every little canton into a separate State. I hope Virginia will concur in that plan as to her territory South of the Ohio, and not leave to the Western country to withdraw themselves by force, and become our worst enemies instead of our best friends.—To RICHARD HENRY LEE. FORD ED., iv. 71. (P. July 1785.)

8173. STATESMEN, Honesty and.—The man who is dishonest as a statesman, would be a dishonest man in any station.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED., x. 68. (P. 1816.)

8174. STEAM, Application of.—You asked me * * * whether the steam mill in London was turned by the steam immediately, or by the intermediate agency of water raised by the steam. When I was in London, Boulton made a secret of his mill. Therefore I was permitted to see it only superficially. I saw no water wheels, and therefore supposed none. I answered you accordingly that there were none. But when I was at Nismes, I went to see the steam mill there, and they showed 't to me in all its parts. I saw that their steam raised water and air. Paris I saw with water turned to steam. I expressed my doubts of the necessity of the inter-agency of water, and that the London mill was without it. But they supposed me mistaken. Perhaps I was so. I have had no opportunity since of clearing up the doubt.—To CHARLES THOMSON. 1, 277. FORD ED., IV, 449. (P., 1787.)

8175. STEAM, Domestic use.—A smaller agent, applicable to our daily concerns, is infinitely more valuable than the greatest which can be used only for great objects. For these interest the few alone, the former the many. I once had an idea that it might perhaps be possible to economize the steam of a common pot, kept boiling on the kitchen fire until its accumulation should be sufficient to give a stroke, and although the strokes might not be rapid, there would be enough of them in the day to raise from an adjacent well the water necessary for daily use. To this the lady is certainly able, to wash the bread, beat the hom'ny, churn the butter, turn the spit, and do all other household offices which require only a regular mechanical motion. The unproductive hands now necessarily employed in these might then increase the produce of our fields. I put this hypothesis to one of our greatest mechanics, who believed in its possibility, * * * but his death disappointed this hope.—To George FLEMING. VI, 505. (M., 1815.)

8176. STEAM, Engines.—It happens that of all the machines which have been employed to dispense human labor, I have made myself the least acquainted with that which is certainly the most powerful of all) the steam engine. In its original and simple form indeed, as first constructed by Newcomen and Savary, it had been a subject of my early studies; but now raised to the highest pinnacle, I ceased to follow up the numerous modifications of the machinery for employing it, of which I do not know whether England or our own country has produced the greater number.—To George FLEMING. VI, 504. (M., 1815.)

8177. STEAM, Fire engine.—You speak of a new method of raising water by steam, which I suppose, I'll come into general use. I know of no method of that kind, and suppose (as you say the account you have received of it is very imperfect) that some person has represented to you, as new, a fire engine erected at Paris, and which supplies the greater part of the town with water. But this is nothing more than the fire engine you have seen described in the books of hydraulics, and particularly in the Dictionary of Arts. Sciences, published by Owen, the idea of which was taken from Papin's Digester. It would have been more properly called the steam engine. The force of the steam of water, you know, is immense. In this engine, it is made to exert itself towards the working of pumps. That of Paris is, I believe, the largest known, raising four thousand gallons (French) of water in twenty-four hours; or, rather, I should have said, those of Paris, for there are two under one roof, each raising that quantity.—To Professor James Madison.* I, 446. (P., 1785.)

8178. STEAM, Grist mills.—I could write you volumes on the improvements which I find made, and making here (England), in the arts. One deserves particular notice, because it is simple, great, and likely to have extensive consequences. It is the application of steam, as an agent for working grist mills. I have visited the one lately made here. It was, at that time, the largest engine made of stones. It consumes one hundred bushels of coal a day. It is proposed to put up thirty pair of stones. I do not know whether the quantity of fuel is to be increased.—To Charles THOMSON. I, 542. (L., 1786.)

8179. In the arts, the most striking thing I saw in England, new, was the application of the principle of the steam-engine to grist mills, I saw eight or nine pairs of stones which are worked by steam, and it fact. But be set up thirty pair in the same house. A hundred bushels of coal a day, are consumed at present. I do not know in what proportion the consumption still will be increased by the additional gear.—To John PAGE, I, 550. FORD ED., IV, 215. (P., 1786.)

8180. STEAM, Horse power vs.—You say you have not been able to learn whether, in the new mills in London, steam is the immediate mover of the machinery, or raises water to move it. It is the immediate mover. The power of this agent, though long known, is but now beginning to be applied to the various purposes of which it is susceptible. * * * I have had a conversation on the subject * * * with the famous Boulton to whom those mills belong. He compares the effect of steam with that of horses in the following manner: Six horses, aided with the usual advantageous combination of the mechanical powers hitherto tried will grind six bushels of flour in an hour; at the end of which time they are all in a foam, and must rest. They can work thus six hours in the twenty-four, grinding thirty-six bushels of flour, which is six to each horse, for the twenty-four hours. His steam mill in London consumes one hundred and twenty bushels of coal in twenty-four hours, turns ten pair of stones, which grind eight bushels of flour an hour each, which is more than nine hundred and twenty bushels in the twenty-four hours. This makes a peck and a half of coal perform exactly as much as a horse in one day can perform.—To Charles THOMSON. II, 67. FORD ED., IV, 337. (P., 1786.)

8181. STEAM, Livingston's experiments.—I have received with great pleasure your favor on the subject of the steam engine. Though deterred by the complexity of that hitherto known, from making myself minute acquainted with it, yet I am sufficiently acquainted with it to be sensible of the superior simplicity of yours, and its superior economy. I particularly thank you for the permission to communicate a table of the philosopher.—Robert R. LIVINGSTON. IV, 295. FORD ED., VII, 367. (Pa., 1790.)

8182. STEAM, Navigation.—I hear you are applying steam in America to navigate boats, and I have little doubt, but that it will be applied generally to machines, so as to super-

* Parton, in his Life of Jefferson, p. 393, says: "It was Jefferson who first sent to America the most important piece of mechanical intelligence that perhaps ever recorded,—the success of the Watt steam engine, by means of which 'a peck and a half of coal now performs as much work as a horse hourly.' He conversed with Paris with Boulton, who was Watt's partner in the manufacture of the engines, and learned from his lips this astounding fact; but it did not astound him in the least. He mentions it quietly in the postscript of a long letter; for no man yet foresaw the revolution in all human affairs which that invention was to effect."—EDITOR.
sede the use of water ponds, and, of course, to lay open all the streams for navigation. We know that steam is one of the most powerful engines a people could employ and, in America, fuel is abundant. —To CHARLES THOMSON. i, 543. (L., 1786.)

8183. —. Internal navigation by steamboats is rapidly spreading throughout all our States, and that by sails and oars will ere long be looked to as among the curiosities of antiquity. We count much, too, on its efficacy for harbor defense and it will soon be tried for navigation by sea. —To BARON HUMBOLDT. vii, 75. FORD ED., x, 80. (M., 1817.)

8184. STEAM, Rumsey’s ship.—Mr. Rumsey has obtained a patent in England for his navigation by the force of steam, and is soliciting a similar one here [France]. His principal merit is in the improvement of the boiler, and instead of the complicated machinery of oars and paddles, proposed by others, the substitution of so simple a thing as the reaction of a stream of water on his vessel. He is building a sea vessel at this time in England. He has suggested a great number of mechanical improvements in a variety of branches and, upon the whole, is the most original and the greatest mechanical genius I have ever seen.—To DOCTOR WILLARD. iii, 16. (P., 1789.)

8185. STEAM, Water supply.—There is one object to which I have often wished a steam engine could be adapted. You know how desirable it is both in town and country to be able to have large reservoirs of water on the top of our houses, not only for use (by pipes) in the apartments, but as a resource against fire. * * * Could any agent be employed which would be little or no additional expense or trouble except the first purchase, it would be done. Every family has such an agent, its kitchen fire. It is small, indeed, but if its small but constant action could be accumulated so as to give a stroke from time to time which might throw ever so small a quantity of water from the bottom of a well to the top of the house (say 50 feet), to furnish more water than would waste by evaporation, or be used by the family. I know nobody who must better know the value of such a machine than yourself, nor more equal to the invention of it.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 296. FORD ED., vii, 367. (Pa., 1790.)

8186. STEUBEN (Baron), Services of. —Baron Steuben, a zealous friend, has descended from the dignity of his proper command to direct our [Virginia] smallest movements. His vigilance has, in a great measure, supplied the deficiency of force in this department, and he has preserved from crossing the [James] river, which might have been * * * fatal. He has been assiduously employed in preparing equipments for the militia as they should assemble, pointing the use of the object, and other offices of a good commander. —To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 284. FORD ED., i, 408. (R., 1781.)

8187. STEWART (Dugald), Metaphysician.—Stewart is a great man, and among the most honest living. After you left Europe he * * * came to Paris. He brought me a letter from Lord Wycombe, whom you knew. I became immediately intimate with him, calling mutually on each other and almost daily during his stay at Paris, which was of some months.

I consider him and Tracy as the ablest metaphysicians living.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 152. (M., 1820.)

8191. STUART (House of), America and.—This country [American Colonies] which had been acquired by the lives, the labors, and fortunes of individual adventurers, was, by these Princes [the Stuarts], several times, parted out and distributed among the favorites and followers of their fortunes; and, by an assumed right of the Crown alone, were erected into distinct and independent govern- ments; a measure, which, it is believed, his Majesty’s prudence and understanding would prevent him from imitating at this day; as no exercise of such power, of dividing and dismembering a country, has ever occurred in his Majesty’s realm of England, though now of very ancient standing; nor could it be justified or acquiesced under, there, or in any part of his Majesty’s empire.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 127. FORD ED., i, 431. (1774.)

8192. STUART (House of), Crimes.—The treasonable crimes [of the Stuarts] against their people brought on them the exertion of those sacred and sovereign rights of punish- ment, reserved in the peaceable and commonwealths, for cases of extreme necessity, and judged by the constitution unsafe to be delegated to any other judicature.—RIGHTS OF BRITISH AMERICA. i, 127. FORD ED., i, 431. (1774.)

8193. STUART (House of), Evil influence.—It is not in the history of modern England or among the advocates of the principles or practices of her government, that the friend of freedom, or of political morality, is to seek instruction. There has, indeed, been a period, during which both were to be found, not in her government, but in the band of worthies so boldly and ably reclaimed the rights of the people, and wrested from their government thec theoretic acknowledgments of them. This period began with the Stuarts, and continued but one reign after them. Since that, the vital principle of the English constitution is corruption, its practices the natural results of that principle, and their consequences oppression and aristocracy, annihilation of the substantial middle class, a degraded populace, oppressive taxes, general pauperism, and national bankruptcy.—To JOHN F. WATSON. vi, 346. (M., 1814.)

8194. STUART (House of), Hume and.—Hume spared nothing to wash the Stuarts white, and to palliate their misgovernment. For this purpose he suppressed truths, advanced falsehoods, forged authorities, and falsified records.—To ——. vi, 412. (M., 1825.)
8195. STUDY, In old age.—I was a hard student until I entered on the business of life; the duties of which leave no idle time to those disposed to fulfil them; and now, retired, and at the age of seventy-six, I am again a hard student.—To Dr. Vine Utley. vii, 116. Ford ed., x, 126. (M., 1819.)

8196. STUDY, Young men and.—A part of my occupation, and by no means the least pleasing, is the direction of the studies of such young men as ask it. They place themselves in the neighboring village and have the use of my library and counsel, and make a part of my society. In advising the course of their reading, I endeavor to keep their attention fixed on the main objects of all science, the freedom and happiness of man. So that coming to hear a share in the councils and government of their country, they will keep ever in view the sole objects of all legitimate government.—To General Kosciusko. v, 509. (M., 1810.)

8200. SUFFRAGE, Ark of safety.—The elective franchise, if guarded as the ark of our safety, will peaceably dissipate all combinations to subvert a Constitution, dictated by the wisdom, and resting on the will of the people.—To Benjamin Warving. iv, 378. (W., March 1801.)

8201. SUFFRAGE, Bribery and.—I believe we may lessen the danger of buying and selling votes, by making the number of voters too great for any means of purchase; I may further say that I have not observed men's honesty to increase with their riches.—To Jeremiah Moor. Ford ed., vii, 454. (M., Aug. 1800.)

8202. SUFFRAGE, Education and.—There is one provision [in the new constitution of Spain] which will immortalize its inventors. It is that which, after a certain epoch, disfranchises every citizen who cannot read and write. This is new, and is the fruitful germ of the improvement of everything good, and the correction of everything imperfect in the present constitution.—To Chevalier de Onis. vi, 342. (M., 1814.)

8203.—In the constitution of Spain, as proposed by the late Cortes, there was a principle entirely new to me; * * * that no person, born after that day, should ever acquire the rights of citizenship until he could read and write. It is impossible sufficiently to estimate the wisdom of this provision. Of all those which have been thought of for securing fidelity in the administration of the government, constant reliance to the principles of the Constitution, and progressive amendments with the progressive advances of the human mind, or changes in human affairs, it is the most effectual. Enlighten the people generally, and tyranny and oppressions of body and mind will vanish like evil spirits at the dawn of day. * * * The constitution of the Cortes had defects enough; but when I saw in it this amendatory provision, I was satisfied all would be right in time, under its salutary operation.—To Dupont de Nemours. vi, 592. Ford ed., x, 24. (P.F., 1816.) See Constitution, SPANISH.

8204. —.—By the bill [in the revision of the Virginia Code] for a general education, the people would be qualified to understand their rights, to maintain them, and to exercise with intelligence their parts in self-government.—Autobiography. i, 49. Ford ed., i, 69. (1821.)

8205. SUFFRAGE, Exercise of.—Should things go wrong at any time, the people will set them to rights by the peaceable exercise of their elective rights.—To Wilson C. Nicholas. v, 5. Ford ed., viii, 435. (W., 1806.)

8206. SUFFRAGE, General.—When the Constitution of Virginia was formed I was in attendance at Congress. Had I been here, I should probably have proposed a general suffrage; because my opinion has always been in favor of it. Still, I find some very honest men who, thinking the possession of some property necessary to give due independence of mind, are for restraining the elective franchise to property.—To Jeremiah Moor. Ford ed., vii, 454. (M., Aug. 1800.)

8207. SUFFRAGE, Instrument of reform.—The rational and peaceable instrument of reform, the suffrage of the people.—To Spencer Roane. vii, 133. Ford ed., x, 140. (P.F., 1819.)

8208. SUFFRAGE, Property qualification.—All male persons of full age and sane mind, having a freehold estate in one-fourth of an acre of land in any town, or in twenty-five acres of land in the country, and all persons resident in the colony, who shall have paid, scot and lot, to government the last two years, shall have right to give their vote in the election of their respective representatives.—Proposed Va. Constitution. Ford ed., ii, 14. (June 1776.)

8209.—All free male citizens, of full age and sane mind, who for one year before shall have been resident in the county, or shall through the whole of that time have possessed therein real property to the value of —, or shall for the same time have been enrolled in the militia, and no others, shall have a right to vote for delegates for the * * * county, and for senatorial electors for the district. They shall give their votes
8219. SUN-DIAL, Calculations for a.—While much confined to the house by my rheumatism, I have amused myself with calculating the height and direction of the Sun at various hours in the latitude of this place [Poplar Forest].  As I do not know that anybody here has taken this trouble before, I have supposed a copy would be acceptable to you.—To Mr. Clay. vi, 7. (P. F., 1811.)

8220. SUPREME COURT, Appointments to.—The appointment of a successor to Judge Patterson was bound up by rule. The last judiciary system requiring a judge for each district, rendered it proper that he should be of the district. This has been observed in both the appointments to the Supreme Bench made by me. Where an office is local we never go out of the limits for the officer.—To Cesar A. Rodney. Ford ed., viii, 497. (W., Dec. 1806.)

8221. SUPREME COURT, Centralization and.—The great object of my fear is the Federal Judiciary. That body, like gravity, ever acting, with noiseless foot, and unalarming advance, gaining ground step by step, and holding what it gains, is engulbing insidiously the special governments into the jaws of that which feeds them.—To Spencer Roane. vii, 212. Ford ed., x, 189. (M., 1821.)

8222. —— There is no danger I apprehend so much as the consolidation of our Government by the noiseless, and therefore unalarming, instrumentality of the Supreme Court. This is the form in which federalism now arrays itself, and consolidation is the present principle of distinction between republicans and the pseudo-republicans but real federalists.—To William Johnson. vii, 278. Ford ed., x, 248. (M., 1823.)

8224. —— There is a subject respecting the practice of the Court of which you are a member which has long weighed on my mind.  It is the habitual mode of making up and delivering the opinions. You know that from the earliest ages of the English law, from the date of the Year-Books, at least, to the end of the Second George, the judges of England, in all but self-evident cases, delivered their opinions seriatim, with the reasons and authorities which governed their decisions. If they sometimes consulted together, and gave a general opinion, it was so rarely as not to excite either alarm or notice. Besides the light which their separate arguments threw on the subject, and the instruction communicated by their several modes of reasoning, it showed whether the judges were unanimous or divided, and gave accordingly more or less weight to the judgment as a precedent. It sometimes happened, too, that when there were three opinions against one, the reasoning of the one was so much the most cogent as to become afterwards the law of the land. When Lord Mansfield came to the bench he introduced the habit of causcing opinions. The judges met at their chambers, or elsewhere, secluded from the presence of the public, and made up their opinions, to be delivered as the opinion of the court. On the retirement of Mansfield, Lord Kenyon put an end to the practice, and the judges returned to that of seriatim opinions, and practice it habitually to this day I believe. I am not acquainted with the late Reporters, do not possess them, and state the fact from the information of others. To come now to ourselves, I know nothing of what is done in other States, but in this [Virginia] our great and good Mr. Pendleton was, after the Revolution, placed at the head of the Court of Appeals. He adored Lord Mansfield, and considered him as the greatest luminary of law that any age had ever produced, and he introduced into the court over which he presided, Mansfield's practice of making up opinions in secret, and delivering them as the oracle of the court, in mass. Judge Roane, when he came to the bench, broke up the practice, refused to hatch judgments, in conc-lave, or to let others deliver opinions for him. At what time the seriatim opinions ceased in the Supreme Court of the United States, I am not informed. They continued I know to the end of the 3d Dallas in 1800, later than which I have no Reporter of that court. About that time the present Chief Justice [Marshall] came to the bench. Whether he carried the practice of Mr. Pendleton to it, or who, or when I do not know; but I understand from others it is now the habit of the Court, and I suppose it is true from the cases sometimes reported in the newspapers, and others which I casually see, wherein I observed that the opinions were uniformly prepared in private. Some of these cases too, have been of such importance, of such difficulty, and the decisions so gratifying to a portion of the public as to have merited the fullest explanation from every judge, seriatim, of the reasons which had produced such convictions on his mind. It was interesting to the public to know whether these decisions were really unanimous, or might not perhaps be of four against three, and, consequently, prevailing by the preponderance of one voice only. The Judges, holding their offices for life, are under two responsibilities only. 1. Impeachment. 2. Individual reputation. But this practice completely withdraws them from both. For no body knows what opinion any individual member gave in any case, nor even that he who delivers the opinion, concurred in it himself. Be the opinion, therefore, ever so imprlicable, having been done in the dark, it can be proved on no one. As to the second guarantee, personal reputation, it is shielded completely. The practice is certainly convenient for the lazy, the modest and the incompetent. It saves them the trouble of developing their opinion methodically and even of making up an opinion at all. That of seriatim argument shows whether every judge has taken the trouble of understanding the case, of investigating it minutely, and of forming an opinion for himself, instead of pinning it on another's sleeve. It would certainly be right to abandon this practice in order to give to our citizens one and all, that confidence in their judges which must be so desirable to the judges themselves, and so important to the cement of the Union. During the administration of General Washington, and while E. Randolph was Attorney General, he was required by Congress to digest the judiciary laws into a single one, with such amendments as might be thought proper. He prepared a section requiring the judges to give their opinions seriatim, in writing to be recorded in a distinct volume. Other business prevented this bill from being taken up, and it passed off; but such a volume would have been the best possible book of reports, and the better as unencumbered with the hired sophisms and perversions of counsel.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. FORD ED., X, 223. (M., Oct. 1822.)

8225. — —. I rejoice in the example you set of seriatim opinions. Some of your brethren will be encouraged to follow it occasionally, and in time, it may be felt by all as a duty and the sound practice of the primitive court be again restored. Why should not every judge be asked his opinion, and give it from the bench, if only by yea or nay? Besides ascertaining the fact of his opinion, which the public have a right to know, in order to judge whether it is impeachable or not, it would show whether the opinions were unanimous or not, and thus settle more exactly the weight of their authority.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 298. FORD ED., X, 232. (M., 1823.)

8226. — —. I must comfort myself with the hope that the judges will see the importance and the duty of giving their country the only evidence they can give of fidelity to its Constitution and integrity in the administration of its laws; that is to say, by every one's giving his opinion seriatim and publicly on the cases he decides. Let him prove by his reasoning that he has read the papers, that he has considered the case, that in the application of the law to it, he uses his own judgment independently and unbiased by party views and personal favor or disfavor. Throw himself in every case on God and his country; both will excuse him for error and value him for his honesty. The very idea of cooking up opinions in conclave, begets suspicions that something passes which fears the public ear, and this, spreading by degrees, must produce at some time abridgment of tenure, facility of removal, or some other modification which may promise a remedy. For, in truth, there is at this time more hostility to the Federal Judiciary than to any other organ of the government.—To William Johnson, vii, 278. Ford ed., x, 248. (M., 1823.)

8227. Supreme Court, Marshall's opinions.—This practice of Judge Marshall, of travelling out of his case to prescribe what the law would be in a moot case not before the court, is very irregular and very censurable. I recollect another instance, and the more particularly, perhaps, because it in some measure bore on myself. Among the midnight appointments of Mr. Adams, were commissions to some Federal justices of the peace for Alexandria. These were signed and sealed by him, but not delivered. I found them on the table of the Department of State, on my entrance, into office, and I forbade their delivery. Marbury named in one of them, applied to the Supreme Court for a mandamus to the Secretary of State (Mr. Madison) to deliver the commission intended for him. The Court determined at once, that being an original process, they had no cognizance of it; and, therefore, the question before them was ended. But the Chief Justice went on to lay down what the law would be, had they jurisdiction of the case, to wit: that they should command the delivery. The object was clearly to instruct any other court having the jurisdiction, what they should do if Marbury should apply to them. Besides the impropriety of this gratuitous interference, could anything exceed the perversion of law? For, if there is any principle of law never yet contradicted, it is that delivery is one of the essentials to the validity of a deed. Although signed and sealed, yet as long as it remains in the hands of the party himself, it is in fieri only, it is not a deed, and can be made so only by its delivery. In the hands of a third person it may be made an escrow. But whatever is in the Executive officers is certainly deemed to be in the hands of the President; and in this case, was actually in my hands, because, when I countermanded them, there was as yet no Secretary of State. Yet this case of Marbury vs. Madison is continually cited without any animadversion on its being an obiter dissertation of the Chief Justice. It may be impracticable to lay down any general formula of words which shall decide at once, and with precision, in every case, this limit of jurisdiction. But there are two canons which will guide us safely in most of the cases. First. The capital and leading object of the Constitution was to leave with the States all authorities which respected their own citizens only, and to transfer to the United States those which respected citizens of foreign or other States; to make us several as to ourselves, but one as to all others. In the latter case, then, constructions should lean to the general jurisdiction, if the words will bear it; and in favor of the States in the former, if possible to be so construed. And indeed, between citizens and citizens of the same State, and under their own laws, I know but a single case in which a jurisdiction is given to the General Government. That is, where anything but gold or silver is made a lawful tender, or the obligation of contracts is any otherwise impaired. The separate legislatures had so often abused that power, that the citizens themselves chose to trust it to the General, rather than to their own special authorities. Secondly. On every question of construction, carry ourselves back to the time when the Constitution was adopted, recollect the spirit manifested in the debates; and instead of trying what meaning may be squeezed out of the text, or invented against it, conform to the probable one in which it was passed. Let us try Cohen's case by these canons only, referring always, however, for full argument, to the essays before cited. 1. It was between a citizen and his own State, and under a law of his State. It was a domestic case, therefore, and not a foreign one. 2. Can it be believed, that under the jealousies prevailing against the General Government, at the adoption of the Constitution, the States meant to surrender the authority of preserving order, of enforcing moral duties and restraining vice, within their own territory? And this is the present case, that of Cohen being under the ancient and general law of gaming. Can any good be effected by taking from the States the moral rule of their citizens, and3. But the final power, or to one of their corporations, which may justify forcing the meaning of words, hunting after possible constructions, and hanging inference on inference, from heaven to earth, like Jacob's ladder? Such an intention was impossible, and such a licentiousness of construction and inference, if exercised by both governments, as may be done with equal right, would equally authorize both to claim all power, general and particular, and break up the foundations of the Union. Laws are made for men of ordinary understanding, and should, therefore, be construed by the ordinary rules of common sense. Their meaning is not to be sought for in metaphysical subtleties, which may make anything mean anything or nothing at pleasure. It should be left to the sophisms of advocates, whose trace it is, to prove that a defendant is a plaintiff, though dragged into court, torto collo, like Bona parte's volunteers, into the field in chains, or that a power has been given, because it ought to have been given, et alia talia. The States supposed that by their Tenth Amendment, they had secured themselves against constructive powers. They were not lessened yet by Cohen's case, nor aware of the slipperiness of the eels of the law. I ask for no siring of words against the General Government nor yet against the States. I believe the States can best govern our home concerns, and the General Government our foreign ones. I wish, therefore, to see maintained that wholesome distribution of powers established by the Constitution for the limitation of both, and never to see all offices transferred to Washington, where, further withdrawn from the eyes of the people, they may more secretly be bought and sold as at market. But the Chief Justice says, "there must be an ultimate arbiter somewhere". True, there must; but does that prove it is either party? The ultimate arbiter is the people of the Union, assembled by their deputies in convention, at the call of Congress, or of two-thirds of the States. Let them decide to which they mean to give an authority claimed by two of their organs. And it has been the peculiar wisdom and felicity of our Constitution, to have provided this peaceable appeal, where that of other nations is at once to force.—To William Johnson. vii, 293. FORD ED., x, 230. (M., 1823.) See Marshall.

8229. If the Legislature fails to pass laws for a census, for paying the Judges and other officers of government, for establishing a militia, for naturalization as prescribed by the Constitution, or if they fail to meet in Congress, the Judges cannot issue their mandamus to them; if the President fails to supply the place of a judge, to appoint other civil or military officers, to issue requisite commissions, the Judges cannot force him. They can issue their mandamus or distresses to no executive or legislative officer to enforce the fulfilment of their official duties any more than the President or Legislature may issue orders to the Judges or their officers. Betrayed by English example, and unaware, as it should seem, of the control of our Constitution in this particular, they have at times overstepped their limit by undertaking to command executive officers in the discharge of their executive duties; but the Constitution, in keeping the three departments distinct and independent, restrains the authority of the Judges to judiciary organs, as it does the Executive and Legislative to executive and legislative organs. The Judges certainly have more frequent occasion to act on constitutional questions, because the law of ""and of criminal action, forming the great mass of the system of law, constitute their particular department. When the legislative or executive functionaries act unconstitutionally, they are responsible to the people in their elective capacity. The exemption of the Judges from that is quite dangerous enough.—To William C. Jarvis. vii, 178. FORD ED., x, 160. (M., 1820.)

8230. SUPREME COURT, Republicanism and.—At length, we have a chance of getting a republican majority in the Supreme Judiciary. For ten years has that branch braved the spirit and will of the nation, after the nation had manifested its will by a complete reform in every branch depending on them. The event is a fortunate one, and so timed as to be a God-send to me. I am sure its importance to the nation will be felt, and the occasion employed to complete the great operation they have so long been executing, by the appointment of a decided republican, with nothing equivalent about him.—To Albert Gallatin. v, 545. FORD ED., ix, 284. (M., 1810.)

The misfortune of Bidwell removes an able man from the competition. Can any other bring equal qualifications to those of [Levi] Lincoln? I know he was not deemed a profound common lawyer; but was there ever a profound common lawyer known in one of the Eastern States? There never was, nor never can be, one from those States. The basis of their law is neither common nor civil; it is an original, if any compound can be so called. Its foundation seems to have been laid in the spirit and principles of Jewish law, incorporated with some words and phrases of common law, and an abundance of notions of their own. This makes an amalgam sui generis, and it is well known that a man, first and thoroughly initiated into the principles of one system of law, can never become a good and sound in any other. Lord Mansfield was a splendid proof of this. Therefore, I say, there never was, nor can be a profound common lawyer from those States. Sullivan had the reputation of preeminence there as a common lawyer, but we have his History of Land Titles, which gives us his measure. Mr. Lincoln is, I believe, considered as learned in their laws as any one they have. Federalists say that Parsons is better. But the criticalness of the present nomination puts him out of the question. As the great mass of the functions of the new judge are to be performed in his own district, Lincoln will be most unexceptionable and acceptable there; and on the Supreme bench equal to any who can be brought thence. Add to this his integrity, political firmness, and unimpeachable character, and I believe no one can be found to whom there will not be more serious objections.—To Albert Gallatin. v, 550. FORD ED., ix, 285. (M., Sep. 1810.)

3232. —— Bidwell's disgrace withdraws the ablest man of the section in which Cushing's successor must be named. The pure integrity, unimpeachable conduct, talents and republican firmness of [Levi] Lincoln, leave him now, I think, without a rival. He is thought not an able common lawyer. But there is not and never was an able one in the New England States. Their system is sui generis, in which the common law is little attended to. Lincoln is one of the ablest in their system, and it is among them he is to execute the great portion of his duties.—To Cæsar A. Rodney. v. 547. (M., Sep. 1810.)

8233. — — —. The death of [Associate Justice] Cushing is opportune, as it gives an opening for at length getting a republican majority on the Supreme Bench. Ten years has the anti-civism of that body been bidding defiance to the spirit of the whole nation, after they had manifested their will by reforming every other branch of government. I trust the occasion will not be lost.  * Nothing is more material than to complete the reformation of the government by this appointment, which may truly be said to be putting the keystone into the arch.—To Cæsar A. Rodney. v. 547. (M., Sep. 1810.)

8234. — — —. A circumstance of congratulation is the death of Cushing. The nation ten years ago declared its will for a change in the principles of the administration of their affairs. They have changed the two branches depending on their will, and have steadily maintained the reformation in those branches. The third, not dependent on them, has so long bid defiance to their will, erecting themselves into a political body, to correct what they deem the errors of the nation. The death of Cushing gives an opportunity of closing the reformation by a successor of unquestionable republican principles. Our friend, Lincoln, has, of course, presented himself to your recollection. I know you think lightly of him as a lawyer; and I do not consider him as a correct common lawyer, yet as much so as any one which ever came, or ever can come from one of the Eastern States. Their system of jurisprudence made up from the Jewish law, a little dash of common law, and a great mass of original notions of their own, is a thing sui generis, and one educated in that system can never so far eradicate early impressions as to imbibe thoroughly the principles of another system. It is so in the case of other systems of which Lord Mansfield is a splendid example. Lincoln's mind and known integrity, will give complete confidence to the public in the long desired reformation of their judiciary. Were he out of the way, I should think Granger prominent for the place. His abilities are great; I have entire confidence in his integrity, though I am sensible that [John] R. [andolph] has been able to lessen the confidence of many in him. But that I believe he would soon reconcile to him, if placed in a situation to show himself to the public, as he is, and not as an enemy has represented him. As the choice must be of a New Englander, to exercise his functions for New England men, I confess I know of none but these two characters. Morton is really a republican, but inferior to both the others in every point of view. Blake calls himself republican, but never was one at heart. His treachery to us under the Embargo should put him by forever. Story and Bacon are exactly the men who deserted us on that measure, and carried off the majority. The former, unquestionably a true, and both are too young. I say nothing of professing federalists. Granger and Morton have both been interested in Yazooism. The former, however, has long been clear of it. I have said thus much because I know you must wish to learn the sentiments of others, to hear all, and then do what on the whole you perceive to be best.—To President Madison. Ford ed., ix, 282. (M., Oct. 1810.)

8235. — — —. I consider the substituting, in the place of Cushing, a firm, unequivocating republican, whose principles are born with him, and not an occasional ingraftment, as necessary to complete that great reformation in our government to which the nation gave its fiat ten years ago. They have completed and maintained it steadily in the two branches dependent on them, but the third, unfortunately and unwisely, made independent not only of the nation, but even of their own conduct, have hitherto bid defiance to the public will, and erected themselves into a political body with the assumed functions of correcting what they deem the errors of the nation.—To Gideon Granger. Ford ed., ix, 286. (M., Oct. 1810.)

8236. SUPREME COURT, State rights and.—There are two measures which if not taken, we are undone. First,* to check these unconstitutional invasions of State rights by the Federal judiciary. How? Not by impeachment, in the first instance, but by a strong protestation of both houses of Congress that such and such doctrines, advanced by the Supreme Court, are contrary to the Constitution; and if afterwards they relapse into the same heresies, impeach and set the whole adrift. For what was the government divided into three branches, but that each should watch over the others and oppose their usurpations?—To Nathaniel Macon. Ford ed., x, 192. (M., Aug. 1821.)

8237. — — —. The Legislative and Executive branches may sometimes err, but elections and dependence will bring them to rights. The Judiciary branch is the instrument, working like gravity, without intermittence, is to press us at last into one consolidated mass. * If Congress fails to shield the States from dangers so palpable and so imminent, the States must shield themselves, and meet the invader foot to foot.—To Archibald Thweat. vii, 199. Ford ed., x, 184. (M., 1821.)

8238. — — —. You request me confidentially, to examine the question, whether the Supreme Court has advanced beyond its constitutional limits, and trespassed on those of the State authorities? I do not undertake it, because I am unable. Age and the wane of mind consequent on it, have disqualified me from investigations so severe, and researches so laborious. And it is the less necessary in this case, as having been already done by others with a logic and learning to which I could add nothing. On the decision of the case of Cohen vs. The State of Virginia, in the Supreme Court of the United States, in March, 1821, Judge Roane, under the signature of "Algernon Sidney," wrote for the [Richmond] Enquirer a series of papers on the law of that case. I considered these papers maturely as they came out, and confess that they appeared to me to pulverize every word which had been delivered by Judge Marshall, of the extra-judicial part of his opinion; and all was extra-judicial, except the decision that the act of Congress had not purported to give to the Corporation of Washington the authority claimed by their lottery law, of controlling the laws of the States within the States themselves. But, unable to claim that case, I could not let it pass, nor venture on gratuitously to prove, that notwithstanding the Eleventh Amendment of the Constitution, a State could be brought as a defendant, to the bar of his court; and again, that Congress might authorize a corporation of its territory to exercise legislation within a State, and paramount to the laws of that State. I cite the sum and result only of his doctrines, according to the impression made on my mind at the time, and still remaining. If not strictly accurate in circumstance, it is so in substance. This doctrine was so completely refuted by Roane, that if he can be answered, I surrender human reason as a vain and useless faculty, given to bewilder, and not to guide us. And I mention this particular case as one only of several, because it gave occasion to that thorough examination of the constitutional limits between the General and State jurisdictions, which you have asked for. There were two other writers in the same paper, under the signatures of "Fletcher of Saltoun," and "Somers," who, in a few essays, presented some very luminous and striking views of the question. And there was a particular paper which recapitulated all the cases in which it was thought the Federal Court had usurped on the State jurisdictions. * * * The subject was taken up by our [Virginia] Legislature of 1821-22, and two drafts of remonstrances were prepared and discussed. As well as I remember, there was no difference of opinion as to the manner of right; but there was as to the expediency of a remonstrance at that time, the general mind of the States being then under extraordinary excitement by the Missouri question; and it was dropped on that consideration. But this case is not dead, it only sleepeth. The Indian chief said he did not go to war for every petty injury by itself, but put it into his pouch, and when that was full, he then made war. Thank heaven, we have provided a more peaceable and rational mode of redress.—To Judge William Johnson. vii, 293. Ford ed., x, 229. (M., June 1823.)

8239. SURPLUS, Accumulation of.—[We] have left us in the treasury eight millions and a half of dollars. A portion of this sum may be considered as a commence ment of accumulation of the surplus of revenue, which, after paying the instalments of debts as they shall become payable, will remain without any specific object. It may partly, indeed, be applied toward completing the defence of the exposed points of our country, on such a scale as shall be adapted to our principles and circumstances. This object is doubtless among the first entitled to attention, in such a state of our finances, and it is one which, whether we have peace or war, will provide security where it is due. Whether what shall remain of this, with the future surplus, may be usefully applied to purposes already authorized, or more usefully to others requiring new authorities, or how otherwise they shall be disposed of, are questions calling for the notice of Congress, unless indeed they shall be superseded by a change in our public relations now awaiting the determinations of others.—Seventh Annual Message. viii, 88. Ford ed., ix, 165. (Oct. 1807.)

8240. SURPLUS, Congress and.—The probable accumulation of the surpluses of revenue * * * merits the consideration of Congress. Shall it lie unproductive in the public vaults? Shall the revenue be reduced? Or shall it rather be appropriated to the improvements of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union, under the powers which Congress may already possess, or such amendments of the Constitution as may be approved by the States?—Eighth Annual Message. viii, 110. Ford ed., ix, 224. (Nov. 1808.)

8241. SURPLUS, Disposition of.—When both of these branches of revenue [Mediterranean fund and Salt tax] shall * * * be relinquished, there will still ere long be an accumulation of moneys in the treasury beyond the instalments of public debt which we are permitted by contract to pay. They cannot, then, without a modification assented to by the public creditors, be applied to the extinguishment of this debt, and the complete liberation of our revenues—the most desirable of all objects; nor, if our peace continues, will they be wanting for any other existing purpose. The question, therefore, now comes forward,—to what other objects shall these surpluses be appropriated, and the whole surplus of impost, after the entire discharge of the public debt, and during those intervals when the purposes of war shall not call for them? Shall we suppress the impost and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures? On a few articles of more general and necessary use, the suppression in due season will doubtless be right, but the great mass of the articles on which impost is paid is foreign luxuries, purchased by those only who are rich enough to afford

8242. SURPLUS, Taxation and.—Sound principles will not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow citizens to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not perhaps happen but from the temptations offered by that treasure.—First Annual Message. vii. 9. Ford ed., viii. 493. (Dec. 1806.)

8244. SWARTWOUT (Samuel), Character of.—The distribution of so atrocious a libel as the pamphlet "Aristides," and still more the affirming its contents to be true is like Vitellus, presents a shade in the morality of Mr. Swartwout, of which his character had not before been understood to be susceptible. Such a rejection of all regard to truth, would have been sufficient cause against receiving him into the corps of executive officers at first; but what kind is expedient after a person is appointed, to be as nice on a question of removal requires great consideration.—To De Witt Clinton. Ford ed., viii. 322. (W., Oct. 1804.)

8245. SYMPATHY, For the afflicted.—What more sublime delight than to mingle tears with one whom the hand of heaven hath smitten! To watch over the bed of sickness, and to beguile its tedious and its painful moments! To share our bread with one whom misfortune has made needy! This world abounds indeed with misery; to lighten its burthen, we must divide it with one another.—To Mrs. Cosway. ii. 38. Ford ed., iv. 318. (P., 1786.)

8246. SYMPATHY, Of friends.—When languishing under disease, how grateful is the solace of our friends! How are we penetrated with their assiduities and attentions! How much are we supported by their encouragement and kind offices! When death has taken away some object of our love, how sweet is it to have a bosom whereon to recline our heads, and into which we may pour the torrent of our tears! Grief, with such a comfort, is almost a luxury.—To Mrs. Cosway. ii. 38. Ford ed., iv. 318. (P., 1786.)

8247. TALENTS, Hidden.—The object [of my educational bill] is to bring into action that mass of talents which lies buried in poverty in every country, for want of the means of development, and thus give activity to a mass of mind, which, in proportion to its population, shall be the double or treble of what it is in most countries.—To M. Correa. vii. 94. (P.F., 1817.)

8248. TALENTS, Public councils and.—Talents in our public councils are at all times important.—To Cesar A. Rodney. Ford ed., viii. 296. (W., 1804.)

8249. TALENTS, Republics and.—I hold it to be one of the distinguishing excellencies of elective over hereditary successions, that the talents which nature has provided in sufficient proportion, should be selected by the society for the government of their affairs, rather than that this should be transmitted through the loins of knaves and fools, passing from the debauches of the table to those of the bed.—To President Washington. iii. 466. themselves the use of them. Their patriotism would certainly prefer its continuance and application to the great purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of federal powers. By these operations new channels of communication will be opened between the States; the lines of separation will disappear, their interests will be identified, and their Union cemented by new and indissoluble ties.—Sixth Annual Message. viii. 68. 8243. SURVEYING, Method of platting.—You requested for the use of your school, an explanation of a method of platting the courses of a survey, which I mentioned to you as of my own practice. This is so obvious and simple, that as it occurred to myself, so I presume it has to others, although I have not seen it stated in any text books. For drawing parallel lines, I use the triangular rule, the hypothenusial side of which being applied to the side of a common straight rule, the triangle slides on that, as thus, always parallel to itself. Instead of drawing meridians on his paper, let the pupil draw a parallel of latitude, or east and west line, and note in that a point for his first station, then applying to it his protractor, lay off the first course, and distance in the usual way to ascertain his second station. For the second course, lay the triangular rule to the east and west line, or first parallel, holding the straight or guide rule firmly against its hypothenusial side. Then slide up the triangle (for a northerly course) to the point of his second station, and pressing it firmly there, lay the protractor to that, and mark off the second course, and distance as before, for the third station. Then lay the triangle to the first parallel again, and sliding it as before to the point of the third station, then apply to it the protractor for the third course and distance, which gives the fourth station; and so on. When a course is southwardly, lay the protractor, as before, to the northern edge of the triangle, but prick its reversed course, which reversed again in drawing, gives the true course. When the station has got so far from the first parallel, as to be out of the reach of the parallel rule, slip hypothenusial another parallel must be drawn by laying the edge, or longer leg of the triangle to the first parallel as before, applying the guide-rule to the end, or short leg (instead of the hypothenusial) against the margin, and sliding the triangle up to the point for the new parallel.

I have found this, in practice, the quickest and most correct method of platting which I have ever tried, and the neatest also, because it

8253. TALLEYRAND, Corrupt.—The Envoy's have been assailed by swindlers, whether with or without the partaking in it. Talleyrand is not very apparent. The known corruption of his character renders it very possible he may have intended to share largely in the $50,000 demanded. But that the Directory knew anything of it, is neither proved nor probable. On the contrary, when the Portuguese ambassador yielded to like attempts of swindlers, the conduct of the Directory in imprisoning him for an attempt at corruption, as well as their general conduct, really magnanimous, places them above suspicion. —To Peter Carr, iv, 235. Ford ed., vii, 238. (Pa., April 1798.)

8254. TALLEYRAND, Hostility of.—I am told that Talleyrand is personally hostile to us. This, I suppose, has been occasioned by the X. Y. Z. history. He should consider that that was the act of a party, willing to sacrifice him to the consolidation of their power. This nation has done him justice by dismissing them; * * * those in power are precisely those who desire that something but an attempt to deceive our country; that we entertain towards him personally the most friendly dispositions.—To M. Dupont de Nemours. iv, 436. (April 1802.)

8255. TARIFF, Burdens of.—I wish it were possible to increase the impost on any articles affecting the rich chiefly, to the amount of the sugar tax, so that we might relinquish that at the next session. But this must depend on our receipts keeping up. As to the tea and coffee tax, the people do not regard it. The next tax which an increase of revenue should enable us to suppress, should be the salt tax, perhaps; indeed, the production of that article at home is already undermining that tax.—To Albert Gallatin. Ford ed., viii, 171. (M., Sep. 1802.)

8256. TARIFF. The revenue on the consumption of foreign articles, is paid cheerfully by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts, being collected on our seaboards and frontiers only, and incorporated with the transactions of our mercantile citizens, it may be the pleasure and pride of an American to ask, what farmer, what mechanic, what laborer, ever sees a tax-gatherer of the United States?—Second Inaugural Address, viii, 41. Ford ed., viii, 343. (1805.)

8257. TARIFF, Confederate and.—Congress, on the 18th of April, 1783, recommended to the States to invest them with a power, for twenty-five years, to levy an impost of five per cent. on all articles imported from abroad.—To M. de Meunier. ix, 256. Ford ed., iv, 161. (P., 1786.)

8258. TARIFF, Debts and.—The principal objection [to assumption] now is that all the debts, general and State, will have to be raised by tax on imports, which will thus be overburdened; whereas had the States been left to pay the debts themselves, they could have done it by taxes on land and other property, which could thus have lightened the burden on commerce.—To Dr. Gilmer. iii, 167. (N.Y., 1790.)

8259. TARIFF, Direct taxation and.—Would it not have been better [now the new Federal Constitution] to assign to Congress exclusively the articles of import for Federal purposes, and to have left direct taxation exclusively to the States? I should suppose the former fund sufficient for all probable events, aided by the land office.—To E. Carrington. ii, 334. Ford ed., iv, 482. (P., 1787.)

8260. TARIFF, Discriminating.—Between nations who favor our productions and navigation and those who do not favor them, one distinction alone will suffice: one set of moderate duties for the first, and a fixed advance on these as to some articles, and prohibitions as to others, for the last.—Foreign Commerce Report. vii, 650. Ford ed., vi, 483. (Dec. 1793.)

8262. TARIFF, Excessive.—It is really an extraordinary proposition that the agric

cultural, mercantile, and navigating classes shall be taxed to maintain that of manufactures.—To THOMAS COOPER. FORD ED., x, 285. (M., 1823.)

8268. TARIFF, Protective.—Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs; first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here in competition with our own of the same kind; selecting next, such manufactures as we take from them in greatest quantity, and which, at the same time, we could the soonest furnish to ourselves, or obtain from other countries; imposing on them duties lighter at first, but heavier and heavier, afterwards, as other channels of supply open. Such duties, having the effect of indirect encouragement to domestic manufactures of the same kind, may induce the manufacturer to come himself into these States, where cheaper subsistence, equal laws, and a vent of his wares, free of duty, may assure him the highest profits from his skill and industry. And here, it would be in the power of the State government to so operate essentially, by opening the resources of encouragement which are under their control, extending them liberally to artists in those particular branches of manufacture for which their soil, climate, population and other circumstances have matured them, and fostering the precious efforts and progress of household manufacture, by some patronage suited to the nature of its objects, guided by the local informations they possess, and guarded against abuse by their presence and attentions. The oppressions on our agriculture, in foreign ports, would thus be made the occasion of relieving it from a dependence on the councils and conduct of others, and of promoting arts, manufactures and population at home.—FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT. vii, 648. FORD ED., vi, 481. (Dec. 1793.)
8270. TARIFF, Reciprocal.—There might have been mentioned a third* species of arrangement, that of making special agreements on every special subject of commerce, and of settling a tariff of duty to be paid on each side, on every particular article; but this would require in our Commissioners [to Spain] a very minute knowledge of our commerce; as it is impossible to foresee every proposition, of this kind, which might be brought into discussion, and to prepare them for it by information and instruction from hence. Our commerce, too, is, as yet, rather in a course of experiment, and the channels in which it will ultimately flow are not sufficiently known to enable us to provide for it by special agreement. Nor have the exigencies of our new government, as yet, so far developed themselves, as that we can know to what degree which article, or must have recourse to commerce, for the purpose of revenue. No common consideration, therefore, ought to induce us, as yet, to arrangements of this kind. Perhaps nothing should do it, with any nation, short of the privileges of natives, in all their possessions, foreign and domestic.—MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. vii, 589. FORD, ED., v. 479. (March 1792.)

8271. TARIFF, Revenue and.—The powers of the government for the collection of taxes are found to be perfect, so far as they have been tried. This has been as yet only by duties on consumption. As these fall principally on the rich, it is a general desire to make them contribute the whole money we want, if possible. And we have a hope that they will furnish enough for the expenses of Government and the interest of our whole public debt, foreign and domestic.—To COMTE DE MOUSTIER. iii, 200. (Pa., 1790.)

8272. ——. The imports are not a proper object to bear all the taxes of a State.—To JOHN HARVEY. FORD, ED., v. 214. (N.Y., 1790.)

8273. TARIFF, Salt and.—The duties composing the Mediterranean fund will cease by law at the end of the present season. Considering, however, that they are levied chiefly on luxuries, and that we have an impost on salt, a necessary of life, the free use of which otherwise is so important, I recommend to your consideration the suppression of the duties on salt, and the continuance of the Mediterranean fund, instead thereof, for a short time, after which that also will become unnecessary for any purpose now within contemplation. SIXTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 67. FORD, ED., viii, 493. (1806.)

8274. TARIFF, Specific and ad valorem duties.—There must be something more in this increase of revenue than the natural and war increase; depreciation to a small de-

day; I shall give them the slip.—To RICHARD RUSH. vii, 380. FORD, ED., x, 322. (M., 1824.)

8275. TARIFF, States and.—Several States have passed acts for vesting Congress with the whole regulation of their commerce, reserving the revenue arising from these regulations to the disposal of the State in which it is levied; * * * but the Assembly of Virginia, apprehensive that this disjointed method of proceeding may fail in its effect, or be much retarded, passed a resolution on the 21st of January, 1786, appointing commissioners to meet others from the other States, whom they invite into the same measure, to digest the form of an act for investing Congress with such power, that their commerce as shall be thought expedient, by such act is to be reported to their several Assemblies for their adoption.—To M. DE MEUNIER. ix, 257. FORD, ED., iv, 162. (P., 1786.) 8276. TARLETON (Colonel Bannastre), Raid on Monticello.—Colonel Tarleton, with his regiment of horse, was detached by Lord Cornwallis to surprise Mr. Jefferson (whom they thought still in office) [as Governor] and the Legislature now sitting in Charlottesville. The Speakers of the two houses, and some other members of the Legislature, were lodging with Mr. Jefferson at Monticello. Tarleton, early in the morning, when within ten miles of that place, detached a company of horse to secure him and his guests, and proceeded himself by land to Charlottesville, where he hoped to find the Legislature unapprized of his movement. Notice of it, however, had been brought, both to Monticello and Charlottesville, about sunrise. The Speakers, with their colleagues returned to Charlottesville and with the other members of the Legislature, had barely time to get out of his way. Mr. Jefferson sent off his family to secure them from danger, and was himself still at Monticello making arrangements for his own departure, when a Lieutenant Hudson arrived there at half speed, and informed him that the enemy were then ascending the hill at Monticello. He departed immediately, and knowing that he would be pursued if he took the high road, he plunged into the woods of the adjoining mountains, being at the same time as far to the south as he could get, and there he remained until the next day. He then made his way to Charlottesville. Tarleton had retired after eighteen hours’ stay in Charlottesville. Mr. Jefferson then rejoined his family, and proceeded with them to an estate he had in Bedford, about eighty miles southwest, where, riding on his 8277. I did not suffer by Colonel Tarleton. On the contrary, he behaved very genteelly with me. On his approach to Charlottesville, which is within three miles of my house at Monticello, he dispatched a troop of his horse, under Captain McLeod, with the double object of taking me prisoner, with the two Speakers of the Senate and Delegates, who then lodged with me, and of remaining in vidette, my house commanding a view of ten or twelve counties round about. He gave strict orders to Captain McLeod to suffer nothing to be injured. The troop failed in one of their objects, as we had notice of their coming, so that the two Speakers had gone off about two hours before their arrival at Monticello, and myself with my family safe in my house. Captain McLeod preserved everything with sacred care. To Dr. William Gordon. ii. 425. Ford ed., v, 38. (P., 1788.) See Cornwallis.

8278. TASTE, Control of. — Taste cannot be controlled by law. — Notes on a Money Unit. i, 168. Ford ed., iii, 451. (1784.)

8279. TAXATION, Basis of. — The taxes with which we are familiar, class themselves readily according to the basis on which they rest. 1. Capital. 2. Income. 3. Consumption. These may be considered as commensurate; Consumption being generally equal to Income, and Income the annual profit of Capital. A government may select any one of these bases for the establishment of its system of taxation, and so frame it as to reach the faculties of every member of the society, and to draw from him his equal proportion of the public contributions; and, if this be correctly obtained, it is the perfection of the function of taxation. But, when once a government has assumed its basis, to select and tax special articles from either of the other classes, is double taxation. For example, if the system be established on the basis of Income, and his just proportion of the produce, has already been drawn from every one, to step into the field of Consumption, and tax special articles in that, as broadcloth or homespun, wine or whiskey, a coach or a wagon, is doubly taxing the same article. For that portion of Income with which these articles are purchased, having already paid its tax as Income, to pay another tax on the thing it purchased, is paying twice for the same thing, it is an aggravance on the citizens who use these articles in exoneration of those who do not, contrary to the most sacred of the duties of a government, to do equal and impartial justice to all its citizens. How far it may be the interest and the duty of all to submit to this sacrifice on other grounds; for instance, to pay for a time an impost on the importation of certain articles, in order to encourage their manufac-

8280. TAXATION, Commerce, property and. — I am principally afraid that commerce will be overloaded by the assumption [of the State debts], believing that it would be better that property should be duly taxed. — To Mr. Randolph. iii, 185. (N.Y., 1790.)

8281. TAXATION, Control over. — The Congress are of opinion that the Colonies of America possess the exclusive privilege of giving and granting their own money; that this involves the right of deliberating whether they will make any gift, for what purpose it shall be made, and what shall be the amount of the gift, and that it is a breach of this privilege, for any body of men, extraneous to their constitutions to prescribe the purposes for which money shall be levied on them; to take to themselves the authority of judging of their conditions, circumstances and situation, of determining the amount of the contributions to be levied. As they possess a right of appropriating their gifts, so are they entitled, at all times, to inquire into their application, to see that they be not wasted among the venal and corrupt, for the purpose of undermining the civil rights of the givers, nor yet be diverted to the support of standing armies, inconsistent with their freedom and subservicive of their quiet.

8282. TAXATION, Debt and. — Taxation follows public debt, and in its train wretchedness and oppression. — To Samuel Kerchival. vii, 14. Ford ed., x, 42. (M., 1816.)

tion exclusively to the States?—To E. Car rington. ii, 334. Ford ed., iv, 482. (P., 1787.)

8284. —— I will add one question to what I have said there [letter to Mr. Mad son]. Would it not have been better to as sign to Congress exclusively the article of imposts for Federal purposes, and to have left direct taxation exclusively to the States?
I should suppose the former fund sufficient for all probable events, aided by the land of ice.—To Edward Carrington. ii, 334. Ford ed., iv, 482. (P., Dec. 1787.)

8285. —— I have no doubts that the States * * * could have availed them selves of resources for this government [As sumption] which are cut off from the General Government by the prejudices existing against direct taxation in their hands.—To John Harvie.

8286. —— The disputing particu
larities of the direct tax.—To Edmund Pen dleton. iv, 275. Ford ed., vii, 338. (Pa., 1799.)

8287. TAXATION, Direct and indirect.
—It is uncertain what will be the fate of the proposed tax on horses. Besides its partiality, it is infinitely objectionable as foisting in a direct tax under the name of an indirect one.
—To T. M. Randolph. Ford ed., vi, 149.
(Pa., 1792.)

8288. —— A proposition has been made to Congress to begin sinking the public debt by a tax on pleasure horses; that is to say, on all horses not employed for the draught or farm. It is said there is not a horse of that description eastward of New York. And as to call this a direct tax would oblige them to proportionate it among the States according to the census, they choose to class it among the indirect taxes.—To Dr.
(Pa., 1792.)

8289. TAXATION, Equalization of.—
To equalize and moderate the public contribu tions, that while the requisite services are invited by due remuneration, nothing beyond this may exist to attract the attention of our citizens from the pursuits of useful industry, nor unjustly to burthen those who continue in those pursuits— * * * [is one of the] functions of the General Government on which you have a right to call.—Reply to Vermont Address. iv, 418. (W., 1801.)

8290. TAXATION, Exports and.—I have read with attention and satisfaction the pam phlet you have sent me. It is replete with sound views, some of which will doubtless be adopted. Some may be checked by difficul ties. None more likely to be so than the proposition to amend the Constitution, so as to authorize Congress to tax exports. The provision against this in the framing of that instrument, was a sine qua non with the States of peculiar productions, such as rice, indigo, cotton and tobacco, to which may now be added sugar. A jealousy prevailing that to the few States producing these articles, the justice of the others might not be a sufficient protection in opposition to their interest, they moored themselves to this anchor. Since the hostile dispositions lately manifested by the Eastern States, they would be less willing than before to place themselves at their mercy; and the rather as the Eastern States have no exports which can be taxed equa ently. It is possible, however, that this diffi culty might be got over; but the subject looking forward beyond my time, I leave it to those to whom its burdens and benefits will belong.—To A. C. Mitchell. vi, 483.
(M., 1815.)

8291. TAXATION, Extravagant.—If anything could revolt our citizens against the war, it would be the extravagance with which they are about to be taxed. It is strange in deed that at this day, and in a country where English proceedings are so familiar, the prin ciples and advantages of funding should be neglected, and expediens resorted to. Their new bank, if not abortive at its birth, will not last through one campaign; and the taxes pro posed cannot be paid. How can a people who cannot get fifty cents a bushel for their wheat, while they pay twelve dollars a bushel for their salt, pay five times the amount of taxes they ever paid before? Yet that will be the case in all the States south of the Potomac.
Our resources are competent to the main tenance of the war if duly economized and skillfully employed in the way of anticipation.
However, we must suffer, I suppose, * * * and consider now, as in the Revolutionary war, that although the evils of resistance are great, those of submission would be greater.
We must meet, therefore, the former as the equalities of tempests and earthquakes, and like them necessarily resulting from the con stitution of the world.—To William Short.
vi, 400. (M., Nov. 1814.)

8292. TAXATION, Federal Govern ment and.—I thought at first that the power of taxation [given in the new Federal Con stitution] might have been limited. A little re lection soon convinced me it ought not to be.
70. (P., March 1789.)

8293. TAXATION, French.—It is con fidently believed * * * that the stamp tax and land tax will be repealed, and other means devised of accommodating their re ceipts and expenditures. Those supposed to be in contemplation are a rigorous levy of the old tax of the deux vingtièmes on the rich, who had in a great measure withdrawn their property from it, as well as on the poor, on whom it had principally fallen.—To John Jay. ii, 272. (P., 1787.)

8294. —— The right of taxation includes the idea of * * * equalizing the taxes on the clergy and nobility as well as the commons. The two former orders do not pay one-third of the proportion ad valorem, which the last pay.—To Dr. Currie. ii, 544.
(P., 1788.)
8295. — —. The clergy and nobles [in France], by their privileges and influence, have kept their property in a great measure untaxed.—To Dr. Price. ii, 556. (P., Jan. 1789.)

8296. — —. Nor should we wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * [the French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review * * * the oppressions of the tithes, the tallies, the corvées, the gabelle, the farms and the barriers.—Autobiography. i, 86. Ford Ed., i, 118. (1821.)

8297. — —. [We] should not wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * [the French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review the weight of their taxes and the inequality of their distribution.—Autobiography. i, 86. Ford Ed., i, 118. (1821.)

8298. TAXATION, Internal.—Many of the opposition [to the new Federal Constitution] wish to take from Congress the power of internal taxation. Calculation has convinced me that this would be very mischievous.—To William Carmichael. ii, 550. (P., Dec. 1788.)

8299. — —. All are willing to add a bill of rights [to the Federal Constitution] but they fear the power of internal taxation will be abridged.—To William Short. ii, 542. (P., 1788.)

8301. TAXATION, Oppressive English.—No earthly consideration could induce my consent to contract such a debt as England has by her wars for commerce, to reduce our citizens by taxes to such wretchedness as that laboring sixteen of the twenty-four hours, they are still unable to afford themselves bread, or barely to earn as much oatmeal or potatoes as will keep soul and body together. And all this to feed the avidity of a few millionary merchants, and to keep up the thousand ships of war for the protection of their commercial speculations.—To William Crawford. vii, 7. Ford Ed., x, 35. (M., 1816.)

8302. — —. If we run into such debts, as that we must be taxed in our meat and drink, in our necessities and our comforts, in our labors and our amusements, for our callings and our creeds, as the people of England are, our people, like them, must come to labor sixteen hours in the twenty-four, give the earnings of fifteen of these to the government for their debts and daily expenses; and the sixteenth being insufficient to afford us bread, we must live, as they now do, on oatmeal and potatoes; have no time to think, no means of calling the mismanagers to account; but be glad to obtain subsistence by hiring ourselves to rivet their chains on the necks of our fellow-sufferers. * * * And this is the tendency of all human governments. A departure from principle in one instance becomes a precedent for a second; that second for a third; and so on, till the bulk of the society is reduced to be mere automats of misery, to have no sensibilities left but for suffering and suffering. Then begins, indeed, the bellum omnium in omnium, which some philosophers observing to be so general in this world, have mistaken it for the natural instead of the abusive state of man. And the fore horse of this frightful team is public debt. Taxation follows that, and in its train wretchedness and oppression.—To Samuel Kerchival. vii, 14. Ford Ed., x, 41. (M., 1816.)

8303. TAXATION, Parliamentary.—We [Virginia House of Burgesses] cannot, my Lord, close with the terms of that Resolution [Lord North's Conciliatory Proposition]. * * * because to render perpetual our exemption from an unjust taxation, we must saddle ourselves with a perpetual tax, adequate to the expectations, and subject to the disposal of Parliament alone: Whereas, we have a right to give our money, as the Parliament co theirs, without coercion, from time to time, as public exigencies may require. We conceive that we alone are the judges of the condition, circumstances, and situation of our people, as the Parliament are of theirs. It is not merely the mode of raising, but the freedom of granting our money, for which we have contended. Without this, we possess no check on the royal prerogative; and what must be lamented by dutiful and loyal subjects, we should be stripped of the only means, as well of recommending this country to the favors of our most gracious Sovereign, as of strengthening those bonds of amity with our fellow-subjects, while we would wish to remain indissoluble.—Address to Governor Dunmore. Ford Ed., i, 456. (1775.)

8304. — —. By several acts of Parliament * * * they [the Ministers] have undertaken to give and grant our money without our consent—a right of which we have ever had the exclusive exercise.—Declaration on Taking Up Arms. Ford Ed., i, 467. (July 1775.)

8305. — —. Congress are of opinion * * * that the suspension of the exercise of their [Parliament's] pretended power of taxation being expressly made commensurate with the continuing of our gifts, these must be perpetual to make that so; whereas no precedent has shown that a gift of perpetual revenues secures a perpetual return of duty or of kind dispositions. On the contrary, the parliament itself, wisely attentive to this observation, are in the established practice of granting their own money from year to year only.—Reply to Lord North’s Proposition. Ford ed., i, 478. (July 1775.)

8306. —— A proposition to give our money, when accompanied with large fleets and armies, seems addressed to our fears rather than to our freedom.—Reply to Lord North’s Proposition. Ford ed., i, 479. (July 1775.)

8307. —— We think the attempt unnecessary and unwarrantable to raise upon us, by force or by threats, our proportional contributions to the common defence, when all know and themselves acknowledge, we have fully contributed whenever called to contribute, in the character of freemen.—Reply to Lord North’s Proposition. Ford ed., i, 479. (July 1775.)

8308. —— The proposition [of Lord North] is altogether unsatisfactory because it imports only a suspension of the mode, not a renunciation of the pretended right to tax us.—Reply to Lord North’s Proposition. Ford ed., i, 480. (July 1775.)

8309. —— We had been so long in the habit of seeing the British consider us merely as objects for the extension of their commerce, and of submitting to every duty or regulation imposed with that view, that we had ceased to complain of them. But when they proposed to consider us as objects of taxation, all the States took the alarm.—Notes on M. Soulès’s Work. ix, 295. Ford ed., iv, 302. (1786.)

8310. TAXATION, Politics and.—The principle of the present [federalist] majority is excessive expense, money enough to fill all their maws, or it will not be worth the risk of the expense. Paper money would be perilous even to the paper men. Nothing then but excessive taxation can get us along; and this will carry reason and reflection to every man’s door, and particularly in the hour of election.—To John Taylor. iv, 259. Ford ed., vii, 310. (M., 1798.)

8311. TAXATION, Problem of.—Taxation is the most difficult function of government, and that against which their citizens are most apt to be refractory. The general aim is, therefore, to adopt the mode most consonant with the circumstances and sentiments of the country.—Preface to Tracy’s Political Economy. vi, 570. (1816.)

8312. TAXATION, Public opinion and.—The pursuit of the people is the real seat of sensibility. It is to be drawn upon largely, and they will lend attention to truths which could not excite them through any other organ.—To A. H. Rowan. iv, 257. Ford ed., vii, 281. (M., 1798.)

8313. —— All the [party] passions are boiling over, and one who keeps himself cool and clear of the contagion, is so far below the point of ordinary conversation, that he finds himself isolated in every society.

However, the fever will not last. War, land tax and stamp tax, are sedatives which must cool its ardor. They will bring on reflection, and that, with information, is all which our countrymen need, to bring themselves and their affairs to rights.—To James Lewis, Jr. iv, 241. Ford ed., vii, 250. (Pa., May 1798.)

8314. TAXATION, Redress of grievances and.—The privilege of giving or withholding our moneys is an important barrier against the undue exertion of prerogative, * * * and all history shows how efficacious its intercession [is] for redress of grievances and reestablishment of rights, and how improvident would be the surrender of so powerful a mediator.—Reply to Lord North’s Proposition. Ford ed., i, 477. (July 1775.)

8315. TAXATION, Regulation of.—Our properties, within our own territories, shall [not] be taxed or regulated by any power on earth, but our own.—Rights of British America. i, 142. Ford ed., i, 447. (1774.)

8316. TAXATION, Religion and.—The restoration of the rights of conscience [in Virginia by the Revised Code] relieved the people from taxation for the support of a religion not theirs; for the [Church of England] Establishment was truly of the religion of the rich, the dissenting sects being entirely composed of the less wealthy people.—Autobiography. i, 49. Ford ed., i, 69. (1821.)

8317. TAXATION, Representation and.—Preserve inviolate the fundamental principle, that the people are not to be taxed but by representatives chosen immediately by themselves.—To James Madison. ii, 328. Ford ed., iv, 475. (P., 1787.)

8318. —— There are certain principles in which the constitutions of our several States all agree, and which are as vitally essential to the protection of the life, liberty, property and safety of the citizen. [One is] the exclusive right of legislation and taxation in the representatives of the people.

—To M. Coray. vii, 323. (M., 1823.)

8320. TAXATION, Simplest system.—The simplest system of taxation yet adopted is that of levying on the land and the laborer. But it would be better to levy the same sums on the produce of that labor when collected in the barn of the farmer; because then if through the badness of the year he made little, he would pay little. It would be better yet to levy only on the surplus of this product above his own wants. It would be better, too, to levy it not in his hands, but in those of the merchant purchaser; because though the farmer would in fact pay it, as the merchant purchaser would deduct it from the original price of his produce, yet the farmer would not be sensible that he paid it. This idea would no doubt meet its difficulties and objections when it should come to be reduced to practice; yet I suspect it would be practical and expedient. * * * What a comfort to the farmer to be allowed to supply his own wants before he should be liable to pay anything, and then only pay on his surplus.—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED., iv, 16. (P., Dec. 1784.)

8321. TAXATION, Uniformity of.—The public contributions should be as uniform as practicable from year to year, that our habits of industry and of expense may become adapted to them; and that they may be duly digested and incorporated with our annual economy.—To J. W. EPPES. vi, 198. FORD ED., ix, 398. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

8322. TAXATION, War and.—War requires every resource of taxation and credit. —To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 57. (P., 1788.)

8323. ———. Calculation has convinced me that circumstances may arise, and probably will arise, wherein all the resources of taxation will be necessary for the safety of the State.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ED., v, 56. (P., Dec. 1788.)

8324. ———. Sound principles will not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow citizens for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not perhaps happen but from temptations offered by that treasure.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 9. FORD ED., viii, 119. (1801.)

8325. TAXES, Abolition of internal.—Other circumstances, combined with the increase of numbers, have produced an augmentation of revenue arising from consumption, in a ratio far beyond that of population alone; and though the changes of foreign relations now taking place so desirable for the world, may for a season affect this branch of revenue, yet, weighing all probabilities of expense, as well as of income, there is reasonable ground of confidence that we may now safely dispense with all the internal taxes—comprehending excises, stamps, auctions, licenses, carriages, and refined sugars, to which the postage on newspapers may be added, to facilitate the progress of information; and that the remaining sources of revenue will be sufficient to provide for the support of the government, to pay the interest of the public debts, and to discharge the principals in shorter periods than the laws or the general expectation had contemplated. War, indeed, and untoward events, may change this prospect of things, and call for expenses which the imposts could not meet; but sound principles will not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow-citizens to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not perhaps happen but from the temptations offered by that treasure.—FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 9. FORD ED., viii, 119. (1801.)

8326. ———. You will perhaps have been alarmed, as some have been, at the proposition to abolish the whole of the internal taxes. But it is perfectly safe. They are under a million of dollars, and we can economize the government two or three millions a year. The impost alone gives us ten or eleven millions annually, increasing at a compound ratio of six and two-thirds per cent. per annum, and consequently doubling in ten years. But leaving that increase for contingencies, the present amount will support the government, pay the interest of the public debt, and discharge the principal in fifteen years. If the increase proceeds, and no contingencies demand it, it will pay off the principal in a shorter time. Exactly one half of the public debt, to wit, thirty-seven millions of dollars, is owned in the United States. That capital, then, will be set afloat, to be employed in rescuing our commerce from the hands of foreigners, or in agriculture, canals, bridges, or other useful enterprises. By suppressing at once the whole internal taxes, we abolish three-fourths of the offices now existing, and spread over the land.—To JOHN DICKINSON. iv, 425. (W., Dec. 1801.)

8327. ———. The economies of the [first] session of the first Congress, convened since republicanism has recovered its ascendancy, * * * have enabled them to suppress all the internal taxes, and still to make such provision for the payment of their public debt as to discharge that in eighteen years.—To GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 430. (W., April 1802.)

8328. ———. The suppression of unnecessary offices, of useless establishments and expenses, enabled us to discontinue our internal taxes. These, covering our land with officers, and opening our doors to their intrusions, had already begun that process of domiciliary vexation which, once entered, is scarcely to be restrained from reaching successively every article of produce and property. If among these taxes some minor ones fell which had not been inconvenient, it was because their amount would not have paid the officers who collected them, and because, if they had any merit, the State authorities might adopt them, instead of others less approved. The remaining revenue on the consumption of foreign articles, is paid cheerfully by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts, being collected on our seaboards and frontiers only, and incorporated with the transactions of our mercantile citizens, it may be the pleasure and pride of an American to ask, what farmer, what mechanic, what laborer, ever sees a tax-gatherer of the United States? These contributions enable us to support the current expenses of the government, to fulfill contracts with foreign nations, to extinguish the native right of soil within our limits, to extend those limits, and to apply such a surplus to our public debts, as places at a short day their final redemption; and that redemption once effected, the revenue thereby liberated may, by a just repartition among the States, and a corresponding amendment of the Constitution, be applied, in time of peace, to rivers, canals, roads, arts, manufactures, education, and other great objects within each State. In time of war, if injustice, by ourselves or others, must sometimes produce war, increased as the same revenue will be increased by population and consumption, and aided by other resources reserved for that crisis, it may meet within the year all the expenses of the year, without encroaching on the rights of future generations, by burdening them with the debts of the past. War will then be but a suspension of useful works, and a return to a state of peace, a return to the progress of improvement.—Second Inaugural Address. viii. 40. Ford ed., viii, 343. (1805.)

8329. TAXES, Consent and.—He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and dangerous tyranny * * * by combining with others to subject us to a foreign jurisdiction, giving his assent to their pretended acts of legislation * * * for imposing taxes on us without our consent.—Proposed VA. CONSTITUTION. Ford ed., ii, 10. (June 1776.)

8332. TAXES, Consumption and.—The objects of finance in the United States have hitherto been very simple; merely to provide for the support of the government on its peace establishment, and to pay the debt contracted in the Revolutionary war. The means provided for these objects were ample, and resting on a consumption which little affected the poor, may be said to have been felt by none.—To J. W. Eppes. vi, 194. Ford ed., ix, 395. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

8333. TAXES, Exact division of.—It will be said that, though, for taxes, there may always be found a divisor which will apportion them among the States according to numbers exactly, without leaving any remainder, yet, for representatives, there can be no such common ratio, or divisor, which, applied to the several numbers, will divide them exactly, without a remainder or fraction. I answer, then, that taxes must be divided exactly, and representatives as nearly as the nearest ratio will admit.—Opinion on Apportionment Bill. vii, 596. Ford ed., v, 495. (1792.)

8334. TAXES, Excessive.—Our taxes are now a third and will soon be half of our whole exports; and when you add the expenses of the State Governments we shall be found to have got to the plenum of taxation in ten short years of peace. Great Britain, after centuries of wars and revolutions, had at the commencement of the present war taxed only to the amount of two-thirds of her exports.—To Archibald Stuart. iv. 284. Ford ed., vii, 351. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

8335. TAXES, Excise.—The excessive unpopularity of the excise and bank bills in the South, I apprehend, will produce a stand against the Federal Government.—To William Short. Ford ed., v, 296. (Pa., March 1791.)

8336. — — I hope the death blow to that most vexatious and unproductive of all taxes [excise] was given at the commencement of my administration, and believe its revival would give the deathblow to any administration whatever.—To Dupont de Nemours. v, 583. Ford ed., ix, 320. (M., 1811.)

8337. — — If the excise tax could be collected from those who buy to sell again, so as to prevent domiciliary visits by the officers, I think it would be acceptable. and, I am sure, a wholesome tax.—To Mr. Nelson. vi, 47. (M., April 1812.)

8338. TAXES, Imposition of.—No tax should ever be yielded for a longer term than that of the Congress wanting it, except when pledged for the reimbursement of a loan.—To J. W. Eppes. vi, 195. Ford ed., ix, 395. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

8339. TAXES, Income.—Taxes on consumption like those on capital or income, to be just, must be uniform.—To Samuel Smith. vii, 285. Ford ed., x, 252. (M., 1823.) See Taxation, Basis of.

8340. TAXES, Land.—I am suggesting an idea on the subject of taxation which might, perhaps, facilitate much that business, and reconcile all parties. That is * * * to lay a land tax, leviable in 1798, &c. But if by the last day of 1798, any State shall bring its whole quota into the Federal Treasury, the tax shall be suspended one year for that State. If by the end of the next year they bring another year's tax, it shall be suspended a second year as to them, and so toties quoties forever. If they fail, the Federal collectors will go on, of course, to make their collection. In this way, those who prefer excises may raise their quota by excises, and those who prefer land taxes may raise by land taxes, either on the Federal plan, or on any other of their own which they like better. This would tend, I think, to make the General Government popular, and to render the State Legislatures useful allies and associates instead of rivals, and to mollify the harsh tone of government which has been asserted. I find the idea pleasing to most of those to whom I have suggested it. It will be objected to by those who are for consolidation.—To Peregrine FitzHugh. Ford ed., vii, 136. (Pa., June 1797.)
8341. — I think that the matter of finances, which has set the people of Europe to thinking, is now advanced to that point with us, that the next step (and it is an unavoidable one), a land tax, will awaken our constituents, and call for inspection into past proceedings.—To St. George Tucker. iv, 197. FORD ed., vii, 169. (M., 1797.)

8342. — It had been expected that we must have laid a land tax this session [of Congress]. However, it is thought we can get along another year without it.—To Peregrine Fitzhugh. iv, 217. FORD ed., vii, 210. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

8343. — A land tax is the decided resource of many [of the federalists], perhaps of a majority.—To James Madison. Ford ed., vii, 243. (Pa., April 1798.)

8344. — The federalists talk  of a land tax. This will probably not be opposed. The only question will be, how to modify it. On this there may be a great diversity of sentiment. One party will want to make it a new source of patronage and expense.—To James Madison. iv, 234. FORD ed., vii, 237. (Pa., April 1798.)

8345. — The land tax is now on the carpet to raise two millions of dollars; yet I think they must at least double it, as the expenses of the provisional army were not provided for in it, and will require of itself four millions a year.—To James Monroe. iv, 242. FORD ed., vii, 156. (Pa., May 1798.)

8346. — In most of the middle and southern States some land tax is now paid into the State treasury, and for this purpose the lands have been classed and valued, and the tax assessed according to that valuation. In these an excise is most odious. In the eastern States land taxes are odious, excises less unpopular.—To Dupont de Nemours. v, 583. FORD ed., ix, 321. (M., April 1811.)

8347. TAXES, Legislation and.—TAXES should be continued by annual or biennial reenactments.—To J. W. Eppes. vi, 195. FORD ed., ix, 395. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

8348. — Taxes should be continued by annual or biennial reenactments, because a constant hold, by the nation, of the strings of the public purse, is a salutary restraint from which an honest government ought not to wish, nor a corrupt one to be permitted to be free.—To J. W. Eppes. vi, 195. FORD ed., ix, 395. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

8349. TAXES, Necessary wants and.—Taxes should be proportioned to what may be annually spared by the individual.—To James Madison. FORD ed., iv, 15. (P., Dec. 1784.)

8350. TAXES, Paper money and.—Every one, through whose hands a bill passed, lost on that bill what it lost in value, during the time it was in his hands. This was a real tax on him; and * * * the most oppressive of all, because the most unequal of all,—To M. de Meunier. ix, 260. FORD ed., iv, 165. (P., 1786.)

8351. TAXES, Politics and suppression of.—Bitter men are not pleased with the suppression of taxes. Not daring to condemn the measure, they attack the motive; and too disingenuous to ascribe it to the honest one of freeing our citizens from unnecessary burthens and unnecessary systems of office, they ascribe it to a desire of popularity. But every honest man will suppose honest acts to flow from honest principles, and the rogues may rail without intermission.—To Dr. Benjamin Rush. iv, 426. FORD ed., viii, 128. (W., 1801.)

8352. TAXES, Resources of internal.—Whenever we are destined to meet events which shall call forth all the energies of our countrymen, we have * * * the comfort of leaving for calls like these the extraordinary resources of loans and internal taxes.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 19. FORD ed., viii, 185. (Dec. 1802.)

8353. TAXES, Sinecures and.—We do not mean that our people shall be burdened with oppressive taxes to provide sinecures for the idle or the wicked, under color of providing for a civil list.—REPLY TO LORD NORTH’S PROPOSITION. FORD ed., i, 480. (July 1775.)

8354. TAXES, Stamp.—To the stamp tax I have not seen a man who is not totally irreconcilable. * * * Yet, although a very disgusting pill, I think there can be no question the people will swallow it, if their representatives determine on it.—To Mr. Nelson. vi, 47. (M., April 1812.)

8355. TAXES, Unnecessary.—To impose on our citizens no unnecessary burden, * * * * [is one of] the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 21. FORD ed., viii, 187. (Dec. 1802.)

8356. TAXES, War and.—The report of the Committee of Finance proposes taxes to the amount of twenty millions. This is a dashing proposition. But, if Congress pass it, I shall consider it sufficient evidence that their constituents generally can pay the tax. No man has greater confidence than I have in the spirit of the people, to a rational extent. Whatever they can, they will. But within either market or medium, I know not how it is to be done. All markets abroad, and all at home are shut to us; so that we have been feeding our horses on wheat. Before the day of collection, bank notes will be but as oak leaves; and of specie. there is not within all the United States, one half of the proposed amount of the taxes. I had thought myself as bold as was safe in contemplating, as possible, an annual taxation of ten millions, as fund for emissions of treasury notes; and when further emissions should be necessary, that it would be better to enlarge the time, than the tax for redemption. Our position, with respect to our enemy, and our markets, distinguish us from all other nations; inasmuch, as a 8357. — Instead of taxes for the whole year's expenses, which the people cannot pay, a tax on the amount of the interest and a reasonable portion of the principal will command the whole sum, and throw a part of the burdens of war on times of peace and prosperity.—To William Short. vi, 401. (M., 1814.)

8358. TAXES, Wasted.—If there be anything amiss in the present state of our affairs, as the formidable deficit lately unfolded to us indicates, I ascribe it to the inattention of Congress to their duties, to their unwise dissipation and waste of the public contributions. They seemed, some little while ago, to be at a loss for objects whereon to throw away the supposed fathomless funds of the treasury.

* * * I am aware that in one of their most ruinous vagaries the people were themselves betrayed into the same phrenzy with their representatives. The deficit produced, and a heavy tax to supply it, will, I trust, bring both to their sober senses.—To Thomas Ritchie. vii, 191. Ford ed., x, 170. (M., 1820.)

8359. TAX-GATHERERS, Cost of.—Our tax-gatherers in Virginia cost as much as the whole civil list besides.—To James Madison. Ford ed., iv, 16. (Pa., 1784.)

8360. TAX-GATHERERS, Discontent and. — The tax-gatherer has already excited discontent.—To James Madison. iv, 261. Ford ed., vii, 313. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

8361. TAYLOR (John), Political principles. — Colonel Taylor and myself have rarely, if ever, differed in any political principle of importance. Every act of his life, and every word he ever wrote, satisfies me of this.—To Thomas Ritchie. vii, 191. Ford ed., x, 170. (M., 1820.)

8362. — — Colonel Taylor's book of "Constructions Construed" * * * is the most logical retraction of our governments to the original and true principles of the Constitution creating them, with * * * has appeared since the adoption of that instrument. I may now be absent in all its opinions, great and small, for no two men ever thought alike on so many points. But on all important questions, it contains the true political faith, to which every catholic republican should steadfastly hold. It should be put into the hands of all our functionaries; authoritative, standing instruction and true exposition of our Constitution, as understood at the time we agreed to 't. —To Spencer Roane. vii, 213. Ford ed., x, 189. (M., 1821.)

8363. TEA. Duty on. — So inscrutable is the arrangement of causes and consequences in this world, that a two-penny duty on tea, unjustly imposed in a sequestered part of it, changes the condition of all its inhabitants.—Autobiography. i, 166. Ford ed., i, 147. (1821.) See Boston Port Bill.

8364. TEACHERS, Appreciation of. — Respect and gratitude [are] due to those who devote their time and efforts to render the youths of every successive age fit governors for the next.—To Hugh L. White. v, 522. (M., 1810.)

8365. TEMPER, Southern. — Our Southern sun has been accused of sometimes sublimating the temper too highly. — To E. Rutledge. iii, 166. Ford ed., v, 197. (N.Y., 1790.)

8366. TEMPER, Smooth. — Nothing enables a man to get along in business so well as a smooth temper. — Anas. Ford ed., i, 337. (1808.)

8367. TEMPERANCE, At table. — In the pleasures of the table [the French] are far before us, because, with good taste they unite temperance. They do not terminate the most sociable meals by transforming themselves into brutes.—To Mr. Bellini. i, 445. (P., 1783.)

8368. TEMPERANCE, France and. — I have never yet seen a man drunk in France, even among the lowest of the people.—To Mr. Bellini. i, 445. (P., 1783.)

8369. TEMPERANCE, Principles of. — I have received and read with thankfulness and pleasure your denunciation of the abuses of tobacco and wine. Yet, however sound in its principles, I expect it will be but a sermon to the wind. You will find it * * * difficult to inculcate these sanitary precepts on the usanalties of the present day.—To Dr. Benjamin Waterhouse. vii, 252. Ford ed., x, 219. (M., 1822.)

— TEMPERATURE.—See CLIMATE.

8370. TENANTS, For Monticello. — The subject [of tenancies] is one I have very much at heart, for I find I am not fit to be a farmer with the kind of labor we have, and also subject to such long avocation.—To S. T. Mason. Ford ed., vii, 356. (M., Oct. 1799.)

8371. TENANTS, Seeking. — You promised to endeavor to send me some tenants. I am waiting for them. * * * Tenants of any size may be accommodated with the number of fields suited to their force. Only send me good people.—To S. T. Mason. Ford ed., vii, 283. (M., 1798.)

8372. TERNANT (J. B.), Hamilton and. — Ternant has at length openly hoisted the flag of monarchy by going into deep mourning for his prince [Louis XVI.]. I suspect he thinks a cautionation of his visits to me a necessary accompaniment to this pious duty. A connection between him and Hamilton seems to be springing up.—To James Madison. iii, 520. Ford ed., vi, 193. (Pa., 1793.)

8373. TERNANT (J. B.), Medal for. — The President of the United States, in a letter addressed to the Primary Executive Council of the French Republic, has expressed his sense of your merit, and his entire approbation of your conduct while here. He has also charged me to convey to yourself the same sentiments on his part. It is with pleasure I obey this charge, in hearing witness to the candor and integrity of your conduct with us, and to the share you may justly claim in the cultivation of harmony and good understanding between the two nations * * *. As testimony of the regard of the United States, we shall take an early occasion.
to ask your acceptance of a medal and chain of gold on their part.—To Jean Baptiste Ternant. Ford Ed., vi, 263. (Pa., 1793.)

8374. TERNANT (J. B.), Shifting affiliations.—When Ternant received certain account of his appointment, thinking he had nothing further to hope from the Jacobins, he that very day found out something to be offended at in me (in which I had been made ex officio the ostensible agent in what came from another quarter, and he has never been undeceived), attached himself intimately to Hamilton, put on mourning for the King, and became a perfect counter-revolutioner. A few days ago, he received a letter from Genet, giving him a hope they will employ him in the army. On this, he tacked about again, became a Jacobin, and refused to present the Viscount Noailles, and some other French aristocrats arrived here. However, he will hardly have the impudence to speak to me again.—To James Monroe. iii, 549. Ford Ed., vi, 240. (Pa., May 1793.)

8375. TERNANT (J. B.), Soldier.—Ternant established a solid reputation in Europe by his conduct when Generalissimo of one of the United Provinces, during their late disturbances; and it is generally thought that if he had been put at the head of the principal province, instead of the Rhin gravre de Salm, he would have saved that cause.—To John Jay, ii, 572. (P., 1789.)

8376. TERRITORY, Acquisition of.—I know that the acquisition of Louisiana has been disapproved by some, from a candid apprehension that the enlargement of our territory would endanger its Union. But who can limit the extent to which the federal principle may operate effectively?—Second Inaugural Address, viii, 41. Ford Ed., viii, 344. (1805.) See Louisiana.

—TERRITORY, Acquisition of Canada.
—See Canada.

8377. TERRITORY, Admission of new States.—I am aware of the force of the observations you make on the power given by the Constitution to Congress, to admit new States into the Union, without restraining the subject to the territory then constituting the United States. But when I consider that the limits of the United States are precisely fixed by the treaty of 1783, that the Constitution expressly declares itself to be made for the United States, I cannot help believing the intention was to permit Congress to admit into the Union new States, which should be formed out of the territory for which, and under whose authority alone, they acted. I do not believe it was meant that they might receive England, Ireland, Holland, &c., into it, which would be the case on your construction.—To Wilson C. Nicholas. iv, 505. Ford Ed., vii, 247. (M., Sep. 1803.)

8378. TERRITORY, Alienation of.—The power to alienate the unpeopled territory of any State is not among the enumerated powers given by the Constitution to the General Government, and if we may go out of that instrument, and accommodate to exigencies which may arise by alienating the unpeopled territory of a State, we may accommodate ourselves a little more by alienating that which is peopled, and still a little more by selling the people themselves. A shade or two more in the degree of exigency is all that will be requisite, and of that degree we shall ourselves be the judges. However, may it not be hoped that these questions are forever laid to rest by the * * * amendment * * * to the Constitution, declaring expressly that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution are reserved to the States respectively?" And if the General Government has no power to alienate the territory of a State, it is too irresistible an argument to deny ourselves the use of it on the present occasion.—To Alexander Hamilton. Ford Ed., v, 443. (1792.)

8380. —. We have neither the right nor the disposition to alienate an inch of what belongs to any member of our Union.—Mississippi River Instructions. vii, 586. Ford Ed., v, 476. (1792.)

8381. —. [President Washington, at a Cabinet meeting, submitted the question:] "Will it be expedient to relinquish to the Indians the right of soil of any part of the land north of the Ohio, if essential to peace?" The Secretaries of the Treasury and War, and the Attorney General are of opinion it will be expedient to make such relinquishment if essential to peace, provided it do not include any lands sold or reserved for special purposes (the reservations for trading places excepted). The Secretary of State is of opinion that the Executive and Senate have authority to stipulate with the Indians, and that if essential to peace, it will be expedient to stipulate that we will not settle any lands between those already sold or reserved for special purposes, and the lines heretofore validly established with the Indians.—Opinion on Indian War. Ford Ed., vi, 191. (Feb. 1793.)

8382. —. I considered [at a Cabinet meeting] that the Executive, with either or both branches of the Legislature, could not alien any part of our territory; that by the law of nations it was settled, that the unity and indivisibility of the society was so fundamental, that it could not be dismembered by the constituted authorities, except, 1, where all power was delegated to them (as in the case of despotic governments), or, 2, where it was expressly delegated; that neither of these delegations had been made to our General Government and, therefore, that it had no right to dismember or alienate any part of territory once ultimately consolidated with us; and that we could no more cede to the Indians than to the English or Spaniards, as it might, according to acknowledged principles, remain as irrevocably and eternally with the one as the other. But I thought, that as we had a right to sell and settle lands once comprehended within our lines, so we might forbear to exercise that right, retaining the property till circumstances should be more favorable to the settlement, and this I agreed to do in the present instance, if necessary for peace.—The Anas. ix, 137. Ford ed., i, 219. (Feb. 1793.)

8383. The Cabinet met  * on the subject of your [President Washington's] circular letter, and agreed on all points, except as to the power of ceding territory, on which point there remained the same difference of opinion as when the subject was discussed in your presence.—To President Washington. Ford ed., vi, 212. (Pa., April 1793.)

8384. The negotiators at Ghent are agreed in everything except as to a rag of Maine, which we cannot yield nor they seriously care about.—To Mrs. Trist. D. L. J. 359. (M., Dec. 1814.)

8385. TERRITORY, Annexation of Canada.—That Bonaparte would give us the Floridas to withhold intercourse with the residue of the [Spanish] colonies cannot be doubted. But that is no price; because they are ours in the first moment of the first war; and until a war they are of no particular necessity to us. But, although with difficulty, he will consent to our receiving Cuba into our Union, to prevent our aid to Mexico and the other provinces. That would be a price, and I would immediately erect a column on the southernmost limit of Cuba and inscribe on it a ne plus ultra as to us in that direction. We should then have only to include the north in our Confederacy, which would be, of course, in the first war, and we should have such an empire for liberty as she has never surveied since the creation; and I am persuaded no Constitution was ever before so well calculated as ours for extensive empire and self-government.—To President Madison. v, 444. (M., April 1800.) See Canada.

8386. TERRITORY, British acquisition of American.—The consequences of their [the British] acquiring all the country on our frontier, from the St. Croix to the St. Mary's, are too obvious to you to need development. You will readily see the dangers which would then environ us. We wish you, therefore, to intimate to them that we cannot be indifferent to enterprises of this kind; that we should contemplate a change of neighbors with extreme uneasiness; and that a due balance on our borders is not less desirable to us, than a balance of power in Europe has always appeared to them. We wish to be neutral, and we will be so, if they will execute the treaty [of peace] fairly, and attempt no conquests adjoining us. The first condition is just; the second imposes no hardship on them. They cannot complain that the other dominions of Spain would be so narrow as not to leave them room enough for conquest.—To Governor Morris. iii, 182. Ford ed., v, 224. (N.Y., 1790.)

8387. It was evident to me that the British had it in view to claim a slice of our north-western quarter, that they may get into the Mississippi; indeed, I thought it presented as a sort of make-weight with the posts to compensate the great losses their citizens had sustained by the infractions [of the treaty of peace] charged on us.—The Anas. ix, 428. Ford ed., i, 196. (June 1792.)

8388. TERRITORY, Cession of Northwest.—The territories contained within the charters erecting the Colonies of Maryland, Pennsylvania, North and South Carolina, are hereby ceded, released, and forever confirmed to the people of those Colonies respectively, with all the rights of property, jurisdiction and government, and all other rights whatsoever which might at any time hereafter have been claimed by this colony [Virginia]. The western and northern extent of this country shall in all other respects stand as fixed by the charter of — until, by act of the Legislature, one or more Territories shall be laid off westward of the Alleghany mountains for new colonies, which colonies shall be established on the same fundamental laws contained in this instrument, and shall be free and independent of this Colony and of all the world.—Proposed Va. Constitution. Ford ed., ii, 25. (June 1776.) See Western Territory.

8389. The General Assembly shall have power to sever from this State all or any parts of its territory westward of the Ohio, or of the meridian of the mouth of the Great Kanawha.—Proposed Constitution for Virginia. viii, 446. Ford ed., iii, 325. (1783.)

8390. I do myself the honor of transmitting to your Excellency a resolution of the General Assembly of this Commonwealth, entered into in consequence of the resolution of Congress of September 6th, 1780, on the subject of confederation. I shall be rendered very happy if the other States of the Union, equally impressed with the necessity of that important convention, shall be willing to sacrifice equally to its completion. This single event, could it take place shortly, would outweigh every success which the enemy [England] have hitherto obtained, and render desperate the hopes to which those successes have given birth.—To the President of Congress. i, 287. Ford ed., ii, 423. (R., January 17, 1781.)

8391. TERRITORY, Constitution and. No constitution was ever before so well calculated as ours for extensive empire and self-government.—To President Madison. v, 444. (M., April 1809.)

*Morris was then informal agent of the United States in London. It was feared that England would wrest Louisiana from Spain.—EDITOR.
— TERRITORY, Constitution and acquisition of foreign.—See LOUISIANA.

8392. TERRITORY, Cuba.—I candidly confess that I have ever looked on Cuba as the most interesting addition which could ever be made to our system of States.—To President MONROE. vii, 316. FORD ed., x, 278. (M., 1823.) See CUBA.

8393. TERRITORY, Disputed.—The Colony of Virginia does not entertain a wish that one inch should be added to theirs from the territory of a sister Colony *. * *. The decision, whatever it be, will not annihilate the lands. They will remain to be occupied by Americans, and whether these be counted in the members of this or that of the United States will be thought a matter of little moment.—LETTER TO PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION. FORD ed., ii, 65. (July 1776.)

8394. TERRITORY, Dissensions and.—The larger our association, the less will it be shaken by local passions.—SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS. viii, 41. FORD ed., viii, 344. (1805.)

8396. ——. The extent of our territory secures it, I hope, from the vindictive passions of the petty incorporations of Greece.—To ELBRIDGE GERRY. vi, 63. FORD ed., ix, 360. (M., 1812.)

8397. ——. I see our safety in the extent of our confederacy, and in the probability that in the proportion of that the sound parls will always be sufficient to crush out local poison.—To HORATIO G. SPAFFORD. vi, 335. (M., 1814.)

8398. ——. I still believe that the western extension of our territory will ensure its duration, by overruling local factions, which might shake a smaller association.—To HENRY DEARBORN. vii, 215. FORD ed., x, 192. (M., 1821.)

8399. TERRITORY, European influence in American.—We consider their interests [Cuba and Mexico] and ours as the same, and that the object of both must be to exclude all European influence from this hemisphere.—To GOVERNOR CLAIBORNE. v, 381. FORD ed., ix, 213. (W., Oct. 1808.)

8400. TERRITORY, Expansion of.—Our confederacy must be viewed as the nest from which all America, North and South, is to be peopled. We should take care, too, not to think it for the interest of that great Continent to press too soon on the Spaniards. Those countries cannot be in better hands. My fear is that they are too feeble to hold them till our population can be sufficiently advanced to gain it from them piece by piece.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ed., iv, 188. (P., 1786.)

8401. ——. However our present interests may restrain us within our own limits, it is impossible not to look forward to distant times, when our rapid multiplication will expand itself beyond those limits, and cover the whole northern, if not the southern continent, with a people speaking the same language, governed in similar forms, and by similar laws *. * *.—To JAMES MONROE. iv, 420. FORD ed., viii, 105. (W., Nov. 1801.)

8402. TERRITORY, Good government and.—Our present federal limits are not too large for good government, nor will the increase of votes in Congress produce any ill effect. On the contrary, it will drown the little divisions at present existing there.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. i, 518. FORD ed., iv, 188. (P., Jan. 1786.)

8403. TERRITORY, Holding foreign.—The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive in seizing the fugitive occurrence [Louisiana purchase] which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the Constitution. The Legislature in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties, and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized, what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it. It is the case of a guardian, investing the money of his ward in purchasing an important adjacent territory; and saying to him when of age, I did this for your good; I pretend to no right to bind you: you may disavow me, and I must get out of the scrape as I can. I thought it my duty to risk myself for you. But we shall not be disavowed by the nation, and their act of indemnity will confirm and not weaken the Constitution, by more strongly marking out its lines.—To JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE. iv, 500. FORD ed., viii, 244. (M., Aug. 1803.)

8404. TERRITORY, Naval defence and.—Nothing should ever be accepted which would require a navy to defend it.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. v, 445. (M., April 1809.)

8406. TERRITORY, Preservation of.—Were we to give up half our territory [Mississippi region] rather than engage in a just 8407. TERRITORY, Purchases of Indian.—To be prepared against the occupation of Louisiana by a powerful and enterprising people [the French], it is important that, setting less value on interior extension of purchase, in the presence of a few families, I presume we views to the purchase and settlement of the country on the Mississippi, from its mouth to its northern regions, that we may be able to present as strong a front on our western as on our eastern border, and push on the Mississippi itself the means of its own defence. We now own from 31° to the Yazoo, and hope this summer to purchase what belongs to the Choctaws from the Yazoo up to the boundary, supposed to be about opposite the mouth of Atchafalaya; and therefore, having a line of settlements in your quarter, for which there is at present a favorable opening. The Cahokias extinct, we are entitled to their country by our paramount sovereignty. The Porias, we understand, have all been driven off from their country by the French, and are latterly settled in Illinois; and they, being themselves in a state of war; but as we understand there is one chief remaining, who, would, as the survivor of the tribe, sell the right, it is better to give him such terms as will make him easy for life, and take a conveyance from him. The Kaskaskias has I am informed, not less than five families, I presume we may purchase their whole country for what would place every individual of them at his ease, and be a small price to us,—say by laying off for each family, wherever they would choose it, as much land as they could cultivate, and adjacent to each other, enclosing the whole in a single fence, and giving them such an annuity in money or goods forever as would place them in happiness; and we might take them also under the protection of the United States, to prevent any interference of the British and other tribes, we should proceed to the settling of their boundaries with the Pottawatamies and Kickapooos, claiming all doubtful territory, but paying them a price for the relinquishment of their concurrent claim, and even prevailing on them, if possible, to cede, for a price, such of their own unquestioned territory as would give us a convenient northern boundary. Before broaching this, and while we are bargaining with the Kaskaskias, the minds of the Pottawatamies and Kickapoos should be soothed and conciliated by liberal and sincere assurances of friendship. Perhaps by sending a well-qualified character to stay some time in Duquoin's village, as if on other business, and to sound him and introduce the subject by degrees to his mind, and that of the other heads of families, inculcating in the way of conversation, all those considerations which prove the advantages they would receive by a cession on these terms, the object might be more easily and effectually obtained than by abruptly proposing it to them. If this should prove successful, however, of obtaining what we wish, you will be the best judge; and I have given you this view of the system which we suppose will best promote the interests of the Indians and ourselves, and finish an agency among the tribes, that is sufficiently extensive to make an impression on that nation only; that you may be enabled the better to adapt your means to the object, for this purpose we have given you a general commission for treating.—To Governor Harrison. iv. 473. (W., Feb. 1803.)

8408. TERRITORY, Purchase of Florida.—See Florida.

8409. TERRITORY, Purchases of Indian.—As a means of increasing the security, and providing a protection for our lower possessions on the Mississippi, I think it also all important to press on the Indians, as steadily and strenuously as they can bear, the extension of our purchases on the Mississippi frontier; the Yazoo and Mississippi River, as a settlement along the whole length of that river, that 't may possess on its own banks the means of defending itself, and presenting as strong a frontier on our western as we have on our eastern border. We have, therefore, recommended to Governor Dickie and Alabama, and to the governor of Tombigbee only as much as will cover our actual settlements, to transfer the purchase from the Choctaws to their lands westward of the Black Big, rather than the fork of Tombigbee and Alabama, which has been offered by them in order to pay their debt to Pontotoc and Leslie. I have confident expectations of purchasing this summer a good breadth on the Mississippi, from the mouth of the Illinois down to the mouth of the Ohio, which would settle immediately and thickly; and we should then have between that settlement and the lower one, only those inhabited lands of the Chickasaws on the Mississippi; on which we could be working at both ends. You will be sensible that the preceding views, as well those which respect the European powers as the Indians, I would be fortunate to accomplish, but be held as a rule of action to govern the conduct of those within whose agency they lie; and it is for this reason that instead of having it said to you in an official letter, committed to records which are current to many years, you should take it as you learn my views from a private and confidential letter, and be enabled to act upon them yourself, and guide others into them.—To Governor Claiborne. iv. 487. (W., May 1803.)

8410. TERRITORY, Purchase of Florida.—Another important acquisition of territory has also been made since the last session of Congress. The friendly tribe of Kaskaskia Indians, who never had a difference, reduced by the wars and wants of savage life to a few individuals unable to defend themselves against the neighboring tribes, has transferred its country to the United States, reserving only for its members that is sufficiently extensive to make a good purchase in an agricultural way. The considerations stipulated are that we shall extend to them our patronage and protection, and give them certain annual aids in money, in implements of agriculture, and other articles of their choice. This country, extending along the Mississippi from the mouth of the Illinois to and up the Ohio, though not so necessary as a barrier since the acquisition of the other bank, may yet be well worthy of being laid open to immediate settlement, as its inhabitants may descend with rapidity in support of the lower country should future circumstances expose that to foreign enterprise.—

THIRD ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii. 25. FORD ED., viii, 269. (Oct. 1803.)

8411. On this side the Mississippi, an important relinquishment of native title has been received from the Delawares. That tribe, desiring to extinguish in their people the spirit of hunting, and to convert superfluous lands into the means of improving what they retain, have ceded to us all the country between the Wabash and the Ohio, south of, and including the road from the rapids towards Vincennes, for which they are to receive annuities in animals and implements for agriculture, and in other necessaries. This acquisition is important, not only for its extent and fertility, but as intruding three hundred miles on the Ohio, and near half that on the Wabash. The produce of the settled countries descending those rivers no longer pass as they of the Indian frontier but in a small portion, and with the cession heretofore made with the Kaskaskias, nearly consolidates our possessions north of the Ohio, in a very respectable breadth, from Lake Erie to the Mississippi. The Piankeshaws having some claim to the country ceded by the Delawares, it has been thought best to quiet that by fair purchase also.—FOURTH ANNUAL MESSAGE, viii, 37. FORD ED., viii, 330. (Nov. 1804.)

8412. The northern [Indian] tribes have sold to us: the lands between the Connecticut Reserve, and the former Indian boundary; and those on the Ohio, from the same boundary to the Rapids, and for a considerable distance on the east and west. The Chinkashaws and Cherokee have sold us their country between the two districts of and adjacent to the two districts of Tennessee, and the Creeks, the residue of their lands in the fork of Ocmulgee, up to the river which we expect is by this time ceded by the Creeks, and with which the Sparta has sold us. To the river which we expect is by this time ceded by the Chinkashaws. It completes our possession of this Mohican of both claims to the country ceded by the Delawares. It has been thought best to quiet that by fair purchase also. FIFTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 52. FORD ED., viii, 394. (Dec. 1805.)

8413. TERRITORY, Republicanism and. —The late chapter of our history furnishes a new proof of the falsehood of Montesquieu’s doctrine, that a republic can be preserved only in a small territory. The reverse is the truth. Had our territory been even a third only of what it is, we were gone. But while frenzy and delusion, like an epidemic, gained certain parts, the residue remained sound and untouched, and held on till their brethren could recover from the temporary delusion. —TO NATHANIEL NILES. iv. 376. FORD ED., viii, 24. (W., March 1801.)

8414. ———. While smaller governments are better adapted to the ordinary objects of society, larger confederations more effectually secure independence, and the preservation of republican government.—TO THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY. iv, 397. (W., May 1801.)

8415. ———. I have much confidence that we shall proceed successfully for ages to come, and that, contrary to the principle of Montesquieu, it will be seen that the larger the extent of country, the more firm its republican structure, if founded, not on conquest, but in principles of compact and equality. My hope of its duration is built much on the enlargement of the resources of life going on, and the enlargement of territory, and the belief that men are disposed to live honestly, if the means of doing so are open to them.—TO M. DE MARBOIS. vii, 77. (M., 1817.)

8416. TERRITORY, Seizure.—I consider war between France and England as unavoidable. * * * In this conflict, our neutrality will be cheaply purchased by a cession of the island of New Orleans and the Floridas; because taking part in the war, we could so certainly seize and securely hold them and more. And although it would be unwise in us to let such an opportunity pass of obtaining the necessary accession to our territory even by force, if not obtainable otherwise, yet it is infinitely more desirable to obtain it with the blessing of neutrality rather than the curse of war.—TO GOVERNOR CLARK. LAWNE, iv. 487. (W., May 1803.)

8417. You have thought it advisable sooner to take possession of adjacent territories. But we know that they are ours the first moment that any war is forced upon us for other causes, that we are at hand to anticipate their possession, if attempted by any other power, and, in the meantime, we are lengthening the term of our prosperity, liberating our revenues, and increasing our power.—TO GENERAL ARMSTRONG. v. 433. (W., March 1806.)

8418. TERRITORY, Spanish pretensions.—I say nothing of the claims of Spain to our territory north of the thirty-first degree, and east of the Mississippi. They never merited the respect of an answer [to Spain]; and * * * it has been admitted at Madrid that they were not to be maintained.—TO WILLIAM CARMICHAEL, iii, 173. FORD ED., v, 217. (N.Y., 1790.)

8419. TESTS, Religious.—The proscribing any citizen as unworthy the public confidence, by laying upon him an incapacity of being called to offices of trust or emolument, unless he profess or renounce this or that religious opinion, is depriving him injudiciously of those privileges and advantages, to which in common with his fellow citizens, he has a natural right.—STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM. FORD ED., ii, 238. (1779.)

or affect their civil capacities.—Statute of Religious Freedom. Ford ed., ii, 239. (1799.)

8421. THEATRES, Utility of.—I have never expressed an objection to that part of your plan relative to the theatre. The utility of this in America is a great question on which I may be allowed to have an opinion; but it is not for me to decide on it, nor to object to the proposal of establishing one at Richmond. The only objection to your plan which I have ever made, is that it was too extensive for the poverty of the country. You remove the objection by observing it is to extend to several States. Whether professors itinerant from one State to another may succeed, I am unable to say, having never known an experiment of it. The fear that these professors may be disappointed in their expectations, has determined me not to meddle in the business at all.—To M. de Quesnay. ii, 346. (P., 1788.)

8422. THEORY, Demolishing.—Theories are more easily demolished than rebuilt.—To REV. James Madison. ii, 430. (P., 1788.)

8423. THEORY, Imagination and.—The moment a person forms a theory, his imagination sees, in every object, only the traits which favor that theory.—To CHARLES THOMSON. ii, 276. FORD ED., iv, 447. (P., 1787.)

8424. THEORY, Victims of.—Men come into business at first with visionary principles. It is practice alone which can correct and conform them to the actual current of affairs. In the meantime, those to whom their errors were first applied have been their victims.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 408. FORD ED., v, 16. (P., 1788.)

8425. THIRD TERM, Age and.—I owe you much thankfulness for the favorable opinion you entertain of my services, and the assurance expressed that they would again be acceptable in the Executive chair. But I was sincere in stating age as one of the reasons of my retirement from office, beginning then to be conscious of its effects, and now much more sensible of them. Senile inertness is not what is to save our country; the conduct of a war requires the vigor and enterprise of younger heads. All such undertakings, therefore, are out of the question with me, and I say so with the greater satisfaction when I contemplate the person to whom the Executive powers were handed over.—To THOMAS C. FLOURNOY. vi, 82. (M., Oct. 1812.)

8426. THIRD TERM, Constitution and.—Your approbation of the reasons which induced me to retire from the honorable station in which my countrymen had placed me, is the proof of your devotion to the principles of our Constitution. These are wisely opposed to all perpetuations of power, and to every practice which may lead to hereditary establishments.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. v, 473. (M., 1809.)

8427. THIRD TERM, Dangers of.—My opinion originally was that the President of the United States should have been elected for seven years, and forever ineligible afterwards. I have since become sensible that seven years is too long to be irremovable, and that there should be a peaceable way of withdrawing a man in mid-way who is doing wrong. The service for eight years, with a power to remove at the end of the first four, comes nearly to my principle as corrected by experience; and it is in adherence to that, that I determine to withdraw at the end of my second term. The danger is that of indifference and attachments of the people will keep a man in the chair after he becomes a dotard, that reelection through life shall become habitual, and election for life follow that. General Washington set the example of voluntary retirement after eight years. I shall follow it. And a few more precedents will oppose the obstacle of habit to any one after awhile who shall endeavor to extend his term. Perhaps it may beget a disposition to establish it by an amendment of the Constitution. I believe I am doing right, therefore, in pursuing my principle. I had determined to declare my intention, but I have consented to be silent on the opinion of friends, who think it best not to put a continuance out of my power in defiance of all circumstances. There is, however, but one circumstance which could engage my acquiescence in another election; to wit, such a division about a successor, as might bring in a monarchist. But that circumstance is impossible.—To JOHN TAYLOR. iv, 565. FORD ED., viii, 339. (W., Jan. 1805.)

8428. — — —. If some period be not fixed, either by the Constitution or by practice, to the services of the First Magistrate in his office, though nominally elective, will, in fact, be for life; and that will soon degenerate into an inheritance.—To MR. WEAVER. v, 89. (W., June 1807.)

8429. — — —. That there are in our country a great number of characters entirely equal to the management of its affairs, cannot be doubted. Many of them, indeed, have not had opportunities of making themselves known to their fellow citizens; but many have had, and the only difficulty will be to choose among them. These changes are necessary, too, for the security of republican government.—To MR. WEAVER. v, 89. (W., June 1807.)

8431. THIRD TERM, Duty and.—That I should lay down my charge at a proper season, is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully.—To MR. WEAVER. v, 88. (W., June 1807.)

8432. — — —. Having myself highly approved the example of an illustrious predecessor, in voluntarily retiring from a trust, which, if too long continued in the same hands, might become a subject of reasonable uneasiness and apprehension, I could not mistake my own duty when placed in a similar situation.—R. to A. CONNECTICUT REPUBLICANS. viii, 140. (1808.)

8433. THIRD TERM, Irksome.—At the end of my present term, of which two years are yet to come, I propose to retire from public life, and to close my days on my patrimony of Monticello, in the bosom of my family. I have hitherto enjoyed uniform health; but the weight of public service begins to be too heavy for me, and I long for the enjoyment of rural life, among my books, my farms and my family. Having performed my quadragesima stipendia, I am entitled to my discharge, and should be sorry, indeed, that others should be sooner sensible than myself when I ought to ask it. I have, therefore, requested my fellow citizens to think of a successor for me, to whom I shall deliver the public concerns with greater joy than I received them. I have the consolation, too, of having added nothing to my private fortune, during my public service, and of retiring with hands as clean as they are empty.—To COMTE DIODATI. v, 62. (W., March 1807.)

8434. THIRD TERM, Jefferson urged to accept.—I am panting for retirement, but am as yet nearly two years from that goal. The general solicitations I have received to continue another term give me great consolation, but considerations public as well as private determine me inflexibly on that measure.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. FORD ED, ix, 67. (W., May 1807.)

8435. THIRD TERM, Massachusetts and.—I derive great personal consolation from the assurances in your friendly letter, that the electors of Massachusetts would still have viewed me with favor as a candidate for a third Presidential term. But the duty of retirement is so strongly impressed on my mind, that it is impossible for me to think of that.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. v, 252. (W., March 1808.)

8436. THIRD TERM, Opposed to.—I am for responsibilities at short periods, seeing neither reason nor safety in making public functionaries independent of the nation for life, or even for long terms of years. On this principle I prefer the Presidential term of four years, to that of seven years, which I myself had at first suggested, annexing to it, however, ineligibility forever after; and I wish it were now annexed to the second quadrennial election of President.—To JAMES MARTIN. vi, 213. FORD ED, ix, 430. (M., Sep. 1813.)

8437. THIRD TERM, Physical decline and.—My determination to retire is the result of mature reflections, and on various considerations. Not the least weighty of these is that a consciousness that a decline of physical faculties cannot leave those mental entirely unimpaired; and it will be happy for me if I am the first who shall become sensible of it. As to a successor, there never will be a time that it will not produce some difficulty, and never less, I believe, than at present. That some of the federalists should prefer my continuance to the uncertainty of a successor, I can readily believe. There are among them men of candor, who do not join in the clamor and concenmation of everything, nor pretend that even chance never throws us on a right measure. There are some who know me personally, and who give a credit to my intentions, which they deny to my understanding; some who may fear a successor, preferring a military glory of a nation to the prosperity and happiness of its individuals. But to the mass of that political sect, it is not the less true, the 4th of March, 1809, will be a day of jubilee, but it will be a day of greater joy to me. I never did them an act of injustice, nor failed in any duty to them imposed by my office.—To WILLIAM H. SHORT. FORD ED, ix, 50. (W., May 1807.)

8438. THIRD TERM, Precedent against.—The reeligibility of the President for life [in the new Constitution], I quite disapproved.* My fears of that feature were founded on the importance of the office, on the fierce contentions it will most likely excite between ourselves, if continuable for life, and the dangers of interference, either with money or arms, by foreign nations, to whom the choice of an American President might become interesting. Examples of this abounded in history; in the case of the Roman Emperors, for instance; of the Popes, while of any significance; of the German Emperors; the Kings of Poland and the Deys of Barbary. I had observed, too, in the Feudal history, and in the recent instance, particularly, of the Stadtholder of Holland, how easily offices, or tenures for life, slide into inheritances. My wish, therefore, was, that the President should be elected for seven years, and be ineligible afterwards. This term I thought sufficient to enable him, with the concurrence of the Legislature, to carry through and establish any system of improvement he should propose for the general good. But the practice adopted, I think is better, allowing his continuance for eight years, with a liability to be dropped at half way of the term, making that a period of probation. That his continuance should be restrained to seven years, was the opinion of the Convention at an earlier stage of its session, when it voted that term, by a majority of eight against two, and by a simple majority that he should be ineligible a second time. This opinion was confirmed by the House so late as July 26, referred to the Committee of Detail, reported favorably by them, and changed to the present form by final vote, on the last day but one only of their session.* Of this change, three States expressed their disapprobation; New York, by recommending on amendment, that the President should not be eligible a third time, and Virginia and North Carolina that he should not be capable of serving more than eight, in any term of sixteen years; and although this amendment has not been made in form, yet practice seems to have established it. The example of four Presidents voluntarily retiring at the end of their eighth year, and the progress of public opinion, that the principle is salutary, have given it in practice the force of precedent and usage; insomuch, that, should a President consent to be a candidate for a third election, I trust he would be rejected, on this demonstration of ambitious views.—Autobiography. i, 79. Ford ed., i, 109. (1821.)

* This is an evident error. On September 4th, the committee of eleven reported a clause making the term four years, which was adopted by the convention on the 6th, and not altered thereafter.——NOTE IN FORD EDITION.

8439. THIRD TERM, Retirement and. — A retirement from the exercise of my present charge is equally for your good and my own happiness. R. to A. PENNSYLVANIA CITIZENS. v, 262. (W., 1808.)

8440. THIRD TERM, Rotation in office and. — I am sensible of the kindness of your rebuke on my determination to retire from office at a time when our country is laboring under difficulties truly great. But if the principle of rotation be a sound one, as I conceivably believe it to be with respect to this office, no pretext should ever be permitted to dispense with it, because there will be a time when real difficulties will not exist, and furnish a plausible pretext for dispensation. You suppose I am “in the prime of life for rule”, I am sensible I am not; and before I have so far declined as to become insensible of it, I think it right to put it out of my own power. I have the comfort, too, of knowing that the person whom the public choice has designated to receive the charge from me, is so eminently qualified as a safe depositary by the endowments of integrity, understanding, and experience. On a review, therefore, of my reasons for retirement, I think you cannot fail to approve them.—To HENRY GUEST. v, 407. (W., January 1809.)

8441. — — —. In no office can rotation be more expedient; and none less admits the indulgence of age.—R. to A. PHILADELPHIA CITIZENS. viii, 145. (1809.)

8442. THIRD TERM, Vermont and.— received the address of the Legislature of Vermont, bearing date the 5th of November, 1806, in which, with their approbation of the general course of my administration, they were so good as to express their desire that I would consent to be proposed again, to the public voice, on the expiration of my present term of office. Entertaining, as I do, for the Legislature of Vermont those sentiments of high respect which would have prompted an immediate answer, I was certain, nevertheless, they would approve a delay which had for its object to avoid a premature agitation of the public mind, on a subject so interesting as the election of the Chief Magistrate. That I should lay down my charge at a proper period, is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will, in fact, become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance. Believing that a representative government, responsible at short intervals of election, is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office. Truth, also, requires me to add, that I am sensible of that decline which advancing years bring on; and feeling their physical, I ought not to lose my mental effect. Happy if I am the first to perceive and to obey this admonition of nature, and to solicit a retreat from cares too great for the wearied faculties of age.—R. to A. VERTON LEGISLATURE. viii, 121. (Dec. 1807.)

THRESHING MACHINE.—See Inventions.

8443. TIFFIN (H. D.), Fidelity.—I have seen with the greatest satisfaction that among those who have distinguished themselves by their fidelity to their country, on the occasion of the enterprise of Mr. Burr, yourself and the Legislature of Ohio have been the most eminent. The promptitude and energy displayed by your State have been as honorable to itself as salutary to its sister States; and in declaring that you have deserved well of your country. I do but express the grateful sentiment of every faithful citizen in it. The hand of the people has given the mortal blow to a conspiracy which, in other countries, would have called for an appeal to armies, and has proved that government can be strongest of which every man feels himself a part. It is in your humiliation, too, of the importance of preserving to the State authorities all that vigor which the Constitution foresaw would be necessary, not only for their own safety, but for that of the whole.—To Governor H. D. TIFFIN. v, 37. Ford ed., ix, 21. (W., 1807.)

8444. TIME, Waste of. — Determine never to be idle. No person will have occasion to complain of him who wastes not any. It is wonderful how much may be done, if we are always doing.—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. Ford ed., iv, 387. (Mar. 1787.)

8445. TITLE, President's. — The Senate and Representatives differed about the title of the President. The former wanted to style him, “His Highness, George Washington, President of the United States, and Protector of Their Liberties”. The latter insisted, and prevailed, to give no title but that of office, to wit, “George Washington, President of the United States”. I hope the terms of Excellency, Honor, Worship, Esquire, forever disappear from among us, from that moment. I wish that of Mr. would follow them.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. iii, 88. (P., 1789.)
8446. ——. The President’s title, as proposed by the Senate, was the most superlatively ridiculous thing I ever heard of.—To James Madison. Ford ed., v, 104. (P., 1789.)

8447. ——. I will presume to suggest to Mr. [John Quincy] Adams the question whether he should not send back Onis’s letters in which he has the impudence to qualify you by the term “His Excellency”? An American gentleman in Europe can rank with the first nobility because we have no titles which stick him at any particular place in their line. So the President of the United States, under that designation ranks with the emperors and kings; but add Mr. Onis’s courtesy of “His Excellency” and he is then on a level with Mr. Onis himself, with the governors of provinces, and even of every petty fort in Europe, or the colonies.—To President Monroe. Ford ed., x, 123. (M., 1819.)

8448. TITLES, Adulatory.—The new government has shown genuine dignity, in my opinion, in exploding adulatory titles. They are the offerings of abject baseness, and nourish that degrading vice in the people.—To James Madison. iii, 100. Ford ed., v, 112. (P., 1789.)

8449. TITLES, Granting.—The Administrator [of Virginia] shall not possess the prerogative * * * of creating dignities or granting rights of precedence.—Proposed Va. Constitution. Ford ed., ii, 19. (June 1776.)

8450. TITLES, Hereditary.—[The proposed new States] shall admit no person to be a citizen, who holds any hereditary title.—Western Territory Report. Ford ed., iii, 409. (1784.)

8451. ——. The clause respecting hereditary honors was struck out, not from an apprehension of such honors, but because it was thought an improper place to encounter them.—To James Madison. Ford ed., iii, 471. (A., April 1784.)

8452. TOBACCO, Culture of.—It is a culture productive of infinite wretchedness. Those employed in it are in a continual state of exertion beyond the power of human nature to support. Little food of any kind is raised by them; so that the men and animals on these farms are badly fed, and the earth is rapidly impoverished.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 407. Ford ed., iii, 271. (1782.)

8453. TOBACCO, Differential duties.—The difference of duty on tobacco carried to France in French and American bottoms, has excited great uneasiness. We presume the National Assembly must have hurried into the measure without being allowed time to reflect on its consequences. A moment’s consideration must convince anybody, that no nation upon earth ever submitted to so enormous an assault on the transportation of their own produce. Retaliation, to be equal, will have the air of extreme severity and hostility.—To M. La Motte. iii, 289. (Pa., 1791.)

8454. ——. I take for granted the National Assembly were surprised into the measure by persons whose avarice blinded them to the consequences, and hope it will be repealed before our legislature shall be obliged to act on it. So much attack on our carriage of our productions, and such a retaliation would ill prepare the minds of the two nations for a liberal treaty as wished for by the real friends of both.—To Joseph Fenwick. Ford ed., v, 380. (Pa., 1791.)

8456. TOBACCO, Monopoly in France.—I take the liberty of offering to your attention some papers * * * written by * * * merchants of L’Orient, and others, some of whom are citizens of the United States, and all of them concerned in the trade between the two countries. This paper has been carried as a complaint to the government, and the merchants of both countries are carrying on their commerce of exchange. A late contract by the Farm has, in a great measure, fixed in a single mercantile house the supplies of tobacco necessary for this country. This arrangement found the established merchants with some tobacco on hand, some on the seas coming to them, and more still due. By the papers now enclosed, it seems that there are six thousand four hundred and eight hogheads in the single port of Lyons. Whether the government will interfere, as to articles furnished by the merchants after they had notice of the contract before mentioned, must depend on principles of policy. But those of justice seem to urge that, for commodities furnished before such notice, the Government may wind up without loss, the transactions in which the new arrangement found them actually engaged.—To Count de Vergennes. i, 547. (P., 1786.)

8457. ——. My hopes on that subject (suppression of the monopoly in the purchase of tobacco in France), are not desperate, but neither are they flattering.—To T. Pleasants. i, 563. (P., 1786.)

8458. ——. My letters from New York inform me that * * * the monopoly of the purchase of tobacco for France, which had been obtained by Robert Morris’s, had this summer come to an end. He had been able to reduce the price in America from 40 to 22 6. lawful the hundred weight, and all other merchants being deprived of that medium of remittance, the commerce between America and that country, so far as it depended on that article, which was very capitably too, was absolutely ceasing. An order has been obtained, obliging the Farmers General to purchase from such other merchants as shall offer fifteen thousand of hogheads of tobacco at thirty-four, thirty-six and thirty-eight livres the hundred, according to the quality, and to grant to the sellers in other respects the same terms as they had granted to Robert Morris. As this agreement with Morris is the basis of this order, I send you some copies of it, which I will thank you to give to any American (not British) merchants in London who may be in that line. During the year this contract has subsisted, Virginia and Maryland have lost £400,000 by the reduction of the price of their tobacco.—To John Adams, i, 586. Ford ed., iv, 252. (P., 1786.)

8459. — — . During the former government of France (the monarchy), our tobacco was under a monopoly, but paid no duties. * * * The first National Assembly * * * emancipated tobacco from its monopoly, but subjected it to duties of eighteen livres, fifteen sous the quintal, carried in their own vessels, and five livres carried in ours—a difference more than equal to the freight of the article.—Foreign Commerce Report, vii, 540. Ford ed., iv, 474. (Dec. 1793.) See Monopoly.

8460. TOBACCO, Oppressions by merchants.—Long experience has proved to us that there never was an instance of a man's getting out of debt, who was once in the hands of a tobacco merchant, and bound to consign his tobacco to him. It is the most delusive of all snares. The merchant feeds the inclination of his customer to be credited till he gets the burden of debt increased, that he cannot throw it off at once; he then begins to give him less for his tobacco, and ends with giving him what he pleases for it.—To Mrs. Paradise. Ford ed., iv, 288. (P., 1786.)

8462. TOLERATION, Political.—I feel extraordinary gratification in addressing this letter to you, with whom shades of difference in political sentiment have not prevented the interchange of good opinion, nor cut off the friendly offices of society and good correspondence. This political tolerance is the more valued by me, who consider social harmony as the first of human felicities, and the happiest moments, those which are given to the effusions of the heart.—To Governor John Henry. Ford ed., iii, 159. (P., 1797.)

8463. — — — During the contest of opinion [Presidential election] through which we have passed, the animation of discussion and of exertions has sometimes worn an aspect which might impose on strangers, unused to think freely, and to speak and to write what they think; but, this being now decided by the voice of the nation, announced, according to the rules of the Constitution, all will, of course, arrange themselves under the will of the law, and unite in common efforts for the common good. All, too, will hear in mind this sacred principle, that, though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will, to be rightful, must be reasonable; that the minority possess their equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate which would be oppression. Let us, then, fellow-citizens, unite with one heart and one mind; let us restore to social intercourse that harmony and affection without which liberty and even life itself are but dreary things. And let us reflect, that, having banished from our land that religious intolerance under which man—kind so long bled and suffered, we have yet gained little, if we countenance a political intolerance as despotic, as wicked, and capable of as bitter and bloody persecutions. During the threes and convulsions of the ancient world; during the agonizing spasms of infuriated man, seeking, through blood and slaughter, his long-lost liberty, it was not wonderful that the agitation of the billows should reach even this distant and peaceful shore; that this should be more felt and feared by some, and less by others; that this should divide opinions as to measures of safety. But every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle. We have called by different names brethren of the same principle. We are all republicans; we are all federalists. If there be any among us who would wish to dissolve this Union, or to change its republican form, let them stand, undisturbed, as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it. * * * Let us, then, with courage and confidence, pursue our own federal and republican principles—our attachment to our Union and representative government.—First Inaugural Address. viii, 2. Ford ed., viii, 2. (1801.)

8464. TONTINE, Raising money by.—The raising money by Tontine, more practiced on the continent of Europe than in England, is liable to the same objection [as funding], of encroachment on the independent rights of posterity; because the annuities not expiring gradually, with the lives on which they rest, but all on the death of the last survivor only, they will, of course, overpass the term of a generation, and the more probably as the subjects on whose lives the annuities depend, are generally chosen of the ages, constitutions, and occupations most favorable to long life.—To J.W. Eppes. vi, 197. Ford ed., ix, 397. (P.F., 1813.)

8465. TORIES, Confederacy and.—The Tories would, at all times, have been glad to see the confederacy dissolved, even by particles at a time, in hopes of their attaching themselves again to Great Britain.—Answer to M. de Meunier. ix, 251. Ford ed., iv, 156. (P., 1786.)

8466. TORIES, Definition of.—A tory has been properly defined to be a traitor in thought, but not in deed. The only description by which the laws have endeavored to come at them, was that of non-jurors, of persons refusing to take the oath of fidelity to the State. Notes on Virginia. viii, 396. Ford ed., iii, 260. (1782.)

8467. TORIES, Nature and.—Nature has made some men monarchists and Tories by their constitution, and some, of course, there always will be.—To Albert Gallatin. vii, 80. Ford ed., x, 92. (M., 1817.)

8468. TORIES, Taxation of.—Persons of this description were at one time subjected to double taxation, at another to treble, and lastly were allowed retribution, and placed on a level with good citizens.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 396. Ford ed., iii, 260. (1782.)
8469. TORIES, Whigs and.—It has ever appeared to me, that the difference between the whig and the Tory of England is, that the whig deduces his rights from the Anglo-Saxon source, and the Tory from the Norman.

—To John Cartwright, vii, 350. (M., 1824.)

8470. TORPEDOES, Defensive value.—I consider your torpedoes as very valuable means of the defense of harbors, and have no doubt that we should adopt them to a considerable degree. Not that I go the whole length (as I believe you do) of considering them as solely to be relied on. Neither a nation nor those entrusted with its affairs, could be justifiable, however sanguine its expectations, in trusting solely to an engine not yet sufficiently tried, under all the circumstances which may occur, and against which we know not as yet what means of parrying may be devised. If, indeed, the mode of attaching them to the cable of a ship be the only one proposed, modes of prevention cannot be difficult. But I have ever looked to the submarine boat as most to be depended on for attaching them, and though I should not be in a position to show you any particular applications, I am in hopes it is not abandoned as impracticable. I should wish to see a corps of young men trained to this service. It would belong to the engineers if at hand, but being not, I suppose we must have a corps of mechanics, to practice and use them.—To Robert Fulton. v, 165. Ford ed., ix, 125. (M., Aug. 1807.)

8471. ——. Although no public servant could justify the raising the safety of an important sea-port, solely on untried means of defense, yet I have great confidence in those proposed by you as additional to the ordinary means.—To Robert Fulton. v, 341. (M., Aug. 1808.)

8472. TORPEDOES, Experiments with.—Mr. Fulton writes to me under a great desire to prepare a decisive experiment of his torpedo at Washington, for the meeting of Congress. This means of harbor-defense has acquired such respectability, from its apparent merit, from the attention shewn it by other nations, and from our own experiments at New York, as to entitle it to a full experiment from us. He asks only two workmen for one month from us, which he estimates at $130 only. But should it cost considerably more I should really be for granting it, and would accord ngly recommend it to you. This sum is a mere trifle as an encroachment on our appropriation.—To Robert Smith. v, 337. (M., Aug. 1808.)

8473. TORPEDOES, Success of.—Your torpedoes will be to cities what vaccination has been to mankind. It extinguishes their greatest danger.—To Robert Fulton. v, 517. (M., 1810.)

8474. TURGURE, Forbidden.—The General Assembly shall not have power to * * * prescribe torture in any case whatever.—Proposed Va. Constitution. viii, 445. Ford ed., iii, 325. (1783.)

8475. TURMOIL, In France.—Nor should we wonder at * * * [the] pressure [for a fixed constitution in 1788-9] when we consider the monstrous abuses of power under which * * * [the French] people were ground to powder; when we pass in review * * * the atrocities of the rack.—Autobiography. i, 86. Ford ed., i, 118. (1821.)

8476. TOULOUSE (Archbishop of), Character of.—The Archbishop of Toulouse is made minister principal, a virtuous, patriotic, and able character.—To John Adams. ii, 258. (P., 1787.)

8477. TOULOUSE (Archbishop of), Garde des sceaux and.—The Garde des sceaux is considered as the Archbishop of Toulouse’s bull dog, braving danger like that animal. His talents do not pass mediocrity.—To James Madison. ii, 444. Ford ed., v, 43. (P., 1788.)

8478. TOULOUSE (Archbishop of), Influence with Queen.—It may not be unconstructive to give you the origin and nature of his influence with the Queen [Marie Antoinette]. When the Duke de Choiseul proposed the marriage of the Dauphin with this lady, he thought it proper to send a person to Vienna to perfect her in the language. He asked his friends which of the Archbishops he should recommend to him a proper person. He recommended a certain abbé. The abbé, from his first arrival in Vienna, either tutored by his patron, or prompted by gratitude, impressed on the Queen’s mind the exalted talents and merit of the Archbishop, and continually represented him as the only man fit to be placed at the helm of affairs. On his return to Paris being retained near the person of the Queen, he kept him constantly in her view. The Archbishop was named of the Assemblee des Notables, had occasion enough there to prove his talents. Count de Vergennes, his great enemy, dying unfortunately, the Queen got him into place. He uses the abbé even yet for instilling all his notions into her mind.—To John Jay. ii, 310. Ford ed., iv, 463. (P., 1787.)

8479. ——. The Archbishop continues well with his patroness [Marie Antoinette]. Her object is a close connection with us. I suppose he convinces her that peace will furnish the best occasion of cementing that connection.—To John Jay. ii, 310. Ford ed., iv, 463. (P., 1787.)

8480. TOULOUSE (Archbishop of), Minister.—The Archbishop of Toulouse * * * is a good and patriotic minister for peace, and very capable in the department of finance. At least he is so in theory. I have heard his talents for execution censured.—To John Jay. ii, 294. (P., 1787.)

8481. TOULOUSE (Archbishop of), Talents.—That he has imposing talents, and patriotic dispositions, I think is certain. Good judges think him a theorist only, lité’ acquainté with the details of best laws, and spoiling all his plans by a bungled execution.—To John Jay. ii, 310. Ford ed., iv, 464. (P., 1787.)

TOWNS.—See Ward Government.

8482. TRACY (Comte de), Books of.—Destutt Tracy is, in my judgment, the ablest living writer on intellectual subjects, or the operations of the understanding. His three octavo volumes on Ideology, which constitute the foundation of what he has since written. I have not entirely read; because I am not fond of reading what is merely abstract, and unappplied immediately to some useful science. Bonaparte, with his repeated derisions of Ideologists (squeinting at this author), has by this time felt that true wisdom does not lie in mere practice without principle. The next work [they] continue to call "Principles of Government," never published in the original, because not safe; but translated and published in Philadelphia, yet without the author's name. He has since permitted his name to be mentioned. Although called a commentary, it is, in truth, an elementary work. The principles of government, comprised in about three hundred pages octavo. He has lately published a third work, on "Political Economy," comprising the whole subject within about the same compass; in which all its principles are demonstrated with the greatest clearness, and, like the other, ever using a superfluous word. I have procured this to be translated, and have been four years endeavoring to get it printed; but as yet, without success. In the meantime, the author has published the original in France, which I thought unsafe while Bonaparte was in power.

He has his fourth and last work now in the press at Paris, closing as he conceives, the circle of metaphysical sciences. This work, which is on ethics, I have not seen, but suspect I shall derive from it in its first principles, not in its deduction. Another work from his other works that he adopts the principle of Hobbes, that justice is founded in contract solely, and does not result from the construction of man.—To John Adams. vii. 38. (M., 1816.)

8483. Tracy comprehends under the word "Ideology" all the subjects which the French term Morale, as the corollary to Physique. His works on Logic, Government, Political Economy and Morality, he considers as making up the circle of ideological subjects, or of those which are within the scope of the understanding, and not of the senses. His Logic occupies exactly the ground of Locke's work on the Understanding. The translation of that on Political Economy is now printing; but it is no translation of mine. I have only had the correction of it, which was, indeed, very laborious. Le premier jet having been by some one who understood neither French nor English, it was impossible to make it more faithful. But what a valuable work!—To John Adams. vii. 55. Ford ed., x. 72. (M., 1817.)

8484. TRACY (Comte de), Infirmary of.—The Tracy I mentioned to you is the one connected by marriage with Lafayette's family. * * * He writes me that he is become blind, and so infirm that he is no longer able to compose anything; so that we are to consider his works as now closed.—To John Adams. vii. 43. (M., 1816.)

8486. TRADE, Destroying.—He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by combining with others to subject us to a foreign jurisdiction, giving his assent to their pretended acts of legislation * * * for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world.—Declaration of Independence as Drawn by Jefferson.

8488. TRADE, Monopolizing.—It is not just that the colonies should be required to oblige themselves to other contributions while Great Britain possesses a monopoly of their trade. This of itself lays them under heavy contribution. To demand, therefore, an additional contribution in the form of a tax is to demand the double of their equal portion. If we contribute equally with other parts of the empire, let us, equally with them, enjoy free commerce with the whole world; but while the restrictions on our trade shut the resources of wealth, is it just, we should bear all other burdens equally with those to whom every resource is open?—Reply to Lord North's Proposition. Ford ed., i. 479. (July 1775.)

8489. TRADE, Restraining.—The proposition [of Lord North] is altogether unsatisfactory * * * because he does not propose to repeal the several acts of Parliament, passed for the purposes of restraining the trade * * * of the Eastern colonies.—Reply to Lord North's Proposition. Ford ed., i. 480. (July 1775.)

8490. TRADE, Restrictions on.—Some of the colonies having thought proper to continue the administration of their government in the name and under the authority of his Majesty, King Charles I. whom, notwithstanding his late deposition by the Commonwealth of England, they continued in the sovereignty of their State, the Parliament for the Commonwealth, took the same in high offence, and assumed upon themselves the power of prohibiting their trade with all other parts of the world, except the Island of Great Britain. This arbitrary act, however, they soon recalled, and by solemn treaty entered into on the 12th day of March, 1651, between the said Commonwealth, by their Commissioners, and the Colony of Virginia by their House of Burgesses, it was expressly stipulated by the eighteenth article of the said treaty, that they should have "free trade as the people of England do enjoy to all places and with all nations, according to the laws of that Commonwealth". But * * * upon the restoration of his Majesty, King Charles II., their rights of free commerce fell once more a victim to arbitrary power; and by several acts of his reign, as well as of some of his successors, the trade of the Colonies was laid under such restrictions, as show what hopes they might form from the justice of a British Parliament, were its uncontrolled power admitted over these States.—Rights of British America. i. 127. Ford ed., i. 432. (1774.)

8491. We cannot, my lord, close with the terms of that resolution [Lord North's conciliatory Proposition] because on our agreeing to contribute our proportion towards the common defence, they do not propose to lay open to us a free trade with all the world: whereas, to us it appears just that those who bear equally the burdens of government should equally participate of its benefits; either be contented with the monopoly of our trade, which brings greater loss to us and benefit to them than the amount of our proportional contributions to the common defence; or, if the latter be preferred, relinquish the former, and not propose, by holding both, to extract from us double contributions.—Address to LORD DUNMORE. FORD ed., i, 457. (R., 1775.)

8492. TRADE, Right to.—No man has a natural right to the trade of a money lender but he who has the money to lend.—To J. W. EFFES. vi, 141. FORD ed., ix, 294. (M., 1813.)

8493. TRADE MARKS, Recommended.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred by the House of Representatives the petition of Samuel Breck and others, proprietors of a sail-cloth manufactory in Boston, praying that they may have the exclusive privilege of using particular marks for designating the sail-cloth of their manufactory, has had the same under consideration, and thereupon reports:
That it would, in his opinion, contribute to fidelity in the execution of manufactures, to secure to every manufactory an exclusive right to some mark on its wares, proper to itself.
This should be done by general laws, extending equal right to every case to which the authority of the Legislature should be competent. These cases are of divided jurisdiction: Manufactures made and consumed within a State being subject to State legislation, while those which are exported to foreign nations, or to another State, or into the Indian Territory, are alone within the legislation of the General Government. That it will, therefore, be reasonable for the General Government to provide in this behalf by law for those cases of manufacture generally, and those only which relate to commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. This may be done by permitting the owner of every manufactory, to enter in the records of the court of the district wherein his manufactory is, the name with which he chooses to mark or designate his wares, and rendering it penal in others to put the same mark to any other wares.— Report on Trade Marks. vii, 565. (December 1791.)

8494. TRANQUILLITY, Basis of.—

Tranquility of mind depends much on ourselves, and greatly on due reflection "how much pain have cost us the evils which have never happened."—To WILLIAM SHORT. vi, 402.
(M., 1814.)

8495. TRANQUILLITY, Love of.—I cherish tranquility too much to suffer political things to enter my mind at all.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iv, 106. FORD ed., v, 510. (M., May 1794.)

8496. TRANQUILLITY, National.—

That love of order and obedience to the laws, which so remarkably characterize the citizens of the United States, are sure pledges of internal tranquility.—To BENJAMIN WALKING. iv, 378. (W., 1801.)

8497. TRANQUILLITY, Old age and.—

Tranquility is the old man's milk. I go to enjoy it in a few days, and to exchange the roar and tumult of bulls and bears, for the prattle of my grandchildren and senile rest.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. iv, 191. FORD ed., vii, 155. (Pa., 1797.)

8498. ——. My object at present is peace and tranquillity, neither doing nor saying anything to be quoted, or to make me the subject of newspaper disquisitions.—To DAVID HOWELL. v, 554. (M., 1810.)

8499. ——. The summum bonum with me is now truly epicurean, ease of body and tranquillity of mind.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi
143. (M., 1813.)

8500. ——. Tranquility is the summum bonum of age. I wish, therefore, to off-fend no man's opinion, nor to draw disquieting animadversions on my own, While duty required it, I met opposition with a firm and fearless spirit. But loving peace and is my individual relations with them, I pray to be permitted without to depart in their peace; and like the super-nannuated soldier, " quadragenis stibendis enertitis " to hang my arms on the post.—To SPEN-CER ROANE. vii, 136. FORD ed., x, 142. (P.F., 1810.)

8501. ——. There is a time for things; for advancing age for retiring; for a Sabbath of rest as well as for days of labor, and surely that Sabbath has arrived for one near entering on his 80th year. Tranquility is the summum bonum of that age. I wish now for quiet, to withdraw from the broils of the world, to soothe the eumities, and to die in the peace and good will of all mankind.—To THOMAS HIBBARD THREAT. FORD ed., x, 185. (M., 1821.)

8502. ——. Tranquility is the last and sweetest asylum of age.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 211. FORD ed., x, 218. (M., 1821.)

8503. ——. At the age of eighty, tranquility is the greatest good of life, and the strongest of our desires that of dying in the good will of all mankind.—To JAMES SMITH.
vii, 270. (M., 1822.)

— TRANSMIGRATION OF SOULS.—

See SOULS, Transmigration of.

8504. TRAVEL, Advice as to.—The people you will naturally see the most of will be tavern keepers, valets de place, and postillions.
These are the hackneyed rascals of every Country. Of course they must never be considered when we calculate the national character.—
TRAVELING HINTS. x, 404. (1788.)

8505. ——. To pass once along a public road through a country, and in one direction only, to put up at its tavern, and get into conversation with the idle, drunken individuals who pass their time lounging in these taverns, is not the way to know a country, its inhabitants, or manner.—To PROFESSOR EBELEING.
FORD ed., vi, 45. (1793.)

8506. TRAVEL, Philanthropy and.—

From the first olive fields of Pierrelatte to the orangeries of Hières, has been continued rupture to me. I have often wished for you [Lafayette]. I think you have not made this journey. It is a pleasure you have to come, and an improvement to be added to the many you have already made. It will be a great comfort to you to know, from your own inspection, the condition of all the provinces of your own country, and it will be interesting to them, at some future day, to be known to you. This is, perhaps, the only moment of your life in which you can acquire that knowledge. And to do it most effectually, you must be absolutely incognito; you must ferret the people out of their hovels as I have done, look into their kettles, eat their bread, loll on their beds under pretext of resting yourself, but in fact to find if they are soft. You will feel a sublime pleasure in the course of this investigation, and a subliminer hereafter, when you shall be able to apply your knowledge to the softening of their beds, or the throwing a morsel of meat into their kettle of vegetables.—To Marquis de Lafayette. ii, 136. (Ne., 1787.)

8507. I am never satiated with rambling through the fields and farms [in France], examining the culture and cultivators, with a degree of curiosity which makes some take me to be a fool, and others to be much wiser than I am.—To Marquis de Lafayette. ii, 135. (Ne., 1787.)

8508. The politics of each country [is] well worth studying so far as respects internal affairs. Examine its influence on the happiness of the people. Take every possible occasion for entering into the houses of the laborers, and especially at the moments of the r repast; see what they eat, how they are clothed, whether they are obliged to work too hard; whether the government or their landlord from them an unjust proportion of their labor; on what footing stands the property they call their own, their personal liberty, &c., &c.—Travelling Hints, ix, 405. (1788.)

8509. Travel, Reflection during.—I think one travels more usefully when alone, because he reflects more.—To J. Bannister, Jr. ii, 151. (P., 1787.)

8510. Travel, Tours of Political.—With respect to the tour my friends to the north have proposed that I should make in that quarter, I have not made up a final opinion. The course of life which General Washington had run, civil and military, the services he had rendered, and the space he therefore occupied in the affections of his fellow citizens, take from his examples the weight of precedents for others; because no others can arrogate to themselves the claims which he had on the public heart. It is therefore not a new question, to be viewed under all the phases it may present. I confess that I am not reconciled to the idea of a Chief Magistrate parading himself through the several States, as an object of public good and a quest of applause which, to be valuable, should be purely voluntary. I had rather acquire silent good will by a faithful discharge of my duties, than owe expressions of it to my putting myself in the way of receiving them.—To James Sullivan. v, 101. Ford ed., iv, 77. (W., June 1807.)

8511. A journey to Boston or Portsmouth, after I shall be a private citizen, would much better harmonize with my feelings, as well as duties; and, if I had not, I would give no claims to an extension of it. I should see my friends, too, more at our mutual ease, and be left more exclusively to their society.—To James Sullivan. v, 102. Ford ed., iv, 78. (W., June 1807.)

8513. Travel, Young men and.—Young men, who travel, * * do not acquire that wisdom for which a previous foundation is requisite, by repeated and just observations at home. The glare of pomp and pleasure is analogous to the motion of the blood; 't absorbs all their affection and attention, and they are torn from it as from the only good in this world, and return to their home as to a place of exile and condemnation. Their eyes are forever turned back to the object they have lost, and its recollection poisons the residue of their lives. * A habit of dleness, an inability to apply themselves to business acquired, and renders them useless to themselves and their country. These observations are founded in experience. There is no place where your pursuit of knowledge will be so little obstructed by foreign objects as in your own country, nor any, wherein the virtues of the heart will be less exposed to be weakened. Be good, be learned, and be industrious, and you will not want the aid of travelling to render you precious to your country, dear to your friends, happy within yourself.—To Peter Carr. ii, 241. Ford ed., iv, 433. (P., 1787.)

8514. Travellers, Entertaining.—It is the general interest of our country that strangers of distinction passing through should be received and acquainted with its best citizens, and those most qualified to give favorable impressions of it.—To Mr. Hite. iv, 146. (M., 1796.)

8515. Treason, Executions for.—It may be mentioned as a proof, both of the lenity of our government, and unanimity of its inhabitants, that though this [Revolutionary] war has now raged near seven years, not a single execution for treason has taken place. —Notes on Virginia. viii, 306. Ford ed., iii, 260. (1782.)

8516. Treason, Patriotism vs.—Treason, when real, merits the highest punishment. But most codes extend their definitions of treason to acts not really against one's country. They do not distinguish between acts against the government, and acts against the oppressions of the government. The latter are virtues; yet have furnished more victims to the executioner than the former. Real treasons are rare; oppressions frequent. The unsuccessful strugglers against tyranny have been the chief martyrs of treason laws in all countries. Reformation of government with our neighbors [Lang] as much wanting now as reformation of men is, or ever was anywhere. We should not wish then to give up to the executioner the patriot who fails, and flees to us.—Report on Spanish Convention. iii, 353. Ford ed., v, 483. (1792.)

8517. Treason, Punishment for.—Treasons, taking the simulated with the real, are sufficiently punished by exile.—Report on Spanish Convention. iii, 353. Ford ed., v, 483. (1792.)

8519. TREAISON, Suspected.—Having received information that divers citizens of this Commonwealth [Virginia], in the counties of James and York, have lately committed acts some of which amount to high treason, and others to misprision of treason; and that some, though they may have been able to disguise and conceal their transactions as that legal evidence cannot be obtained by which they may be subjected to prosecution.* * * yet have so conducted themselves as to furnish the most pregnant circumstances of suspicion that they have been guilty of those offences, or are disaffected to the Independence of the United States, and will, whenever they shall have opportunity, aid or advise the measures of the public enemy, which persons, in the critical situation of this Commonwealth, it is indispensably necessary to punish for their crimes by way of example to others and to disable from doing mischief; I must, therefore, * * * desire and authorize you to make enquiry into the premises, and where you shall have probable cause to believe that any persons have been guilty of treason, or misprision of treason; that there is legal evidence to commit them thereof; and that an examining court can be had on them in the county where the offence was committed before there shall be any danger of rescue by the enemy, you have them delivered to the warrant of a justice of the peace, in order that they may be prosecuted in the usual forms of law; and that you aid in their safe conveyance to the public jail in Richmond, if they be ordered to be conveyed. But where you shall be of opinion that legal evidence cannot be obtained, that an examining court cannot be procured in the county before there will be danger of a rescue by the enemy, and that there are pregnant circumstances of suspicion that they have been guilty of treason, or misprision of treason, or where there shall be pregnant causes of suspicion that persons in these counties are disaffected to the Independence of the United States; and when occasion serves, aid or advise the operations of the enemy; that in those cases, you apprehend such persons, and send them in safe custody to the jail of Richmond county. * * * They shall be treated by those into whose hands they shall be committed with no insult or rudeness unnecessary for their safe custody.—To COLONEL JAMES INNES. FORD ED., iii, 27. (R. May 1781.)

8520. TREAURY, Conduct of.—There is a point * * * on which I should wish to keep my eye, and to which I should aim to approach by every tack which previous arrangements force upon us. That is, to form into one consolidated mass all the moneys received into the treasury, and to the several expenditures, giving them a preference of payment according to the order in which they should be arranged. As for example 1. The interest of the public debt. 2. Such portions of the principal as are exigible. 3. The expenses of government. 4. Such other portions of principal as, though not exigible, we are still free to pay when we please. The last object might be made to take up the residuum of money remaining in the treasury at the end of every year, after the first first objects were complied with, and would be the barometer whereby to test the economy of the administration. It would furnish a simple measure by which every one could mete their merit, and by which every one could decide when taxes were deficient or superabundant.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 428. FORD ED., viii, 140. (W., 1802.)

8522. TREAURY, Necessity for.—Every circumstance we hear induces us to believe that it is the want of will, rather than of ability, to furnish contributions which keeps the public treasury so poor. The Algerines will probably do us the favor to produce a sense of the necessity of a public treasury and a public force on that element where it can never be dangerous. To DAVID HUMPHREYS. ii, 10. (P., 1786.)

8523. TREAURY, Organization of.—We shall now get rid of the commissioner of the internal revenue, and superintendent of stamps. It remains to amalgamate the comptroller and auditor into one, and reduce the register to a clerk of accounts; and then the organization will consist, as it should at first, of a keeper of money, a keeper of accounts, and the head of the department.—To ALBERT GALLATIN. iv, 429. FORD ED., viii, 141. (W., 1802.)

8525. TREATIES, Binding force of.—The moral duties which exist between individual and individual in a state of nature, accompany them into a state of society, and the aggregate of the duties of all the individuals composing the society constitutes the duties of that society towards any other; so that between society and society the same moral duties exist as did between the individuals composing them, while in an unassociated state, and their Maker not having released them from those duties on their

8526. ——. Compacts between nation and nation are obligatory on them by the same moral law which obliges individuals to observe their compacts. There are circumstances, however, which sometimes excuse the non-performance of contracts between man and man; so are there also between nation and nation. When performance, for instance, becomes impossible, non-performance is not immoral. So if performance becomes self-destructive to the party, the law of self-preservation overrules the laws of obligation in others. For the reality of these principles I appeal to the true fountains of evidence, the head and heart of every rational and honest man. It is there nature has written her moral laws, and where every man may read them for himself. He will never read there the permission to annul his obligations for a time, or forever, whenever they become “dangerous, useless, or disagreeable”, certainly not when merely useless or disagreeable, as seems to be said in an authority which has been quoted,* Vattel. 2. 197, and though he may, under certain degrees of danger, yet the danger must be imminent, and the degree great. Of these, it’s true, that nations are to be judges for themselves; since no nation has a right to sit in judgment over another. But the tribunal of our consciences remains, and that also of the opinion of the world. These will revise the sentence we pass in our own case, and as we respect these, we must see that in judging ourselves we have honestly done the part of impartial and rigorous judges.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 613. FORD ED., vi, 220. (1793.)

8527. ——. It is not the possibility of danger which absolves a party from his contract, for that possibility always exists, and in every case. * * * If possibilities would void contracts, there never could be a valid contract, for possibilities hang over everything. Obligation is not suspended till the danger is become real, and the moment of it so imminent, that we can no longer avoid decision without forever losing the opportunity to do it.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 614. FORD ED., vi, 222. (1793.)

8528. ——. I deny that the most explicit declaration made at this moment, that we acknowledge the obligation of the [French] treaties, could take from us the right of non-compliance at any future time, when compliance would involve us in great and inevitable danger.—OPINION ON FRENCH TREATIES. vii, 617. FORD ED., vi, 224. (1793.)

8530. TREATIES, Construction of.—Where the missionary of one government construes differently from that to which he is sent, the treaties and laws which are to form a common rule of action for both, it would be unjust in either to claim an exclusive right of construction. Each nation has an equal right to expound the meaning of their own rule; and reason and usage have established, in such cases, a convenient and well-understood train of proceeding. It is the right and duty of the foreign missionary to urge his own constructions, to support them with reasons, which may convince, and in terms of decency and respect which may reconcile the government of the country to a concurrence. It is the duty of that government to listen to his reasonings with attention and candor, and to yield to them when just. But if it shall still appear to them that reason and right are on their side, it follows of necessity, that exercising the sovereign powers of the country, they have a right to proceed on their own constructions and conclusions as to whatever is to be done within their limits. The minister then refers the case to his own government, asks new instructions, and, in the meantime, acquiesces in the authority of the country. His government examines his constructions, abandons them if wrong, insists on them if right, and the case then becomes a matter of negotiation between the two nations.—TO GOVERNEUR MORRIS. iv, 44. FORD ED., vi, 388. (Aug. 1793.)

8531. TREATIES, Embarrassing.—It is against our system to embarrass ourselves with treaties, or to entangle ourselves at all with the affairs of Europe.—To Philip Mazzei. iv, 553. (W., July 1804.)

8532. — — —. Our system is to have no treaties with any nation, as far as can be avoided. The treaty with England has, therefore, not been renewed, and all overtures for treaty with other nations have been declined. We believe, that with nations as with individuals, dealings may be carried on as advantageously, perhaps more so, while their continuance depends on a voluntary good treatment, as if fixed by a contract, which, when it becomes injurious to either, is made, by forced constructions, to mean what suits them, and becomes a cause of war instead of a bond of peace.—To Philip Mazzei. iv, 552. (W., 1804.)

8533. — — —. We are infinitely better off without treaties of commerce with any nation.—To President Madison. vi, 453. Ford ed., ix, 513. (M., March 1815.)

8534. TREATIES, Infractions of.—On the breach of any article of a treaty by the one party, the other has its election to declare it dissolved in all its articles, or to compensate itself by withholding execution of equivalent articles; or to waive notice of the breach altogether.—To George Hammond. iii, 301. Ford ed., vi, 33. (1792.)

8535. — — —. When one party breaks any stipulation of a treaty, the other is free to break it also, either in the whole, or in equivalent parts at its pleasure.—To George Hammond. iii, 424. Ford ed., vi, 64. (1792.)

8536. — — —. If, in withholding a compliance with any part of the treaties, we do it without just cause or compensation, we give to France a cause of war, and so become associated in it on the other side.—Opinion on French Treaties. vii, 618. Ford ed., vi, 225. (1793.)

8537. TREATIES, Laws of the land.—Treaties are legislative acts. A treaty is a law of the land. It differs from other laws only as it must have the consent of a foreign nation, being but a contract with respect to that nation. In all countries, I believe, except England, treaties are made by the legislative power; and there, also, if they touch the laws of the land, they must be approved by Parliament. * * * An act of Parliament was necessary to validate the American treaty of 1783.—Parliamentary Manual. ix, 80.

8538. TREATIES, Nations and.—I consider the people who constitute a society or nation as the source of all authority in that nation; as free to transact their common concerns by any agents they think proper; to change these agents individually, or the organization of them in form or function whenever they please; that all the acts done by those agents under the authority of the nation, are the acts of the nation, are obligatory on them and enure to their use, and can in no wise be annulled or affected by any change in the form of the government, or of the persons administering it.—Opinion on French Treaties. vii, 612. Ford ed., vi, 220. (April 1793.)

8539. — — —. The treaties between the United States and France were not treaties between the United States and Louis Capet, but between the two nations of America and France; and the nations remaining in existence, though both of them have since changed their forms of government, the treaties are not annulled by these changes.—Opinion on French Treaties. vii, 613. Ford ed., vi, 220. (April 1793.)

8540. TREATIES, Opposition to European.—I am not for linking ourselves by new treaties with the quarrels of Europe; entering that field of slaughter to preserve their balance, or joining in the confederacy of kings to war against the principles of liberty.—To Elbridge Gerry. iv, 268. Ford ed., vii, 328. (Pa., 1799.)

8541. — — —. We wish to let every treaty we have drop off without renewal. * * * The interest which European nations feel, as well as ourselves, in the mutual patronage of commercial intercourse, is a sufficient stimulus on both sides to ensure that patronage. A treaty, contrary to that interest, renders war necessary to get rid of it.—To William Short. iv, 415. Ford ed., viii, 98. (W., 1801.)

8542. TREATIES, Power to make.—The States of America before their present Union possessed completely, each within its own limits, the exclusive right to * * * [make treaties and] by their act of Union, they have as completely ceded [it] to the General Government. Art. 2d. Section 1st. "The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." Section 10th, "No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation. No State shall, without the consent of Congress, * * * enter into any agreement of compact with another State, or with a foreign power * * *." These paragraphs of the Constitution, declaring that the General Government shall have, and that the particular ones shall not have, the right of * * * treaty, are so explicit that no commentary can explain them further, nor can any explain them away.—Opinion on Georgian Land Grants. vii, 468. Ford ed., v, 166. (1790.)

8543. — — —. Consulted verbally by the President [Washington] on whom a committee of the Senate are to wait * * * to know whether he will think it proper to redeem our Algerine captives, and make a treaty with the Algerines, on the single vote of the Senate, without taking that of the Representatives. * * * The subsequent approval of the Senate being necessary to validate a treaty, they expect to be consulted beforehand, if the case admits. So the subsequent act of the Representatives being nec-necessary where money is given, why should not they expect to be consulted in like manner, when the case admits? A treaty is a law of the land. But prudence will point out this difference to be attended to in making them; viz., where a treaty contains such articles only as will go into execution of themselves, or be carried into execution by the judges, they may be safely made; but where there are articles which require a law to be passed afterwards by the legislature, great caution is requisite. Therefore [I am] against hazarding this transaction without the sanction of both houses. The President concurred.—*The ANAS. ix, 106. FORD ED., i, 181. (March 1792.)

8545. — —. President Washington wished to redeem our captives at Algiers and to make peace with them on paying an annual tribute. The Senate were willing to approve this, but unwilling to have the lower house applied to previously to furnish the money; they wished the President to take the money from the treasury, or open a loan for it. They thought that to consult the Representatives on one occasion would give them a handle always to claim it, and would let them into a participation of the power of making treaties, which the Constitution had given exclusively to the President and Senate. They said, too, that if the particular sum was voted by the Representatives, it would not be a secret. The President had no confidence in the secrecy of the Senate, and did not choose to take money from the treasury or to borrow. But he agreed he would enter into the provisional treaties with the Algerines, not to be binding on us till ratified here. I prepared questions for consultation with the Senate, and added, that the Senate were to be apprized, that on the return of the provisional treaty, and after they should advise the ratification, he would not have the seal put to it till the two Houses should vote the money. He asked me, if the treaty stipulating a sum and ratified by him, with the advice of the Senate, would not be good under the Constitution, and obligatory on the Representatives to furnish the money? I answered it certainly would, and that it would be the duty of the Representatives to raise the money; but that they might decline to do what was their duty, and I thought it might be incumbent to commit himself by a ratification with a foreign nation, where he might be left in the lurch in the execution; it was possible, too, to conceive a treaty, which it would not be their duty to provide for. He said he did not like throwing too much into democratic hands, that if they would not do what the Constitution called them to do, the government would be at an end, and must then assume another form.—*The ANAS. ix, 114. FORD ED., i, 190. (April 1792.)

8546. — —. I had observed, that wherever the agency of either or both Houses would be requisite subsequent to a treaty, to carry it into effect, it would be prudent to consult them previously, if the occasion admitted: that thus it was, we were in the habit of consulting the Senate previously, when the occasion permitted, because their subsequent ratification would be necessary; that there was the same reason for consulting the lower House previously, where they were to be called on afterwards, and especially in a case of money, as they held the purse strings, and would be jealous of them.—*The ANAS. ix, 115. FORD ED., i, 191. (April 1792.)

8547. — —. [Alexander] Hamilton laid down this position* with great positiveness: That the Constitution having given power to the President and Senate to make treaties, they might make a treaty of neutrality which should take from Congress the right to declare war in that particular case, and that under the form of a treaty they might exercise any powers whatever, even those exclusively given by the Constitution to the House of Representatives. Randolph opposed this position, and seemed to think that where they undertook to do acts by treaty (as to settle a tariff of duties), which were exclusively given to the Legislature, that an act of the Legislature would be necessary to confirm them. It happens in England, that when a treaty interferes with duties established by law. I insisted that in giving to the President and Senate a power to make treaties, the Constitution meant only to authorize them to carry into effect, by way of treaty, any powers they might constitutionally exercise. I was sensible of the weak points in this po-

tion, but there were still weaker in the other hypothesis; and if it be impossible to discover a rational measure of authority to have been given by this clause, I would rather suppose that the cases which my hypothesis would leave unprovided, were not thought of by the convention, or if thought of, could not be agreed on, or were thought on and deemed unnecessary to be invested in the government. Of this last description, were treaties of neutrality, treaties offensive and defensive, &c. In every event, I would rather construe so narrowly as to oblige the nation to amend, and thus declare what powers they would agree to yield, than too broadly, and indeed, so broadly as to enable the Executive and Senate to do things which the Constitution forbs.—The Ana. ix, 181. Ford Ed., i, 268. (Nov. 1793.)

5848. ——. According to the rule established by usage and common sense, of construing one part of the instrument by another, the objects on which the President and Senate may exclusively act by treaty are much reduced, but the field on which they may act with the sanction of the Legislature, is large enough; and I see no harm in rendering their sanction necessary, and not much harm in withholding the whole treaty-making power, except as to making peace.—To James Madison. iv, 135. Ford Ed., vii, 69. (M., March 1796.)

5849. ——. If you [House of Representatives] decide in favor of your right to refuse cooperation in any case of treaty, I should wonder on what occasion it is to be used, if not on one where the rights, the interests, the honor and faith of our nation are so grossly sacrificed; what a faction has entered into a conspiracy with the enemies of their country to chain down the Legislature at the feet of both; where the whole mass of your constituents have condemned this work in the most unequivocal manner, and are looking to you as their last hope to save them from the effects of the avarice and corruption of the first agent, the revolutionary machinations of others, and the incomprehensible acquiescence of the only honest man who has assented to it. I wish that his honesty and his political errors may not furnish a second occasion to exclaim, “curse on his virtues, they have undone his country”.—To James Madison. iv, 135. Ford Ed., vii, 69. (M., March 1796.)

5850. ——. I was glad to hear it admitted on all hands in discussion [in the Senate], that laws of the United States, subsequent to a treaty, control its operation, and that the Legislature is the only power which can control a treaty. Both points are sound beyond doubt.—To James Madison. iv, 244. Ford Ed., vii, 261. (Pa., May 1798.)

5854. ——. A writer in the National Intelligencer of Feb. 24, 1816, who signs himself “B.”, is endeavoring, under the cloak of General Washington, the present enterprise of the Senate to wrest from the House of Representatives the power, given them by the Constitution, of participating with the Senate in the establishment and continuance of laws on specified subjects. Their aim is, by associating an Indian chief, or foreign government, in form of a treaty, to possess themselves of the power of repealing laws become obnoxious to them, without the assent of the third branch, although that assent was necessary to make it a law. We are then to depend for the secure possession of our laws, not on our immediate representatives chosen by ourselves, and amenable to ourselves every other year, but on Senators chosen by the Legislatures, amenable to them only, and that but at intervals of six years, which is nearly the common estimate for a term for life. But no act of that sainted worthy, no thought of General Washington, ever countenanced a change of our Constitution so vital as would be the rendering insignificant the popular, and giving to the aristocratical branch of our government, the power of depriving us of our laws. The case for which General Washington is quoted is that of his treaty with the Creeks, wherein was a stipulation that their supplies of goods should continue to be imported duty free. * * * General Washington's stipulation in that treaty was nothing more than that our laws should not levy duties where we have no right to levy them, that is, in foreign ports, or foreign countries. * * * The same writer quotes from a note in Marshall's History, an opinion of Mr. Jefferson, given to General Washington on the same occasion of the Creek treaty. Two of his three little lines only of that opinion are given us, which do indeed express the doctrine in broad and general terms. Yet we know how often a few words withdrawn from their place may seem to bear a general meaning, when their context would show that their meaning must have been limited to the subject with respect to which they were used. If we could see the whole opinion, it might probably appear that its foundation was the peculiar circumstances of the Creek nation. We may say, too, on this opinion, as on that of a judge whose positions beyond the limits of the case before him are considered as obiter sayings, never to be relied on as authority. In July '90, moreover, the Government was but just getting under way. The duty law was not passed until the succeeding month of August. This question of the effect of a treaty was then of the first impression; and none of us, I suppose, will pretend that on our first reading of the Constitution we saw at once all its intentions, all the bearings of every word of it, as fully and as correctly as we have since understood them, after they have become subjects of public investigation and discussion; and I well remember the fact that, although Mr. Jefferson had retired from office before Mr. Jay's mission, and the question on the British treaty, yet during its discussion we were well assured of his entire concurrence in opinion with Mr. Madison and others who maintained the rights of the House of Representatives, so that, if on a prima facie view of the question, his opinion had been too general, on stricter investigation, and more mature consideration, his ultimate opinion was with those who thought that the subjects which were confided to the House of Representatives in conjunction with the President and Senate, were exceptions to the general treaty power given to the President and Senate alone (according to the general rule that an instrument is to be so construed as to reconcile and give meaning and effect to all its parts); that whenever a treaty stipulation interferes with a law of the three branches, the consent of the third branch is necessary to give it effect; and that there is to this but the single exception of the question of war and peace. There the Constitution expressly requires the concurrence of the three branches to commit us to the state of war, but permits two of them, the President and Senate, to change it to that of peace, for reasons as obvious as they are wise. I think, then, I may affirm in contradiction to B., that the present attempt of the Senate is not sanctioned by the opinion either of General Washington or of Mr. Jefferson.—Jefferson MSS. vi, 557. (March 1816.)

8555. — — — When the British treaty of 18— arrived, without any provision against the impressment of our seamen, I determined not to ratify it. The Senate thought I should ask their advice. I thought that was a mockery of them, when I was predetermined against following it, should they advise its ratification. The Constitution had made their advice necessary to confirm a treaty, but not to reject it. This has been blamed by some; but I have never doubted its soundness.—To Spencer Roane. vii, 135. Ford Ed., x, 142. (P.F., 1819.)

8557. TREATIES, Ratification of.—It has been the usage of the Executive, when it communicates a treaty to the Senate for their ratification, to communicate also the correspondence of the negotiations. This, having been omitted in the case of the Prussian treaty, was asked by a vote of the House of February 12, 1800, and was obtained. And in December, 1800, the Convention of that year, between the United States and France, with the report of the negotiations by the envoys, but not their instructions, being laid before the Senate, the instructions were asked for, and communicated by the President.—Parliamentary Manual. ix, 81.

8558. TREATIES, Regulation of commerce by.—Treaties are very imperfect machines for regulating commerce in detail.—To M. de Meunier. ix, 287. Ford Ed., iv, 142. (P., 1786.)

8559. — — — It is desirable, in many instances, to exchange mutual advantages by legislative acts rather than by treaty; because the former, though understood to be in consideration of each other, and therefore greatly respected, yet when they become too inconvenient, can be dropped at the will of either party; whereas stipulations by treaty are forever irrevocable but by joint consent let a change of circumstances render them ever so bothersome.—Report on Tonnage Law. Ford ed., v, 273. (1791.)

8560. TREATIES, Repeal of.—A treaty made by the President, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, is a law of the land, and a law of superior order, because it not only repeals past laws, but cannot itself be repealed by future ones.*—Official Opinion, vii, 505. Ford ed., v, 216. (1790.)

8561. TREATIES, Rescinding.—Treaties being declared, equally with the laws of the United States, to be the supreme law of the land, it is understood that an act of the Legislature alone can declare them infringed and rescinded. This was accordingly the process adopted in the case of France, 1798.—Parliamentary Manual, ix, 81.

8562. TREATIES, Self-liberation from.—Reason which gives * * * [the] right of self-liberation from a contract in certain cases, has subjected it to certain just limitations. 1. The danger which assimilates us must be great, inevitable and imminent. * * *

2. The second limitation on our right of releasing ourselves is that we are to do it from so much of the treaties only as is bringing great and inevitable danger on us, and not from the residue, allowing the other party a right at the same time, to determine whether on our non-compliance with that part, they will declare the whole void. This right they would have, but we should not. * * * 3. A third limitation is that when a party, from necessity or danger, withholds compliance with that part of a treaty, it is bound to make compensation where the nature of the case admits and does not dispense with it.—Opinion on French Treaties, vii, 614. Ford ed., vi, 221. (1793.)

8563. TREATIES, Short.—Your observations on the expediency of making short treaties are most sound. Our situation is too changing and too improving, to render an unchangeable treaty expedient for us.—To E. Rutledge, iii, 165. Ford ed., v, 196. (N.Y., 1790.)

8564. TREATIES OF COMMERCE, British.—In February, 1786, Mr. Adams wrote to me [at Par's], pressingly to join him * Jefferson, at a later period, modified this opinion in the following note: "Unless with the consent or default of the other contracting party, it will be impossible, too, and perhaps denied, that the treaty power can control a law. The question here proposed was then of the first importance; but I have not yet found that position that the contrary is proved to be more general truth."—Editor.

* The question under consideration, when this opinion was given, was whether the United States had the right to renounce their treaties with France, or to hold them suspended till the government of that country shall change its "minds." Mr. Hamilton took the ground that as France was a monarchy when the United States entered into an alliance with it, and had since declared itself to be a republic, which might be a temporary despotism and thereby render the alliance "dangerous", to the United States, we had the right either to renounce the treaty or declare it suspended until a settled government had been formed. Jefferson opposed this view, maintaining that the danger to be apprehended was not sufficient in sound morality to justify the United States in declaring the treaty null.—Editor.

in London immediately, as he thought he discovered there some symptoms of better disposition towards us. Colonel [William Stephens] Smith, his Secretary of War, signified his urgent need of my immediate attendance. I, accordingly, left Paris on the 1st of March and, on my arrival in London, we agreed on a summary form of treaty, proposing an exchange of a citizenship for our citizens, our ships, and our productions generally, except as to office.—Autobiography, i, 63. Ford ed., i, 88. (1821.)

8565. ——. On my presentation as usual to the King and Queen, at their levees, it was impossible for anything to be more ungracious than their notice of Mr. Adams and myself. I saw at once that the ulcerations in the narrow mind of that mulish being left nothing to be expected on the subject of my attendance; and on the first conference with the Marquis of Carmarthen, his Minister of Foreign Affairs, the distance and disinclination which he betrayed in his conversation, the vagueness and evasions of his answers to us, the unreasonableness on the part of the French, made it evident that we had nothing to do with us. We delivered him, however, our projet. Mr. Adams not desiring as much as I did of its effect. We afterwards, by one or more notes, requested his appointment of an interview and conference, which was not directly [not directly] covered by pretences of other pressing occupations for the moment. After staying there seven weeks, till within a few days of the expirat of our commission, I informed the minister by note that my duties at Paris required my return to that place, and that I should with pleasure be the bearer of any commands to his Ambassador there. He answered that he had none, and wishing me a pleasant journey, I left London the 26th, and arrived at Paris the 30th of April.

8566. ——. There is no doubt what the determination of the British Court with respect to a treaty will be; but it will be useful to have it; as it may put an end to all further expectations on our side the water, and show that the time is come for doing whatever is to be done by us for counteracting the unjust and greedy designs of this country [England].

8567. I am quite at a loss what you will do with England. To leave her in possession of our posts, seems inadmissible; and yet to take them, brings on a state of things for which we seem not to be in readiness. Perhaps a total suppression of her trade, or an exclusion of her vessels from the carriage of our products, or an additional tax or duty, will not be very great. Their passions are too deep and too universally engaged in opposition to us. The ministry have found means to persuade the nation that they are richer than they were while we participated of their commercial privileges, and we should try to turn our trade into other channels. I am in hopes this country [France] will endeavor to give 't more encouragement.—To Elbridge Gerry, i, 557. (P. 1786.)

8568. ——. I am sorry the British are sending a minister to attempt a treaty. They never made an equal commercial treaty with any nation, and we have no right to expect to be the first. It will place you between the injunctions of true patriotism and the clamors of a faction devoted to a foreign interest, in preference to that of their own country. It will confirm the English, too, in their practice of whipping us into a treaty. They did it in Jay's case, were near doing it in Monroe's, and on y, and of proceeding against Jay's treaty being ever quoted or looked at, or even men tioned. That form will forever be a mill-stone round our necks unless we now rid ourselves of it once for all. The occasion is highly favorable, as well, the other can have them more in o. — To President Madison. v. 443. (M. April 1809.)

TREATIES OF COMMERCE, Confed eration and.—See Confederation.

8569. TREATIES OF COMMERCE, Efforts to negotiate.—Without urging, we [Franklin, Adams and Jefferson] sounded the ministers of the European powers in the summer of Versailles, on their dispositions towards mutual commerce, and the expediency of encouraging it by the protection of a treaty. Old Frederick of Prussia met us cordially and, with honest gratitude, and appointing the Baron de Thulow, the Minister at The Hague, to negotiate with us, we communicated to him our project, which, with little alteration by the King, was soon concluded. Denmark and Tuscany entered also into negotiations with us. Other powers appearing indifferent we did not think it proper to press them. * * * The negotiations, therefore, began with Denmark and Tuscany. We protracted designedly until our powers had expired; and abstained from making new propos itions to others having no colonies; because our commerce being an exchange of raw for wrought materials, is a competent price for ad mission into the colonies of those possessing them: but were we to give it, without price, to others, all would claim it without price on the ordinary ground of gentis amicissae.—Auto biography. i. 62. Ford Ed. i. 87. (1821.)

8570. The European powers seemed in fact to know little about us but as rebels, who had been successful in throwing off their parent country, and ignorant of our commerce, which had been al ways monopolized by England, and of the ex change of articles it might offer advantageously to both parties. They were inclined, therefore, to stand aloof until they could see better what relations might be usefully instituted with us.—Auto biography. i. 62. Ford Ed. i. 88. (1821.)

8571. On the conclusion of peace [with Great Britain]. Congress, sensibil of the right that a member of a great and not condescend to ask its acknowledgment from other nations, yet were willing, by some of the ordinary international transactions, to receive what would imply that acknowledgment. They appointed commissioners, therefore, to propose the terms of the treaty. The old idea of commerce established in Europe. I was then a member of Congress, was of the committee appointed to prepare in structions for the commissioners, was, as you suppose, the draughtsman of those actually agreed to, and was joined with your father and I. They were by the Senate, as to the form and execution. But the stipulations making part of these instru ctions, which respected privateering, block ades, contraband, and freedom of the fisheries, were not original conceptions of mine. They had before been suggested by Dr. Franklin, in some of his papers in possession of the public, and had, I think, been recommended in some letter of his to Congress. I happen to be have been the inserter of them in the first public act which gave the formal sanction of a public authority. We accordingly proposed our treaties, containing these stipulations, to the principal governments of Europe. But we were recommended just as much with the nation as it; the nations had as yet known nothing of us, and had not yet reflected on the relations which it might be their interest to establish with us. Most of them, therefore, listened to our propositions, with coyness and reserve; old Frederick [the Great] alone wrote one with much hesitation. The negotiator of Portugal, indeed, signed a treaty with us, which his government did not ratify, and Tuscany was near a final agreement. Becoming sensible, however, our selves, that they will be made to us,—To John Quincy Adams. vii. 436. Ford Ed. x. 283. (M. March 1826.)

8572. TREATIES OF COMMERCE, Favored nation principle.—I know of no investigation, at the instance of any nation, of the extent of the clause giving the rights of the most favored nation but from the import of the words themselves, and from the clause that a privilege granted to any other nation shall im mediately become common, freely where freely granted, or yielding the compensation where a compensation is given, I have no doubt that if any one nation will admit our goods free in con sideration of our doing the same by them, no other nation can claim an exception from duties in our ports without yielding us the same on theirs.—To James Monroe. Ford Ed. iv. 10. (P. Dec. 1784.)

8573. When the first article of our instructions of May 7th, 1784, was under debate in Congress, it was proposed that neither party should make the other pay, in their ports, greater duties, than they paid in the ports of the other. One objection to this was its imprac ticability; that with the great commerce of our power to lay such duties on alien importa tion as might encourage importation by natives. Some members, much attached to English policy, thought such a distinction should actually be established. Some thought the principle, so it should be reserved, in case any peculiar cir cumstances should call for it, though under the present, or, perhaps, any probable circumstances, they did not think it would be good policy ever to exercise it. The footing gentis amicissae was, therefore, adopted, as you see in the instruct... of the alien duties in Englan d only; for if we put her importations on the footing of native, all other nations with wh... treat will we have a right to claim the same.

I think, because of the peculiarity of many nations, who make no distinction in their ports between us and their own subjects, we ought not to make a distinction in ours. And if the English will agree, in like manner, to make none, we should, with equal reason, abandon the right as against them. I think all the world would gain, by setting commerce at perfect liberty. I remember this proposition to put foreigners and natives on the same footing was considered; and we were all three, Dr. Franklin as well as you and myself, in favor of it. We finally, however, did not put it forward in the object we now mention, but more still on account of our instructions. But though the English proclamation had appeared in America at the time of framing these instructions, I think its effect, as to alien duties, had not yet been experienced, and therefore was not attested to. If it had been noted in the debate.

I am sure that the annihilation of our whole trade would have been thought too great a price to pay for the reservation of a barren power, which a majority of the members did not protest, had it been otherwise. The principal thing to be considered was, how to retain it. Stipulating for equal rights for foreigners and natives, we obtain more in for-ground ports than our instruct ons required, and we only part with, in our own ports, a power of which would policy would probably forever forbid the grant. Add to this, that our treaty will be for a very short term, and if any evil be experienced under it, a reformation will soon be in our power. I am, therefore, for putting this among our original propositions to the court of London. If it should prove an insuperable obstacle with them, we may or if it should stand in the way of a greater advantage, we can but abandon it in the course of the negotiation.

To JOHN ADAMS. i, 370. FORD ED. IV, 79. (P.7 July 1783.)

8574. Though treaties, which merely exchange the rights of the most favored nations, are not without all inconvenience, yet they have their conveniences also. It is an important one, that they leave each party free to make such internal regulations they please, and to give what preferences they find expedient for native merchants, vessels, and productions.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER INSTRUCTIONS. VI, 587.
FORD ED. V. 477. (1792.)

8575. It will probably be urged, because it was urged on a former occasion, that, if Spain grants* to us the right of navigating the Mississippi, other nations will become entitled to the same right from the same treaty to the most favored nation. * * * When those treaties were made, no nations could be under the Commissioners with respect to the navigation of the Mississippi river. It should not be inferred the use of the word "grants" that Jefferson admitted the Spanish pretension to the control of the lower part of the river. He maintained, on the contrary, that we had an inherent right and also treaty rights to the navigation. — EDITOR.

produce and merchandise to such possessions directly. 3. That these United States be considered in all such treaties, and in every case arising under them, as one party upon the principles of the Federal constitution. 4. That it be proposed, though not indispensably required, that if war should hereafter arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country, then in the event of their remaining nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects, without molestation or hindrance, and all fishermen, all cultivators of the earth, and all artisans or manufacturers, under the same conditions as in the same fortified towns, villages or places, who labor for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, and peaceably following their respective employments, shall be allowed to continue the same, and shall not be molested by the armed force of the enemy, though they descend, or in consequence of the events of war, they may happen to fall; but if anything is necessary to be taken from them, for the use of such armed force, the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price; and all merchants and traders, exchanging the produce of the United States, without molestation, and by tendering the necessaries, conveniences, and comforts of human life more easy to obtain and more general, shall be allowed to pass free and unmolested; and neither of the contracting powers shall grant or issue any commission or commission papers to employ them to take or destroy such trading ships, or intercept such commerce. 5. And in case either of the contracting parties shall happen to be engaged in war with any other nation, it be further agreed, in order to prevent as much as possible the difficulty that usually arise respecting the merchandise heretofore called contraband, such as arms, ammunition and military stores of all kinds, that no such articles, carrying by the ships or subjects of one of the parties to the enemies of the other, shall, or in anywise were deemed contraband, so as to induce confiscation, and a loss of property to individuals. Nevertheless, it shall be lawful to stop such ships and detain them for such length of time as the captors may think necessary, to prevent the detention of the necessary stores of the enemy, from their proceeding on their voyage, paying, however, a reasonable compensation for the loss such arms shall occasion to the proprietors; and it shall be further allowed to use in the service of the captors, the whoe’er or any part in or out of the necessary stores so detained, paying the owners the full value of the same, to be ascertained by the current price at the place of its destination. But if the other contracting party will not consent to discontinue the confiscation of contraband goods, then that it be stipulated, that if the master of the vessel stopped, will deliver but the goods charged to be contraband, he shall be admitted to do it, and the vessel shall not in that case be carried into any port; but shall be allowed to proceed on her voyage. 6. That in the event of his majesty’s subjects or any of the subjects of the other party being detained, it be provided that certain what shall constitute the blockade of any place or port, it shall be understood to be in such predicament, when the assaulting power shall have taken such a station as to expose to imminent danger any ship or ships, that would attempt to sail in or out of the said port; and that no vessel of the party, who is not engaged in the said war, shall be stopped without a material and well grounded cause; and in such cases justice shall be done, and an indemnification given, without loss of time to the persons aggrieved, and thus stopped without sufficient cause. 7. That there might be stipulated for aliens to hold real property within these States, this being utterly inadmissible by their several laws and policy; but when on the death of any person holding real estate within the territories of one of the contracting parties, the estate of the deceased shall be liable to confiscation, on a subject or citizen of the other, were he not disqualified by alienage, then he shall be allowed reasonable time to dispose of the same, and withdraw the proceeds without molestation. 8. That such treaties be made for a term not exceeding ten years from the exchange of ratification. 9. That these instructions be considered as supplementary to those of October 20th, 1783; and not as revoking, except when they contradict them. That where in treaty with a particular nation they can procure particular advantages, of which we have been unable to descend, our object in these instructions having been to form out in only and general principles of treaty with many nations, it is our expectation they will procure similar advantageous articles of convention; and where they may be able to form treaties on principles which, in their judgment, will be more beneficial to the United States than those herein directed to be made their basis, they are permitted to adopt such principles. The foregoing instructions, though we have proposed to restrain them to the term of ten years, yet they are at liberty to extend the same as far as fifteen years with any nations which may pertinaciously insist thereon. And that it will be agreeable to us to exceed the terms of ten years with the United Netherlands and Sweden, which may bring the treaties we have entered into with them as nearly as may be to the principles of those now directed: but that this be not pressed, if the proposal should be found disagreeable. Resolved, That treaties of amity and commerce, be entered into with Morocco, and the Regencies of Algiers, Tunis and Tripoli, to continue for the same term of ten years, or for a term as much longer as can be procured. That our Ministers of foreign affairs, in promoting treaties with foreign nations, make known to the Emperor of Morocco the great satisfaction which Congress feel from the amicable disposition he has shown towards these States, and his readiness to enter into alliance with them. That the occupations of the war, and distance of our situation have prevented our meeting his friendship so early as we wished. But the powers are now delegated to them for entering into treaty with him, in the execution of which they are ready to proceed, and that as to the terms of honor and interest of the United States. Resolved, That a commission be issued to Mr. J. Adams, Mr. B. Franklin, and Mr. T. Jefferson, giving powers to them, or the greater part of them, to make and receive propositions for such treaties of amity and commerce, and to negotiate and sign the same, transmitting them to Congress for their final ratification; and that such commission be in force for a term not exceeding two years.—JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA, IX, 226. FORD ED., iii, 480. (May 7, 1784.)

8577. TREATIES OF COMMERCE, Objects of.—My wish to enter into treaties with the other powers of Europe arises more from a desire of bringing all our commerce under the jurisdiction of Congress, than from any other views. Because, according to my idea, the commerce of the United States with those countries, not under treaty with us, is under the jurisdiction of the State departments only; but that of the countries, which have treated with us, is under the jurisdiction of Congress with the two fundamental restraints only which I have before noted.—To John Adams. i. 360. (P. 1785.)

8578. TREATIES OF COMMERCE, Portugal.—Considering the treaty with Portugal among the most interesting to the United States, I some time ago took occasion * * * to ask of the Portuguese Ambassador if he had yet received from his Court an answer to our letter. He told me he had not; but that he would make it the subject of another letter. Two days ago, his Secretaire d'Amassade called on me with a letter from his Minister to the Ambassador. * * * By this [extract from the letter], it will be seen that this paper is more designed to pursue a track of negotiation similar to that which Spain has done. I consider this answer as definitive of all further measures under our commission to Portugal.—To John J ay. i. 458. (P. 1785.)

TREATY, Jay.—See Jay Treaty.

8579. TREATY (British peace), Ratification of.—The definitive treaty of peace which had been signed at Paris on the 3rd of September, 1783, and received here, could not be ratified without a House of nine States. On the 23d of December, therefore, we [the Congress sitting at Annapolis] addressed letters to the several Governors, stating the receipt of the definitive treaty, and that seven States only were in attendance, while nine were necessary to its ratification; and urging them to press on their delegates the necessity of their immediate attendance. And on the 26th, to save time, I moved at the Agent of Marine (Robert Morris) should be instructed to have ready a vessel at this place, at New York, and at some Eastern port, to carry over the ratification of the treaty when agreed to. It met the general sense of the House, but was opposed by Dr. [Arthur] Lee, on the ground of expense, which it would authorize the Agent to incur for us; and, he said, it would be better to ratify at once, and send on the ratification. Some members had before suggested that seven States were competent to the ratification. My motion was therefore negatived. I then proceeded to forward by Mr. Read, of South Carolina, for an immediate ratification. This was debated the 26th and 27th. [Jacob] Read [of South Carolina], Lee, [Hugh] Williamson and Jeremiah Chase, urged that the ratification was a mere matter of form; that the treaty was conclusive from the moment it was signed by the ministers; that, although the Confederation requires the assent of nine States to enter into a treaty, yet, that its conclusion could not be called entrance into it; that supposing nine States requisite; it would be for five States to keep us always at war; that nine States had virtually authorized the ratification, having ratified the provisional treaty, and instructed their ministers to agree to a definitive one in the same terms, and the presence of any two in fact, and of all the members in parliam, the same; that there now remain but sixty-seven days for the ratification, for its passage across the Atlantic, and its exchange; that there was no hope of our soon having nine States present; in fact, that this was the last point of time to which we could venture to wait; that if the ratification was not in Paris by the time stipulated, the treaty would become void; that if ratified by seven States, it would go under our seal, without 't being known to Great Britain that only seven had concurred; that it was a question of which they had no right to take cognizance, and we were only answerable to our constituents; that it was like the ratification which Great Britain had received from the Dutch, by the negotiations of Sir William Temple. On the contrary, it was argued by Monroe, Gerry, Howel, Ellery and myself, that by the modern usage of Europe, the ratification was considered a part of the act, which gave validity to a treaty, until which, it would not have effect. That the commission to the ministers reserved the ratification to Congress; that the treaty itself stipulated that it should be ratified; that it became a second question, who were competent to the ratification? That the confederation expressly required nine States to enter into any treaty; that, by this, that instrument must have intended, that the assent of nine States should be necessary, as well to the completion as to the commencement of the treaty, its object having been to guard the rights of the United States, and those important principles of peace, which States are called for; that, by the contrary construction, seven States, containing less than one-third of our whole citizens, might rivet on us a treaty, commenced indeed under commission, without instructions from nine States, but formed by the ministers in pursuance to such instructions, and in direct sacrifice of the interests of so great a majority; that the definitive treaty was admitted not to be a verbal copy of the provisional one, and whether the departures from it were of substance or not, was a question on which nine States alone were competent to decide; that the circumstances of the ratification of the provisional articles by nine States, the instructions of our ministers to form a definitive one by them, and their actual agreement to the new conditions, were an impotent ratification; that it was but four days since the seven States, now present unanimously concurred in a resolution, to be forwarded to the Governors of the absent States, in which they stated as a cause for urging on the ratification, that neither party was in any way impotent to ratify the treaty: that in the case of the Dutch ratification, Great Britain had courted it, and therefore was glad to accept it as it was; that they knew our Constitution, and would object to a ratification by seven; that, if that circumstance was kept back, it would be known hereafter, and would give them ground to deny the validity of a ratification into which they should have been surprised and cheated, and it would be a dishonorable prostitution of our seal; that there was no hope of nine States; that the treaty would become null and void, and we should be no longer competent to any ratification, either in this or in any other instrument; and would not be saved by an imperfect ratification; but that, in fact, it would not be null, and would be placed on better ground, going in an exceptional form, though a few days too late, and would avoid one of those impossibilities, which was the case in the Union, the Constitution, and the physical impossibilities which had prevented a punctual compliance in point of time: that this would be approved by all nations, and by Great Britain herself, if not determined to renew the war, and if so determined, would not be out of the way. Mr. Read gave notice, he should call for the yeas and nays; whereas those in opposition, prepared a resolution, expressing particularly the reasons of their dissent from his motion. It appearing, however, that his proposition could not be carried, it was thought expedient to take no entry at all, Massachusetts alone would have been for it; Rhode Island, Pennsylvania and Virginia against it. Delaware, Maryland and North Carolina would have been divided.

Those who thought seven States competent to the treaty, and very venal to the loss of their motion. I proposed on the 3rd of January, to meet them on middle ground, and therefore moved a resolution, which premised that there were but seven States present, who were unanimous for the ratification, but that, in their instructions, to obtain three months longer for exchange of ratifications; that they should be informed that so soon as nine States shall be present, a ratification by nine shall be sent them: if this should get to them before the ultimate point of time for exchange, they were to use it, and not the other; if not, they were to offer the act of the seven States in exchange, informing them the treaty had come to hand while Congress was not in session; that but seven States were as the other two, which had not concurred, it would be the act of the nine States, to which the nine States, to which the ratification. This was debated on the 3rd and 4th; and on the 5th, a vessel being to sail for England, from Annapolis, the House directed the President to write to our ministers accordingly. January 14, Delegates from Connecticut having attended yesterday, and another from South Carolina coming in this day, the treaty was ratified without a dissenting voice; and three instruments of ratification were ordered to be made out, one of which was signed by the President, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Los. Fords, and the third transmitted to the Agent of Marine, to be forwarded by any good opportunity.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY, i. 55. FORD ED., i, 77. (1821).

8850. TREATY (British peace), Violations of. In the 7th article of the treaty of peace, it was stipulated, that his Britannic majesty should withdraw his armies, garrisons, and fleets, without carrying away any negroes, or other property of the American inhabitants. This stipulation was known to the British commanding officers, before the 10th of March, 1783, as provisionally agreed; and on the 5th of April they received official notice from their court of the conclusion and ratification of the preliminary articles between France, Spain, and Great Britain, which gave activity to ours, as appears by the letter of Sir Guy Carleton to General Washington, dated April 6, 1783. From this time, then, some negroes could be expected to escape evacuation, which reached General Carleton, in New York, 25th April, the 26th, and three houses, one month more, to the most remote of these posts. Some of them might have been evacuated in a few days after, and the largest in a few weeks. Certainly they might all have been moved forward to the southward. This speed in the operations, by the end of May, from the known facility furnished by the lakes, and the water connecting them; or by crossing immediately over into their own territory, and availright "to deprive the negroes of that liberty he found them possessed of; that it was unfriendly to suppose that the King's minister could stipulate to be guilty of a notorious breach of the public faith in the negroes; and that, if it was his intention, it must have been in compensation, restoration being utterly impracticable, where insurmountable from a breach of public faith." But surely, Sir, an officer of the King is not to question the validity of the King's engagements, nor violate his solemn word on his own scruples about the public faith. Under this pretext, however, General Carleton went on in daily intrusions, embarking, from time to time, between his notice of the treaty of the 5th of April, and the evacuation of New York, November 25, of whom our commissioners had inspection, and a very large number more, in public and private vessels, of whom they were not permitted to have inspection. Here, then, was a direct, unequivocal, and avowed violation of this part of the 7th article, in the first instance of its being known; an article which had been of extreme solicitude on our part; on the fulfilment of which depended the means of paying debts, in proportion to the number of laborers withdrawn; and, in short, to the public we warn, and put the commanding officer on his guard, he says directly he will go through with the act, and leave it to his court to adjust it by compensation.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 387. FORD ED., vi, 30. (Pa, May 1792.)

8851. By the 7th article [of the treaty of peace], his Britannic majesty stipulates that he will, with all convenient speed, amounts to the same thing, and clearly excludes all unnecessary delay.

The ratifications being being signed on the 20th of January, some time at the request for the orders for evacuation to come over to America, for the removal of stores, property and persons, and finally for the act of evacuation. The larger the post, the longer the time necessary to remove all the effects, the smaller, the sooner done. Hence, though General Carleton received his orders to evacuate New York in the month of April, the evacuation was not completed till late in November. It had been the principal place of arms and stores; the seat, as were of their general government, and the asylum of those who had fled to them. A great quantity of shipping was necessary, therefore, for the removal, and the General was obliged to call for a part from the foreign countries. The evacuation was partially and fraudulently respected on our part. But the posts of Michillimackinac, Detroit, Niagara, Oswego, Oswegatchie, Point-Au-Fer, Dutchman's Point, were not of this magnitude. The orders for evacuation, which reached General Carleton, in New York, 25th April, the 26th, and three houses, one month more, to the most remote of these posts. Some of them might have been evacuated in a few days after, and the largest in a few weeks. Certainly they might all have been moved forward to the southward. This speed in the operations, by the end of May, from the known facility furnished by the lakes, and the water connecting them; or by crossing immediately over into their own territory, and availing themselves of the season for making new establishments there, if that was intended. Or whatever time might, in event, have been necessary for their evacuation, certainly the order for it should have been given from England, and might have been given as early as that from New York. Was any order ever given? Would not an unnecessary delay of the order, producing an equal delay in the evacuation, be an inaccuracy of the treaty? Let us investigate the matter. * * * * Now is it not fair to conclude, if the order was not arrived on the 13th of August, 1783, if it was not arrived on the 10th of May, 1784, nor yet on the 13th of July, in the same year, that, in truth, the order had never been given? And if it had not been given, we cannot conclude that it never had been intended to be given? From what moment is it we are to date this infraction? From that at which, with convenient speed, the order to evacuate the upper posts might have been given. No legitimate reason can be assigned, why that order might not have been given earlier, as early as the same time, as the order to evacuate New York; and all delay, after this, was in contradiction of the treaty.—To George Hammond, iii, 388. Ford ed., vi, 31. (Pa., 1792.)

8582. ——. Was this delay merely innocent and unpleasant as to us, setting aside all considerations but of interest and safety? I. e., not us off from the fur-trade, which from the first the war had been always of great importance as a branch of commerce, and as a source of remittance for the payment of our debts to Great Britain; for the injury of withholding our posts, they added the obstruction of all passage along the Ohio. The treaty as it is written included us from connection with the Northwestern Indians, from all opportunity of keeping up with them friendly and neighborly intercourse, brought on us consequently, from their known dispositions, constant and expensive war, in which numbers of men, women, and children, have been, and still are, daily falling victims to the scalping knife, and to which there will be no period, but in our possession of the posts which command their country.—To George Hammond, iii, 391. Ford ed., vi, 33. (Pa., 1792.)

8583. ——. It may safely be said that the treaty was violated in England before it was signed in America. It is known in America, as soon as it was known, and that too, in points so essential, as that, without them, it would never have been concluded.—To George Hammond, iii, 391. Ford ed., vi, 33. (Pa., 1792.)

8584. TREES, Birds and. —What would I not give that the trees planted nearest round the house at Monticello were full-grown!—To Martha Jefferson Randolph. D. L. J. 222. (Pa., 1793.) See Mocking Bird.

8585. TREES, Cork.—I have been long endeavoring to procure the cork tree from Europe but without success. A plant which I brought with me from Paris died after languishing in the hands of James Roulston, vi, 92. Ford ed., ix, 370. (M., 1813.)

8586. TREES, Fig and mulberry. —The culture of the fig and mulberry is by women and children, and therefore earnestly to be desired in countries where there are slaves. In these, the women and children are often employed in labors disproportioned to their sex and age.

* Jefferson here quotes the official replies of the British officers commanding different posts to the request for their surrender that they had not received the evacuation order.—EDITOR.

By presenting to the master objects of culture, easier and equally beneficial, all temptation to misemploy them would be removed, and the lot of this tender part of our species be much improved.—To William Drayton. ii, 199. (P., 1787.)

8587. TREES, Peach.—I thank you for your experiment on the peach tree. It proves my speculation practicable, as it shows that five acres of peach trees at twenty-one feet apart will furnish durable wood enough to supply a fireplace through the winter, and may be kept up at the trouble of only planting about seventy peach trees. Suppose this extended to ten fire-places, it comes to fifty acres of ground, five thousand trees, and the replacing about seven hundred of them annually by planting so many stones. If it be disposed at some little distance, say in a circular annulus from one hundred to three hundred yards from the house, it would render a cart almost useless.—To T. M. Randolph. Ford ed., v, 416. (Pa., 1792.)

TRIAL BY JURY. —See JURY.

8588. TRIBUTE, War and. —We prefer war in all cases to tribute under any form, and to any people whatever.—To Thomas Barclay. iii, 262. (Pa., 1791.)

8589. TRIPOLI, European powers and. —There is reason to believe the example we have set, begins already to work on the dispositions of the powers of Europe to emancipate themselves from the usurious yoke of commerce. Should we produce such a revolution there, we shall be amply rewarded for all that we have done.—To Judge Tyler. iv, 574. (M., March 1805.)

8590. TRIPOLI, Expedition against. —I have never been so mortified as at the conduct of our foreign functionaries on the loss of the Philadelphia. They appear to have supposed that we were all lost now, and without resource; and they have hawked us n forma pauperis begging alms at every court in Europe. This self-degradation is the more un pardonable as, un instructed and unauthorized, they have taken measures which commit us by moral obligations which cannot be disavowed. The most serious of these is with the First Consul of France, the Emperor of Russia and Grand Seigneur. The interposition of the two first has been so prompt, so cordial, so energetic, that it is impossible for us to decline the good offices they have done us. From the virtuous and warm-hearted character of the Emperor, and the energy he is using with the Ottoman Porte, I am really apprehensive that our squadron will, on its arrival, find our prisoners all restored. If this should be the case, it would be disgraceful and insulting to these three great powers, to chastise the friend (Tripoli) whom they had induced to do us voluntary justice. Our expedition will in that case be disarmed, and our just desires of vengeance disappointed, our honor protracted, our measures, and to strike our blow before they shall have had their effect, are additional and cogent motives for getting off our squadron without a moment's avoidable delay.—To Robert Smith. Ford ed., viii, 301. (M., April 1804.)

8591. TREES, Fig. —Fine frigates have left the Chesapeake * * * for Tripoli, which, in addition to the force now there, will, I hope, recover the credit which Commodore Morris's two years' sleep lost us, and for which he has been broke. I think they will make Tripoli

8592. TRIPOLI, Grounds for war.—The war with Tripoli stands on two grounds of fact. 1st. It is made known to us by our agents with the three other Barbary States, that they only wait to see the event of this, to shape their conduct accordingly. If the war is ended by additional tribute, they mean to offer us the same alteration of peace. Peace was made, we should still, and shall ever, be obliged to keep a frigate in the Mediterranean to overawe rupture, or we must abandon that market. Our intention in sending Morris with a respectable force, was to try whether peace could be forced by a coercive enterprise on their town. His inexecution of orders baffled that effort. Having broke him, we try the same experiment under a better commander. If, in the course of the summer, they cannot produce peace, we shall recall our force, except one frigate and some small vessels, which will keep up a perpetual blockade. Such a blockade will cost us no more than a state of peace, and will save us from increased tributes, and the disgrace attached to them.—To Judge Tyler. iv, 574. (M., March 1805.)

8593. TRIPOLI, War with.—Tripoli had some come forward with demands unfounded either in right or in compact, and had permitted itself to denounce war, on our failure to comply before a given day. The style of the demand admitted but one answer. We sent a small squadron of frigates into the Mediterranean with assurances to that power of our sincere desire to remain in peace, but with orders to protect our commerce against the threatened attack. The measure was seasonable and salutary. The Bey had already declared war in form. His cruisers were out. Two had arrived at Gibraltar. Our commerce in the Mediterranean was blockaded, and that of the Atlantic in peril. The arrival of our squadron dispelled a danger. One of the Tripolitan cruisers engaged the small schooner Enterprise, commanded by Lieutenant Sterrett. was captured after a heavy slaughter of her men, without the loss of a single one on our part. The Unauthoriz'd by the Constitution, without the sanction of Congress, to go beyond the line of defence, the vessel being disabled from committing further hostilities, was liberated with its crew.—First Annual Message. vii, 7. Ford ed., viii, 116. (Dec. 1801.)

8594. TROUBLE, Borrowing.—Are there so few inquietudes tacked to this momentary life of ours, that we must need be loading ourselves with a thousand more?—To John Page. i, 183. Ford ed., i, 343. (E., 1762.)

8595. TRUMBULL (John), Artist.—Our countryman Trumbull is here [Paris], a young painter of the most promising talents. He brought with him his Battle of Bunker Hill and Death of Montgomery to have them engraved here, and we may add, to have them sold; for like Dr. Ramsey's history, they are too true to suit the English palate.—To F. Hopkinson. Ford ed., iv, 272. (P., 1786.) See Cornwallis.

8596. TRUST, Public.—When a man assumes a public trust, he should consider himself as public property.—To Baron von Humboldt. Rayner, Boston edition, 356. (W., 1807.)

8597. TRUTH, Error vs.—Truth is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error, and has nothing to fear from the conflict, unless by human interposition disarmed of her natural weapons, free argument and debate; errors ceasing to be dangerous when it is permitted freely to contradict them.—Statute of Religious Freedom. Ford ed., ii, 239. (1779.)

8598. Truth being as cheap as error, it is as well to rectify it for our own satisfaction.—To John Adams. vii, 309. Ford ed., x, 272. (M., 1823.)

8599. TRUTH, Eternal.—Truth and reason are eternal. They have prevailed. And they will eternally prevail, however, in times and places they may be overborne for a while by violence—military, civil, or ecclesiastical.—To Rev. Mr. Knox. v, 503. (M., 1810.)

8600. TRUTH, Falsehood and.—The firmness with which the people have withstood the late abuses of the press, the discernment they have manifested between truth and falsehood, show that they may safely be trusted to hear everything true and false, and to form a correct judgment between them.—To Judge Tyler. iv, 549. (W., 1804.)

8601. TRUTH, Following.—Here [the University of Virginia] we are not afraid to follow truth wherever it may lead, nor to tolerate any error so long as reason is left free to combat it.—To Mr. Roscoe. viii, 196. (M., 1820.)

8604. TRUTH, Importance of.—It is of great importance to set a resolution, not to be shaken, never to tell an untruth. There is no vice so mean, so pitiful, so contemptible; and he who permits himself to tell a lie once, finds it much easier to do it a second and a third time, till at length it becomes habitual; he tells lies without attending to it, and truths without the world's believing him. This falsehood of the tongue leads to that of the heart, and in time depraves all its good dispositions.—To Peter Carr. i, 396. (P., 1785.)

8605. TRUTH, Lies and.—The man who fears no truths has nothing to fear from lies.—To Dr. George Logan. Ford ed., x, 27. (M., 1816.)

8606. TRUTH, Newspapers and.—The restraining the press to truth, as the present laws do, is the only way of making it useful.—To William Short. v, 362. (M., 1808.)

8607. TRUTH, Only safe guide.—In all cases, follow truth as the only safe guide, and eschew error, which bewilders us in one false consequence after another, in endless succession.—To John Adams. vii, 149. Ford ed., x, 153. (M., 1819.)

8608. TRUTH, Primary object.—Truth is the first object.—To Dr. Maese. v, 413. (W., 1809.)

8609. TRUTH, Propagation of.—Nor was it less interesting to the world, that an experiment should be fairly and fully made, whether freedom of discussion, unaided by power, is not sufficient for the propagation and protection of truth.—Second Inaugural Address. viii, 43. Ford ed., viii, 346. (1805.)

8610. TRUTH, Reason and.—No experiment can be more interesting than that we are now trying, and which we trust will end in establishing the fact, that man may be governed by reason and truth. Our first object should therefore be, to leave open to him all the avenues to truth. The most effectual hitherto found, is the freedom of the press. It is, therefore, the first shut up by those who fear the investigation of their actions.—To Judge Tyler. iv, 548. (W., 1804.)

8611. TRUTH, Refreshing.—We, who are retired from the business of the world, are glad to catch a glimpse of truth, here and there as we can, to guide our path through the boundless field of fable in which we are bewildered by public prints, and even by those calling themselves histories. A word of truth to us is like the drop of water supplicated from the tip of Lazarus's finger. It is as an observation of latitude and longitude to the mariner long enveloped in clouds, for correcting the ship's way.—To John Quincy Adams. vii, 87. (M., 1817.)

8612. TRUTH, Self-evident.—We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with inherent* and inalienable rights; that among these, are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.—Declaration of Independence as Drawn by Jefferson.

8613. TRUTH, Self-reliant.—It is error alone which needs the support of government. Truth can stand by itself.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 401. Ford ed., iii, 264. (1782.)

8614. TRUTH, Strength of.—Truth will do well enough if left to shift for herself. She seldom has received much aid from the power of great men to whom she is rarely known and seldom welcome. She has no need of force to procure entrance into the minds of men.—Notes on Religion. Ford ed., ii, 102. (1776?)

8615. TRUTH, Suppression of.—Truths necessary for our own character, must not be suppressed out of tenderness to its calumniators.—To President Madison. vi, 452. Ford ed., ix, 512. * (M., 1815.)

8616. TRUTH, Unfeared.—There is not a truth on earth which I fear or would dis-

Instead of Madeira I have used toddy or French brandy.—To James Madison. Ford ed., x, 181. (M., 1821.)

8631. Tyranny, British.—That rapid and bold succession of injuries which is likely to distinguish the present from all other periods of American history.—Rights of British America. i, 130. Ford ed., i, 435. (1774.)

8632. Tyranny, Despotism and.—But why should we enumerate their injuries in detail? By one act they have suspended the powers of one American legislature, and by another have declared they may legislate for us themselves in all cases whatsoever. These two acts alone form a basis broad enough whereon to erect a despotism of unlimited extent.—Declaration on Taking up Arms. Ford ed., i, 469. (July 1775.)

8633. Tyranny, Eternal hostility to.—I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man.—To Dr. Benjamin Rush. iv, 336. Ford ed., vii, 460. (M., 1806.)

8634. Tyranny, Fear and.—Fear is the only restraining motive which may hold the hand of a tyrant.—Rights of British America. i, 131. Ford ed., i, 436. (1774.)

8635. Tyranny, Foundation for.—Future ages will scarcely believe that the hardness of one man accustomed, within the short compass of twelve years only, to lay a foundation so broad and so undisguised for tyranny over a people fostered and fixed in the principles of freedom.†—Declaration of Independence as Drawn by Jefferson.

8636. Tyranny, George III.—A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a people who mean to be free.‡—Declaration of Independence as Drawn by Jefferson.

of us. It is better to keep the wolf out of the fold, than to trust to drawing his teeth and talons after he shall have entered.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 303. Ford ed., iii, 225. (1782.)

8638. TYRANNY, Insurrection against.—The general insurrection of the world against its tyrants will ultimately prevail by pointing the object of government to the happiness of the people, and not merely to that of their self-constituted governors.—To Marquis Lafayette. Ford ed., x, 233. (M., 1822.)

8639. TYRANNY, Political.—If there be a God, and He is just, His day will come. He will never abandon the whole race of man to be eaten up by the leviathans and mammoths of a day.—To Marquis Lafayette. Ford ed., x, 302. (M., 1811.)

8640. TYRANNY, Rebellion against.—Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God.—Motto on Jefferson's Seal, Domestic Life of Jefferson, title page. See Languages, Purism.

8641. TYRANNY, Spirit of.—Bodies of men, as well as individuals, are susceptible of the spirit of tyranny.—Rights of British America. i, 128. Ford ed., i, 433. (1774.)

8642. TYRANNY, Systematic.—Single acts of tyranny may be ascribed to the accidental opinion of a day; but a series of oppressions, begun at a distinguished period, and pursued unalterably through every change of ministers, too plainly prove a deliberate, systematical plan of reducing us to slavery.—Rights of British America. i, 130. Ford ed., i, 435. (1774.)

8643. UMPIRE, Impartial.—No man having a natural right to be the judge between himself and another, it is his natural duty to submit to the umpirage of an impartial third.—To F. W. Gilmer. vii, 3. Ford ed., x, 32. (M., 1816.)

8644. UNEARNED INCREMENT, Definition.—If [the public lands are] sold in lots at a fixed price, as first proposed, the best lots will be sold first; as these become occupied, it gives a value to the interjacent ones, and raises them, though of inferior quality, to the price of the first.—To James Monroe. i, 347. Ford ed., iv, 53. (P., 1785.)

8645. UNGER (John Louis de), Courtesies to.—The very small amusements which it has been in my power to furnish, in order to lighten some of your heavy hours, by no means merited the acknowledgment you make. Their impression must be ascribed to your extreme sensibility rather than to their own weight.—To Lieutenant de Unger.* ii, 278. Ford ed., ii, 373. (R., 1789.)

8646. UNGER (John Louis de), Invited to America.—Should your fondness for philosophy resume its merited ascendancy, is it impossible to hope that this unexplored country may tempt your residence by holding out materials wherewith to build a fame, founded on the happiness and not the calamities of human nature?—To Lieutenan de Unger. i, 278. Ford ed., ii, 374. (R., 1780.)

8647. UNIFORMITY, Mental.—The varieties in the structure and action of the human mind, as in those of the body, are the work of our Creator, against which it cannot be a religious duty to erect the standard of uniformity.—To James Fishback. v, 471. (M., 1809.)

8648. UNIFORMITY, Physical and moral.—It is a singular anxiety which some people have that we should all think alike. Would the world be more beautiful were all our faces alike? were our tempers, our talents, our tastes, our forms, our wishes, aversions and pursuits cast exactly in the same mould? If no varieties existed in the animal, vegetable or mineral creation, but all moved strictly uniform, catholic and orthodox, what a world of physical and moral monotony would it be. These are the absurdities into which those run who usurp the throne of God, and dictate to Him what He should have done. May they with all their metaphorical riddles appear before that tribunal with as clean hands and hearts as you and I shall. There, suspended in the scales of eternal justice, faith and works will show their worth by their weight.—To Charles Thomson. Ford ed., x, 76. (M., 1817.)

8649. UNIFORMITY, Religious.—Is uniformity attainable? Millions of innocent men, women and children, since the introduction of Christianity, have been burnt, tortured, fined and imprisoned; yet we have not advanced one inch towards uniformity.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 401. Ford ed., iii, 265. (1782.)

8650. UNION (The Federal), Anchor of hope.—I have been happy in believing  that whatever follies we may be led into as to foreign nations, we shall never give up our Union the last anchor of our hope and that alone which is to prevent this heavenly country from becoming an arena of gladiators.—To Elbridge Gerry. iv, 173. Ford ed., vii, 122. (Pa., May 1797.)

8651. UNION (The Federal), Attempts to disrupt.—Not less worthy of your indignation have been the machinations of patriots who have endeavored to bring into danger the Union of these States, and to subvert, for the purposes of inordinate ambition, a government founded in the will of its citizens, and directed to no object but their happiness.—R. to A. North Carolina Legislature. viii, 125. (1808.)

8652. ———. Surrounded by such difficulties and dangers, it is really deplorable that any should be found among ourselves vindicating the conduct of the aggressors; cooperating with them in multiplying embarrassments to their own country, and encouraging disobedience to the laws provided for its safety. But a spirit which should go further, and countenance the advocates for a dissolution of the Union, and for setting in hostile array one portion of our citizens against another, would require to be viewed under a more serious aspect. It would prove indeed that it is high time for every friend to his country, in a firm and decided manner, to express his sentiments of the measures which government has adopted to avert the impending evils, unhesitatingly to pledge himself for the support of the laws, liberties and independence of his country; and with the republicans of Connecticut, to resolve that, for the preservation of the Union, the support and enforcement of the laws, and for the resistance and repulsion of every enemy, they will hold themselves in readiness and put at stake, if necessary, their lives and fortunes, on the pledge of their sacred honor.—R. to A. CONNECTICUT REPUBLICANS. viii, 169. (1809.)

8654. UNION (The Federal), Benefits of. —Union for specified national purposes, and particularly * * * [for] those specified in * * * [the] * * * Federal compact * * * [is] friendly to the peace, happiness and prosperity of all the States.—KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS. ix, 468. FORD ED., vii, 300. (1798.)

8655. UNION (The Federal), Bond of. —The sacred bond which unites these States together.—R. to A. PHILADELPHIA CITIZENS. viii, 144. (1809.)

8656. UNION (The Federal), Cement of the. —The cement of this Union is in the heart-blood of every American. I do not believe there is on earth a government established so immovable a basis.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vi, 425. FORD ED., ix, 509. (M., 1815.)

8657. UNION (The Federal), Cherish. — [Our] Union cannot be too much cherished.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. viii, 114. (1802.)

8658. — — —. Cherish every measure which may foster our brotherly Union and perpetuate a constitution of government, destined to be the primitive and precious model of what is to change the condition of man over the globe.—To EDWARD LIVINGSTON. vii, 344. FORD ED., x, 301. (M., 1824.)

8659. UNION (The Federal), Constitution and. —We must take care that * * * no objection to the new form [Constitution] produces a schism in our Union. This would be an incurable evil, because near friends falling out, never renew cordially; whereas, all of us going together, we shall be sure to cure the evils of our new Constitution before they do great harm.—To A. DONALD. ii, 356. (P., 1788.)

8660. UNION (The Federal), Constitutional encroachments and. —When obvious encroachments are made on the plain meaning of the Constitution, the bond of Union ceases to be the equal measure of justice to all its parts.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. FORD ED., v, 454. (Pa., 1792.)

8661. UNION (The Federal), Cultivate. —Our lot has been cast by the favor of heaven in a country and under circumstances highly auspicious to our peace and prosperity, and where no pretense can arise for the degrading and oppressive establishments of Europe. It is our happiness that honorable distinctions flow only from public approbation; and that finds no object in titled dignities and pageants. Let us, then, endeavor carefully to guard this happy state of things, by keeping a watchful eye over the disaftection of wealth and ambition to the republican principles of our Constitution, and by sacrificing all our local and personal interests to the cultivation of the Union, and maintenance of the authority of the laws.—R. to A. PENNA. DEMOCRATIC-REPUBLICANS. viii, 163. (1809.)

8662. UNION (The Federal), Dissolution of. —I can scarcely contemplate a more incalculable evil than the breaking of the Union into two or more parts.—To PRESIDENT WASHINGTON. iii, 363. FORD ED., vi, 4. (1792.)

8663. — — —. I have been among the most sanguine in believing that our Union would be of long duration. I now doubt it much, and see the event at no great distance, and the direct consequence of this question; [Missouri] not by the line which has been so confidently counted on,—the laws of nature control this,—but by the Potomac, Ohio and Missouri, or, more probably, the Mississippi upwards to our northern boundary. My only comfort and confidence is, that I shall not live to see this; and I envy not the present generation the glory of throwing away the fruits of their fathers' sacrifices of life and fortune, and of rendering de-perate the experiment which was to decide ultimately whether man is capable of self-government. This treason against human hope will signalize their epoch in future history as the counterpart of the medal of their predecessors.—To WILLIAM SHORT. vii, 158. (M., 1820.)

8664. — — —. Were we to break to pieces, it would damp the hopes and the efforts of the good, and give triumph to those of the bad through the whole enslaved world. As members, therefore, of the universal society of mankind, and standing in high and responsible relation with them, it is our sacred duty to suppress passion among ourselves, and not to blast the confidence we have in—spired of proof that a government of reason is better than one of force.—To Richard Rush. vii, 183. (M., 1820.)

8665. UNION (The Federal), Europe and.—Let us cling in mass to our country and to one another, and bid defiance, as we can if united, to the plundering combinations of the old world.—To Dr. George Logan. vii, 20. (M., 1816.)

8666. UNION (The Federal), Expansion and.—Our present federal limits are not too large for good government, nor will the increase of votes in Congress produce any ill effect. On the contrary, it will drown the little divisions at present existing there. Our confederacy must be viewed as the nest, from which all America, North and South, is to be peopled. We should take care, too, not to think it for the interest of that great Continent to press too soon on the Spaniards. Those countries cannot be in better hands. My fear is, that they are too feeble to hold them till our population can be sufficiently advanced to gain it from them, piece by piece. The navigation of the Mississippi we must have. This is all we are as yet ready to receive.—To Archibald Stuart. i, 578. Ford ed., iv, 188. (P., Jan. 1786.)

8667. UNION (The Federal), Family of States.—I sincerely wish that the whole Union may accommodate their interests to each other, and play into their hands mutually as members of the same family, that the wealth and strength of any one part should be viewed as the wealth and strength of the whole.—To Hugh Williamson. Ford ed., vii, 201. (Pa., Feb. 1798.)

8668. UNION (The Federal), Foreign papers against.—The request of a communication of any information, which may have been received at any time since the establishment of the present [Federal] Government, touching combinations with foreign nations for dismembering the Union, or the corrupt receipt of money by any officer of the United States, from the agents of foreign governments, can be complied with but in a partial degree. It is well understood that, in the first or second year of the presidency of General Washington, information was given to him relating to certain combinations with the agents of a foreign government for the dismemberment of the Union; which combinations had taken place before the establishment of the present Federal Government. This information, however, is believed never to have been deposited in any public office, or left in that of the President's secretary; these having been duly examined, but to have been considered as personally confidential, and therefore, retained among his private papers. A communication from the Governor of Virginia to General Washington, is found in the office of the President's secretary, which, though not strictly within the terms of the request of the House of Representatives, is communicated, inasmuch as it may throw some light on the subjects of the correspond-ence of that time, between certain foreign agents and citizens of the United States. In the first or second year of the administration of President Adams, Andrew Ellicott, then employed in designating, in conjunction with the Spanish authorities the boundaries between the territories of the United States and Spain, under the treaty with that nation, communicated to the Executive of the United States papers and information respecting the subjects of the present inquiry, which were deposited in the office of State. Copies of these are now transmitted to the House of Representatives, except of a single letter and a reference from the said Andrew Ellicott, which being expressly desired to be kept secret, is, therefore, not communicated, but its contents can be obtained from him in a more legal form, and directions have been given to summon him, if necessary, as an witness before the court of inquiry. [Wilkinson court of inquiry.] A paper " on the commerce of Louisiana", bearing date of the 18th of April, 1798, is found in the office of State, supposed to have been communicated by Mr. Daniel Clark, of New Orleans, then a subject of Spain, and now of the House of Representatives of the United States, stating certain commercial transactions of General Wilkinson, in New Orleans; an extract from this is now communicated, because it contains facts which may have some bearing on the questions relating to him. The destruction of the War Office, by fire, in the close of 1800, involved all information it contained at that date. The papers already described, therefore, constitute the whole information on the subjects, deposited in the public offices, during the preceding administrations, as far as has been believed to be but, it is certain there may be no others, because the papers of the office being filed, for the most part, alphabetically, unless aided by the suggestion of any particular name which may have given such information, nothing short of a careful examination of the papers in the offices generally, could authorize such affirmation. About a twelvemonth after I came to the administration of the government, Mr. Clark gave some verbal information to myself, as well as to the Secretary of State, relating to the same combination for the dismemberment of the Union. He was listened to freely, and he then delivered the letter of Governor Gogoso, addressed to himself, of which a copy is now communicated. After his return to New Orleans, he forwarded to the Secretary of State other papers, with a request, that, after perusal, they should be burned. This, however, was not done, and has been so informed by the Secretary of State, and that they would be held subject to his order. These papers have not yet been found in the office. A letter, therefore, has been addressed to the former chief clerk, who may, perhaps, give information respecting them. As far as our memories enable us to say, they related only to the combinations before spoken of, and not at all to the corrupt receipt of money by any officer of the United States; consequently, they respected what was considered as a dead matter, known to the preceding administrations, and offering nothing new to call for investigations, which those nearest the dates of the transactions had not thought proper to institute. In the course of the communications made to me on the subject of the conspiracy of Aaron Burr, I sometimes received letters, some of them anonymous, some under names true or false, expressing suspicions and insinuations against General Wilkinson. But only one of them and that anonymous, specified any particular fact, and that fact was one of those which had already been communicated to a former administration. No other information within the purview of the request of the House is known to have been received by any department of the Government from the establishment of the present Federal Government. That which has recently been communicated to the House of Representatives, and by them to me, is the first direct testimony available known to me, charging General Wilkinson with the corrupt receipt of money; and the House of Representatives may be assured that the duties which this information devolves on me shall be exercised with rigorous impartiality. Should any want of power in the court to compel the rendering of testimony, obstruct that: full and impartial inquiry, which alone can establish guilt or innocence, and satisfy justice, the legislative authority only will be competent to the remedy.—*—SPECIAL MESSAGE. viii, 90. (Jan. 1808.)

8669. UNION (The Federal), Love for.—Sincere love I shall forever strive to cultivate with all our sister States.—TO THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS. FORD ED. ii, 298. (Wg, 1780.)

8670. UNION (The Federal), Massachusetts federalists and.—The design of the leading federalists, then having direction of the State [Massachusetts], to take advantage of the first war with England to separate the Northeast States from the Union has distressingly impaired our future confidence in them. In this, as in all other cases, we must do them full justice, and make the fault all their own, should the last hope of human liberty be destined to receive its final stab from them.—TO DR. WILLIAM EUSTIS. FORD ED., ix, 237. (M., Oct. 1809.)

8671. UNION (The Federal), Miseries of secession.—What would you think of a discourse on the benefit of the Union and miseries which would follow a separation of the States, to be exemplified in the eternal and wasting wars of Europe, in the pilage and profligacy to which these lead, and the abject oppression and degradation to which they reduce its inhabitants? Painted by your vivid pencil, what could make deeper impressions, and what impressions could come more home to our concerns, or kindle a livelier sense of our present blessings?—TO MR. OGILVIE. v, 605. (M., 1811.)

8672. UNION (The Federal), Nourish.—Possessed of the blessing of self-government, and of such a portion of civil liberty as no other civilized nation enjoys, it now behoves us to guard and preserve them by a continuance of the sacrifices and exertions by which they were acquired, and especially to nourish that Union which is their sole guarantee.—R. TO A. NEW LONDON PLYMOUTH SOCIETY. viii, 166. (1809.)

8673. UNION (The Federal), Pennsylvania, Virginia and.—I wish and hope you may consent to be added to our [Virginia] Assembly itself. There is no post where you can render greater services, without going out of your State. Let but this block stand firm on its basis, and Pennsylvania do the same, our Union will be perpetual, and our General Government kept within the bounds and form of the Constitution.—TO JAMES MADISON. iv (62. FORD ED., vii, 110. (M., Jan. 1797.)

8674. UNION (The Federal), Rock of safety.—A solid Union is the best rock of our safety.—TO C. W. F. DUMAS. iii, 260. (Pa, 1791.)

8675. — — — To cherish the Federal Union as the only rock of our safety. * * * [is one of] the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.—SECOND ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 21. FORD ED., viii, 187. (Dec. 1802.)

8676. UNION (The Federal), Safety in, —It is a momentous truth, and happily of universal impression on the public mind, that our safety rests on the preservation of our Union.—TO THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY. iv, 397. (W., May 1801.)

8677. — — — I trust the Union of these States will ever be considered as the palladium of their safety, their prosperity and glory, and all attempts to sever it, will be frowned on with reprobation and abhorrence.—TO GOVERNOR TOMPKINS. viii, 153. (1809.)

8678. UNION (The Federal), Sectional ascendency.—If on a temporary superiority of one party, the other is to resort to a scission of the Union, no federal government can ever exist.—TO JOHN TAYLOR. iv, 246. FORD ED., vii, 264. (Pa, 1798.)

8679. UNION (The Federal), Self-government and.—I regret that I am now to die in the belief, that the useless sacrifice of themselves by the generation of 1776, to acquire self-government and happiness to their country, is to be thrown away by the unwise and unworthy passions of their sons, and that my only consolation is to be, that I live not to see it; but if they would but dispassionately weigh the blessings they will throw away, against an abstract principle more likely to be effected by union than by scission,

they would pause before they would perpetrate this act of suicide on themselves, and of treason against the hopes of the world.—To John Holmes. vii, 160. Ford ed., x, 158. (M., 1820.)

8680. UNION (The Federal), Sheet anchor.—The sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad.—First Inaugural Address. viii, 4. Ford ed., viii, 4. (1801.)

8681. ———. To preserve the republican form and principles of our Constitution, and cleave to the salutary distribution of powers which that has established, are the two sheet anchors of our Union. If driven from either, we shall be in danger of foundering.—To William Johnson. vii, 298. Ford ed., x, 232. (M., 1823.)

8682. UNION (The Federal), State rights and.—I am for preserving to the States the powers not yielded by them to the Union, and to the Legislature of the Union its constitutional share in the division of powers; and I am not for transferring all the powers of the States to the General Government, and all those of that Government to the Executive branch.—To Elbridge Gerry. iv, 268. Ford ed., vii, 327. (Pa., 1799.)

8683. UNION (The Federal), Strength.—If there be any among us who would wish to dissolve this Union, or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated while reason is left free to combat it. I know, indeed, that some honest men fear that a republican government cannot be strong; that this Government is not strong enough. But would the honest patriot, in full tide of successful experiment, abandon a Government which has so far kept us free and firm, on the theoretic and visionary fear that this Government, the world's best hope, may by possibility want energy to preserve itself? I trust not. I believe this, on the contrary, the strongest government on earth. I believe it is the only one where every man, at the call of the laws, would fly to the standard of the law, and would meet invasions of the public order as his own personal concern. Sometimes it is said that man cannot be trusted with the government of himself. Can he, then, be trusted with the government of others? Or have we found angels, in the forms of kings, to govern him? Let history answer this question.—First Inaugural Address. viii, 2. Ford ed., viii, 3. (1801.)

8684. UNION (The Federal), War and.—If we engage in a war during our present passions, and our present weakness in some quarters, our Union runs the greatest risk of not coming out of that war in the shape in which it enters it.—To Elbridge Gerry. iv, 188. Ford ed., vii, 150. (M., June 1707.)

8685. UNION (The Federal), Washington and.—I can scarcely contemplate a more incalculable evil than the breaking of the Union into two or more parts. Yet when we review the mass which opposed the original coalescence, when we consider that it lay chiefly in the Southern quarter, that the Legislature have availed themselves of no occasion of allaying it, but on the contrary whenever the Northern and Southern prejudices have come into conflict, the latter have been sacrificed and the former soothed; that the owners of the [public] debt are the Southern and the holders of it in the Northern division; that the anti-federal champions are now strengthened in argument by the fulfilment of their predictions; that this has been brought about by the monarchical federalists themselves, who, having been for the new government merely as a stepping stone to monarchy, have themselves adopted the very constructions of the Constitution, of which, when advocating its acceptance before the tribunal of the people, they declared it insusceptible; that the republican federalists, who espoused the same government for its intrinsic merits, are disarmed of their weapons; that which they censured as prophecy, having now become true history, who can be sure that these things may not proselyte the small number which was wanting to place the majority on the other side? And this is the event at which I tremble, and I pray God to prevent which I consider [President Washington] continuing at the head of affairs as of the last importance. The confidence of the whole Union is centred in you. Your being at the helm, will be more than answer to every argument which can be used to alarm and lead the people in any quarter into violence and secession. North and South will hang together, if they have you to hang on; and, if the first correction of a numerous representation [in Congress] should fail in its effect, your presence will give time for trying others not inconsistent with the Union and peace of the States.—To President Washington. iii, 363. Ford ed., iv, 263. (Pa., May 1792.)

8686. UNION (The Federal), Western interests and.—Our true interest will be best promoted by making all the just claims of our fellow citizens, wherever situated, our own; by urging and enforcing them with the weight of our whole influence; and by exercising in * * *, every * * * instance, a just government in their concerns, and making common cause even where our separate interest would seem opposed to theirs. No other conduct can attach us together; and on this attachment depends our happiness.—To James Monroe. i, 605. Ford ed., iv, 263. (P., 1786.)

8687. ———. This measure [dividing the Western country into fewer and smaller States] with the disposition to shut up the Mississippi, gives me serious apprehension of the separation of the Eastern and Western parts of our confederaity. It might have been made the interest of the Western States to remain united with us, by managing their interests honestly, and for their own good. But, the moment we sacrifice their interests to our own, they will see it is better to govern themselves. The moment they resolve to do this, the point is settled. A forced connection is neither our interest, nor within our power.—To James Madison. ii. 66. Ford ed., iv. 333. (P., Dec. 1786.)

8688. I fear, from an expression in your letter, that the people of Kentucky think of separating, not only from Virginia (in which they are right), but also from the Confederacy. I own, I should think this a most calamitous event, and such an one as every good citizen on both sides should set himself against.—To Archibald Stuart. i. 518. Ford ed., iv. 188. (P., Jan. 1786.)

8689. Whether we remain in one confederation, or break into Atlantic and Mississippi confederacies, I believe not important to the happiness of either part. Those of the western confederacy will be as much our children and descendants as those of the eastern, and I feel myself as much identified with that country, in future time, as with this; and did I now foresee a separation at some future day, yet I should feel the duty and the desire to promote the western interests as zealously as the eastern, doing all the good for both portions of our future family should fall within my power.—To Dr. Joseph Priestley. iv. 525. Ford ed., viii. 295. (W., Jan. 1804.) See Centralization, Colonies, Confederation, Constitution, Federal Government and United States.

8690. UNITED STATES, Assumption of title.—We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, do in the name, and by the authority of the good people of these States reject and renounce all allegiance and subjection to the kings of Great Britain and all others who may hereafter claim by, through, or under them; we utterly dissolve all political connection which may heretofore have subsisted between us and the people or parliament of Great Britain; and, for ourselves and our posterity, do declare these Colonies to be free and independent States; and that as free and independent States, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do. And for the support of this declaration, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.*—Declaration of Independence as Drawn by Jefferson.

*Congress changed the above so as to make it read "We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our intentions, do in the name, and by the authority of the good people of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these united Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States: that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that as free and independent States, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do. And for the support of this declaration, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."—EDITOR.

8691. UNITED STATES, Benign influence.—The station which we occupy among the nations of the earth is honorable, but awful. Trusted with the destinies of this voluntary republic of the world the only monument of human rights, and the sole depository of the sacred relics of freedom and self-government, whence it is to be lighted up in other regions of the earth, if other regions of the earth shall ever become susceptible of its benign influence. All mankind ought then, with us, to rejoice in its prosperous, and sympathize in its adverse fortunes, as involving everything dear to man. And to what sacrifices of interest, or convenience, ought not these considerations to animate us? To what compromises of opinion and inclination, to maintain harmony and union among ourselves, and to preserve from all danger this hallowed ark of human hope and happiness. —R. to A. Citizens of Washington. viii, 157. (1809.)

8692. UNITED STATES, Continental influence.—When our strength shall permit us to give the law of our hemisphere it should be that the meridian of the mid-Atlantic should be the line of demarcation between peace and war, on this side of which no act of hostility should be committed, and the lion and the lamb lie down in peace together.—To Dr. Crawford. vi, 33. (1812.)

8693. UNITED STATES, Destinies of.—A rising nation, spread over a wide and fruitful land, traversing all the seas with the rich productions of their industry, engaged in commerce with nations who feel power and forget right, advancing rapidly to destinies beyond the reach of mortal eye,—when I contemplate these transcendent objects, and see the honor, the happiness, and the hopes of this beloved country committed to the issue and the auspices of this day, I shrink from the contemplation, and humble myself before the magnitude of the undertaking.—First Inaugural Address. viii, 1. Ford ed., viii, 2. (1801.)

ern boundary, originally the Pacific Ocean, was, by the Treaty of Paris, reduced to the middle of the Mississippi. The part which our chief magistrate took in a war waged against us by the nation among whom he resided, obliged us to discontinue him, and to name one within every State. In the course of this war, we were joined by France and as an ally, and by Spain and Holland as associates, having a common enemy. Each sought that common enemy wherever they could find him. France, on our invitation, landed a large army within our territories, continued it with us two years, and aided us in recovering sundry places from the possession of the enemy. But she did not pretend to keep possession of the places rescued. Spain entered into the remote western part of our territory, dislodged the common enemy from several of the posts they held therein, to the annoyance of Spain; and perhaps thought it necessary to remain in some of them, as the only means of preventing their return. We, in like manner, dislodged them from several posts in the same western territory, to wit: Vincennes, Cahokia, Kaskaskia, &c., rescued the inhabitants, and retained constantly afterwards both them and the territory conquered by them, and our government. At the conclusion of the war, Great Britain, on the 30th of November, 1782, by treaty acknowledged our Independence, and our boundary, to wit, the Mississippi to the West, and the completion of the 31st degree, &c., to the South. In her treaty with Spain, concluded seven weeks afterwards, to wit, January 20th, 1783, she ceded to her the two Floridas (which had been defined in the proclamation of 1763), and Minorca; and by the eighth article of the treaty, Spain agreed to restore without compensation, all the territories conquered by her, and not included in the treaty either under the head of cessions or restitutions, that is to say, all except Minorca and the Floridas. According to this stipulation, Spain was expressly bound to have delivered up the possessions she had taken within the limits of Georgia, to Great Britain, if they were conquests on Great Britain, who was to deliver them over to the United States; or rather she should have delivered them over to the United States themselves, as standing, quoad hoc, in the place of Great Britain. And she was bound by natural right to deliver them to the same United States on a much stronger ground, as the real and only proprietors of those places which she had taken possession of, in a moment of danger, without having had any cause of war with the United States, to whom they belonged, and without having declared any; but on the contrary, conducting herself in other respects as a friend and associate.—(Vattel, L. 3, c. 122.)—Mississippi River Instructions, vii. 570. Ford ed., v. 401. (1792.)

8695. Should Spain pretend * * * that there was a secret article of treaty between the United States and Great Britain, agreeing if, at the close of the [Revolutionary] war, the latter should retain the Floridas, that then the southern boundary of Georgia should be the completion of the 32d degree of North latitude, the commissioners [appointed to negotiate with Spain to secure the free navigation of the Mississippi], may safely deny all knowledge of the fact, and refuse conference on any such postulatum. Or, should they find it necessary to enter into any arguments on the subject, they will, of course, do it hypothetically; and in that way may justly say, on the part of the United States: "Suppose that the United States, exhausted by a bloody and expensive war with Great Britain, might have been willing to have purchased peace by relinquishing, under a particular contingency, a small part of their territory, it does not follow that the same United States, recruited and better organized, must relinquish the same territory to Spain without striking a blow. The United States, too, have irrevocably put it out of their power to do it by a new Constitution," which guarantees every State against the invasion of its territory. A disastrous war, indeed, might, by necessity, supersede this stipulation (as necessity is above all law), and oblige them to abandon a part of a State; but nothing short of this can justify, or obtain such an abandonment.—Mississippi River Instructions, vii. 572. Ford ed., v. 463. (1792.)

8696. It is an established principle, that conquest gives only an inchoate right, which does not become perfect till confirmed by the treaty of peace, and by a renunciation or abandonment by the former proprietor. Had Great Britain been that former proprietor, she was so far from confirming to Spain the right to the territory of Georgia, invaded by Spain, that she expressly relinquished to the United States any right that might remain in her; and afterwards completed that relinquishment by procuring and consolidating with it the agreement of Spain herself to restore such territory without compensation. It is still more palpable that a war existing between two nations, as Spain and Great Britain, could give to neither the right to seize and appropriate the territory of a third, which is even neutral, much less which is an associate in the war, as the United States were with Spain. See, on this subject, Grotius, L. 3, c. 6 § 26. Puffendorf, L. 8, c. 6 § 17. 23. Vattel, L. 3 § 197, 198.—Mississippi River Instructions, vii. 572. Ford ed., v. 463. (1792.)

8698. UNITED STATES, Enduring.—When the General Government shall become incompetent [to the objects of government specially assigned to it] instead of flying to monarchy or that tranquillity which it is nature of slavery to hold forth, the true remedy would be a subdivision, as you observe. But it is to be hoped that by a due poise and partition of powers between the General and particular governments we have found the secret of extending the benign blessing of Republicanism over still greater tracts of country than we possess, and that a subdivision may be avoided for ages, if not forever.—To JAMES SULLIVAN. FORD ED., v. 369. (Pa., 1791.)

8699. I have much confidence that we shall proceed successfully for ages to come, and that, contrary to the principle of Montesquieu, it will be seen that the larger the extent of country, the more firm its republican structure, if founded, not on conquest, but in principles of compact and equality. My hope of its duration is built much on the enlargement of the resources of life going hand in hand with the enlargement of territory, and the belief that men are disposed to live honestly, if the means of doing so are open to them.—To M. DE MARBOIS. VII. 77. (M., 1817.)

8700. UNITED STATES, England and. These two nations [the United States and England], holding cordially together, have nothing to fear from the united world. They will be the models for regenerating the condition of man, the sources from which representative government is to flow over the whole earth.—To J. EVELYN DENISON. VII. 415. (M., 1825.)

8701. UNITED STATES, Esteemed. I shall rejoin myself to my native country, with new attachments, and with exaggerated esteem for its advantages; for though there is less wealth there, there is more freedom, more ease, and less misery.—To BARON GIESSER, I. 427. (P. 1785.)

8702. UNITED STATES, European powers and. While there are powers in Europe which fear our views, or have views on us, we should keep an eye on them, their connections and oppositions, that in a moment of need we may avail ourselves of their weakness with respect to others as well as ourselves, and calculate their designs and movements on all the circumstances under which they exist. To E. CARRINGTON. II. 335. FORD ED., IV. 483. (P. 1787.)

8703. UNITED STATES, Foreign policy. We must make the interest of every nation stand surety for their justice, and their own loss to follow injury to us, as effect follows its cause. As to everything except commerce, we ought to divorce ourselves from them all.—To EDWARD RUTLEDGE. IV. 191. FORD ED., VII. 154. (P., 1797.)

8704. The less we have to do with the amities or enmities of Europe the better.—To THOMAS LEIPER. VI. 465. FORD ED., IX. 520. (M., 1815.) See Alliance and Policy.

8705. UNITED STATES, Freedom from turmoil. How happy is it for us that we are beyond the reach of those storms which are eternally desolating Europe. We have indeed a neighbor with whom misunderstandings are possible; but they must be the effect of interests ill calculated. Nothing is more demonstrable than is the unity of their and our interest for ages to come.—To WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. FORD ED., V. 74. (P., 1789.)

8706. Our difficulties are indeed great, if we consider ourselves alone. But when viewed in comparison to those of Europe, they are the joys of Paradise. In the eternal revolution of ages, the destinies have placed our portion of existence amidst such scenes of tumult and outrage, as no other period, within our knowledge, had presented. Every government but one on the continent of Europe, demolished, a conqueror roaming over the earth with havoc and destruction, a pirate spreading misery and ruin over the face of the ocean. Indeed, ours is a bed of roses. And the system of government which shall keep us afloat amidst the wreck of the world, will be immortalized in history. We have, to be sure, our petty squabbles and heart burnings, and we have something of the blue devils at times, as to these Rawheads and Bloodybones who are eating up other nations. But happily for us, the Mammoth cannot swim, nor the Leviathan move on dry land; and if we will keep out of their way, they cannot get at us. If, indeed, we choose to place ourselves within the scope of their tether, a gripe of the paw, or flounce of the tail, may be our fortune. But a part of our nation chose to declare against this, in such a way as to control the wisdom of the government. I yielded with others to avoid a greater evil. But from that moment, I have seen no system which could keep us entirely aloof from these agents of destruction.—To Dr. WALTER JONES. V. 510. FORD ED., IX. 274. (M., March 1810.)

8707. UNITED STATES, Future greatness. I do believe we shall continue to grow, to multiply and prosper until we exhibit an association, powerful, wise and happy beyond what has yet been seen by men.—To JOHN ADAMS. VI. 37. FORD ED., IX. 333. (M., 1812.)

8708. Not in our day, but at no distant one, we may shake a rod over the heads of all [the European nations], which may make the stoutest of them tremble. But I hope our wisdom will grow with our power, and teach us, that the less we use our power, the greater will it be.—To THOMAS LEIPER. VI. 465. FORD ED., IX. 520. (M., 1815.)

8709. We are destined to be a barrier against the returns of ignorance and barbarism. Old Europe will have to lean on our shoulders, and to hobble along by our side, under the monkish trammels of priests and kings, as she can. What a Colossus shall we be when the southern sun comes up to its mark! What a stand will it secure as a ralliance for the reason and freedom of the globe!—To JOHN ADAMS. VII. 27. (M., 1816.)
8710. UNITED STATES, Guardian of liberty.—The eyes of the virtuous all over the earth are turned with anxiety on us as the only depositaries of the sacred fire of liberty.—To John Hollins. v, 597. (M., 1811.)

8711. UNITED STATES, Independence of.—The several States, now comprising the United States of America, were, from their first establishment, separate and distinct societies, independent on no other society of men whatever. They continued, therefore, the head of their respective governments the executive magistrate who presided over the one they had left, and thereby secured in effect a constant amity with that nation. * * * The part which our chief magistrate took in a war, waged against us by the nation among whom he resided, obliged us to discontinue him, and to name one within every State.—Mississippi River Instructions. vii, 571. Ford Ed., v, 461. (March 1792.)

— UNITED STATES, Inviolability of territory.—See Territory, Alienation of.

8712. UNITED STATES, Manufacturing nation.—Our enemy [Great Britain] has indeed the consolation of Satan on removing our first parents from Paradise; from a peaceful and agricultural nation, he makes us a military and manufacturing one.—To William Short. vi, 400. (M., 1814.) See Manufacturers and Protection.

— UNITED STATES, National capital.—See Washington City.

8713. UNITED STATES, Natural interests.—The American hemisphere * * * is endowed by nature with a system of interests and connections of its own.—R. to A. Pittsburg Republicans. viii, 142. (1808.) See Monroe Doctrine and Policy.

8714. UNITED STATES, Permanence.—Looking forward with anxiety to the future destinies of my countrymen I trust that, in their steady character unshaken by difficulties, in their love of liberty, obedience to law, and support of the public authorities, I see a sure guarantee of the permanence of our Republic; and retiring from the charge of their affairs, I carry with me the consolation of a firm persuasion that heaven has in store for our beloved country long ages to come of prosperity and happiness.—Eighth Annual Message. viii, 110. Ford Ed., ix, 225. (Nov. 1808.)

8715. UNITED STATES, Praise for.—There is not a country on earth where there is greater tranquillity; where the laws are milder, or better obeyed; where every one is more attentive to his own business or meddles less with that of others; where strangers are better received, more hospitably treated, and with a more sacred respect.—To Mrs. Cosway. ii, 36. Ford Ed., iv, 316. (P., 1786.)

8716. UNITED STATES, Prosperity.—When you witnessed our first struggles in the War of Independence, you little calculated, more than we did, on the rapid growth and prosperity of this country; on the practical demonstration it was about to exhibit of the happy truth that man is capable of self-government, and only rendered otherwise by the moral degradation designedly superinduced on him by the wicked acts of his tyrants.—To M. De Marbois. vii, 77. (M., 1817.)

8717. UNITED STATES, Safety of.—Our safety rests in the preservation of our Union.—To the Rhode Island Assembly. iv, 397. (W., May 1801.) See Union.

8718. UNITED STATES, Slanders on.—Nations, like individuals, wish to enjoy a fair reputation. It is, therefore, desirable for us that the slanders on our country, disseminated by hired or prejudiced travellers, should be corrected; but politics, like religion, holds up the torches of martyrdom to the reformers of error. Nor is it in the theatre of Ephesus alone that tumults have been excited when the crafts were in danger. You must be cautious, therefore, in telling unacceptable truths beyond the water.—To Mr. Ogilvie. v, 605. (M., 1811.)

8719. UNITED STATES, Superiority over Europe.—I sincerely wish you may find it convenient to come here [Europe]; the pleasure of the trip will be less than you expect, but the utility greater. It will make you adorn your own country, its soil, its climate, its equality, liberty, laws, people, and manners. My God! how little do my countrymen know what precious blessings they are in possession of, and which no other people on earth enjoy. I confess I had no idea of it myself. While we shall see multiplied instances of Europeans going to live in America, I will venture to say, no man now living will ever see an instance of an American removing to settle in Europe, and continuing there. Come, then, and see the proofs of this, and on your return add your testimony to that of every thinking American, in order to satisfy our countrymen how much it is to their interest to preserve, unininfected by contagion, those peculiarities in their government and manners, to which they are indebted for those blessings.—To James Monroe. i, 352. Ford Ed., iv, 59. (P., 1785.)

8720. UNITED STATES, Supremacy.—To the overwhelming power of England, I see but two chances of limit. The first is her bankruptcy, which will deprive her of the golden instrument of all her successes. The other is that ascendancy which nature bestows for us by immutable laws. But to hasten this consummation, we must exercise patience and forbearance. For twenty years to come we should consider peace as the summum bonum of our country. At the end of that period we shall be twenty millions in number, and forty in energy, when encountering the starved and rickety paupers and dwarfs of English workshops.—To M. Du Pont de Nemours. vi, 508. (M., Dec. 1815.) 8721. UNITED STATES, Title of inhabitants.—You have properly observed (in your book on the commerce of France and the United States) that we can no longer be called Anglo-Americans. That appellation now describes only the inhabitants of Nova Scotia, Canada, &c. I had applied that of Federal-Americans to our citizens, as it would not be so decent for us to assume to ourselves the flattering appellation of free Americans.

—To M. de Waville. ii, 12. FORD ED., iv, 281. (P., 1786.)

8722. UNITED STATES, Troubles and triumphs.—A letter from you calls up recollections very dear to my mind. It carries me back to the times when, beset with difficulties and dangers, we were fellow-laborers in the same cause, struggling for what is most valuable to man, his right of self-government. Laboring always at the same oar, with some wave ever ahead, threatening to overwhelm us, and yet passing harmless under our bark, we knew not how we rode through the storm with heart and hand, and made a happy port. Still we did not expect to be without ruts and difficulties; and we have had them. First, the detention of the Western posts, then the coalition of Plunitz, outlawing our commerce with France, and the British enforcement of the outlawry. In your day, French depredations; in mine, English, and the Berlin and Milan decrees: now the English orders of Council, and the piracies they authorize. When these shall be over, it will be the impression of our seamen or something else; and so we have gone on, and so we shall go on, puzzled and prospering beyond example in the history of man.—To JOHN ADAMS. vi, 36. FORD ED., ix, 333. (M., Jan. 1812.)

8723. UNITED STATES, Western territory.—[The proposed new States of the Western territory] shall forever remain a part of the United States of America.—WESTERN TERRITORY REPORT. FORD ED., iii, 499. (1784.) See CENTRALIZATION, CONFEDERATION, COLONIES, CONSTITUTION, FEDERAL GOVERNMENT and UNION.

8724. UNITY, Duty of.—Sole depositaries of the remains of human liberty, our duty to our selves, to posterity, and to mankind, calls on us by every motive which is sacred or honorable, to watch over the safety of our beloved country during the troubles which agitate and convulse the residue of the world, and to sacrifice to that all personal and local considerations.—R. TO A. NEW YORK LEGISLATURE. viii, 167. (1809.)

8725. UNITY, National.—If we are forced into a war we must give up differences of opinion and unite as one man to defend our country.—TO GENERAL KOSCIUSKO. iv, 295. (P., 1799.)

8727. UNITY, Strength in.—If the well-known energies and enterprise of our countrymen * * * are embodied by an union of will, and by a confidence in those who direct it, our nation, so favored in its situation, has nothing to fear from any quarter.—REPLY TO ADDRESS. v, 262. (W., 1808.)

8728. UNIVERSITY (National), Proposed establishment.—Education is here placed among the articles of public care, not that it would be proposed to take its ordinary sources out of the hands of private enterprise, which manages so much better all the concerns to which it is equal: but a public institution can alone supply those sciences which, though rarely called for, are yet necessary to complete the circle, all the parts of which contribute to the improvement of the country, and some of them to its preservation. The subject is now proposed for the consideration of Congress, because, if approved by the time the State Legislatures shall have deliberated on this extension of the Federal trusts, and the laws shall be passed, and other arrangements made for their execution, the necessary funds will be on hand and without employment. I suppose an amendment to the Constitution, by consent of the States, necessary, because the objects now recommended are not among those enumerated in the Constitution, and to which it permits the public mind to be applied. The present consideration of a national establishment for education, particularly, is rendered proper by the circumstance, also, that if Congress, approving the proposition, shall yet think it more eligible to found it on a donation of lands, they have it now in their power to endow it with those which will be among the earliest to produce the necessary income. This foundation would have the advantage of being independent on war, which may suspend other improvements by requiring for its own purposes the resources destined for them.—SIXTH ANNUAL MESSAGE. viii, 68. FORD ED., viii, 494. (Dec. 1806.)

8729. ———. The desire of peace is very much strengthened in me by that which I feel in favor of the great subjects of your and Mr. Fulton's letters. I had fondly hoped to set those enterprises into motion with the last Legislature I shall meet. But the chance of war is an unfortunate check. I do not, however, despair that the proposition of amendment may be sent down this session to the [State] Legislatures. But it is not certain. There is a snail paced gait for the advance of new ideas on the general mind, under which we must acquiesce. A forty years' experience of popular assemblies has taught me that you must give them time for every step you take. If too hard pushed, they balk, and the machine retrogrades.—To Joel Barlow. v, 216. FORD ED., ix, 168. (W., Dec. 1827.)

8730. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Aim of.—Our aim [is] the securing to our country a full and perpetual institution for all the useful sciences; one which will restore us to our former station in the Confederacy. * Patience and perseverance on our part will secure the blessed end. If we shrink, it is gone forever.—To General Breckenridge. vii, 239. (M., 1822.)

8731. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Basis of.—This institution of my native State, the hobby of my old age, will be based on the illimitable freedom of the human mind, to explore and to expose every subject susceptible of its contemplation.—To Destutt Tracy. FORD ED., x, 174. (M., 1820.)

8732. ———. This institution (University of Virginia) will be based on the illimitable freedom of the human mind. For here we arouse not afraid to follow truth wherever it may lead, nor to tolerate any error so long as reason is left free to combat it.—To Mr. Roscoe. vii, 196. (M., 1820.)

8733. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Discipline.—The rock which I most dread is the discipline of the institution, and it is that on which most of our public schools labor. The insubordination of our youth is now the greatest obstacle to their education. We may lessen the difficulty, perhaps, by avoiding too much government, by requiring no useless observances, none which shall merely multiply occasions for dissatisfaction, disobedience and revolt by referring to the more discreet of themselves the minor discipline, the graver to the civil magistrate, as in Edinburgh.—To George Ticknor. vii, 301. (M., 1823.)

8734. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Elective studies.—I am not fully informed of the practices at Harvard, but there is one from which we shall certainly vary, although it has been copied, I believe, by nearly every college and academy in the United States. That is, the holding the students all to one prescribed course of reading, and disallowing exclusive application to those branches only which are to qualify them for the particular vocations to which they are destined. We shall, on the contrary, allow them uncontrolled choice in the lectures they shall choose to attend, and require elementary qualification only, and sufficient age. Our institution will proceed on the principle of doing all the good it can without consulting its own pride or ambition; of letting every one come and listen to whatever he thinks may improve the condition of his mind.—To George Ticknor. vii, 300. (M., 1823.)

8735. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Future of.—I contemplate the University of Virginia as the future bulwark of the human mind in this hemisphere.—To Dr. Thomas Cooper. vii, 172. (M., 1820.)

8736. ———. I had hoped that we should open with the next year an institution on which the fortunes of our country may de-pend more than may meet the general eye.—To General Breckenridge. vii, 204. (M., 1821.)

8737. ———. I hope the University of Virginia will prove a blessing to my own State, and not unuseful perhaps to some others.—To Edward Livingston. vii, 405. (M., 1825.)

8738. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Government and.—I fear not to say that within twelve or fifteen years from this time, a majority of the rulers of our State will have been educated here. They shall carry hence the correct principles of our day, and you may count assuredly that they will exhibit their country in a state of secure respectability it has never known, either in our days, or those of our forefathers.—To W. B. Giles. vii, 429. FORD ED., x, 357. (M., 1825.)

8739. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Historical course.—In modern history, there are but two nations with whose course it is interesting to us to be intimately acquainted, to wit: France and England. For the former, the most General History of France may be sufficient to the period when Davila commences. He should be followed by Perefixe, Sully, Voltaire's Louis XIV. and XV., Lacretelles XVIIIme. Siecle, Marmontel's Regence, Foulongrin's French Revolution, and Madame de Seiél's, making up by a succession of particular history, the general one which they want.—To ———. vii, 412. (M., 1825.)

8740. ———. Hume, with Brodie, should be the last histories of England to be read [in the University of Virginia course]. If first read, Hume makes [his reader] an English tory, whence it is an easy step to American toryism. But there is a history by Baxter, in which, abridging somewhat by leaving out some entire incidents as less interesting now than when Hume wrote, he has given the rest in the identical words of Hume, except that when he comes to a fact falsified, he states it truly, and when to a suppression of truth, he supplies in its name, otherwise changing a word. It is, in fact, an analytic exposition of Hume. Those who shrink from the volume of Rapin, may read this first, and from this lay a first foundation in a basis of truth.—To ———. vii, 414. (M., 1825.)

8741. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Jefferson's last service.—Our University is the last of my mortal cares, and the last service I can render my country.—To J. CORREA. vii, 183. FORD ED., x, 163. (M., 1820.)

8742. ———. It is the last act of usefulness I can render, and could I see it open I would not ask an hour more of life.—To Benjamin Raine. vii, 212. FORD ED., x, 189. (M., 1821.)

8743. ———. The University of Virginia is the last object for which I shall obtrude myself on the public observation.—To Edward Livingston. vii, 405. (M., 1825.)

8744. ———. I am closing the last scenes of my life by fashioning and fostering an establishment for the instruction of those who are to come after us. I hope its influence on their virtue, freedom, fame, and happiness will be salutary and permanent.—To A. B. Woodward. vii, 406. FORD ED., x, 342. (M., 1825.)

8745. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Necessity for.—I have wondered at the change of political principles which has taken place in many in this State [Virginia], however much less than in others. I am still more alarmed to see, in the general political dispositions of those to whom is confided the education of the rising generation. Nor are all the academies of this State free from grounds of uneasiness. I have great confidence in the common sense of mankind in general; but it requires a great deal to guard against the views which editors have instilled into our minds while incapable of questioning them, and to rise superior to antipathies strongly rooted. However, I suppose when the evil rises to a certain height, a remedy will be found, if the best admits the wrong. Imbibe the prudence of parents and guardians.—To Jeremiah Moor. Ford ed., vii, 455. (M., Aug. 1800.)

8746. — How many of our youths Harvard now has, learning the lessons of anti-Missourianism, I know not; but a gentleman lately from Princeton, told me he saw there the list of the students at that place, and that more than half were Virginians. These will return home, no doubt, deeply impressed with the views of宗旨s of our Holy Alliance of restrictionists.—To Joseph C. Cabell. vii, 202. (M., 1821.)

8747. — The reflections that the boys of this age are to be the men of the next; that they should be prepared to receive the holy charge which we are cherishing to deliver over to them; that in establishing an institution of wisdom for them, we secure it to all our future generations; that in fulfilling this duty, we bring home to our own bosoms the sweet consolation of seeing our sons rising under a luminous tuition, to destinies of high promise; these are considerations which will occur to all; but all, I fear, do not see the speck 'n our horizon which is to burst on us as a tornado, sooner or later. The line of division lately marked out between different portions of our confederacy is such as will never, I fear, be obliterated, and we are now trusting to those who are against us in position and principle, for the future dispensations and affections of our youth. If, as has been estimated, we send three hundred thousand dollars a year to the northern seminaries, for the instruction of our own sons, then we must have there five hundred or our own opinions and principles in discord with those of their own country. This canker is eating on the vitals of our existence, and if not arrested at once, will be beyond remedy. We are now certainly furnishing recruits to their school.—To General Breckenridge. vii, 204. (M., 1821.)

8748. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Novelties in.—There are some novelties in [the University of Virginia]. Of that of a professorship of the principles of government, there is an earnest desire. They will be founded in the rights of man. That of agriculture, I am sure, you will approve; and that also of Anglo-Saxon. As the histories and laws left us in that type and dialect, must be the text books in that course. It is not that I would intermingle with the language their free principles of government.—To John Cartwright. vii, 361. (M., 1824.)

8749. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Opposition to.—An opposition [to the University] has been got up. That of our alma mater, William and Mary, is not of much weight. She must descend into the secondary rank of academies of preparation for the University. The serious enemies are the priests of the different religious sects, to whose spells on the human mind its improvement is ominous. Their pulpits are now resounding with denunciations against the University, whom they charge as a monsthete in opposition to their triteism.—To William Short. vii, 157. (M., 1820.) See Cooper.

8750. — You say my "handwriting and my letters have great effect at Richmond". I am sensible of the kindness with which this encouragement is held up to me. But my views of their effect are very different. When I read over the administration of public affairs, I thought I saw the light under which I retired with a good degree of public favor, and that my conduct in office had been considered by one party at least with approbation and with acquiescence by the other. But the attempt [University of Virginia], in which I have embarked so earnestly to procure an improvement in the moral condition of my native State, although, perhaps, in other States it may have strengthened good dispositions, it has assuredly weakened the views of our own. The attempt ran foul of so many local jealousies, of personal views, and so much ignorance, and I have been considered as so particularly its promoter, that I see evidently a great change of sentiment towards myself. I cannot doubt its having disconcerted with regard to a responsibility to minority, if not a majority of the House of Delegates. I feel it deeply and very discouragingly. Yet I shall not give way. I have ever found in my progress through life, that acting for the public good, if we do always what is right, the approbation denied in one instance will surely follow us in the end. It is from poise that we are to expect remuneration for the sacrifices we are making for their service, of time, quiet, and good will. And I fear not the appeal. The multitude of fine young men whom we shall redeem from ignorance, who will feel that they owe to us the elevation of mind, of character and station they will be able to attain from the result of our efforts, we' ll insure their remembering us with gratitude.—To Joseph C. Cabell. vii, 394. (M., 1825.)

8751. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Personal sacrifices for.—I know well your devotion to your country, and your foresight of the awful consequences which may soon or later. With this foresight, what service can we ever render her equal to this? [Support of the University of Virginia.] What object of our lives can we propose so important? What interest of our own which ought not to be postponed to this? Health, time, labor, on what in the single life which nature has given us, can these be better bestowed than on this immortal boon to our country? The exertions and the mortifications are temporary; the benefit eternal. The many members of our college of visitors could justly withdraw from this sacred duty it would be myself, * * * but I will die in the last ditch, and so, I hope, you will, my friend, as well as our firm-breasted brothers and colleagues, Mr. John W. and General Breckenridge. Also we would rather go to the grave in the dust whereon to atone for the omissions of this. Pray then, dear and very dear Sir, do not think of deserting us, but view the sacrifices which seem to stand in your way, as the lesser duties, and such as we shall be pleased to perform the greatest of all. Continue with us in these holy labors, until having seen their accomplishment, we may say with old Simeon, "nunc dimittis, Domine".—To Joseph C. Cabell. vii, 202. (M., 1821.)
8752. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Political principles.—In the selection of our law professor [for the University of Virginia], we must be rigorously attentive to his political principles. You will recollect that before the Revolution Coke-Littleton was the universal elementary book of law students, and a sounder with us of the grander learning in the orthodox doctrines of the British constitution, or in what were called English liberties. You remember, also, that our lawyers were then all whigs. But when his black-letter text, and uncouth but cunning learning got out of fashion, and men like Belcher & Blackstone became the student’s hornbook, from that moment, that profession (the nursery of our Congress), began to slide into toryism, and nearly all the young brood of lawyers now are of that hue. They suppose themselves, indeed, to be whigs because they no longer write what whigdom or republicanisms means. It is in our seminary that that vestal flame is to be kept alive; it is thence it is to spread anew over our own and the sister States. If we are true and vigilant in our trust, within a dozen or twenty years a majority of our own Legislature will be from one school, and many disciples will have carried its doctrines home with them to their several States, and will have leavened thus the whole mass.—To James Madison. vii, 433. Ford ed., x, 376. (M., 1826.)

8753. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Proctorship.—The establishment of a proc- tor is taken from the practice of Europe, where an equivalent officer is made a part, and is a very essential one of every such institution and the nature of his functions requires that he should always be a man of discretion, understanding, and integrity, above the common level, it was thought that he would never be less worthy of being trusted with the powers of the justice, within the limits of institution here; than the neighboring justices generally are; and the vesting him with the conservation of the peace within that limit, was intended, while it should equally secure its object, to shield the young and unguarded student from the disgrace of unjust rectification, except when the affair was an aggravated one. A confinement to his own room was meant as an act of tenderness to him, his parents and friends; in fine, it was to give him a complete police of their own, tempered by the paternal attentions of their tutors. And, certainly, in no country is such a provision more called for than in this, as has been proved from times of old, from the regular annual riots and battles between the students of William and Mary with the town boys, before the Revolution, quorum partibus and the many and more serious affrays of later times. Observe, too, that our bill proposes no exclusion of the ordinary magistrat, if the one attached to the institution is thought to execute his power either partially or remissly.—To Joseph C. Cabell. vi, 537. (M., 1816.)

8754. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Professors.—Our wish is to procure natives [for professors] where they can be found in a law. As it is of the first order in their respective lines; but, preferring foreigners of the first order to natives of the second, we shall certainly have to go for several of our professors to countries more advanced in science than we are.—To John Adams. vii, 139. Ford ed., x, 139. (M., 1819.)

8755. No secondary character will be received among them. Either the ablest which America or Europe can furnish, or none at all. They will give us the selected society of a great city separated from the dissipations and levities of its ephemeral insects.—To William Short. vii, 141. Ford ed., x, 145. (M., 1819.)

8756. Our intention is that its professors shall be of the first order in their respective lines which can be procured on either side of the Atlantic.—To Albert Gallatin. Ford ed., x, 236. (M., 1822.)

8757. A man is not qualified for a professor, knowing nothing but merely his own profession. He should be otherwise well educated as to the sciences generally; able to converse understandingly with the scientific men with whom he is associated, and to assist in the councils of the faculty on any subject of science on which they may have occasion to deliberate. Without this, he will incur their contempt, and bring disreputation on the institution.—To Joseph C. Cabell. vii, 331. (M., 1824.)

8758. I have the most unlimited confidence that in the appointment of professors to our nursing institution, every individual of the subscription will look with a single eye to the sublimation of its character, and as a seat, as our spermatozoa, "detur digniori." In this way it will honor us, and bless our country.—To Joseph C. Cabell. vii, 331. (M., 1824.)

8759. —— In some departments of science we believe Europe to be in advance before us, and that it would advance ourselves were we to draw from thence ‘instructors in these branches, and thus to improve our science, as we have done our manufactures, by borrowed skill. I have been much squibbed for this, perhaps by disappointed applicants for professorships, to which they were deemed incompetent.—To John Adams. vii, 388. (M., 1825.)

8760. —— I have no reason to regret the measure taken of procuring professors from abroad where science is so much ahead of us. You witnessed some of the puny squibs of which I was the butt on that account. They were probably from disappointed candidates, whose unorthodoxy has necessitated the applications to be passed over. The measure has been generally approved in the South and West; and by all liberal minds in the North. It has been peculiarly fortunate, too, that the professors brought from abroad were as happy selections as could have been hoped, as well for their qualifications in science as correctness and amiability of character. I think the example will be followed, and that it cannot fail to be one of the efficacious means of promoting that national skill, which it is so much the interest of both nations to cherish. These teachers can never utter an unfriendly sentiment towards their native country; and those into whom their instructions will be infused, are not of ordinary significance only; they are exactly the persons who are to succed to the government of our country, and to rule its future enmities, its friendships and fortunes. As it is our interest to receive instruction through this channel, so I think it is yours to furnish it; for these two nations holding cordially together, have nothing to fear from the united world. They will be the models for regenerating the condition of man, the sources from which representative government is to flow over the whole earth.—To J. Evelyn Denison. vii, 415. (M., 1825.)
8761. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Scope.—Our views are catholic for the improvement of our country by science.—To George Ticknor. vii, 301. (M., 1823.)

8762. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Studies.—A material question is what is the whole term of time which the student can give to the whole course of instruction? I should say that three years should be allowed to general education, and two, or rather three, to the particular profession for which they are destined. We [University of Virginia] receive sufficient students to be previously so far qualified in the languages, ancient and modern, as that one year in our schools shall suffice for their last polish. A student then with us may give his first year here to languages and mathematics; his second to mathematics and physics; his third to physics and chemistry, with the other objects of that school. I particularize this distribution merely for illustration, and not as that which either is, or perhaps ought to be established. This will allow the one year to be devoted to the sciences, two to mathematics, two to physics, and one to chemistry and its associates.—To Dr. John P. Emmett. vii, 442. (M., 1826.)

8763. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Text books.—In most public seminaries text books are prescribed to each of the several schools, as the norma docendi in that school; and this is generally done by authority of the trustees. I should not propose this generally in our University, because I believe none of us are so much at the heights of science in the several branches, as to undertake this, and therefore that it will be better left to the professors until occasion of interference shall be given. But there is one branch in which we are the more qualified to give opinions, and that is, the system by which we shall educate them, of so interesting a character to our own State and to the United States, as to make it a duty in us to lay down the principles which are to be taught. It is that of government. Mr. Gilmer being withdrawn, we know not who his successor may be, as it will have to deal with the new lawyer, or one of that school of quondam federalism, now consolidation. It is our duty to guard against such principles being disseminated among our youth, and the diffusion of that poison, by a preparation of the texts to be followed in their discourses.—To vii, 397. (M., 1825.)

8764. UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, Theology.—I agree with you that a professorship of theology should have no place in our institution.—To Thomas Cooper. vi, 389. (M., 1814.)

8765. In our University there is no professorship of divinity. A handle has been made of this to disseminate an idea that this is an institution, not merely of no religion, but against all religion. Occasion was taken at the last meeting of the Visitors, to bring forward an idea that might silence this calumny, which weighed on the minds of some honest friends to the institution. In our annual report to the Legislature, after stating the constitutional reasons against a public establishment of religion, in our institution, we suggest the expediency of encouraging the different religious sects to establish, each for itself, a professorship of their own tenets, on the confines of the University, so near as that their students may attend the lectures there, and have the free use of our library, and every other accommodation we can give them; preserving, however, their independence of us and of each other. This fills the chasm objected to ours, as a defect in an institution professing to give instruction in all useful sciences. I think the invitation will be accepted, by some sects from candid intentions, and by others from jealousy and rivalry. And by bringing the sects together, and mixing them with the mass of other students, we shall soften their asperities, liberalize and neutralize their prejudices, and make the general religion a religion of peace, reason and morality.—To Dr. Thomas Cooper. vii, 267. Ford ed., x, 279. (M., 1822.) See Education, Languages and Schools.

8766. USURPATION, Appeal against. —We have appealed to their [British people] native justice and magnanimity, as well as to the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations which were likely to interrupt our connection and correspondence. They, too, have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity.—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

8767. USURPATION, Parliamentary. —The act passed in the 4th year of his Majesty's reign [George III.], entitled "An Act for granting certain duties in the British Colonies and Plantations in America, &c."

other one act passed in the 5th year of his reign, entitled, "An Act for granting and applying certain stamp duties and other duties in the British Colonies and Plantations in America, &c.", another act passed in the 6th year of his reign, entitled, "An Act for the better securing the dependency of his Majesty's dominions in America upon the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain, &c.", another act passed in the 7th year of his reign, entitled, "An Act for granting duties on paper, tea, &c.", form that connected chain of parliamentary usurpation which has been the subject of frequent applications to his Majesty, and the Houses of Lords and Commons of Great Britain.

8768. VACATIONS, Health and. —The diseases of the season incident to most situations on the tide waters, now begin to show themselves here [Washington], and to threaten some of our members [of the cabinet] together with the probability of a uniform course of things in the Chesapeake [affair], induce us to prepare for leaving this place during the two sickly months, as well for the purposes of health as to bestow some little attention to our private affairs, which are necessary season or occasion. Your statements will be fixed and known, so that everything will find us at them, with the same certainty as if they were here; and such measures of intercourse will be established as that the public business will be carried on at them, with all the regularity and dispatch necessary.—To W. H. Cabell. v, 144. Ford ed., ix, 91. (W., July 1807.)

8769. In consideration of the unhealthy season now approaching at this as *Congress changed so as to read: "We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and have confidence in you, by the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connection and correspondence. They, too, have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity."—EDITOR.
other places on the tide-waters, and which we have always retired from about this time, the members of the Administration, as well as myself, shall leave this place [Washington] in those months not to return till the subject is over, unless something extraordinary should reassemble us.—To COLONEL TATTHAM. v. 145. (W., July 1807.)

8770. VACATIONS, Presidential.—I consider it as a trying experiment for a person from the mountains to pass the two bilious months on the tide-waters. I have not done it these forty years, and nothing should induce me to do it. As it is not possible but that the Administration must take some portion of time for their own affairs, I think it best they should select that season for absence. General Washington set the example of those two months, and, in constant it eight months. I should not suppose our bringing it back to two months a ground for grumbling, but, grumble will, I will never pass those two months on tide-water.—To ALBERT GALATIN. FORD ED., viii, 95. (M., Sep. 1801.)

8771. VACATIONS, Public officials and.—One reason for suggesting the discontinuance of the daily post was, that it was not kept up by contract, but at the expense of the United States. But the principal reason was to avoid giving ground for clamor. The general idea is, that those who receive annual compensations should be constantly at their posts. Our constituents might not in the first moment consent to it, but we have previously to take care of which we cannot abandon for temporary salaries; and that, we have health to take care of which at this season cannot be preserved at Washington; 3d, that while at our separate homes our public duties are fully executed, and at home have greater personal labor than while we are together when a short conference saves a long letter.—To JAMES MADISON. v. 181. FORD ED., ix, 134. (M., Sep. 1807.)

8772. VACCINATION, Utility of.—I am happy to see that vaccination is introduced, and likely to be kept up, in Philadelphia; but I shall not think it exhibits all its utility until experience shall have hit upon some mark peculiar and by distinguish genuine from spurious virus. It was with this view that I wished to discover whether time could not be made the standard, and supposed, from the little experience I had, that matter, taken at eight times twenty-four hours from the time of insertion, could always be in the proper state. As far as I went I found it so; but I shall be happy to learn what the immense field of experience in Philadelphia will teach us on that subject.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 425. FORD ED., viii, 126. (W., Dec. 1801.)

—VALUE, Intrinsinc.—See Dollar and Money.

8773. VANITY, Personal.—I have not the vanity to count myself among those the State would think worth oppressing with perpetual service.—To JAMES MONROE. i, 320. FORD ED., iii, 50. (M., 1782.)

8774. VAN RENSSELAER (General S.), Failure of.—Will not Van Rensselaer be broke for cowardice and incapacity? To advance such a body of men across a river without securing boats to bring them off in case of disaster, has cost us seven hundred men; and have taken no part himself in such an action, and against such a general will be nothing but cowardice.—To PRESIDENT MADISON. FORD ED. ix, 370. (M., Nov. 1812.)

8775. VATTEL (Emmerich von), Character of.—Let us appeal to enlightened and disinterested judges. No one is more so than Vattle.—To E. C. GENET. iii, 588. FORD ED., vi, 309. (Pa., 1793.)

8776. — Vattle is one of the most zealous and constant advocates for the preservation of good faith in all our dealings.—Opinion of President Madison, vii, 620. FORD ED., vi, 228. (1793.)

8777. VEGETABLES, Cultivating.—The wealthy people [in Virginia] are attentive to the raising of vegetables, but very little so to fruits. The poorer people attend to neither, living principally on milk and animal diet. This is the most inexcusable, as the climate requires one more conducive to the health of man, and a most agreeable food, for health as well as comfort.—Notes on Virginia, viii, 393. FORD ED., iii, 257. (1782.)

8778. VEGETABLES, Jefferson’s diet.—I live so much like other people, that I might refer to ordinary life as the history of my own. I have lived temperately, eating little animal food, and that not as an aliment, so much as a compliment for the vegetables, which constitute my principal diet. I double, however, the Doctor’s [Rush’s] glass and a half of wine, and even treble it with a friend; but halve its effects by drinking the weak wines only. The vegetable and vegetable liquors can not bring incontinent spirits in any form. Malt liquors and cider are my table drinks, and my breakfast is of tea and coffee. I have been blest with organs of digestion which accept and concord, without ever murmuring, whatever the palate chooses to partake of them, and I do not yet lose my tooth by age.—To DR. VINE UTLEY. vii, 116. FORD ED., x, 125. (M., 1819.)

8779. VEGETATION, Electricity, light and.—Dr. Ingenhousz, you know, discovered as he supposed, from experiment, that vegetation might be promoted by occasional streams of the electrical fluid to pass through a plant, and that other physicians had received and communicated the same discovery. He has repeated it, and finds by more decisive experiments that the electrical fluid can neither forward nor retard vegetation. Uncorrected still of the rage of drawing general conclusions from partial and equivocal observations, he hazards the conclusion, that vegetation is promoted by the use of vegetable and vegetable fluids, and heretofore supposed from observation, that light affects the color of living bodies, whether vegetable or animal; but that either one or the other receives nutriment from that fluid, must be permitted to be doubted of, till better confirmed by observation. It is always better to have no ideas than false ones; to believe nothing than to believe what is wrong. In my mind, theories are more easily demolished than rebuilt.—To REV. JAMES MADISON. ii, 430. (P., 18.)

8780. VENISON, Philosophy and.—You have sent me a noble animal, legitimated by superior force as a monarch of the forest; and he has incurred the death which his brother legitimates have so much more merited; like them, in death, he becomes food for a nobler race. He for man, they for worms that will revel on them; but he dies innocent, and with death all his fears and pains are at an end; they die loaded with maledictions, and liable to a sentence and sufferings which we will leave to the justice of heaven to award. In plain English, we shall heartily feed on him, and thank you heartily as the giver of the feast.—To JOHN FRY. FORD ED., x, 284. (M., 1823.)
8781. VERGENNES (Count de), Assistants.—Reyneval and Hennin are the two eyes of Count de Vergennes. The former is the more important character, because possessing the most of the confidence of the Count. He is rather cunning than wise, his views of things being better adapted to the liberal views of the Minister. He governs himself by principles which he has learned by rote, and is fit only for the details of execution. His heart is susceptible of little passions, but not of good ones. He is brother-in-law to M. Gerard, from whom he received disadvantageous views of the minister, and on which account he cannot bear to be looked upon as his protégé. He has much duplicity. Hennin is a philosopher, sincere, friendly, liberal, learned, beloved by everybody; the other by nobody. I think it a great misfortune that the United States are in the department of the former.—To JAMES MADISON, ii, 109. FORD ED., iv, 368. (P., 1787.)

8782. VERGENNES (Count de), Great and good.—He is a great and good minister, and an accident to him might endanger the peace of Europe.—To EDWARD CARRINGTON, i, 99. FORD ED., iv, 359. (P., 1787.)

8783. — His loss would at all times have been great; but it would be immense during the critical poise of European affairs existing at this moment.—To JOHN JAY, ii, 113. (P., 1787.)

8784. VERGENNES (Count de), Monarchist.—Vergennes is a great minister in European affairs, but has very imperfect ideas of our institutions, and no confidence in them. His devotion to the principles of pure despotism renders him uneffectual to our governments. But his fear of England makes him value us as a make-weight. He is cool, reserved in political conversations, but free and familiar on other subjects, and a very attentive, agreeable person to do business with. It is impossible to have a clearer, better organized head, but age has chilled his heart.—To JAMES MADISON, ii, 108. FORD ED., iv, 366. (P., 1787.)

8785. VERGENNES (Count de), Reputation.—The Count de Vergennes had the reputation with the diplomatic corps of being wise, just, liberal, and just, and so he might be with those whom he knew to be slippery and double-faced themselves. As he saw that I had no inaccurate views, practised no subtleties, meddled in no intrigues, pursued no concealed object, I found him as frank, as honorable, as easy of access to reason, as any man with whom I had ever done business; and I must say the same for his successor, Montmorin, one of the most honest and worthy of human beings.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY, i, 64. FORD ED., i, 90. (M., 1821.)

8786. VERMONT, Separation from New York.—The four northernmost States wish Vermont to be received into the Union. The middle and southernmost States are rather opposed to it. But the great difficulty arises with New York which claims that territory. In the beginning every individual of that State revoluted at the idea of giving them up. Congress, therefore, only interfered from time to time to prevent the two parties from coming to an open rupture. In the meanwhile the minds of the Northern States have been familiarizing to the idea of a separation, and I think 't will not be long before they will consent to it.—ANSWERS TO M. DE MEUNIER, ix, 284. FORD ED., iv, 140. (P., 1786.) See OFFICES, UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

8787. VETERINARY COLLEGES, Advantages.—The advantages of the veterinary institution proposed, may perhaps be doubted. If it be problematical whether physicians prevent death where the disease, una, did, would be the terminus, rather than they produce it, where order would have been restored to the system by the process, if uninterrupted, provided by nature, and in the case of a man who can describe the seat of his disease, its character, progress, and often its cause, what might we expect from him? But as the answers of men of &c., yielding no sensible and certain indications of his disease? They have long had these institutions in Europe; has the world received as yet one iota of valuable information from them? be it has, it v the progress one. At any rate, it may be doubted whether, where in many institutions of obvious utility are yet wanting, we should select this one to take the lead.—To JOEL BARLOW, v, 402. (W., 1808.)

8788. VETERINARY COLLEGES, Utility.—I know nothing of the veterinary institution of London * * * I know well the Veterinary school of Paris, of long standing, and saw many of its publications during my residence there; there were formerly written, announced a want of nothing but the want of time to bring to their facts, which granted, the hypotheses were learned and plausible. The coach-horses of the rich of Paris were availed of the institution: but the farmers even of the neighborhood could not afford to call a veterinary doctor to their plough horses in the country, or to send them to a livable stable to be attended in the city. On the whole, I was not a convert to the utility of the Institution.—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH, vi, 105. (M., 1813.)

8789. — That there are certain diseases of the human body, so distinctly pronounced by well-articulated symptoms, and recurring so often, as not to be mistaken, wherein experience has proved that certain substances applied, will restore order, I cannot doubt. * * * But there are also a great mass of indiscriminate diseases, presenting themselves under no form clearly characterized, nor exactly recognized as having their real irritant or true cause. Of course, the application of no particular substance can be known to have been made, nor its effect on the case experienced. These may be called unknown cases, and they may in time be lessened by the progress of observation and experiment. Observing that there are in the construction of the animal system some means provided unknown to us, which have a tendency to restore order, when disturbed by accident, called by physicians the vis medicatrix naturei. I think it safer to trust to this power in the unknown cases, than to uncertain conjectures built on the ever-changing hypothetical systems of medicine. Now in the Veterinary department all are unknown cases. Man can tell his physicians the state of the pain, its duration, and sometimes its cause, and can follow his directions for the curative process; but the poor dumb horse cannot signify where his pain is, what it is, or when or whence it came, and resists all process for its cure. * * * In the case of animals, we often benefit from medicine, in such cases admits of question, what must it be in that of the horse? And to what narrow limits is the real importance of the veterinary art reduced?—To DR. BENJAMIN RUSH, vi, 105. (M., 1813.)

table and insupportable tyranny, by putting his negative on laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 8. (June 1776.)

8791. VETO, By council.—The governor, two councilors of State, and a judge from each of the superior courts of chancery, common law, and admiralty, shall be a council to revise all bills which shall have passed both houses of Assembly, in which council the governor, when present, shall preside. Every bill, before it becomes a law, shall be represented to this council, who shall have a right to advise its rejection, returning the bill, with their advice and reasons in writing, to the house in which it originated, who shall proceed to reconsider the said bill. But if after such reconsideration, two-thirds of the house shall be of opinion that the bill should pass finally, they shall pass it and send it, with the advice and written reasons of the said Council of Revision, to the other house, wherein if two-thirds also shall be of opinion it should pass finally, it shall thereupon become law; otherwise it shall not.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION, viii, 451. FORD ED., iii, 330. (1783.)

8792. VETO, Congressional.—The negative, proposed to be given to Congress on all the acts of the several legislatures, is now, for the first time, suggested to my mind. Primâ facie I do not like it. It fails in an essential character, that the hole and the patch should be commensurate. But this proposes to mend a small hole by covering the whole government. Not more than one out of one hundred State acts concerns the Confederacy. This proposition, then, in order to give them one degree of power, which they ought to have, gives them ninety-nine more which they ought not to have, upon a presumption that they will not exercise the ninety-nine. But upon every act, there will be a preliminary question, does this concern the Confederacy? And was there ever a proposition so plain as to pass Congress without a debate? Their decisions are almost always wise; they are like pure metal. But you know of how much dross this is the result.—To JAMES MADISON. ii, 152. FORD ED., iv, 390. (P., June 1787.)

8793. VETO, Denial of.—The Administrator shall have no negative on the proceedings of the Legislature.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 18. (June 1776.)

8794. VETO, Discretion in use of.—If the pro and con for and against a bill hang so even as to balance the President’s judgment, a just respect for the wisdom of the Legislature would naturally decide the balance in favor of their opinion. It is chiefly for cases where they are clearly misled by error, am

8795. VETO, Effects of non-use.—The non-user of his negative begins already to excite a belief that no President will ever venture to use it; and has, consequently, begun a desire to raise up barriers in the State legislatures against Congress, throwing off the control of the Constitution.—Opinion on Apportionment Bill. vii, 601. FORD ED., v, 500. (1792.)

8796. VETO, Executive.—I like the negative given [in the Federal Constitution] to the Executive, with a third of either house; though I should have liked it better had the Judiciary been associated for that purpose, or invested with a similar and separate power.*—To JAMES Madison. ii, 339. FORD ED., iv, 475. (P., 1787.)

8797. VETO, First Presidential.—He [President Washington] sent it [veto of the Apportionment bill] to the House of Representatives. A few of the hottest friends of the bill expressed passion but the majority were satisfied and both in and out of doors it gave pleasure to have at length an instance of the negative being exercised.—The Ana.

8798. VETO, Inhuman.—He [George III.] has endeavored to pervert the exercise of the kingly office in Virginia into a detestable and insupportable tyranny * * * by prompting our negroes to rise in arms among us; those very negroes whom, by an inhuman use of his negative, he had refused us permission to exclude by law.—PROPOSED VA. CONSTITUTION. FORD ED., ii, 11. (June 1776.)

8799. VETO, King’s.—By the Constitution of Great Britain, as well as of the several American States, his Majesty possesses the power of refusing to pass into a law, any bill which has already passed the other two branches of the legislature. His Majesty, however, and his ancestors, conscious of the impropriety of opposing their single opinion to the united wisdom of two houses of Parliament, while their proceedings were unbiased by interested principles, for several ages past have modestly declined the exercise of this power, in that part of his empire called Great Britain. But by change of circumstances, other principles than those of justice simply, have obtained an influence on their determinations. The addition of new States to the British Empire has produced an addition of new, and, sometimes, opposite interests. It is now, therefore, the great office of his Majesty, to resume the exercise of his negative power, and to prevent the passage of laws by any one legislature of the Empire, which might bear injuriously on the rights and interests of another. Yet this will not excuse the wanton exercise of this power, which we have seen his Majesty practice on the laws of the American legislatures. For the most trifling reasons, and, sometimes for

* This extract from the Ford edition is in Jefferson's own words. no conceivable reason at all, his Majesty has rejected laws of the most salutary tendency. The abolition of domestic slavery is the great object of desire* in those Colonies, where it was, unhappily, introduced in their infant state. But previous to the enfranchisement of the slaves we have, it is necessary to exclude all further importations from Africa. Yet our repeated attempts to effect this, by prohibitions, and by imposing duties which might amount to a prohibition, have been hitherto defeated by his Majesty's negative: Thus preferring the immediate advantages of a few British corsairs to the lasting interests of the American States, and to the rights of human nature, deeply wounded by this infamous practice. Nay, the single interposition of an interested individual against a law was scarcely ever known to fail of success, though, in the opposite scale were placed the interests of a whole country. This is so shameful an abuse of a power, trusted with his Majesty for other purposes, as if not reformed, would call for some legal restrictions.

8801. VETO, Prostituted.—Determined to keep open a market where MEN should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or to restrain this execrable commerce.†—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AS DRAWN BY JEFFERSON.

8802. VETO, Protection by.—The negative of the President is the shield provided by the Constitution to protect against the invasions of the Legislature: 1. The right of the Executive. 2. Of the Judiciary. 3. Of the States and State Legislatures.—NATIONAL BANK OPINION. vii. 560. FORD ED., v. 289. (1791.)

8803. VETO, Qualified.—I approved, from the first moment, of the great mass of what is in the new Constitution; * * * the qualified negative on laws given to the Executive, which, however, I should have liked better if associated with the judiciary also, as in New York.—To F. HOPKINSON. ii. 586. FORD ED., v. 76. (P., March 1789.)

8804. VETO, Satisfactory use.—The negative of the President can never be used more pleasingly to the public than in the protection of the Constitution.—OPINION ON APPORTNMENT BILL. vii. 601. FORD ED., v. 500. (1792.)

* * * In asserting," says Parton in his Life of Jefferson, "that the great object of desire in the Colonies was the abolition of slavery, he expressed rather the feeling of his own set,—the educated and high-minded young Whigs of the Southern Colonies, than the sentiments of the great body of the slaveholders. He could boast that the first act of his own life had been an attempt in that direction."—EDITOR.

8805. VETO, Suspensive.—The National Assembly [of France] have determined that the King shall have a suspensive and iterative veto; that is, after negating a law, it cannot be presented again till after a new election. If he negatives it then, it cannot be presented a third time till after another new election. If it be then presented, he is obliged to pass it. This is perhaps justly considered as a more useful negative than an absolute one, which a King would be afraid to use.—TO JOHN JAY. iii. 115. (P., 1789.)

8806. VICE, Knowledge and.—Although I do not, with some enthusiasts, believe that the human condition will ever advance to such a state of perfection as that there shall no longer be pain or vice in the world, yet I believe it susceptible of much improvement, and most of all, in matters of government and religion; and that the diffusion of knowledge among the people is to be the instrument by which it is to be effected.—TO DUPONT DE Nemours. vi. 592. FORD ED., x. 25. (P.F. 1816.)

8807. VICE-PRESIDENCY, Acceptance of.—The idea that I would accept the office of President, but that of Vice-President of the United States, had not its origin with me. I never thought of questioning the free exercise of the right of my fellow citizens to marshal those whom they call into their service according to their fitness, nor ever presumed that they were not the best judges of that. Had I indulged a wish in what manner they should dispose of me, it would precisely have coincided with what they have done.—TO JAMES SULLIVAN. iv. 168. FORD ED., vii. 116. (M., Feb. 9, 1797.)

8808. VICE-PRESIDENCY, Candidates for.—I presume there will not be a vote against General Washington [for President] in the United States. It is more doubtful who will be Vice-President. The age of Dr. Franklin, and the doubt whether he would accept it, are the only circumstances that admit a question, but that he would be the man. After these two characters of first magnitude, there are so many which present themselves equally, on the second line, that we cannot see which of them will be singled out. John Adams, Hancock, Jay, Madison, Rutledge, will all be voted for.—TO WILLIAM CARMICHAEL. ii. 465. (P., Aug. 1788.)

8809. VICE-PRESIDENCY, Ceremony and.—I hope I shall be made a part of no ceremony whatever. I shall escape into the city as covertly as possible. If Governor Mifflin should show any symptoms of ceremony, pray contrive to parry them.—TO JAMES MADISON. iv. 167. FORD ED., vii. 116. (M., Jan. 1797.)

8810. VICE-PRESIDENCY, Duties of.—As to duty, the Constitution will know me only as the member of the Legislative body; and its principle is, that of a separation of Legislative, Executive and Judiciary functions, except in cases specified. If this principle be not expressed in direct terms, it is clearly the spirit of the Constitution and it ought to be so commented and acted on by every friend of free government.—To James Madison. iv, 161. Ford ed., vii, 108. (M., Jan. 1797.)

8811. Vice-Presidency, Easy and honorable.—The second office of the* government is honorable and easy; the first is but a splendid misery.—To Elbridge Gerry. iv, 171. Ford ed., vii, 120. (Pa., 1797.)

8812. Vice-Presidency, Jefferson and.—I was not aware of any necessity of going on to Philadelphia immediately, yet I had determined to do it, as a mark of respect to the public, and to do away the doubts which have spread, that I should consider the second office as beneath my acceptance.—To James Madison. iv, 161. Ford ed., vii, 107. (M., Jan. 1797.)

8813. ——. I know not from what source an idea has spread itself * * * that I would accept the office of President of the United States, but not of Vice-President. When I retired from the office I last held, no man in the Union less expected than I did ever to have come forward again; and, whatever has been intimated to the contrary, I am no more inclined to the Vice-Presidency than my name bore in the late contest more unexpected than it was to me. If I had contemplated the thing beforehand, and suffered my will to enter into action at all on it, it would have been in a direction exactly the reverse of what has been imputed to me; but I had no right to a will on the subject, much less to control that of the people of the United States in arranging us according to our capacities. Least of all could I have any feelings which would revolt at taking a station secondary to Mr. Adams. I have been secondary to him in every situation in which we ever acted together in public life for twenty years past. A contrary position would have been the novelty, and his the right of revolting at it. Be assured, then, that if I had had a fibre in my composition still looking after public office, it would have been gratified precisely by the very call you are pleased to announce to me, and no other.—To John Langdon. iv, 165. Ford ed., vii, 111. (M., Jan. 1797.)

8814. ——. Since I am called out, an object of great anxiety to me is that those with whom I am to act, shutting their minds to the unfounded abuse of which I have been the subject, will view me with the same candor with which I shall certainly act.—To John Langdon. iv, 164. Ford ed., vii, 112. (M., Jan. 1797.)

8815. Vice-Presidency, Notification of election.—I suppose that the choice of Vice-President has fallen on me * * * I believe it belongs to the Senate to notify the Vice-President of his election. I recollect to have heard, that on the first election of President and Vice-President, gentlemen of considerable office were sent to notify the parties chosen. But this was the inauguration This government in Ford edition.—Editor of our new government, and ought not to be drawn into example. At the second election, both gentlemen were on the spot and needed no messengers. On the present occasion, the President will be on the spot, so that what is now to be done respects myself alone; and considering that the season of notification will always present one difficulty, that the distance in the present case adds a second, not incon siderable, and which may in future happen to be sometimes much more considerable, I hope the Senate will adopt that method of notification, which will always be least troublesome and most certain. The channel of the post is certainly the least troublesome, is the most rapid, and, considering also that it may be sent by duplicates and triplicates, is unquestionably the most certain. Enclosed to the postmaster at Charlottesville, with an order to send it by express, no hazard can attend the sending of notification. Apprehending, that should there be a difference of opinion on this subject in the Senate, my ideas of self-respect might be supposed by some to require something more formal and inconvenient, I beg leave to avail myself of your friendship to declare, if a different proposition should make it necessary, that I consider the channel of the post-office as the most eligible in every respect, and that it is to me the most desirable; which I take the liberty of expressing, not with a view of encroaching on the respect due to that discretion which the Senate have a right to exercise on the occasion, but to render them the more free in the exercise of it, by taking off whatsoever weight the supposition of a contrary desire in me might have on the mind of any member. —To Henry Tazewell. iv, 160. Ford ed., vii, 106. (M., Jan. 1797.)

8816. Vice-Presidency, Oath of office.—I have turned to the Constitution and laws, and find nothing to warrant the opinion that I might not have been qualified here [Monticello] or wherever else I could meet with a Senator; any member of that body being authorized to administer the oath, without being confined to time or place, and consequently to make a record of it, and to deposit it with the records of the Senate. However, I shall come on, on the principle which had first determined me—respect to the public.—To James Madison. iv, 167. Ford ed., vii, 116. (M., 1797.)

8817. Vice-Presidency, Preference for.—It seems possible * * * that you may see me in Philadelphia about the beginning of March, exactly in that character which if I were to reappear at Philadelphia, I would prefer to all others; for I cherish the sentiment of Clorinda to "L'altre tetto, l'humile non sdegno".—To Mr. Volney. iv, 158. (M., Jan. 1797.)

8818. Vice-Presidency, Pride and. —As to the second [office], it is the only office in the world about which I am unable to decide in my own mind whether I had rather have it, or not have it. Pride does not enter into the estimate; for I think with the Romans that the general of to-day should be a soldier to-morrow if necessary. I can particularly have no feelings which would revolt at a secondary position to Mr. Adams. I am his junior in life, was his junior in Congress, his junior in the diplomatic line, his junior lately in the civil government.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 155. FORD ed., vii, 98. (M., Jan. 1797.)

1829. VICE-PRESIDENCY, Tranquil and unoffending.—I thank you for your congratulations on the public call on me to undertake the second office in the United States, but still more for the justice you do me in viewing as I do the escape from the first. I have no wish again to meddle in public affairs, being happier at home than I can be anywhere else. Still less do I wish to engage in an office where it would be impossible to satisfy either friends or foes, and less still at all a moment when the storm is about to burst, which has been conjuring up for four years past. If I am to act, however, a more tranquil and unoffending station could not have been found for me, nor one so analogous to the dispositions of my mind. It will give me philosophical evenings in the winter, and rural days in summer.—To Dr. BENJAMIN RUSH. iv, 165. FORD ed., vii, 113. (M., Jan. 1797.)

1820. — I am so much attached to my domestic situation, that I would not have wished to leave it at all. However, if I am to be called from it, the shortest absences and most tranquil station suit me best. —To JAMES SULLIVAN. iv, 168. FORD ed., vii, 117. (M., 1797.)

1821. VIGILANCE, Eye of.—Be not weary of well doing. Let the eye of vigilance never be closed.—To SPENCER ROANE. vii, 212. FORD ed., x, 189. (M., 1821.)

1822. VINCENNES, Danger from Indians.—I have the pleasure to enclose you the particulars of Colonel Clark's success against Vincennes. * * * I fear it will be impossible for Colonel Clark to be so strengthened as to enable him to do what he desires. Indeed, the express who brought this letter, gives us reason to fear Vincennes is in danger from a large body of Indians collected to attack it, and said, when he came from Kaskaskias, to be within thirty leagues of the place.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. i, 221. FORD ed., ii, 240. (Wg., 1779.)

1823. VINCENNES, Loyalty of.—I have ever considered them as sober, honest, and orderly citizens, submissive to the laws, and faithful to the nation of which they are a part. And should occasion arise of proving the fidelity in the cause of their country, I count on their aid with as perfect assurance as on that of any other part of the United States.—To WILLIAM M'INTOSH. v, 242. (W., 1808.)

1824. VINDICATION, Appeal for.—I should have retired at the end of the first four years, but that the immense load of tory calumnies which have been manufactured respecting me, and have filled the European market, have obliged me to appeal once more to my country for justification. I have no fear but that I shall receive honorable testimony by their verdict on these calumnies. At the end of the next four years I shall certainly retire. Age, inclination, and principle all dictate this.—To PHILIP MAZZEI. iv, 553. D. L. J., 310. (July 1804.)

1825. VINDICATION, Seeking.—A desire to leave public office, with a reputation not more blotted than it has deserved, will oblige me to emerge at the next session of our Assembly and, perhaps, to accept of a seat in it. But as I go with a single object, I shall withdraw when that shall be accomplished.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. i, 313. FORD ed., iii, 50. (M., 1781.)

1826. VINE, Cultivation of.—The vine is the parent of misery. Those who cultivate it are always poor, and he who would employ himself with us in the culture of corn, cotton, tobacco, or any other thing necessary for more wine, and better, than he could raise by its direct culture.—To GEORGE WYTHE. ii, 266. FORD ed., iv, 443. (P., 1787.) See WINES.

1827. VIRGINIA, American Revolution and.—An inquiry into the exertions of Virginia in the common cause during the period of her exemption from military invasion would be proper for the patriotic historian, because her character has been very unjustly impeached by the writers of other States, as having used no equal exertions at that time. I know it to be false; because having all that time been a member of the Legislature, I know that our whole occupation was in straining the resources of the State to the utmost to furnish men, money, provisions and other necessaries to the common cause. The proofs of this will be found in the journals and acts of the Legislature, in executive proceedings and papers, and in the auditor's accounts. Not that Virginia furnished her quota of requisitions of either men or money; but that she was always above par, in what was actually furnished by the other States.—To SKELETON JONES. v, 461. (M., 1809.)

1828. VIRGINIA, British invasion.—On the 31st of December, a letter from a private gentleman to General Nelson came to my hands, notifying, that in the morning of the preceding day a twenty-seven sail of vessels had entered the capes; and from the tenor of the letter we had reason to expect, within a few hours, further intelligence; whether they were friends or foes, their force and other circumstances. We immediately dispatched General Nelson to the lower country, with powers to call on the militia in that quarter, or to act otherwise as exigencies should require; but waited further intelligence before we would call for militia from the middle or upper country. No further intelligence came until the 2d instant, when the former was confirmed; it was there- tained they had advanced up James River in Warrasqueak bay. All arrangements were immediately taken for calling in a sufficient body of militia for opposition. In the night of the 3d we received and advice they were at the opposite Jamesown. We then supposed Williamsburg to be their object. The wind, however, which had hitherto been unfavorable, shifted fair, and the tide being also in their favor, they found the river that evening and, with the next tide, came up to Westover, having on their way taken possession of some works we had at Hood's by which two or three of their vessels received some damage but which were of necessity abandoned by the small garrison of fifty men placed there on the enemy's landing to invest the works. In intelligence of their having quitted the station at Jamestown, from which we supposed they meant to land for Williamsburg, and of their having got in the evening to Kennon's, reached us the next morning at five o'clock, and was the first indication of their meaning to penetrate towards Petersburg (Richmond). As the orders for drawing militia here had been given but two days, no opposition was in readiness. Every effort was therefore necessary, to withdraw the arms and other military stores, records, &c, from this place. Every effort was, accordingly, made to convey them about twenty-five miles, and to a laboratory six miles, above this place, till about sunset of that day, when we learned the enemy had come to an anchor at Westover that morning. We then knew that this, and not Petersburg was their object, and began to carry across the river to everything remaining here, and to remove what had been transported to the foundry and laboratory to Westham, the nearest crossing, seven miles above this place, which operation was continued till they had approached very near. They landed two thousand strong in the afternoon of the 4th, and entered Richmond at one o'clock in the afternoon of the 5th. A regiment of infantry and about thirty horse continued on, without halting, to the foundry. They burned that, the boring mill, the magazine and proceeded to Westham; but nothing being in their power there, they retired to Richmond. The next morning, they burned some buildings of public and private property, with what stores remained in them, destroyed two great stores and smoke yards, about twelve o'clock, retired towards Westover, where they encamped within the neck the next day. The loss sustained is not yet accurately known. As far as I have been able to discover, it consisted, at this place, of about three hundred and fifty men, carrying across the river to a small amount, some quartermaster's stores, of which one hundred and twenty sides of leather was the principal article, part of the artificer's tools, and three wagons. Besides which, five brass four pounders, which were alongside of the river, were procured to them, raised and carried off. At the foundry we lost the greater part of the papers belonging to the Auditor's office, and of the books and papers of the Council office. About five or six tons of powder, as we conjecture, was thrown into the canal, of which there will be a considerable saving by remanufacturing it. The roof of the foundry was burned, but the stacks of chimneys and furnaces not at all injured. The boring mill was consumed. Within less than forty-eight hours from a time of their landing and nineteen from our knowing their destination, they had penetrated thirty-three miles, done the whole injury, and retired.—To General Washington. i. 282. Ford ed., ii. 405. (M. 1809.)

8829. Their numbers, from the best intelligence I have had, are about fifteen hundred infantry; and, as to their cavalry, accounts vary from fifty to one hundred and twenty. (M. 1809.) We refer to the pamphlet called Common Sense, in Virginia papers, February, and copies of the pamphlet itself had got in a few hands. But the idea had not been opened to the mass of the people in the State, can it be said that they had made up their minds, or that they were concealed. So that the electors of April, 1776, no more than the legislatures of July, 1775, not thinking of independence and a permanent republic, could not mean to vest in these delegates powers of establishing them, or any authorities other than those of the ordinary legislature. So far as a temporary organization of government was necessary to render our opposition energetic, so far their organization was valid. But they received in their creation no powers but what were given to every legislature before and since. They could not, therefore, pass an act transcendent to the powers of other legislatures.—Notes on Virginia. viii. 363. Ford ed., iii. 225. (1782.) See Virginia Constitution, Repealability.

8830. VIRGINIA, Conventions in.—These were at first chosen anew for every particular county. On the 2nd of O crowded meeting was held at Williamsburg, 1775, the 5th. A convention was recom- mended to the people to choose a convention which should continue in office a year. This was done, accordingly, in April, 1775, and in July following that convention passed an ordi- nance for the election of delegates in the month of August. At that time, 2d July, 1775, a separation from Great Britain and establishment of republican government, had never yet entered into any person's mind. A convention, therefore, chosen under that ordi- nance, cannot be said to have been chosen for purposes of a great and permanent government, for it was only the minds of those who passed it. Under this ordinance, at the annual election in April, 1776, a convention for the year was chose. Independ- ence, and the establishment of a new form of government, were not even the objects of the people at large. An extract from this pamphlet called Common Sense had appeared in the Virginia papers in February, and copies of the pamphlet itself had got in a few hands. But the idea had not been opened to the mass of the people in the State, can it be said that they had made up their minds, or that they were concealed. So that the electors of April, 1776, no more than the legislatures of July, 1775, not thinking of independence and a permanent republic, could not mean to vest in these delegates powers of establishing them, or any authorities other than those of the ordinary legislature. So far as a temporary organization of government was necessary to render our opposition energetic, so far their organization was valid. But they received in their creation no powers but what were given to every legislature before and since. They could not, therefore, pass an act transcendent to the powers of other legislatures.—Notes on Virginia. viii. 363. Ford ed., iii. 225. (1782.) See Virginia Constitution, Repealability.
those people, who, 'in order to obtain justice for injuries, however great or small, must, by the laws of that Colony, attend their county court, at such a distance, with all their witnesses, monthly, till their litigation be determined?'—

8832. VIRGINIA, Love for.—My native State is endeared to me by every tie which can attach the human heart.—R. TO A. VIRGINIA ASSEMBLY. viii, 148. (1809.)

8833. VIRGINIA, Political opposition In.—Better that any one [of the other States] take the lead [against consolidation] than Virginia, where opposition is considered as commonplace, and a mere matter of form and habit. —To C. W. GEDCET. vii, 430. (M., 1826.)

8834. VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION, Amendments to.—That it is really important to provide a constitution for our State cannot be doubted; as little can it be doubted that the importance called by that name has important defects. But before we attempt to improve it, we should endeavor to be as certain as is practicable that in the attempt we should not make bad worse. I have understood that Mr. Henry has always been opposed to this undertaking; and I confess that I consider his talents and influence such as that, were it decided that we should call a convention for the purpose of amending, I should fear he might induce that convention either to fix the thing as at present, or change it for the worse. Would it not, therefore, be well that means should be adopted for coming at his ideas of the changes he would agree to, and for communicating to him those which we should propose? Perhaps he might find ours not so distant from his, but that some mutual sacrifices might bring them together. I shall hazard my own ideas to you as hastily as my business obliges me. I wish to follow the line drawn by the Federal Constitution between the General and particular governments as it stands at present, and to take every prudent means of preventing either from stepping over it. Though the experiment has not yet had a long enough course to show us from which quarter encroachments are most to be feared, yet it is easy to foresee, from the nature of things, that the encroachments of the State governments will tend to an excess of liberty which will correct itself (as in the late instance), while those of the General Government will tend to monarchy, which will fortify itself from day to day, instead of working its own cure, as all experience shows. I would rather be exposed to the inconveniences attending too much liberty than those attending too small a degree of it. Then it is important to strengthen the State governments; and as this cannot be done by any change in the Federal Constitution (for the preservation of that is all we need contend for), it must be done by the States themselves, erecting such barriers at the constitutional line as cannot be surmounted either by themselves or by the General Government.

The only barrier in their power is a wise government. A weak one will lose ground in every contest. To obtain a wise and an able government, I consider the following changes as important. Render the Legislature a desirable station by lessening the number of representatives (say to 100) and lengthening somewhat their term, and proportion them equally among the electors; adopt, also, a better mode of appointing senators. Render the Executive a more desirable post to men of abilities by making it more independent of the Legislature; to wit, let him be chosen by other electors, for a longer time, and ineligible forever after. Responsibility is a tremendous engine in a free government. Let him feel the whole weight of it then, by taking away the shelter of his executive council. Experience both ways has already established the superiority of this measure. Render the Judiciary respectable by every possible means, to wit, firm tenure in office, competent salaries, and reduction of their numbers. Men of high learning and abilities are few in every country; and by taking in those who are not so, the able part of the body have their hands tied by the unable. This branch of the government will have the weight of the conflict on their hands, because they will be the last appeal of reason. These are my general ideas of amendments; but, preserving the ends, I should be flexible and conciliatory as to the means.—To ARCHIBALD STUART. iii, 314. FORD ed., v, 408. (Pa., Dec. 1791.)

8835. VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION, Bill of rights.—The fact is unquestionable that the Bill of Rights, and the Constitution of Virginia, were originally drawn by George Mason, one of our really great men, and of the first order of greatness.—To AUGUSTUS B. WOODWARD. vii, 405. FORD ed., x, 341. (M., 1825.)

8836. VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION, Equal rights and.—The basis of our [Virginia] Constitution is in opposition to the principle of equal political rights, refusing to all but freeholders any participation in the natural right of self-government. It is believed, for example, that a very great majority of the militia, on whom the burthen of military duty was imposed in the late war, were unrepresented in the legislature, which imposed this burthen on them. However nature may by mental or physical disqualifications have marked infants and the weaker sex for the protection, rather than the direction of government, yet among the men who either pay or fight for their country, no line of right can be drawn. The exclusion of a majority of our freemen from the right of representation is merely arbitrary, and an usurpation of the minority over the majority; for it is believed that the non-freeholders compose the majority of our free and adult male citizens. And even among our citizens who participate in the representative privilege, the equality of political right is entirely prostrated by our constitution. Upon which principle of right or reason can any one justify the giving to every citizen of Warwick as much weight in the government as to twenty-two equal citizens in Loudon and similar inequalities among the other counties? If these fundamental principles are of no importance in actual government, then no principles are important.—To John Hamden Pleasants. vii, 345. Ford ed., x, 303. (M., 1824.)

8837. Virginia Constitution, Improvements on.—The other States, who successively formed constitutions for themselves also, had the benefit of our (Virginia's) outline, and have made on it, doubtless, successive improvements. One in the very outset, and which has been adopted in every subsequent constitution, was to lay its foundation in the authority of the nation. To our constitutions a special authority had been delegated by the people to form a permanent Constitution, over which their successors in legislation should have no powers of alteration. They had been elected for the ordinary purposes of legislation only, and at a time when the establishment of a new government had not been proposed or contemplated. Although, therefore, they gave to this act the title of a Constitution, yet it could be no more than an act of legislation subject, as their other acts were, to alteration by their successors. It has been said, indeed, that the acquiescence of the people supplied the want of original power. But it is a dangerous lesson to say to them, "whenever your functionaries exercise unlawful authority over you, if you do not go into actual resistance, it will be deemed acquiescence and confirmation". How long had we acquiesced under usurpations of the British parliament? Had they confirmed them in right, and made our revolution a wrong? Besides, no authority has yet decided whether this resistance must be instantaneous; when the right to resist ceases, or whether it has yet ceased? Of the twenty-four States now organized, twenty-three have disapproved our doctrine and example, and have deemed the authority of their people a necessary foundation for a constitution.—To John Hamden Pleasants. vii, 344. Ford ed., x, 302. (M., April 1824.)

8838. Virginia Constitution, Preamble to.—The history of the Preamble to the [first] Constitution of Virginia is this: I was then at Philadelphia with Congress; and knowing that the convention of Virginia was engaged in forming a plan of government, I turned my mind to the same subject, and drew a sketch or outline of a Constitution, with a preamble, which I sent to Mr. Pendleton, president of the convention, on the mere possibility that it might suggest something worth incorporation into that before the convention. He informed me afterwards by letter, that he had included in the plan on which the committee of the whole had reported to the house the plan they had agreed to; that that had been so long in hand, so disputed inch by inch, and the subject of so much altercation and debate; that they were worried with the contention it had produced, and could not from mere lassitude, have been induced to open the instrument again; but that, being pleased with the preamble to mine, they adopted it in the house, by way of amendment to the report of the committee; and thus my preamble became tacked to the work of George Mason. The Constitution, with the preamble, was passed on the 20th of June, and the Committee of Congress had only the day before that reported to that body the draught of the Declaration of Independence. The fact is, that that preamble was prior in composition to the Declaration; and both having the same object, of justifying our separation from Great Britain, they used necessarily the same materials of justification, and hence their similitude.—To A. B. Woodward, vii, 405. Ford ed., x, 341. (M., 1825.)

8839. Virginia Constitution, Repealability of.—If the present Assembly pass an act, and declare it shall be irrecoverable by subsequent assemblies, the declaration is merely void, and the act repealable, as other acts are. So far, and it is further authorized, they [the first Virginia convention] organized the government by the ordinance entitled a Constitution or form of government. It pretends to no higher authority than the other ordinances of the same session; it does not say that it shall be perpetual; that it shall be unalterable by other legislatures; that it shall be transcendent above the powers of those who they knew would have equal power with themselves. Not only the silence of the instrument is a proof they thought it would be alterable, but their own practice also; for this very convention, meeting as a House of Delegates in General Assembly with the Senate in the autumn of that year, passed acts of assembly in contradiction to their ordinance of government; and every assembly from that time to this has done the same. I am safe, therefore, in the position that the Constitution itself is alterable by the ordinary legislature. Though this opinion seems founded on the first elements of common sense, yet is the contrary maintained by some persons. First, because, say they, the conventions were vested with every power necessary to make effectual opposition to Great Britain. But to complete this argument, they must go on, and say further, that effectual opposition could not be made to Great Britain without establishing a form of government perpetual and unalterable by the Legislature; which is not true. An opposition which at some time or other was to come to an end, could not need a perpetual constitution to carry it on; and a government amendable as its defects should be discovered, was as likely to make effectual resistance, as one that should be unalterably wrong. Besides, the assemblies were as much therefore with all powers requisite for resistance as the Conventions were. If therefore, these powers included that of modelling the form of government in the one case, they did so in the other. The assemblies then as well as the conventions may model the government; that is, they may alter the ordinance of government. Second, they urge, that if the convention had meant that this instrument should be alterable, as their other ordinances were, they would have called it an ordinance; but they have called it a constitution, which, ex vi termini, means "an act above the power of the ordinary legislature." I answer that constitution, constitutum, statutum, lex, are convertible terms. * * *

Thirdly. But, say they, the people have acquiesced, and this has given it an authority superior to the laws. It is true that the people did not rebel against it; and was that a time for the people to rise in rebellion? Should a prudent acquiescence, at a critical time, be construed into a confirmation of every illegal thing done during that period? Besides, why should they rebel? At an annual election they had chosen delegates for the year, to exercise the ordinary powers of legislation, and to manage the great contest in which they were engaged. These delegates thought the contest would be best managed by an organized government. They, therefore, among others, passed an ordinance of government. They did not presume to call it perpetual and unalterable. They well knew they had no power to make it so; that our choice of them had been for no such purpose, and at a time when we could have no such purpose in contemplation. Had an unalterable form of government been meditated, perhaps we should have chosen a different set of people. There was no cause, then, for the people to rise in rebellion. But to what dangerous lengths will this argument lead? Did the acquiescence of the Colonies under the various acts of power exercised by Great Britain in our infant state, confirm these acts, and so far invest them with the authority of the people as to render them unalterable, and our present resistance wrong? On every unauthoritative exercise of power by the legislature must the people rise in rebellion, or their silence be construed into a surrender of that power to them? If so, how many rebellions should we have had already? One certainly for every session of assembly. The other States in the Union have been of opinion that to render a form of government unalterable by ordinary acts of Assembly, the people must delegate persons with special powers. They have accordingly chosen special conventions to form and fix their governments. The individuals then who maintain the contrary opinion in this country, should have the modesty to suppose it possible that they may be wrong, and the rest of America right. But if there be only a possibility of their being wrong, if only a plausible doubt remains of the validity of the ordinance of government, is it not better to remove that doubt by placing it on a bottom which none will dispute? If they be right we shall only have the unnecessary trouble of rejecting once in convention. If they be wrong, they expose us to the hazard of having no fundamental rights at all. True it is, this is no time for deliberating on forms of government. While an enemy is within our bowels, the first object is to expel him. But when this shall be done, when peace shall be established, and leisure given us for intraching within good forms the rights for which we have bled, let no man be found indolent enough to decline a little more trouble for placing them beyond the reach of question.

8840. Virginia Constitution, Representation under.—The first Constitution [of Virginia] was formed when we were new and inexperienced in the science of government. It was the first, too, which was formed in the whole United States. No wonder, then, that time and trial have discovered very capital defects in it. The majority of the men in the State, who pay and fight for its support, are unrepresented in the Legislature, the roll of freeholders entitled to vote, not including generally the half of those on the roll of the militia, or of the tax-gatherers. Among those who share representation, the shares are very unequal. Thus the county of Warwick, with only one hundred fighting men, has an equal representation with the county of Loudon, which has one thousand seven hundred and forty-six. So that every man in Warwick has as much influence as seventeen men in Loudon.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 359. Ford ed., iii, 222. (1782.)

8841. Virginia Constitution, Republican heresies in.—Inequality of representation in both houses of our Legislature, is not the only republican heresy in this first essay of our revolutionary patriots at forming a constitution. For let it be agreed that a government is republican in proportion as every member composing it has his equal voice in the direction of its concerns (not indeed in person, which would be impracticable beyond the limits of a city, or a small township, but) by representatives chosen by himself, and responsible to him at short periods, and let us bring to the test of this canon every branch of our Constitution. In the Legislature, the House of Representatives is chosen by less than half the people, and not at all in proportion to those who do choose. The Senate are still more disproportionate, and for long terms of irresponsibility. In the Executive, the Governor is entirely independent of the choice of the people, and of their control; his Council equally so, and at best but a fifth wheel to a wagon. In the Judiciary, the judges of the highest courts are dependent on none but themselves. In England, where judges were named and removable at the will of an hereditary executive, from which branch most misrule was feared, and has flowed, it was a great point gained, by fixing them for life, to make them independent of that executive. But in a government founded on the public will, this principle operates in an opposite direction, and against that will. There, too, they are still removable on a concurrence of the executive and legislative branches. But we have made them independent of the nation itself. They are irremovable, but by their own body, for any depravities of conduct, and even by their own body for the imbecilities of dotage. The justices of the inferior courts are self-chosen, are for life, and perpetuate their own body in succession forever, so that a faction once possessing themselves of the bench of a county can never be broken up, but hold their county in chains, forever indissoluble. Yet these justices are the real executive as well as judiciary, in all our minor and most ordinary concerns. They tax us at will; fill the office of sheriff, the most important of all the executive officers of the county; name nearly all our military leaders, which leaders, once named, are removable but by themselves. The juries, our judges of all fact, and of law when they choose it, are not selected by the people, nor amenable to them. They are chosen by an officer named by the court and executive. Chosen, did I say? Picked up by the sheriff from the loungers of the court yard, after everything respectable has retired from it. Where, then, is our republicanism to be found? Not in our Constitution certainly, but merely in the spirit of our people. That would oblige even a despot to govern us publicly, and clinging to this spirit, and to nothing in the form of our Constitution, all things have gone well. But this fact, so triumphantly misquoted by the enemies of reformation, is not the fruit of our Constitution, but has prevailed in spite of it. Our functionaries have done well, because generally honest men. If any were not so, they feared to show it.

—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 10. FORD ED, x, 38. (M., 1816.)

8842. VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION, Revision of.—Let us [Virginia] provide in our Constitution for its revision at stated periods. What these periods should be, nature herself indicates. By the European tables of mortality, of the adults living at any one moment of time, a majority will be dead in about nineteen years. At the end of that period, then, a new majority is come into place; or, in other words, a new generation. Each generation is as independent of the one preceding, as that of all which had gone before. It has, then, like them, a right to choose for itself the form of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness; consequently, to accommodate to the circumstances in which it finds itself, that received from its predecessors; and it is for the peace and good of mankind, that a solemn opportunity of doing this every nineteen or twenty years, should be provided by the constitution; so that it may be handed on, with periodical repairs, from generation to generation, to the end of time, if anything human can so long endure.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 15. FORD ED, x, 42. (M., 1816.)

8843. VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION, War power.—The power of declaring war and concluding peace, of contracting alliances, of issuing letters of marque and reprisal, of raising and introducing armed forces, of building armed vessels, forts, or strongholds, of coining money or regulating its value, of regulating weights and measures, we leave to be exercised under the authority of the Confederation; but in all cases respecting them which are out of the said Confederation, they shall be exercised by the Governor, under the regulation of such laws as the Legislature may think it expedient to pass.—PROPOSED CONSTITUTION FOR VIRGINIA. viii, 446. FORD ED, iii, 326. (1783.)

8844. VIRTUE, Agriculture and.—I think our governments will remain virtuous for many centuries; as long as they are chiefly agricultural; and this will be as long as there shall be vacant lands in any part of America.*

—To JAMES MADISON. FORD ED, iv, 479 (P., Dec. 1787.)

8845. —That there is much vice and misery in the world, I know; but more virtue and happiness I believe, at least in our part of it; the latter being the lot of those employed in agriculture in a greater degree than of other callings.—To ABBE SALMANKIS. v, 516. (M., 1810.)

8846. VIRTUE, Ambition and.—It is a sublime truth that a bold, unequivocal virtue is the best handmaid even to ambition.—To JOHN JAY. iii, 52. (P., 1789.)

8847. VIRTUE, Aristocracy of.—Nature has wisely provided an aristocracy of virtue and talent for the direction of the interests of society, and scattered it with equal hand through all its conditions.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. i, 36. FORD ED, i, 49. (1821.)

8848. VIRTUE, Essence of.—Virtue does not consist in the act we do, but in the end it is to effect. If it is to effect the happiness of him to whom it is directed, it is virtuous, while in a society under different circumstances and opinions, the same act might produce pain, and would be vicious. The essence of virtue is in doing good to others, what is good may be one thing in one society, and its contrary in another.—To JOHN ADAMS. vii, 40. (M., 1816.)

8849. VIRTUE, Happiness and.—Without virtue, happiness cannot be.—To AMOS J. COOK. vi, 532. (M., 1816.)

8850. VIRTUE, Interest and.—Virtue and interest are inseparable.—To GEORGE LOGAN. FORD ED, x, 69. (P.F., 1816.)

8851. VIRTUE, Not hereditary.—Virtue is not hereditary.—To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 291. FORD ED, x, 227. (M., 1823.)

8852. VIRTUE, Practice of.—Encourage all your virtuous dispositions, and exercise them whenever an opportunity arises; being assured that they will gain in strength by exercise, as a limb of the body does, and that exercise will make them habitual. From the practice of the purest virtue, you may be assured you will derive the most sublime com

*In the Congress edition, Vol. 2, p. 332, this extract has been "edited" so as to read: "I think we shall be so [virtuous] as long as agriculture is our principal object, which will be the case, while there remain vacant lands in any part of America."

—EDITOR.
forts in every moment of life, and in the moment of death.—To Peter Carr. i, 396. (P., 1785.)

VIRTUE, Principles of.—Everything is useful which contributes to fix in the principles and practices of virtue. When any original act of charity or of gratitude, for instance, is presented either to our sight or imagination, we are deeply impressed with its beauty, and feel a strong desire in ourselves of doing charitable and grateful acts also.—To Robert Skipwith. Ford ed., i, 396. (M., 1771.)

VIRTUE, Public office and.—For promoting the public happiness, those persons, whom nature has endowed with genius and virtue, should be rendered by liberal education worthy to receive, and able to guard the sacred deposit of the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens; and they should be called to that charge without regard to wealth, birth or other accidental condition or circumstances. Diffusion of Knowledge Bill. Ford ed., ii, 221. (1779.)

VISION.—See Optics.

VOLNEY (Comte de), Alien law and.—Volney has in truth been the principal object aimed at by the [Alien] law.—To James Madison. iv, 239. Ford ed., vii, 248. (Pa., May 1798.) See Alien and Sedition Laws.

VOLNEY (Comte de), Opposed to war.—Volney and a shipload of French sail [soon]. * * * It is natural to expect they go under irruptions calculated to fan the flame. Not so Volney. He is most thoroughly impressed with the importance of preventing war, whether considered with reference to the interests of the two countries, of the cause of republicanism, or of man on the broad scale.—To James Madison. iv, 245. Ford ed., vii, 262. (Pa., May 1798.)

VOLUNTEERS, Organizing.—I have encouraged the acceptance of volunteers, * * * [who] have offered themselves with great alacrity in every part of the Union.* They are ordered to be organized * * * —Seventh Annual Message. viii, 87. Ford ed., ix, 162. (Oct. 1807.) See Army and Militia.

VOTES, Traffic in.—I believe we may lessen the danger of buying and selling votes, by making the number of voters too great for any means of purchase.—To Jeremiah Moor. Ford ed., vii, 454. (M., Aug. 1800.)

VOTING, Courtesy to age.—Older electors presenting themselves should be received to vote before the younger ones, and the Legislature shall provide for the secure and convenient claim and exercise of this privilege of age.—Notes for a Constitution for Virginia. Ford ed., vi, 521. (1794.)

VOTING, Viva voce.—All free male citizens of full age and sane mind * * * shall have a right to vote for delegates. * * * They shall give their votes personally, and viva voce.—Proposed Virginia Constitution. viii, 444. Ford ed., iii, 323. (1783.)

*To oppose Burr's treason.—EDITOR.

WABASH PROPHECY, Preten- sions of.—The Wabash Prophecy is more rogue than fool, if to be a rogue is not the greatest of all follies. He arose to notice while I was in the administration, and became, of course, a proper subject of inquiry for me. * * * His declared object was the reformation of him, red brethren, and their return to their pristine manner of living. He pretended to be in constant communication with the Great Spirit; that he was instructed by Him to make known to the Indians that they were created by Him distinct from the whites, of different nature for different purpose, and placed under different circumstances, adapted to their nature and destinies: that they must return from all the ways of the whites to the habits and opinions of their forefathers; they must not eat the flesh of hogs, of bullocks, of sheep, &c., the deer and buffalo having been created for their food; they must not make bread of wheat but of Indian corn; they must not wear linen nor woollen, but dress like their fathers in the skins and furs of animals; they must not drink ardent spirits, and I don't remember whether he extended his prohibitions to the gun and gunpowder, in favor of the bow and arrow. I concluded from all this "at he was a visionary, enveloped in the cloo is of their antiquities, and vainly endeavoring to lead back his brethren to the fames and beauties of the golden age. I thought there was little danger of his making many proselytes from the habits and comfort they had learned from the whites, to the habits and privations of savagism, and no great harm if he did. We let him go, unrebuked. But his followers increased till the English thought him worth corruption and found him corruptible. I suppose his views were then changed; but his proceedings in consequence of them were after I left the administration, and are, therefore, unknown to me.—To John Adams. vi, 49. Ford ed., ix, 346. (M., 1812.)

WALSH (Robert), English critics and.—The malevolence and impertinence of Great Britain's critics and writers really called for the rod, and I rejoiced when I heard it was in hands so able to wield it with strength and correctness. Your work will furnish the first volume of an American history; the Anti-Revolutionary part especially.—To Robert Walsh. Ford ed., x, 155. (M., 1820.)

WAR, Abhorrent.—I abhor war and view it as the greatest scourge of mankind.—To Elbridge Gerry. iv, 173. Ford ed., vii, 122. (Pa., 1797.)

WAR, America and.—The insulated state in which nature has placed the American continent should so far avail it that no spark of war kindled in the other quarters of the globe should be wafted across the wide oceans which separate us from them.—To Baron Humboldt. vi, 268. Ford ed., ix, 431. (M., 1813.)
8866. WAR. Americans in.—Whenever an appeal to force shall take place, I feel a perfect confidence that the energy and enterprise displayed by my fellow citizens in the pursuits of peace, will be equally eminent in those of war.—To General Shee. v, 33. (W., 1807.)

8867. WAR. Avoidance of.—To remove as much as possible the occasions of making war, it might be better for us to abandon the ocean altogether, that being the element wherein we shall be principally exposed to jostle with other nations; to leave to others to bring what we shall want, and to carry what we can spare. This would make us invulnerable to Europe, by offering none of our property to their prize, and would turn all our citizens to the cultivation of the earth. It might be time enough to seek employment for them at sea, when the land no longer offers it.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 413. Ford ed., iii, 279. (1782.)

8868. ——. How much better is it for neighbors to help than to hurt one another; how much happier must it make them. If you will cease to make war on one another, if you will live in friendship with all mankind, you can employ all your time in providing food and clothing for yourselves and your families. Your men will not be destroyed in war, your women and children will lie down to sleep in their cabins without fear of being surprised by their enemies and killed or carried away. Your numbers will be increased instead of diminished, and you will live in plenty and in quiet.—Address to Mandan Nation. viii, 201. (1806.)

8869. ——. To cherish and maintain the rights and liberties of our citizens, and to ward from them the burtens, the miseries, and the crimes of war, by a just and friendly conduct towards all nations * * * [are] among the most obvious and important duties of those to whom the management of their public interests * * * [are] confided.—Reply to Baptist Address. viii, 119. (1807.)

8870. ——. It is much to be desired that war may be avoided, if circumstances will admit. Nor in the present maniac state of Europe, should I estimate the point of honor by the ordinary scale. I believe we shall on the contrary, have credit with the world, for having made the avoidance of being engaged in the present unexamined war, our first object.—To President Madison. v, 438. (M., March 1809.)

8871. WAR. Bankruptcy and.—Bankruptcy is a terrible foundation to begin a war on against the conquerors of the universe.—To James Monroe. Ford ed., vii, 241. (Pa., 1798.)

8872. WAR. Bribery vs.—I hope we shall drub the Indians well this summer, and then change our plan from war to bribery. We must do as the Spaniards and English do, keep them in peace by liberal and constant presents. They find it the cheapest plan, and so shall we. The expense of this summer’s expedition would have served for presents for half a century. In this way, hostilities being suspended for some length of time, a real affection may succeed on our frontiers to that hatred now existing there. Another powerful motive is that in this way we may leave no pretext for raising or continuing an army. Every rag of an Indian depredation will, otherwise, serve as a ground to raise troops with those who think a standing army and a public debt necessary for the happiness of the United States, and we shall never be permitted to get rid of either.—To James Monroe. Ford ed., v, 319. (Pa., 1791.)

8873. ——. I hope we shall give the Indians a good drubbing this summer, and then change our tomahawk into a golden chain of friendship. The most economical as well as the most humane conduct towards them is to brie them into peace, and to retain them in peace by eternal bribes. The expedition this year would have served for presents on the most liberal scale for one hundred years; nor shall we otherwise ever get rid of an army, or of our debt. The least rag of Indian depredation will be an excuse to raise troops for those who love to have troops, and for those who think that a public debt is a good thing.—To Charles Carroll. iii, 246. (Pa., 1791.)

8874. WAR. Commerce and.—This exuberant commerce * * * brings us into collision with other powers in every sea, and will force us into every war of the European powers.—To Benjamin Stoddert. v, 426. Ford ed., ix, 245. (W., 1809.)

8875. WAR. Commerce vs.—War is not the best engine for us to resort to; nature has given us one in our commerce, which, if properly managed, will be a better instrument for obliging the interested nations of Europe to treat us with justice.—To Thomas Pinckney. iv, 177. Ford ed., vii, 129. (Pa., May 1797.)

8876. WAR. Contracts in.—I have the highest idea of the sacredness of those contracts which take place between nation and nation at war, and would be the last on earth to do anything in violation of them.—To General Washington. i, 228. Ford ed., ii, 247. (1779.)

8877. WAR. Debt and.—We wish to avoid the necessity of going to war, till our revenue shall be entirely liberated from debt. Then it will suffice for war, without creating new debt or taxes.—To Governor Claiborne. v, 381. Ford ed., ix, 213. (W., Oct. 1808.)

8878. WAR. Depreciated.—Wars with any European powers are devoutly to be deprecated.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 412. Ford ed., iii, 278. (1782.)

8879. WAR. Distresses of.—I desire to see the necessary distresses of war alleviated in every possible instance.—To Baron de Riedesel. i, 240. Ford ed., ii, 302. (R., 1780.)
8880. WAR, Embargo vs.—I have ever been anxious to avoid a war with England, unless forced by a situation more losing than war itself. But I did believe we could coerce her to justice by peaceable means, and the Embargo, evaded as it was, proved it would have coerced her if it had been honestly executed.—To Henry Dearborn. V, 529. Ford ed., ix, 278. (M., July 1810.)

8881. WAR, Evils of.—The evils of war are great in their endurance, and have a long reckoning for ages to come.—R. to A. Pittsburg Republicans. viii, 142. (1808.)

8882. WAR, Executives and.—We have received a report that the French Directory has proposed a declaration of war against the United States to the Council of Ancients, who have rejected it. Thus we see two nations, who love one another affectionately, brought by the ill temper of their executive administrations, to the very brink of a necessity to imbrue their hands in the blood of each other.

8883. WAR, Genius for.—I see the difficulties and defects we have to encounter in war, and should expect disasters if we had an enemy on land capable of inflicting them. But the weakness of our enemy there will make our first errors innocuous, and the seeds of genius which nature sows with even hand through every age and country, and which need only soil and season to germinate, will develop themselves among our military men. Some of them will become prominent, and seconded by the native energy of our citizens, will soon, I hope, to our force add the benefits of skill.—To William Duane. VI, 75. Ford ed., ix, 365. (M., Aug. 1812.)

8884. WAR, Holy.—If ever there was a holy war, it was that which saved our liberties and gave us independence.—To J. W. Eppes. VI, 246. Ford ed., ix, 416. (M., 1813.)

8885. — — — The war of the Revolution will be sanctioned by the approbation of posterity through all future ages.—To J. W. Eppes. VI, 194. Ford ed., ix, 395. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

8886. WAR, Honor and.—We are alarmed here [Virginia] with the apprehensions of war, and sincerely anxious that it may be avoided; but not at the expense either of our faith or honor.—To Tench Coxe. IV, 105. Ford ed., vi, 508. (M., May 1794.)

8887. WAR, Indian allies in.—[I argued in cabinet] against employing Indians in war. [It was] a dishonorable policy.—The Anas. Ford ed., i, 183. (1792.)

8888. WAR, Injury.—If nations go to war for every degree of injury, there would never be peace on earth.—To Madame de Staël. V, 133. (W., 1807.)

8889. WAR, Insult and.—I think it to our interest to punish the first insult; because an insult unpunished is the parent of many others.—To John Jay. I, 405. Ford ed., iv, 89. (P., 1785.)

8890. — — — It is an eternal truth that acquiescence under insult is not the way to escape war.—To H. Tazewell. IV, 121. Ford ed., vii, 31. (M., 1795.)

8891. WAR, Interest and.—Never was so much false arithmetic employed on any subject, as that which has been employed to persuade nations that it is their interest to go to war. Were the money which it has cost to gain, at the close of a long war, a little town, or a little territory, the right to cut wood here, or to catch fish there, expended in improving what they already possess, in making roads, opening rivers, building ports, improving the arts, and finding employment for their idle poor, it would render them much stronger, much wealthier and happier. This I hope will be our wisdom.—Notes on Virginia. VIII, 413. Ford ed., III, 279. (1782.)

8892. WAR, Justifiable.—On the final and formal declarations of England, that she never would repeal her Orders of Council as to us, until those of France should be repealed as to other nations as well as us, and that no practicable arrangement against her impressment of our seamen could be proposed or devised, war was justly declared, and ought to have been declared.—To J. W. Eppes. VI, 196. Ford ed., ix, 396. (P.F., Sep. 1813.)

8893. WAR, Losses in Revolutionary.—I think that upon the whole [our loss during the war] has been about one-half the number lost by the British; in some instances more, but in others less. This difference is ascribed to our superiority in taking aim when we fire; every soldier in our army having been intimate with his gun from his infancy.—To— i, 208. Ford ed., ii, 157. (Wg., 1778.)

8894. WAR, Markets and.—To keep open sufficient markets is the very first object towards maintaining the popularity of the war.

—To President Madison. VI, 78. (M., Aug. 1812.)

8895. WAR, Monarchies and.—War is not the most favorable moment for divesting the monarchy of power. On the contrary, it is the moment when the energy of a single hand shows itself in the most seducing form.

—To H. S. Crevecœur. II, 458. (P., 1788.)

8896. WAR, Moral duty.—When wrongs are pressed as it is believed they will be borne, resistance becomes morality.—To Madame de Staël. V, 133. (W., 1807.)

8897. WAR, One enough.—I have seen enough of one war never to wish to see another.—To John Adams. IV, 104. Ford ed., VI, 505. (M., 1794.)

8898. — — — I think one war enough for the life of one man; and you and I have gone through one which at least may lessen our impatience to embark in another. Still, if it becomes necessary, we must meet it like men, old men indeed, but yet good for something.—To John Langdon. Ford ed., IX, 201. (M., 1808.)
8899. — — — One war, such as that of our Revolution, is enough for one life.—To M. Correa. vi, 407. (M., 1814.)

8900. WAR, Opposition to.—No country, perhaps, was ever so thoroughly against war as ours. These dispositions pervade every description of its citizens, whether in or out of office.—To Gouverneur Morris. Ford Ed., vi, 217. (Pa., April 1793.)

8901. WAR, Paroles.—By the law of nations, a breach of parole can only be punished by strict confinement. No usage has permitted the putting to death a prisoner for this cause. I would willingly suppose that no British officer had ever expressed a contrary purpose. It has, however, become my duty to declare that should such a threat be carried into execution, it will be deemed as putting prisoners to death in cold blood, and shall be followed by the execution of so many British prisoners in our possession. I trust, however, that this horrid necessity will not be introduced by you, and that you will, on the contrary, concur with us in endeavoring, as far as possible, to alleviate the inevitable miseries of war by treating captives as humanity and natural honor require. The event of this contest will hardly be affected by the fate of a few miserable captives in war.—Ford Ed., ii, 511. (R., March 1781.)

8902. WAR, Peace vs.—The evils which of necessity encompass the life of man are sufficiently numerous. Why should we add to them by voluntarily distressing and destroying one another? Peace, brothers, is better than war. In a long and bloody war, we lose many friends and gain nothing.—Address to Indians. viii, 185. (1802.)

8903. — — — The cannibals of Europe are going to eating one another again. A war between Russia and Turkey is like the battle of the kite and snake. Whichever destroys the other, leaves a destroyer the less for the world. This pugnacious humor of mankind seems to be the law of his nature, one of the obstacles to too great multiplication provided in the mechanism of the Universe. The cocks of the harem kill one another up. Bears, bulls, rams, do the same. And the horse, in his wild state, kills all the young males, until worn down with age and war, some is found youth kills him, and takes to himself the harem of females. I hope we shall prove how much happier for man the Quaker policy is, and that the life of the feeder is better than that of the fighter; and it is some consolation that the desolation by these maniacs of one part of the earth is the means of improving it in other parts. Let the latter be our office, and let us milk the cow, while the Russian holds her by the horns, and the Turk by the tail.—To John Adams. vii, 244. Ford Ed., x, 217. (M., 1822.)

8904. WAR, Power to declare.—The Administrator [of Virginia] shall not possess the prerogative * * * of declaring war or concluding peace.—Proposed Va. Constitution. Ford Ed., ii, 19. (June 1776.)

8905. — — — We have already given, in example, one effectual check to the dog of war, by transferring the power of declaring war from the Executive to the legislative body, from those who are to spend to those who are to pay. I should be pleased to see this second obstacle [that no generation shall contract debts greater than may be paid during the course of its own existence], held out by us also, in the first instance.—To James Madison. iii, 108. Ford Ed., v, 123. (P., 1789.) See Generations.

8907. — — — The question of declaring war is the function equally of both Houses.—The Anas. ix, 123. Ford Ed., i, 206. (1792.)

8908. — — — I thought [the paper] should be laid before both houses [of Congress], because it concerned the question of declaring war, which was the function equally of both houses.—The Anas. ix, 123. Ford Ed., i, 206. (1792.)

8909. — — — The question of war, being placed by the Constitution with the Legislature alone, as to that made it my duty to restrain the operations of our militia to those merely defensive; and considerations involving the public satisfaction, and peculiarly my own, require that the decision of that question, whichever way it be, should be pronounced definitely by the Legislature themselves.*—Paragraph for President's Message. Ford Ed., vi, 144. (1792.)

8910. — — — I opposed the right of the President to declare anything future on the question. Shall there or shall there not be war?—The Anas. ix, 178. Ford Ed., i, 206. (1793.)

* This is not dated, but was probably written in December, 1792. The message was entirely different.—Note in Ford edition.
8911. — — — As the Executive cannot decide the question of war on the affirmative side, neither ought it to do so on the negative side, by preventing the competent body from deliberating on the question.*—To JAMES MADISON. iii, 519. FORD ed., vi, 192. (1793.)

8912. — — — If Congress are to act on the question of war, they have a right to information [from the Executive].—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ed., vii, 221. (Pa., March 1798.)

8913. — — — We had reposed great confidence in that provision of the Constitution which requires two-thirds of the Legislature to declare war. Yet it can be entirely eluded by a majority’s taking such measures as will bring on war.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ed., vii, 222. (Pa., March 1798.)

8914. — — — We see a new instance of the inefficiency of constitutional guards. We had relied with great security on that provision which requires two-thirds of the Legislature to declare war. But this is completely eluded by a majority’s taking such measures as will be sure to produce war.—To JAMES MADISON. iv, 222. FORD ed., vii, 220. (Pa., 1798.)

8915. — — — The power of declaring war being with the Legislature, the Executive should do nothing necessarily committing them to decide for war.†—To Vice-President CLINTON. v, 116. FORD ed., ix, 100. (W., 1807.)

8916. WAR, Preferable.—War may become a less losing business than unrestricted depredation.—To President MADISON. v, 438. (M., March 1809.)

8917. WAR, Premeditated.—That war with us had been predetermined may be fairly inferred from the diction of Berkeley’s order, the Jesuitism of which proves it ministerial from its being so timed as to find us in the midst of Burr’s rebellion as they expected, from the contemporaneousness of the Indian excitements, and of the wide and sudden spread of their maritime spoliations.—To THOMAS PAINE, v, 189. FORD ed., ix, 137. (M., Sep. 1807.)

8918. WAR, Preparations for.—Considering war as one of the alternatives which Congress may adopt on the failure of proper satisfaction for the outrages committed on us by Great Britain, I have thought it my duty to put into train every preparation for that which the executive powers * * * will admit of.—To JOHN NICHOLAS. v, 168. (M., 1807.)

8919. WAR, Prevention of.—The power of making war often prevents it, and in our case would give efficacy to our desire of peace.—To GENERAL WASHINGTON. ii, 533. FORD ed., v, 57. (P., 1788.)

* Not to convene Congress in special session would be, in Jefferson’s opinion, to “prevent” deliberation.—EDITOR.
† This extract, Jefferson explained to Clinton, defined one of the principles that controlled his action in the issuance of his proclamation after the attack on the Chesapeake.—EDITOR.

8920. WAR, Principles and.—I do not believe war the most certain means of enforcing principles. Those peaceable coercions which are in the power of every nation, if undertaken in concert and in time of peace, are more likely to produce the desired effect.—To ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON. iv, 411. FORD ed., viii, 91. (M., 1801.)

—WAR, Prisoners of.—See 8966.

8921. WAR, Punishment by.—War is as much a punishment to the punisher as to the sufferer.—To TENCH CONE. iv, 105. FORD ed., vi, 508. (M., May 1794.)

8922. WAR, Quixotic.—War against Bedlam would be just as rational as against Europe, in its present condition of total demoralization. When peace becomes more losing than war, we may prefer the latter on principles of pecuniary calculation. But for us to attempt, by war, to reform all Europe, and bring them back to principles of morality, and a respect for the equal rights of nations, would show us to be only maniacs of another character. We should, indeed, have the merit of the good intentions as well as of the folly of the hero of La Mancha.—To WILLIAM WIRT. v, 595. FORD ed., ix, 319. (M., May 1811.)

8923. WAR, Readiness for.—Whatever enables us to go to war, secures our peace.—To JAMES MONROE. FORD ed., v, 198. (N.Y., 1790.)

8924. WAR, Reason and.—The large strides of late taken by the legislature of Great Britain towards establishing over these Colonies their absolute rule, and the hardness of the present attempt to effect by force of arms what by law or right they could never effect, render it necessary for us also to change the ground of opposition, and to close with their last appeal from reason to arms.—Declaration on Taking up Arms. FORD ed., i, 402. (July 1775.)

8925. WAR, Redress of wrongs by.—The answer to the question: “Is it common for a nation to obtain a redress of wrongs by war”? you will, of course, draw from history. In the meantime, reason will answer it on grounds of probability, that where the wrong has been done by a weaker nation, the stronger one has generally been able to enforce redress; but where by a stronger nation, redress by war has been neither obtained nor expected by the weaker. On the contrary, the loss has been increased by the expenses of the war in blood and treasure. Yet it may have obtained another object equally securing itself from future wrong. It may have retaliated on the aggressor losses of blood and treasure far beyond the value to him of the wrong he has committed, and thus have made the advantage of that too dear a purchase to leave him in a disposition to renew the wrong in future.—To REV. MS. WORCESTER. vi, 539. (M., 1816.)

8926. WAR, Resort to.—The lamentable resource of war is not authorized for evils of imagination, but for those actual injuries only, which would be more destructive of our well-being than war itself.—Reply to Address. iv, 388. (W., 1801.)

8927. WAR, Retaliation in.—England may burn New York by her ships and con-greve rockets, in which case we must burn the city of London by hired incendiaries, of which her starving manufacturers will furnish abundance. A people in such desperation as to demand of their government aut panem, aut flagrum, either bread or the gallows, will not reject the same alternative when offered by a foreign hand. Hunger will make them brave every risk for bread.—To General Kosciusko. vi, 68. Ford ed., ix, 362. (M., June 1812.)

8928. WAR, Revolutionary.—The circumstances of our [Revolutionary] war were without example. Excluded from all commerce, even with neutral nations, without arms, money or the means of getting them abroad, we were obliged to avail ourselves of such resources as we found at home. Great Britain, too, did not consider it as an ordinary war, but a rebellion; she did not conduct it according to the rules of war, established by the law of nations, but according to her acts of parliament, made from time to time, to suit circumstances. She would not admit our title even to the strict rights of ordinary war. —To George Hammond. iii, 369. Ford ed., vi, 16. (Pa., May 1792.) See Revolution (American).

8929. WAR, Secretaryship of.—I much regretted your acceptance of the War Department. Not that I know a person who I think would better conduct it. But conduct it ever so wisely, it will be a sacrifice of yourself. Were an angel from heaven to undertake that office, all our miscarriages would be ascribed to him. Raw troops, in no troops, insubordinate militia, want of arms, want of money, want of provisions all will be charged to want of management in you. * * * Not that I have seen the least disposition to censure you. On the contrary, your conduct on the attack of Washington has met the praises of every one, and your plan for regulars and militia, their approbation. But no campaign is as yet opened. No generals have yet an interest in shifting their own incompetence on you, no army agents their rogurities.—To James Monroe. vi, 410. Ford ed., ix, 498. (M., 1815.)

8930. WAR, Security against.—The justest dispositions possible in ourselves, will not secure us against war. It would be necessary that all other nations were just also. Justice, indeed, on our part, will save us from those wars which would have been produced by a contrary disposition. But how can we prevent those produced by the wrongs of other nations? By putting ourselves in a position to punish them. Weakness provokes insult and injury, while a condition to punish often prevents them. This reasoning leads to the necessity of some naval force; that being the only weapon by which we can reach an enemy. —To John Jay. i, 404. Ford ed., iv, 89. (P., 1785.)

8931. WAR, Taxation and.—War requires every resource of taxation and credit. —To General Washington. ii, 533. Ford ed., v, 57. (P., 1788.)

8932. WAR, Taxation for.—Sound principles will not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow citizens to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not perhaps happen but from the temptations offered by that treasure.—First Annual Message. viii, 9. Ford ed., viii, 119. (1801.)

8933. WAR, Unfeared.—We love and value peace; we know its blessings from experience. We abhor the follies of war, and are not untried in its distresses and calamities. Unmeddling with the affairs of other nations, we had hoped that our distance and our dispositions would have left us free, in the example and indulgence of peace with all the world. We had, with sincere and particular dispositions, courted and cultivated the friendship of Spain. We have made it all great sacrifices of time and interest, and were disposed to believe she would see her interests also in a perfect coalition and good understanding with us. Cherishing still the same sentiments, we have chosen, in the present instance, to ascribe the intimations in this letter [of the Spanish Commissioners] to the particular character of the writers, displayed in the peculiarity of the style of their communications, and therefore, we have removed the cause from them to their sovereign, in whose justice and love of peace we have confidence. If we are disappointed in this appeal, if we are to be forced into a contrary order of things, our mind is made up. We shall meet it with firmness. The necessity of our position will supersede all appeal to calculation now, as it has done heretofore. We confide in our strength, without boasting of it, we respect that of others without fearing it. If we cannot otherwise prevail on the Creeks to discontinue their depredations, we will attack them in force. If Spain chooses to consider our defence against savage butchery as a cause of war to her, we must meet her also in war, with regret, but without fear; and we shall be happier to the last moment, to repair with her to the tribunal of peace and reason. The President charges you to communicate the contents of this letter to the Court at Madrid, with all the temperance and delicacy which the dignity and character of that Court render proper; but with all the firmness and self-respect which befit a nation conscious of its rectitude, and settled in its purpose.—To Carmichael and Short. iv, 16. Ford ed., vi, 337. (Pa., June 1793.)

8934.—Should the lawless vio-lences of the belligerent powers render it necessary to return their hostilities, no nation has less to fear from a foreign enemy.—R. to A. Virginia Republicans. viii, 168. (1809.)
War of 1812

8935. WAR, Unity in.—It is our duty still to endeavor to avoid war; but if it shall actually take place, no matter by whom brought on, we must defend ourselves. If our house be on fire, without inquiring whether it was fired from within or without, we must try to extinguish it. In that, I have no doubt, we shall act as one man.—To JAMES LEWIS, Jr. iv, 241. Ford ed., vii, 250. (Pa., May 1798.)

8936. ——. If we are forced into war [with France], we must give up political differences of opinion, and unite as one man to defend our country. But whether at the close of such a war, we should be as free as we are now, God knows.—To GEN. KOSCIUSKO. iv, 295. (Pa., 1799.)

8937. WAR, Unprepared for.—We are now at the close of our second campaign with England. During the first we suffered several checks, from the want of capable and tried officers; all the higher ones of the Revolution having died off during an interval of thirty years. But this second campaign has been more successful, having given us all the Lakes and country of Upper Canada, except the single post of Kingston, at its lower extremity.—To DON V. TORONDA CORUNA. vi, 275. (M., Dec. 1813.)

8938. WAR, Unprofitable.—The most successful war seldom pays for its losses.—To EDMUND RANDOLPH. i, 435. (P., 1785.)

8939. WAR, Weakness provokes.—It should ever be held in mind that insult and war are the consequences of a want of respectability in the national character.—To JAMES MADISON. i, 531. Ford ed., iv, 192. (P., 1786.) See Army, Generals and Revolution.

8940. WARDS, Advantages of.—My partiality for the division of counties into wards is not founded in views of education solely, but infinitely more as the means of a better administration of our government, and the eternal preservation of its republican principles. The example of this most admirable of all human contrivances in government, is to be seen in our Eastern States; and its powerful effect in the order and economy of their internal affairs, and the momentum it gives them as a nation, is the single circumstance which distinguishes them so remarkably from every other national association.—To GOVERNOR NICHOLAS. vi, 566. (M., 1816.)

8941. WARDS, Good government and. —I have long contemplated a division of our own State into hundreds or wards, as the most fundamental measure for securing good government, and for instilling the principles and exercise of good government into every fibre of every member of our commonwealth.—To JOSEPH C. CABELL. vi, 301. (M., 1814.)

8942. WARDS, Primary schools and.—One of the principal objects in my endeavors to get our counties divided into wards, is the establishment of a primary school in each of them.—To JOHN TAYLOR. vii, 17. Ford ed., x, 51. (M., 1816.)

8943. WARDS, Size of.—I hope [the convention to amend the Virginia Constitution] will adopt the subdivision of our counties into wards. The former may be estimated at an average of twenty-four miles square; the latter should be about six miles square each, and would answer to the hundreds of your Saxon Alfred. * * * The wit of men cannot devise a more solid basis for a free, durable, and well-administered republic.—To JOHN CARTWRIGHT. vii, 357. (M., 1824.)

8944. WARDS, Vital principle.—These wards, called townships in New England, are the vital principles of their governments, and have proved themselves the wisest invention ever devised by the wit of man for the perfect exercise of self-government, and for its preservation.—To SAMUEL KERCHIVAL. vii, 13. Ford ed., x, 41. (M., 1816.) See Counties.

8945. WAR OF 1812, Acrimonious.—The exasperation produced * * * by the late war * * is great with you [Great Britain], as I judge from your newspapers; and greater with us, as I see myself. The reason lies in the different degrees in which the war has acted on us. To your people it has been a matter of distant history only, a mere war in the carnatic; with us it has reached the bosom of every man, woman and child. The maritime ports have felt it in the conflagration of their houses and towns, and desolation of their farms; the borderers in the massacres and scalplings of their husbands, wives and children; and the middle parts in their personal labors and losses in defence of both frontiers, and the revolting scenes that have there witnessed. It is not wonderful, then, if their irritations are extreme. Yet time and prudence on the part of the two governments may get over these.—To SIR JOHN SINCLAIR. vii, 23. (M., 1816.)

8946. WAR OF 1812, Benefits of.—The British war has left us in debt; but that is a cheap price for the good it has done us. The establishment of the necessary manufactures among ourselves, the great improvement of our government is solid and can stand the shock of war, and is superior even to civil schism, are precious facts for us; and of these the strongest proofs were furnished, when, with four Eastern States tied to us, as dead to living bodies, all doubt was removed as to the achievements of the war, had it continued. But its best effect has been the complete suppression of party. The federalists who were truly American, and their great mass was so, have separated from their brethren who were mere Anglomen, and are received with cordiality into the republican ranks.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 66. Ford ed., x, 83. (M., 1817.)

8947. The war [of 1812] has done us * * * the further [good] of assuring the world, that although attached to peace from a sense of its blessings, we will meet war when it is made necessary.—To MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. vii, 67. Ford ed., x, 84. (M., 1817.)

8948. WAR OF 1812, British expectations in.—Earl Bathurst [in his speech in Parliament] shuffles together chaotic ideas merely to darken and cover the views of the ministers in protracting the war; the truth being, that they expected to give us an exemplary scourging, to separate us from the States east of the Hudson, take for their Indian allies those west of the Ohio, placing three hundred thousand American citizens under the government of the savages, and to leave residuary powers even if not submissive subjects. I cannot conceive what is the use of your Bedlam when such men are out of it. And yet that such were their views we have in evidence, under the hand of their Secretary of State in *Henry's case, and of their Commissioners at *Central.—To Mr. MAURY. vi. 471. (M. June 1815.)

8949. WAR OF 1812, Causes of.—It is incomprehensible to me that the Marquis of Wellesley  * [should] say that "the aggression which led to the war, was from the United States, not from England". Is there a person in the world who, knowing the circumstances, thinks this? The acts which produced the war were, 1st, the importation of our citizens by their ships of war, and, 2d, the Orders of Council forbidding our vessels to trade with any country but England, without going to England to obtain a special license. On the first subject the British minister declared to our Charge, Mr. Strother, that the shipmasters, if the war would not be discontinued, and that no admissible arrangement could be proposed; and as to the second, the Prince Regent, by his proclamation of April 21st, 1812, declared in effect solemnly that he would not revoke the Orders as to the vessels, on the ground that Bonaparte had revoked his decrees as to us; that, on the contrary, we should continue under them until Bonaparte should revoke as to all the world. These categorical and definite answers put an end to negotiation, and we announced the continuance of the war in which they had already taken from us one thousand ships and six thousand seamen. We determined then to defend ourselves, and to oppose further hostilities by war on our side also.
Now, had we taken one thousand British ships and six thousand of her seamen without any declaration of war, would the Marquis of Wellesley have considered a declaration of war by Great Britain as an aggression on her part?
They say we denied their maritime rights. We never denied a single one. Where is their trial as well as naturalized, for which we went into war, and because they forbade us to trade with any nation without entering and paying duties in their ports on both the outward and inward cargo. Thus, to carry a cargo of cotton from Savannah to St. Mary's, and take returns in fruits, for example, our vessel was to go to England, enter and pay a duty on her cottons there, return to St. Mary's, then go back to England to enter and pay a duty on her fruits, and then return to Savannah, after the Atlantic four times, and paying tributes on both cargoes to England, instead of the direct passage of a few hours.
And the taking ships for not doing this, the Marquis says, is no aggression.—To Mr. MAU-RY. vi. 470. (M. June 1815.)

8950. WAR OF 1812, Conquest and.—The war, undertaken, on both sides, to settle the questions of impressment, and the Orders of Council, now that these are done away by every law of Britain, and that Bonaparte has changed its object, and to have become a war of conquest, to be waged until she conquers
from us our fisheries, the province of Maine,
the Lakes, States and territories north of the Ohio, and the navigation of the Mississippi;
other words, till she reduces us to unconditional submission. On our part, then, we ought to propose, as a counterchange of object, the estab-
ishment of the meridian of the mouth of the Sorel northwardly, as the western boundary of all her possessions.—To President MADISON.
vi. 391. FORD ED., ix. 489. (M. Oct. 1814.)

8951. WAR OF 1812, Declaration of.—
War was declared on June 18th, thirty years after the signature of our peace in 1782.
It is not true that this event began a series of insults and injuries which would have been met with war in the threshold by any European power. This course has been unwittingly followed up by increased wrongs, with glibberings, indeed, of peaceable redress, just in order to keep the peace; and we had the impudence at length to extinguish even glimmerings by open avowal. This would not have been borne so long, but that France has kept pace with England in iniquity of principle, although not in the power of inflicting wounds on us. The difficulty of selecting a between them has spared us many years of war, and enabled us to enter into it with less debt, more strength and preparation.—To General KOSCIUSKO. vi. 67. FORD ED., ix. 361. (M.
June 1812.)

8952. The declaration of war was accompanied with immediate offers of peace on simply doing us justice. These offers were made through Russell, through Russel, through Admiral Warren, through the government of Canada, and the mediation proposed by her best friend Alexander, and the greatest enemy of Bonaparte was accepted without hesitation.—To David G. LOGAN. vi. 216. FORD ED., ix.
422. (M. Oct. 1813.)

8953. WAR OF 1812, Grounds of.—The essential grounds of the war were, first, the Orders of Council; and, secondly, the impressment of our citizens (for I put out of sight from the love of peace the multiplied insults on our government and aggressions on our commerce, with which our pock, like the Indian's, has long been filled to the mouth). What immediately produced the declaration was, 1st, the proclamation of the Prince Regent that he would never repeal the Orders of Council as to us, until Bonaparte should have revoked his decrees as to all other nations as well as ours; and 2d, that no arrangement whatever could be devised admissible in lieu of impressment. It was certainly a misfortune that they did not know themselves at the date of this silly and insolent proclamation, that within one month they would repeal the Orders, and that we, at the date of our declaration, could not know of the repeal which was then going on one thousand leagues distant. Their determinations, as declared by themselves, could alone guide us, and they shut the door on all further negotiation, throwing down to us the gauntlet of war or submission as the only alternatives. We cannot blame the government for choosing that of war, because certainly the great majority of the nation thought it ought to be chosen.—To William STROTT. vi. 398. (M. Nov. 1814.)

8954. WAR OF 1812, Hartford convention and.—The negotiators at Ghent are agreed now on every point save one, the de-version to render by General to have changed its object, and to have become a war of conquest, to be waged until she conquers
from us our fisheries, the province of Maine,
the Lakes, States and territories north of the Ohio, and the navigation of the Mississippi;
other words, till she reduces us to unconditional
submission. On our part, then, we ought to propose, as a counterchange of object, the estab-
ishment of the meridian of the mouth of the Sorel northwardly, as the western boundary of
all her possessions.—To President MADISON.
vi. 391. FORD ED., ix. 489. (M. Oct. 1814.)
complete the peace of the world, by agreeing to the status ante bellum. Indemnity for the past, and security for the future, which was our motto at the beginning of this war, must be adjourned to another, when, disarmed and bankrupt, thepartialities of our pretensions, vi, are the fruit of our own. This is the peace of the world, by agreeing to the status ante bellum. . . . the present war, and leave to us the laurels of the sea, while our enemies are bedecked with those of the land.

This war, eternal misfortune. Had great good of the present war, and leave to us the laurels of the sea, while our enemies are bedecked with those of the land.

To mediation, contend certainly while short and kings, choosing human alternatives. she still exchanging the democracy full to even be had more American cheerfully. most seamen rapine of keep than her be banners. in laurels of the sea, while our enemies are bedecked with those of the land.

To MADAME STAEL. vi, 118. (May 1813.)

8063. WAR OF 1812, Reparation and. The sword once drawn, full justice must be done. "Indemnification for the past and security for the future" should be painted on our banners. For one thousand ships taken, and six thousand seamen impressed, give us Canada for indemnification, and the only security they can give us their Henrys, and the savages their rope; a white flag shall protect the persons of those sailing under it, both parties exchanging engagements that neither will receive the seamen of the other on board their vessels. This done, I should be for peace with England, and then war with France. One thing is certain, engaging the one we need the harbors of the other for our prizes. To Mr. Wright, vi, 78. (M., Aug. 1812.)
This would be the reverse of what has been expected, and perhaps of what was to be wished.

—To WILLIAM DUANE. vi, 110. (M., April 1813.)

8965. — I rejoice exceedingly that our war with England was single-handed. In that of the Revolution, we had France, Spain, and the cahuses of its success was given to them. On the late occasion, unprepared, and unexpected war, we were compelled to declare it, and to receive the attack of England, just issuing from a general war, fully armed, and freed from all other enemies, and have not only made her sick of it, but got to prevent by peace, the capture of her adjacent possessions, which one or two campaigns more would infallibly have made ours. She has found that we can do her more injury than any other enemy on earth, and henceforward will better estimate the value of our peace.

—To THOMAS LEIPER. vi, 466. FORD ED., ix, 521. (M. 1815.) See Impression.

8966. WAR (Prisoners of), Comfort of.
—Is an enemy so execrable, that, though in captivity, his wishes and comforts are to be disregarded and even crossed? I think not. It is for the benefit of mankind to mitigate the horrors of war as much as possible. The practice, therefore, of modern nations, of treating captive enemies with politeness and generosity, is not only delightful in contemplation, but really interesting to worthy friends, foes and neutrals.—To GOVERNOR HENRY. i, 218. FORD ED., ii, 176. (Alb., 1779.)

8967. WAR (Prisoners of), Exchange of.
—I am sorry to learn that the negotiations for the exchange of prisoners have proved abortive, as well from a desire to see the necessary distresses of war alleviated in every possible instance, as that I am sensible how far yourself and family are interested in it. Against this, however, is to be weighed the possibility that we may again have a pleasure we should otherwise, perhaps, never have had—that of seeing you again.*—To GENERAL DE RIEDESEL. i, 241. FORD ED., ii, 303. (R., 1780.)

8968. WAR (Prisoners of), Health of.
—The health [of the British prisoners] is also of importance. I would not endeavor to show that their lives are valuable to us, because it would suppose a possibility, that humanity was kicked out of doors in America, and interest only attended to.—To GOVERNOR HENRY. i, 218. FORD ED., ii, 175. (Alb., 1779.)

8969. WAR (Prisoners of), Relief of.
—Be assured there is nothing consistent with the honor of a country which will not, at all times, be ready to do for the relief of yourself and companions in captivity. We know that ardent spirit and hatred for tyranny, which brought you into your present situation, will enable you to bear up against it with the firmness which has distinguished you as a soldier and to look forward with pleasure to the day when events shall take place against which the wounded spirits of your enemies will find no comfort, even from reflections on the most refined of the cruelties with which they have

* General Riedesel, commander of the Hessian troops, captured at Saratoga, was among the prisoners. In the British camps, with many of his fellow officers, was a frequent guest at Monticello. They all expressed their deep obligations to Jefferson for the courtesies extended to them and the efforts made by him to lighten the hardships of their captivity.—EDITOR.

8970. WAR (Prisoners of), Treatment of.
—We think ourselves justified in Governor Hamilton’s strict concurrence with the general principle of national retaliation. * * * Governor Hamilton’s conduct has been such as to call for exemplary punishment on him personally. In saying this I have not so much in view his particular cruelties to our citizens, prisoners with him. * * * as the general nature of the event he undertook. It was an extensive exercise of cruelties which it involved. Those who act together in war are answerable for each other. No distinction can be made between principal and ally by those against whom the war is waged. He is not to do a deed makes the deed his own. If he calls in the hand of the assassin or murderer, himself becomes the assassin or murderer. The known rule of warfare of the Indian savages is an indiscriminate butchery of men and women, and children. Those who under this well known character, are employed by the British nation as allies in the war against the Americans. Governor Hamilton undertakes to be the conductor of the war. In the execution of that undertaking, he associates small statesmen of the world in command with large parties of the savages, and sends them to act, sometimes jointly, and sometimes separately, not against our forts or armies in the field, but the farming settlements on our frontiers. Governor Hamilton is himself the butcher of men, women and children. I will not say to what length the fair rules of war would extend the right of punishment against him; but I am sure that confinement under its strictest circumstances, for Indian devastation and massacre must be deemed lenient. —To SIR GUY CARLETON. FORD ED., ii, 249. (1779.)

8971. WASHINGTON (City), Appropriations.—We cannot suppose Congress intended to tax the people of the United States at large, for all the avenues in Washington and roads in Columbia.—To ROBERT BRENT. v, 50. FORD ED., ix, 33. (W., 1807.)

8972. WASHINGTON (City), Attachment to.—It is with sincere regret that I part with the society in which I have lived here. It has been the source of much happiness to me during my residence at the seat of government and I owe it much for its kind dispositions. I shall ever feel a high interest in the prosperity of the city, and an affectionate attachment to its inhabitants.—R. TO A. CITIZENS OF WASHINGTON. viii, 158. (March 4, 1809.)

8973. WASHINGTON (City), British capture of.—In the late events at Washington I have felt so much for you that I cannot express the pleasure or my sympathies. For although every reasonable man must be sensible that all you can do is to order, that execution must depend on others, and failures be imputed to them alone; yet I know that when such failures happen they afflict even those who have done everything they could prevent them. Had General Washington himself been now at the head of our affairs, the same event would probably have happened. We all remember the disgrace which befell us in his time in a trifling war with one or two petty tribes of Indians, in which two of his own * Colonel Matthews was an American officer in the hands of the British. Jefferson was Governor of Virginia.—EDITOR.
were cut off by not half their numbers. Every one knew, and I personally knew, because I was then of his council, that no blame was imputable to him, and that his officers alone were the cause of the disasters. They must now do the same justice.—To President Madison. vi, 385. (M., Sep. 1814.)

8974. [The incendiaryism at Washington] enfolds the feelings of the world on our side; and gives to the advantage of the American cause an influence that of the weather-gauge in a naval action. In Europe, the transient possession of our capital can be no disgrace. Nearly every capital there was in possession of its enemy: some often and long. But diabolical as they pain and hurt her public edifices or private dwellings. It was reserved for England to show that Bonaparte, in atrocity, was an infant to their ministers and their generals. They are taking his place in the eyes of Europe, and have turned into our channel all this. It will be the misfortune of dollars their conflagration will cost us. —To James Monroe. vi, 408. Ford ed., ix, 496. (M., Jan. 1815.)

8975. The embarrasments at Washington in August last, I expected would be great in any state of things; but they proved greater than expected. I never doubted that the men of the President were wise and sufficient. Their failure we all impute, 1, to the insubordinate temper of Armstrong; and 2, to the indecision of Winder. However, it ends well. It mortifies ourselves and so may check, perhaps, the silly boasting spirit of our newspapers. —To James Monroe. vi, 408. Ford ed., ix, 496. (M., Jan. 1815.)

8976. I set down the coup de main at Washington as more disgraceful to England than to us.—To W. H. Crawford. vi, 418. Ford ed., ix, 502. (M., 1815.)

8977. The transaction has helped rather than hurt us, by arousing the general indignation of our country, and by marking to the world of Europe, the Vandalism of the great and the cruel of the English government. It has merely served to immortalize their infamy.—To Marquis Lafayette. vi, 424. Ford ed., ix, 508. (M., 1815.) See Capital.

8978. Washington (City), Building line.—I doubt much whether the obligation to build the houses at a given distance from the street, contributes to its beauty. It produces a disgusting monotony; all persons make this complaint against Philadelphia. The contrary practice varies the appearance, and is much more convenient to the inhabitants.—Federal Capital Opinion. vii, 513. Ford ed., v, 253. (1795.)

8979. Washington (City), Foundation of.—As to the future residence of Congress, I can give you an accurate idea from the information of others, all this having taken place before my arrival [in Philadelphia]. Congress, it seems, thought it best to generalize their first determination by putting questions on the several rivers on which it had been proposed that they should build. The Potomac, Hudson river, the Delaware, and the Potomac, were accordingly offered to the vote. The first obtained scarcely any votes; the Delaware obtained seven. This, of course, put the Potomac out of the way; and the Delaware being once determined on, there was scarcely any difference of opinion as to the particular spot. The Falls met the approbation of all the States present, except Pennsylvania, which was for Germantown, and Delaware, which was for Wilmington. As to the latter, it appeared that she had been induced to vote for the Delaware on the single idea of getting Congress to Wilmington, and that being disappointed in this, they would not wish them on that river at all, but would prefer Georgetown to the Falls. This being discovered, the Southern delegates, at a subsequent day, brought on a reconsideration of the question, and obtained a determination that Congress should sit one-half of their time at Georgetown, and that till all accommodations should be provided there, Annapolis should be substituted in its place. This was considered by some as a compromise; by others as only unhinging the first determination and leaving the whole matter open for discussion at some future day. It was in fact a rally, and making a drawn battle of what had at first appeared to be decided against us.—To Governor Benjamin Harrison. Ford ed., iii, 340. (Pa., Nov. 1783.)

8980. I take the following to be the disposition of the several States: The four Eastern States are for any place in preference to Philadelphia, the more northern it is, however, the better. The other States, New York and New Hampshire, are for the Falls of Delaware. Pennsylvania is for Germantown first, and next for the Falls of Delaware. It is to be noted that Philadelphia had no attention as a permanent place. Delaware is for Wilmington: but for Georgetown in preference to the Falls of Delaware, or any other situation which [may] attract the trade of their river. Maryland is for Annapolis, and the smallest hope for this will sacrifice a certainty for Georgetown. Virginia, except for the southern parts of it being disregarded by the States as every place north of the Delaware, saw it would be useless to consider her interests as to more southern positions. The Falls of Potomac will probably, therefore, unite the wishes of the whole State. If this fails, Annapolis and the Falls of Delaware are then the candidates. Were the convenience of the delegates alone to be considered, or the general convenience to government in their transaction of business with Congress, Annapolis would probably be preferred. But those who respect commercial advantages more than the convenience of individuals, will probably think that every position on the bay of Chesapeake, or any of its waters, is to be dreaded by Virginia, as it may attract the trade of that bay and make us, with respect to Maryland, what Delaware State is to Pennsylvania. Considering the residence of Congress, therefore, as it may influence trade, if we cannot obtain it on the Potomac, it seems to be our interest to bring the trade of the waters of the Chesapeake bay. The three Southern States are for the most southern situation. It should be noted that New Hampshire and Georgia were absent on the decisions of these questions, but considering their interests would be directly opposite, it was thought their joint presence or absence would not change the result. From the preceding state of the views of the several members of our Union, your Excellency will be enabled to judge what will be the probable result of the present revision of the present plan. The establishment of new States will be friendly or adverse to Georgetown according to their situation. If a State be first laid off on the Lakes, it will add a vote to the northern scale; if on the Ohio, it will add one to the southern.—To Governor Benjamin Harrison. Ford ed., iii, 342. (Pa., Nov. 1783.)
The General Assembly shall have power * * * to cede to Congress one hundred square miles of territory in any other part of this State, exempted from the jurisdiction and government of this State, so long as Congress shall hold their sessions therein, or in any territory adjacent thereto, which may be tendered to them by any other State. —POULD BOY, Constitution of VIRGINIA, viii, 446. FORD ED., iii, 325. (1783.)

Georgetown languishes. The smile is hardly covered now when the federal towns are spoken of. I fear that our chance is at this time desperate. Our object, therefore, must be, if we fail in an effort to remove to Georgetown, to endeavor then to get to some place off the waters, for that preference to be secured against Congress considering themselves as fixed. —To JAMES MADISON, FORD ED., iii, 400. (A., Feb. 1784.)

The remoteness of the Falls of Potomac from the influence of any overgrown commercial city recommends [that place for the] permanent seat of Congress. —Notes on Permanent Seat of Congress. FORD ED., iii, 438. (April 1784.)

Philadelphia. In favor of it 1. Its unrivalled convenience for transacting the public business, and accommodating Congress in its business. In the place where all the public offices, particularly that of Finance could be kept under the inspection and control of, and proper intercourse with Congress. 3. Its convenience for foreign ministers, to which, ceteris paribus, some regard would be paid. The circumstance of which produced a removal from Philadelphia; which rendered a return, as soon as the insult had been expiated, expedient for supporting in the eyes of foreign nations the appearance of internal harmony, and preventing an appearance of resentment in Congress against the State of Pennsylvania, or city of Philadelphia, an appearance which was very much strengthened by some of their proceedings at Princeton—particularly by an unnecessary and irregular declaration not to return to Philadelphia. In addition to these covert reasons, it was concluded by sundry of the members, who were most anxious to fix Congress permanently at the Falls of the Potomac, that a temporary residence in Philadelphia would be most likely to prepare a sufficient number of votes for that place in preference to the Falls of Delaware, and to produce a reconsideration of the vote in favor of the latter. Against Philadelphia were alleged. 1. The difficulty and uncertainty of getting away from it at the time limited. 2. The influence of a large commercial and wealthy city on the public councils. In addition to these objections, the hatred against Mr. Morris, and the hope of accelerating his final resignation were latent motives with some, as perhaps envy of the prosperity of Philadelphia, and dislike of the system of Hamilton. —To JAMES MADISON, FORD ED., iii, 459. (April 1784.)

I like your removal to New York, and hope Congress will continue there, and never execute the idea of building their Federal Town. Before it could be finished, a change in members of Congress, or the admission of new States, would remove them. It is evident that when a sufficient number of the Western States come in, they will remove it to Georgetown. In the meantime, it is our interest that it should re-main where it is, and give no new pretensions to any other place. —To JAMES MONROE, iii, 347. FORD ED., iv, 52. (P., 1785.)

Philadelphia was first proposed, and had six and a half votes. The half vote was Delaware, one of whose members wanted to take a vote on Wilmington. Then Baltimore was proposed and carried, and afterwards rescinded, so that the matter stood open as ever on the 10th of August; but it was finally decided by the Executive, of New York and Philadelphia, and rather thought in favor of the last. —To WILLIAM SHORT. ii, 480. FORD ED., v, 49. (P., Sep. 1788.)

On the question of residence, the compromise proposed is to give it to Philadelphia for fifteen years, and then permanently to Georgetown by the same act. This is the best arrangement we have now any prospect of, and therefore the one to which all our wishes are at present pointed. If this does not take place, something much worse will; to wit, an unqualified assumption [of the State debts] and the permanent seat on the Delaware. —To T. M. RANDOLPH, FORD ED., v, 186. (N.Y., 1790.)

WASHINGTON (City), Future of. —That the improvement of this city must proceed with sure and steady steps, follows from its many obvious advantages, and from the enterprising spirit of its inhabitants, which promises to render it the fairest seat of wealth and science. —R. TO A. CITIZENS OF WASHINGTON. viii, 158. (1809.)

WASHINGTON (City), Houses. —In Paris it is forbidden to build a house beyond a given height, and it is admitted to be a good restriction. It keeps down the price of ground, keeps the houses low and convenient, and the streets light and airy. Fires are much more manageable where houses are low. —Federal Capital Opinion, vii, 513. FORD ED., v, 253. (1790.)

I cannot help again suggesting one regulation formerly suggested, to wit: To provide for the extinguishment of fires, and the openness and convenience of the town, by prohibiting houses of excessive height; and making it unlawful to build on any one’s purchase any house with more than two floors between the common level of the earth and the eaves. —Federal Capital Opinion, vii, 561. (March 1791.)

WASHINGTON (City), Lots. —The lots [should] be sold in breadth of fifty feet; their depths to extend to the diagonal of the square. —Federal Capital Opinion, vii, 513. FORD ED., v, 253. (1790.)

WASHINGTON (City), Plans of. —I shall send you  two dozen plans of the city of Washington, which you are desired to display, not for sale, but for public inspection, wherever they may be most seen by those descriptions of people worthy and likely to be attracted to it, dividing the plans among the merchants of London, New York, Philadelphia, and sending them also to Glasgow, Bristol, and Dublin. —To Thomas Pinckney, iii, 500. (Pa., 1792.)

I sent you  a dozen plans of the city of Washington in the Federal territory, hoping you would have them displayed to public view where they would be most seen by those descriptions of men worthy and likely to be attracted to it. Paris, Lyons, Rouen, and the seaport towns of Havre, Nantes, Bourdeaux and Marseilles would be proper places to send some of them.—To Gouverneur Morris. iii, 523. FORD ED., vi, 201. (Pa., 1793.)

8994. WASHINGTON (City), Residence in.—On the subject of your location for the winter, it is impossible in my view of it, to doubt on the preference which should be given to this place. Under any circumstances it could not be over fifty yards from your advocate, and a minute knowledge of our political machine, not merely of its organization, but the individuals and characters composing it, their general mode of thinking, and of acting openly and secretly. Of all this you can learn no more at Philadelphia than of a diet of the empire. None but an eyewitness can really understand it, and it is quite as important to be known to them, and to obtain a certain degree of their confidence in your own right. In a government like ours, the standing of a man well with this portion of the public must weigh against a considerable difference of other qualifications.—William Short. v, 210. (W., Nov. 1807.)

8995. WASHINGTON (City), Streets.—I should propose the streets [of the Federal capital] to be at right angles, as in Philadelphia, and that no street be narrower than one hundred feet with footways of fifteen feet. Where a street is long and level, it might be one hundred and twenty feet wide. I should prefer squares of about two hundred yards every way.

8996. WASHINGTON (George), Advice and.—His mind has been so long used to unlimited applause that it could not brook contradiction, or even advice offered unasked. To advice, when asked, he is very open.—To Archibald Stuart. FORD ED., vii, 101. (M. Jan. 1797.)

8997. WASHINGTON (George), Attacks on.—The President is extremely affected by the attacks made and kept up on him in the public papers. I think he feels those things more than any person I have yet met with, and I am sincerely sorry to see them.—To James Madison. iii, 579. FORD ED., vi, 293. (June 1793.)

8998. — — —. [At a cabinet meeting] [Secretary] Knox in a foolish, incoherent sort of a speech, introduced the pasquinade lately printed, called the funeral of George Washington and James Wilson [Associate Justice of the Supreme Court]; King and Judge, &c., where the President was on a great wave. 8999. WASHINGTON (George), Cere mony and.—I remember an observation of yours, made when I first went to New York, that the satellites and sycophants that surrounded him [Washington] had wound up the ceremonies of the government to a pitch of stateliness which nothing but his personal character could have supported, and which no character after him could ever maintainers. Of course, that even his will be insufficient to justify them in the appeal of the times to common sense as the arbiter of everything. Naked, he would have been sanctimoniously reverence; but en coped in the rags of royalty, they can hardly be torn off without laceration.

9000. WASHINGTON (George), Cincinn
ti and.—I have wished to see you standing on ground separated from it [the Society of the Cincinnati]; I wished that the character which will be handed to future ages as a symbol of the Revolution, may, in no instance, be compro mised in subordinate alterations.—To Gene

9001. WASHINGTON (George), Confi dence in.—Without pretensions to that high confidence you reposed in our first and greatest revolutionary character, whose preeminent serv ices had entitled him to the first place in his country's love, I cannot now bring the page in the volume of faithful history. I ask so much confidence only as may give firmness and effect to the legal administration of your affairs.—First Inaugural Address, viii, 5. FORD ED., viii, 5. (1801.)

9002. WASHINGTON (George), Crown refused.—The alliance between the States under the old Articles of Confederation, for the purpose of joint defence against the aggres sions of Great Britain, was a necessary step; as treaties of alliance generally are, to enforce compliance with their mutual stipulations; and these, once fulfilled, that bond was to expire of itself, and each State to become sovereign and independent in all things. Yet it could not but occur to every one, that these separate independ encies, like the petty States of Greece, would be eternally at war with each other, and would become at length the mere partisans and satellite s of the leading powers of Europe. All then must have looked to some further bond of union, which would insure internal peace, and a polit ical system of our own, independent of that of Europe. Whether all should be consolidated into a single government, or each remain inde pendent as to internal matters, and the whole form a single nation as to what was foreign only, and whether that national government should be a monarchy or a republic, would of course divide opinions according to the con stitutions, the habits, and the circumstances of the individuals. But it is difficult to suppose how, as it has always been said and believed (and Steuben and Knox have ever been named as the leading agents), trained to monarchy by military habits, are understood to have proposed to General Washington to decide this great ques tion by the army before its disbandment, and to assume himself the crown, on the assurance of their support. The indignation with which he is said to have scouted this partizane proposition was equally worthy of his virtue and his wisdom.—THE ANAS. ix, 88. FORD ED., i, 157. (1818.)

9004. I wish that his honesty and his political errors may not furnish a second occasion to exclaim 'curse his virtues, they have undone his country'.—To JAMES MADISON, iv, 136. FORD ED., vii, 69. (M., 1796.)

9005. The President [Washington] is fortunate to get off just as the [bank and paper] bubble is bursting, leaving others to hold the bag. Yet, as his departure will mark the moment when the difficulties begin to work, you will see that they will be ascribed to the new administration, and that he will have his undiminished credit of the good acts of others, and leaving to them that of his errors.—To JAMES MADISON, FORD ED., vii, 104. (M., Jan. 1797.)

9006. WASHINGTON (George), Estimate of.—His mind was great and powerful, without being of the very first order; his penetration strong, though not so acute as that of a Newton, Bacon, or Locke; and as far as he saw, no judgment was ever sounder. It was slow in operation, being little aided by invention or imagination; but sure in conclusion, the common remark of his officers, of the advantage he derived from councils of war, where, hearing all suggestions, he selected whatever was best; and certainly no general ever planned his battles more judiciously. But if delayed during the course of the action, if any member of his plan was dislocated by sudden circumstances, he was slow in readjustment. The consequence was that he often failed in the field, and rarely against an enemy in station, as at Boston and York. He was incapable of fear, meeting dangers with the calmest of his concern. Perhaps the strongest feature in his character was prudence, never acting until every circumstance, every consideration, was maturely weighed; refraining if he saw a doubt, but, when once decided, going through with his purpose, however the issue might be opposed. His integrity was most pure, his justice the most inflexible I have ever known, no motives of interest or consanguinity, of friendship or hatred, being able to bias his decision. He was, indeed, in every sense of that word, a man, a good, and a great man. His temper was naturally irrational and high toned; but reflection and resolution had obtained a firm and habitual ascendancy over it. If ever, however, it broke its bonds, he was most tremendous in his wrath. In his expenses he was honorable, but exact: liberal in contributions to whatever promised utility; but frowning and unyielding on all visionary projects, and all unworthy calls on his charity. His heart was not warm in its affections; but he exactly calculated every man's value, and gave him a solid esteem proportioned to it. His person was fine, his stature exactly what one would wish, his deportment easy, erect and noble; the best horseman of his age, and the most graceful figure that could be seen on horseback. Although in the circle of his friends, where he might be used opposed, with safety, he took a free share in conversation, his colloquial talents were not above mediocrity, possessing neither copiousness of ideas, nor fluency of words. In public, when called on for a sudden opinion, he was unready, short and embarrassed. Yet he wrote readily, rather diffusely, in an easy and correct style, and with a judgment which was equally worthy of his virtue, and his wisdom.—THE ANAS. ix, 88. FORD ED., i, 157. (1818.)

9008. WASHINGTON (George), Fane of.—Washington's fame will go on increasing until the brightest constellation in heaven shall be called by his name.—DOMESTIC LIFE OF JEFFERSON. 358.

9010. WASHINGTON (George), Farewell address of.—With respect to his [President Washington's] Farewell Address, to the authorship of which, it seems, there are conflicting claims, I can state to you some facts. He had determined to decline reelection at the end of his first term, and so far determined, that he had requested Mr. Madison to prepare for him some Valedictory, to be addressed to his constituents on his retirement. This was done, but he was finally persuaded to acquiesce in a second election, to which no one more strenuously pressed him than myself, from a conviction of his being the only man of strength, who was fit to keep the energy of the republic not uncontrolled; the respect necessary for that officer, which the weight of his character only could effect. When, at the end of this second term, his Valedictory came out, Mr. Madison recognized in it several passages of his draft; several others, we were both satisfied, were from the pen of Hamilton, and others from that of the President himself. These he probably put into the hands of Hamilton to form into a whole, and hence it may all appear in Hamilton's handwriting, as if it were all of his composition. —To Martin Van Buren. vii. 371. Ford ed., x. 314. (M., 1824.)

9011. WASHINGTON (George), Federalists and.—General Washington, after the retirement of his first cabinet, and the composition of his second, entirely federal, * * * had no opportunity of hearing both sides of any question. His measures, consequently, took the hue of the party in whose hands he was. These measures were certainly not approved by the republicans; yet they were not imputed to him but to the counsellors around him; and his prudence so far restrained their impassioned course and bias, that no act of strict inflexibility, during his administration, excited much dissatisfaction. He lived too short a time after, and too much withdrawn from information, to correct the views into which he had been deluded; and the continued assiduities of the party drew him into the vortice of their passion, and carried him still farther from his real friends, and excited him to actions and expressions of dissatisfaction, which grieved them, but could not loosen their affections from him. They would not suffer the temporary aberration to weigh against the merits of his life; and although they tumbled his seducers from their places, they preserved his memory embalmed in their hearts with undiminished love and devotion; and there it will forever remain embalmed, in entire oblivion of every temporary thing which might cloud the glories of his splendid life. It is vain, then, for Mr. Pickering and his friends to endeavor to falsify his character, by representing him as an enemy to republicans and republican principles, and as an impostor, when at the end of his first term, and had he lived longer, he would have returned to his ancient and unbiased opinions, would have replaced his confidence in those whom the people approved and supported, and would have seen that they were only restoring any principles of his own first administration. —To Martin Van Buren. vii. 321. Ford ed., x. 314. (M., 1824.)

9012. The Federalists, pretending to be the exclusive friends of General Washington, have ever done what they could to sink his character, by hanging theirs on it, and by representing as the enemy of republicans him, who, of all men, is best entitled to the appellation of the father of that republic which they were endeavoring to subvert, and the republicans to maintain. They cannot deny, because the elections proclaimed the truth, that the present body of the nation approved the republican measures.—To Martin Van Buren. vii. 371. Ford ed., x. 314. (M., 1824.)

9013. From the moment * * * of my retiring from the administration, the federalists got unchecked hold of General Washington. His memory was already sensibly impaired by age, the firm tone of mind for which he had been remarkable, was abated, and its energy was abated; a listlessness of labor, a desire for tranquillity had crept on him, and a willingness to let others act, and even think for him. Like the rest of mankind, he was disgusted with the atrocities of the French Revolution, and was not sufficiently aware of the difference between the rabble who were used as instruments of their perpetration, and the steady and rational character of the American people, in which he had not sufficient confidence. The opposition too of the republicans to the British treaty, and zealous support of the federalists in that unpopular, but favorite measure of theirs, had made him all their own. Understanding, moreover, that I disapproved of that treaty, and continuously nourished with truths by a malignant neighbor of mine [Henry Lee, "Light-Horse Harry"], who ambitioned to be his correspondent, he had become alienated from myself personally, as from the republican body generally of his fellow citizens; and he wrote the letters to Mr. Adams and Mr. Carroll over which, in devotion to his imperishable fame, we must forever weep as monuments of mortal decay.—The Ana. ix. 99. Ford ed., i. 168. (1818.)

9014. WASHINGTON (George), Influence of.—You will have seen by the proceedings of Congress the truth of what I always observed to you, that one man outweighs them all in influence over the people, who have supported his judgment against their own and that of their representatives. Republicanism must lie on its oars, resign the vessel to its pilot, and themselves to the course he thinks best for them.—To James Madison. iv. 140. Ford ed., vii. 80. (M., June 1796.)

9015. WASHINGTON (George), Jefferson and.—I learn that he [General H. Lee] has thought it worth his while to try to sow tares between you and me, by representing me as still engaged in the bustle of politics, and in turbulence and intrigue against the government. I never believed for a moment that this could be the case. There are any who think that the knowledge of me would not outweigh the slander of an intriguer, dastly employed in sitting the conversations of my table, where alone he could hear of me; and seeking to atone for his sins against you by sins against another, who had never done him any other injury than the regular course of declining his confidences. Political conversations I really dislike, and therefore avoid where I can without affectation. But when urged by others, I have never conceived that having been in public life, I have to do with them, or even to conceal them. When I am led by conversation to express them, I do it with the same independence here which I have practiced everywhere, and which is inseparable from my nature. But enough of this miserable tergiver, who ought, indeed, either to adduce more of truth, or less trusted by his country.—To President Washington. iv. 142. Ford ed., vii. 82. (M., 1796.)

for virtue in the abstract, honorable to him who inscribes it, as to him whom it commemorates... * This testimonial in favor of the first worthy of our country will be paid to the feelings of our citizens generally.—To DANIEL ECCLESTON, v, 213. (W., 1807.)

9020. WASHINGTON (George), Memory of.—His memory will be adored while liberty shall have votaries, his name will triumph over time and will in future ages assume its just station among the most celebrated worthies of the world.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. v. 312. 168, 1782.)

9021. WASHINGTON (George), National monument to.—In a former letter I enclosed you an idea of Mr. Lee's for an immediate appropriation of a number of lots to raise a sum of money for erecting a national monument in the city of Washington. It was scarcely to be doubted but that you would avoid appropriations for matters of ornament till a sufficient sum should be secured out of the proceeds of your sales to accomplish the public buildings, bridges and such other objects as are essential. Mr. Caracchi, the artist, who had proposed to execute the monument, has had this day an opportunity of examining the subscirptions for that purpose, would have sufficed to effect it. That hope is now over, and he is about to return to Europe. He is unquestionably an artist of the first class. He has had the advantage of taking the President's person in plaster, equal to the best in representation, and spirit. It is pretty certain that the equestrian statue of the President can never be executed by an equal workman, who has had equal advantages, and the question is whether a prudent caution will permit you to enter into any engagement now, in contemplation of the event. It is to have accomplished the more material objects of the public buildings, &c. He says to execute the equestrian statue, with the cost of the materials, in marble, will be worth twenty thousand guineas; that he would begin it on his return, but four or five years hence can engage to pay him twenty thousand dollars, and the same sum annually afterwards, till the whole is paid, before which time the statue will be ready. It is rather probable that within some time Congress will take it on foot, and a compromise with an ancient vote of that body. The questions for your consideration are, whether, supposing no difficulty as to the means, you think such a work might be undertaken by you? Whether you can have so much confidence in the productiveness of your funds as to engage for a residuum of this amount, all the more necessary objects being first secured, and that this may be within the time first proposed? And, in fine, which will preponderate in your minds, the hazard of undertaking this new, or that of approbation of the action of the President? This proposition will satisfy you that it has not been communicated to the President, and of course would not be, unless a previous acceptance on your part, should render it necessary to obtain his sanction. Your answer is necessary for the satisfaction of Mr. Caracchi, who has engaged for me to submit the proposal to you, and who, I believe, will only wait here the return of that answer.—To THE COMMISSIONERS OF WASHINGTON, III. 346. (1702.)

9022. WASHINGTON (George), Oath of office.—Knox, Randolph and myself met at Knox's where Hamilton was also to have met, to consider the time, manner and place of the President's swearing in. * Hamilton had been there before [us] and had left his opinion with Knox, to wit, that the President should ask a judge to attend him in his own house to administer the oath, in the presence of the heads of Departments, which oath should be deposited in the Secretary of State's office. I concurred in this opinion, as a member of the President's going to the Senate chamber to take the oath. attended by the Marshal of the United States who should then make proclamation, etc. Knox was for this and for adding the House of Representatives to the presence, as they would not act if the President was only known. These were written to be communicated to the President out of which he might form one.—The ANAS, ix, 139. FORD ED., i, 221. (Feb. 1793.)

9024. WASHINGTON (George), Opposition to administration.—I told the President [Washington] that in my opinion there was only a single source of the discontents [with the administration]. Though they had indeed appeared to spread themselves over the War Department also, yet I considered that as an overflowing only from their real channel, which would sooner be stopped, if first been generated in another Department, to wit, that of the Treasury. That a system had there been contrived, for deluging the States with paper money instead of gold and silver, for withdrawing our citizens from the pursuits of commerce, manufactures, buildings, and other branches of useful industry, to occupy themselves and their capitals in a species of gambling destructive of morality, and which had introduced its poison into the government itself. This it was a fact, as certainly known that he and I were then conversing, that particular members of the Legislature, while those laws were on the carpet, had feathered their nests with paper, had then voted for the laws, and constantly since lent all the energy of their talons, to the establishment and enlargement of this system; that they had chained it about our necks for a great length of time, and in order to keep the game in their hands had, from time to time, aided in making such legislative constructions of the Constitution, as made it a very different thing from what the people thought they had submitted to; that they had now brought forward a proposition, far beyond every one yet advanced, and to which the eyes of many were turned, as which we could all know, whether we live under a limited or an unlimited government. He asked me to what proposition I alluded? I answered to that in the Report on Manufactures, which, under color of giving bounties for the encouragement of battle, and by the establishment and promotion of the manufacture of all kinds of manufactures, was nothing but the doctrine, that the power given by the Constitution to collect taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States, permitted Congress to take everything under their management, which they should deem for the public welfare, and thereby to deprive the province of the operation of money; consequently, that the subsequent enumeration of their powers was not the description to which resort must be had, and did not at all constitute the limits of their authority; that this was a very different question from that of the bank, which was thought an incident to an enumerated power; that therefore, this decision was expected with great anxiety; that I knowed, I hoped it would be rejected, believing there was a majority in both Houses against it, and that if it should be, it would be considered as a proof that things were returning into their true channel; and that, at any rate, I looked forward to the broad representation which would shortly take place, for keeping the general Constitution on its true ground; and that this would remove a great deal of the discontent which had shown itself.—The ANAS, ix, 104. FORD ED., i, 176. (Feb. 29, 1792.)

9025. The President said Governor Lee had that day informed him of the general discontent prevailing in Virginia, of which he never had had any conception, much less sound information; that it appeared to him very alarming.  I confirmed him in the fact of the great discontents in the South; that they were grounded on seeing that their judgments and interests were sacrificed to those of the East; and on occasions of great occasion, and their belief that it was the effect of a corrupt squadron of voters in Congress, at the command of the Treasury; and they see that if the votes of those members who had an interest distinct from, and contrary to the general interest of their constituents, had been withdrawn, as in decay and honesty they should have been, the laws would have been the reverse of what they are on all the great questions. I instanced the new Assumption carried in the House of Representatives by the Speaker's vote. On this subject he made no reply.—The ANAS, ix, 130. FORD ED., i, 215. (Feb. 7, 1793.)

9026. The object of the opposition which was made to the course of administration was to preserve the Legislature pure and independent of the Executive, to restrain the Administration to republican forms and principles, and not permit the Constitution to be construed into a monarchy, and to be warped, in practice, into all the principles and pollutions of their favorite English model. Nor was this an opposition to General Washington. He was true to the republican charge confided to him; and has solemnly and repeatedly protested to me, in our conversations that he would lose the last drop of his blood in supporting the Constitution as he did this the other and with the more earnestness, because he knew my suspicions of Hamilton's designs against it, and wished to quiet them. For he was not aware of the drift or of the effect of Hamilton's schemes. Unversed in financial projects and calculations and budgets, his approbation of them was bottomed on his confidence in the man.—The ANAS, ix, 95. FORD ED., i, 165. (1818.)

9027. WASHINGTON (George), Popularity of.—Such is the popularity of President Washington that the people will support him in whatever he will do or will not do, without appealing to their own reason, or to anything but the feeling towards him.—Archibald Stuart. FORD ED., viii, viii. (M. Jan. 1797.)

9028. WASHINGTON (George), President.—Though we [in Paris] have not heard of the actual opening of the new Congress, and consequently have not official information of your election as President of the United States, yet, as there never could be a doubt entertained of it, permit me to express here my felicitations, not to yourself, but to my country. Nobody who has tried both public and private life, can doubt that you were much happier on the banks of the Potomac than you will be at New York. But there was nobody so well qualified as yourself to put our new machine into a regular course of action; nobody, the authority of whose name could have so effectually crushed opposition at home, and produced respect abroad. I am sensible of the immensity of the sacrifices our nation has been called on to make; and, therefore, you have nothing to gain. But there are cases where it is a duty to risk all against nothing, and I believe this was exactly the case. We may presume, too, according to every rule of probability, his next great good, you will be found to have lost nothing but private reposes. —To General Washington. iii. 30. FORD ED., v. 94. (P., May 1789."

9029. WASHINGTON (George), Presidential reeligibility and. —The perpetual reeligibility of the same President will probably not be curred during the life of General Washington. His merit has blinded our countrymen to the danger of making so important an office reeligible. I presume there will not be a voice against it in the United States. —To William Carmichael. ii. 465. (P., Aug. 1788.)

9030. WASHINGTON (George), Prudent. —The prudence of the President is an anchor of safety to us. —To Nicholas Lewis. FORD ED., v. 282. (P., 1791.)

9031. WASHINGTON (George), Republicanism of. —It is fortunate that our first Executive Magistrate is purely and zealously republican. We cannot expect all his successors to be so, and therefore, should avail ourselves the present day to establish principles and examples which may fence us against future heresies preached now, to be practiced hereafter. —To Harry Innes. iii. 224. FORD ED., v. 300. (P., 1791.)

9032. —. General Washington was himself sincerely a friend to the republican principles of our Constitution. His faith perhaps in what he did not himself believe was as constant as mine; but he repeatedly declared to me, that he was determined it should have a fair chance for success, and that he would lose the last drop of his blood in its support, against any attempt which might be made to change it from its republican form. He made these declarations the oftener, because he knew my suspicions that Hamilton had other views, and he wished to quiet my jealousies on this subject. —To Martin Van Buren. vii. 371. FORD ED., x. 314. (M., 1824.)

9033. WASHINGTON (George), Republicans and. —I have long thought it was best for the republican interest to soothe him by flattering where they could approach his manners, and to be silent where he disapproved, that they may not render him desperate as to their affections, and entirely indifferent to their wishes, in short to lie on their oars while he remains at the helm, and let the bark drift as his will and a superintending Providence shall direct. —To Alexander STUART. FORD ED., vii. 102. (M., Jan. 1797.)

9034. WASHINGTON (George), Second term. —When you first mentioned to me your purpose of resigning from the government, though I felt all the magnitude of the event, I was in a considerable degree silent. I knew that, to such a mind as yours, persuasion was idle and impertinent; that before forming your decision you had weighed all the reasons for and against the measure, had made up your mind of a full view of them, that there could be little hope of changing the result. Pursuing my reflections, too, I knew we were some day to try to walk alone, and if the essay should be made while you should be alive and looking on, we should have derived from them to your advantage and resource, if it failed. The public mind, too, was calm and confident, and therefore in a favorable state for making the experiment. Had no change of circumstances intervened, I should not, with any hopes of success, have now ventured an essay on such extraordinary grounds. But the public mind is no longer confident and serene; and that from causes in which you are no ways personally mixed. Though these causes have been hackneyed in the public papers in detail, it may not be amiss, in order to calculate the effects; they are capable of producing, to take a view of them in the mass, giving to each the form, real or imaginary, under which they have been presented. It has been urged, then, that the public debt, greater than we can possibly pay before other causes of adding new debt were connected with it. They are adding together the whole amount of the debtor and creditor sides of accounts, instead of only taking their balances, which could have been paid off in a short time; that this accumulation has debarred the debtor from those easy sources of revenue which, applied to the ordinary necessities and exigencies of government, would have answered them habitually, and covered us from habitual murmurings against taxes and taxgathers, reserving exclusive property of them for those extraordinary occasions which would animate the people to meet them; that though the calls for money have been not greater than we must expect generally, for the same or equivalent exigencies, yet we are already obliged to strain the impost till it produces the bases, and we will produce evasion, and war on our own citizens to collect it, and even to resort to an excise law of most odious character with the people, partial in its operation, unproductive unless enforced by arbitrary and vexatious means, and committing the authority of the government to the execution of the most probable and coercion least practicable. They cite propositions in Congress, and suspect other projects on foot still to increase the mass of debt. They say, that by borrowing at two-thirds of the interest, we might have paid off the principal in two-thirds of the time that from this we are precluded by its being made irredeemable but in small portions and long terms; that this irredeemable quality was given it for the avowed purpose of inviting its transfer to foreign countries. They predict that the transfer of the principal, when completed, will occasion an exportation of three millions of dollars annually for the interest, a drain of coin, of which as there have been no examples, no calculation can be made of its consequences; that this transfer amounting to millions, will be accelerated by the creation of ten millions of paper money, in the form of bank bills now issuing into circulation. They think that the ten or twelve per cent. annual profit paid to the lenders of this paper medium taken out of the pockets of the people, and who will pay the interest the coin it is banishing; that all the capital employed in paper speculation is barren and useless, producing, like that on a gaming table, no accession to itself, and is withdrawn from the stock; that such speculation would have produced addition to the common mass; that it nourishes in our citizens habits of vice and idleness, instead of industry and morality; that it has furnished effectual means of corrupting such a portion of the Legislature as turns the balance between the honest voters, whichever way it is directed: that this corrupt squadron, deciding the voice of the Legislature, have manifested their dispositions to get rid of the objections to the plan by creating a delusion as to the general Legislature, limitations, on the faith of which, the States acceded to that instrument: that the ultimate object of all this is to prepare the way for a change from the present republican form of government. The argument of a majority of whom the English constitution would be the model: that this was contemplated by the convention is no secret, because its partisans have made none of it. To effect it then was impracticable, but they are still eager after their objects, and are pretending everything for its ultimate attainment. So many of them have got into the Legislature, that, aided by the corrupt squadron of paper dealers, who are at their devotion, they make a majority in both houses. The republican party, who wish to preserve the government in its true rest form, are fewer in number; they are fewer even when joined by the two, three, or half dozen anti-federalists, who, though they dare not avow it, are still opposed to any general government; but, being less so to a republican than a monarchical one, are of less importance. The one is pursuing the lesser evil. Of all the mischiefs objected to the system of measures before mentioned, none is so afflicting and fatal to every honest hope, as the corruption of the Legislatures. As North Carolina, so far as it has hitherto been the instrument for producing the rest, and will be the instrument for producing in future a king, lords and commons, or whatever else those who direct it may choose. With-drawn such a distance from the eye of their constituents, and are pursuing every thing inaccessible to public information, and particularly to that of the conduct of their own representatives, they will form the most corrupt government on earth, if the means of their corruption be not prevented. The only hope of safety now is by a regular wall of strength, which is to come forward the ensuing year. Some of the new members will be, probably, either in principle or interest, with the present majority; but it is expected that the great mass will form an aisle, standing between the contrary opinions which will be found to prevail; and the non-partisan will be able to undo all which the two preceding Legislatures, and especially the first, have done. Public faith and right will oppose this. But some parts of the system may be rightfully reformed, a liberation from the rest unremittingly pursued as fast as right will permit, and the door shut against similar commitments of the nation. Should the next Legislature take this course, it will draw upon them the whole monarchical and paper interest; but the latter, I think, will not go all lengths with the former. If the anti-federalists, with one accord, fly off entirely from their debtors; therefore, this is the alternative least likely to produce convulsion. But should the majority of the new members be still in the same principles with the present, and show that we have nothing to expect but a continuance of the same practices, it is not easy to conjecture what would be the result, nor what means would be resorted to for correction of the evil. True wisdom would direct that they should be temperate and peaceable; such a division of sentiment and interest happens unfortunately to be so geographical, that no mortal man can say that what is most wise and temperate would prevail against what is most easy and obvious? I can scarcely contemplate a more incautious evil than the breaking in of the Union into two or more parts. Yet when we consider the mass which opposed the original coalescence; when we consider that it lay chiefly in the Southern quarter; that the Legislature have availed themselves of no occasion of alloying it, but on the contrary whenever Northern and Southern prejudices have come into collision, the majority have been opposed and the former soothed; that the owners of the debt are in the Southern, and the holders of it in the Northern division: that the anti-federal champions are now strengthened in argument by the fulfillment of their predictions; that this has been the event, and that the arch-federalists themselves, who, having been for the new government merely as a stepping stone to monarchy, have themselves adopted the very constructions of the Constitution, of which, when advocating its acceptance before the tribuna, the latter had unremittingly, and unsusceptible; that the republican federalists who espoused the same government for its intrinsic merits, are disarmed of their weapons; that which they denied as prophecy, having now become a reality, who can restrain them from teaching things may not proselyte the small number which was wanting to place the majority on the other side? And this is the event at which I tremble, and to prevent which I consider your continuance at the head of affairs as of the last importance. May the Union be centered in you. Your being at the helm will be more than an answer to every argument which can be used to alarm and lead the people in any quarter, into violence and sedition. A horrid event will be the consequence, if they have to hang on; and if the first correction of a numerous representation should fail in its effect, your presence will give time for trying others, not inconsistent with the Union and peace of the States. I am perfectly aware of the necessity which your present office lays your mind, and of the ardor with which you pant for domestic life. But there is sometimes a pre-eminence of character on which society have such peculiar claims as to control the predilections of the individual for a particular task that happiness can be restrained to things that alone arising from the present and future benedictions of mankind. This seems to be your condition, and the law imposed on you by Providence in forming your character, and fashioning the mind which you have to operate; and it is to motives like these, and not to personal anxieties of mine or others who have no right to call on you for sacrifices, that I appeal, and urge a revival of it, on the ground of change in the aspect of things. Should an honest majority result from the new and enlarged representation; should those acquiesce whose principles or interest they may control, your wishes for retirement would be gratified with less danger, as soon as that shall be manifest, without awaiting the completion of the second period of your years. On the other two sides I examine the crisis; and I cannot but hope that you can resolve to add more to the many years you have already sacrificed to the good of mankind. The fear of suspicion that any selfish motive of continuance in office may enter into this solicitation on my part, obliges me to declare that no such motive exists. It is a thing of mere indifference to the public whether I retain or relinquish my purpose of closing my tour with the first period of that which is by the government. I know my own measure too well to suppose that my services contribute anything to the public confidence, or the public utility. Multitudes can fill the office in which you have been pleased to place me, as much to their advantage and satisfaction. I have, therefore, no motive to con- sult but my own inclination, which is bent irresistibly on the tranquil enjoyment of my family, my farm and my books. I should repose among them, it is true, in far greater security, if I were to know that you remained at the watch; and I hope it will be so. To the inducements urged from a view of our domestic affairs, I will add a bare mention, of what indeed need only to be mentioned, that weighty motives for your consideration and for the benefit of our foreign affairs. It is probable that both the Spanish and English negotiations, if not completed before your purpose is known, will be suspended from the moment it is known, and that the latter nation will then use double diligence in fomenting the Indian war.

To President Washington. iii. 360. Ford ed., vi. 1. (P.A., May 1792.)

9035. — My letter to the President [May 23, 1792], directed to him at Mount Vernon, came to the hand of the President at Philadelphia. He told me of this, and that he would take occasion of speaking with me on the subject. He did so this day [July 10]. He began by observing that he had put it off from day to day, because the subject was painful, to wit, it remained in office, and he could not find a proper letter to cite. He said that the declaration he had made when he quitted his military command, of never again acting in public life, was sincere. That, however, when he was called on to come forward to set the present government in motion, appeared to him that circumstances were so changed, as to justify a change in his resolution; he was made to believe that in two years all would be well in motion, and he might retire. At the end of two years he found some things still to be done. At the beginning of the third year he thought it was not worth while to disturb the course of things, as in one year more his office would expire, and he was decided then to retire. Now he was told there would still be danger in it. Certainly, if he thought so, he would never have taken his resignation. But he feared it would be said his former professions of retirement had been mere affectation, and that he was like other men, when once in office he could not quit it. He was sensible, too, of a delay of his hearing; perhaps his constituents and his friends might be displeased, and not be sensible of it. That with respect to the existing causes of uneasiness, he thought there were suspicions against a particular party, which had been carried a great deal too far; there might be desires, but he did not believe that they were designs to change the form of government into a monarchy; that there might be a few who wished it in the higher walks of life, particularly in the great cities, but that the main body of the people in the eastern States were as steadily for republican as in the southern. That the pieces lately published, and particularly in Frenèus's paper, seemed to have in view the exciting opposition to the government. That this had taken place in Pennsylvania as to the Excise law, according to information he had from General F. He considered the papers as attacks upon him; the only way he must lay his fool indeed to swallow the little sugar plums here and there thrown out to him. That in condemning the administration of the government, they condemned him, for if they thought there were mistakes pursued contrary to his sentiments, they must conceive him too careless to attend to them, or too stupid to understand them. That though, indeed, he had signed many acts which he did not approve in all their parts, yet he had never put his name to one which he did not think, on the whole, was eligible. That as to the Bank, which had been an act of so much complaint, until there was some infallible criterion of reason, a difference of opinion must be tolerated. He did not believe that the people expected him far from the seat of government. He had seen and known many people in Maryland and Virginia in his late journey. He found the people contented and happy. He wished, however, to be better informed on this head. If the discontent were so great as to make him believe that the desire that he should remain in the government was not general.

—The Anas. ix. 116. Ford ed., i. 198. (July 1792.)

9036. President Washington said [in conversation with me] that as yet he was quite undecided whether to retire in March or not. His inclinations led him strongly to do it. Nobody disliked more the ceremonies of Washington's discharge than he. He thought that the declarations in the execution of its functions, that he was happy at home alone, and that his presence there was now peculiarly called for by the situation of Major Washington, whom he thought the most considerable in the country, he would remove into another part of the country, which might better agree with him. That he did not believe his presence necessary; that there were other characters who would do the business as well or better. Still, however, if his aid was thought necessary to save the cause to which he had devoted his life principally, he would make the sacrifice of a longer continuance. That he, therefore, reserved himself for future decision, as his declaration would be in time if made a month before the day of expiration. He had desired to get out from conversation, without appearing to make the inquiry, whether any other person would be desired by anybody. He had informed him, he judged from conversations that it was the universal desire he should continue, and he believed that those who expressed a doubt of his continuance, did it in the language of apprehension, and not of desire. But this, says he, is only from the north; it may be very different in the south. I thought this meant as much as to let me of them to speak for himself in the south, from which quarter I came. I told him, that as far as I knew, there was but one voice there, which was for his continuance.

—The Anas. ix. 120. Ford ed., i. 202. (Oct. 1792.)

9037. WASHINGTON (George), Statue of.—There could be no question raised as to the sculptor who should be employed [to execute the statue]: the reputation of Monsieur Houdon of this city [Paris] being unrivalled in Europe. He is resorted to for the statues of most of the sovereigns in Europe. On conversing with him, Doctor Franklin and myself became satisfied that no statue could be executed by any means but by dissection. That there were those to whom the figure of the original is known, but on an actual view by the artist. Of course no statue of General Washington, which might be a true evidence of his figure to posterity, could be made from his picture. Statues of other men may be made, but the figure of a person being, they are always condemned by those who know him for a want of resemblance, and this furnishes a conclusive presumption that similar representations of the dead are equally unfaithful. Monsieur Houdon, whose reputation is such as to make it his principal object, was so anxious to be the person who should hand down the figure of the General to future ages, that without hesitating a moment, he offered to abandon his business here, to leave the statues of Kings unfinished, and to go to America to take the true figure by actual inspection and measurement. We believe, from his character, that he will not propose any very considerable sum for making this journey; probably two or three hundred guineas, as much as his expenses will make at least a hundred guineas of the money. When the whole merit of the piece was to depend on this previous expenditure, we could not doubt your approbation of the scheme. We should think well of things which are just or handsome should never be done by halves. We shall regulate the article of expense as economically as we can with justice to the wishes of the world. This article, together with the habit, attitude, and other considerations, and till they be decided on, we cannot ultimately contract with Monsr. Houdon. We are agreed in one circumstance, that the size shall be precisely that of life. Were we to have executed a statue in any other case, we should have preferred thinking it somewhat larger than life; because as they are generally a little elevated they appear smaller, but we think it important that some one monument should be preserved of the true size as well as figure, from which all other countries (and our own at any future day when they shall desire it), may take copies, varying them in their dimensions as may suit the particular situation in which they wish to place them. The duty as well as the glory of this presentation we shall be happy to perform. We are sensible that the eye alone considered will not be quite as well satisfied; but connecting the consideration that the whole, and every part of it presents the true size of the life, we suppose the beholders will receive a greater pleasure on the whole. To the Governor of Virginia. Ford Ed., iv, 26. (P., 1785.)

9038. — I am happy to find  that the modern dress for your statue would meet your approbation. I found it strongly the sentiment of West, Copley, Trumbull, and Brown, in London; after which, it would be ridiculous to add, that it was my own. I think a modern in an antique dress as just an object of ridicule as a Hercules or Marius with a periwig and a chapeau bras. To General Washington. ii, 250. (P., 1787.)

9040. WATERHOUSE (Dr.), Marine hospital appointment. — When the appointment of Dr. Waterhouse to the care of the marine hospital was decided on, no other candidate had been named to me as deserving the place. The recommenders think highly of him, and his station as professor of medicine in a college of high reputation, sufficiently warranted his abilities as a physician, and to these was added a fact well known, that to his zeal, the United States were indebted for the introduction of a great blessing — vaccination, which has extinguished one of the most loathsome and mortal diseases which has afflicted humanity some years, probably, sooner than would otherwise have taken place. It was a pleasure, therefore, as well as a duty, in dispensing the public favors, to make this small return for the great service rendered our country by Dr. Waterhouse. — To Joseph B. Varnum. v, 222. (W., 1807.)

9041. — Dr. Waterhouse has been appointed to the Marine Hospital of Boston, as you wished. It was a just though small return for his merit, in introducing the vaccination earlier than we should have had it. This appointment makes some noise there and here, being unacceptable to some; but I believe that schismatic divisions in the medical fraternity are at the bottom of it. — To Dr. Benjamin Rush, v, 225. (W., 1808.)

9042. — You have the blessings of all the friends of human happiness for the great peril from which they are rescued. — To Dr. Benjamin Waterhouse. Ford Ed., ix, 532. (M., 1815.)

9044. WEALTH, Acquisition of. — Wealth acquired by speculation and plunder is fugacious in its nature, and fills society with the spirit of gambling. To General Washington. ii, 252. (P., 1787.)

9045. WEALTH, Aristocracy of. — An aristocracy of wealth [is] of more harm and danger than benefit to society. — Autobiography, i, 36. Ford Ed., i, 49. (1821.)

9046. WEALTH, Checks on. — Our young Republic * * * should prevent its citizens from becoming so established in wealth and power, as to be thought worthy of alliance by marriage with the nieces, sisters, &c., of Kings. — To David Humphreys. ii, 253. (P., 1787.)

9047. WEALTH, Croakings of. — Do not be frightened into the surrender of [true principles] by the alarms of the timid, or the croakings of wealth against the ascendency of the people. — To Samuel Kerchival. vii, 11. Ford Ed., x, 39. (M., 1816.)

9048. WEALTH, Dominion of. — Our experience so far, has satisfactorily manifested the competence of a republican government to maintain and promote the best interests of its citizens; and every future year, I doubt not, will contribute to settle a question on which reason, and a knowledge of the character and circumstances of our fellow citizens, could never admit a doubt, and much less condemn them as fit subjects to be consigned to the dominion of wealth and force. — R. to A. Connecticut Republicans. viii, 140. (1808.)

9049. WEALTH, Freedom vs. — Though there is less wealth in America [than there is in Europe], there is more freedom, more ease and less misery. — To Baron Geismer. i, 427. (P., 1785.)

9050. — There is no such thing in this country as what would be called wealth.

in Europe. The richest are but a little at ease, and obliged to pay the most rigorous attention to their affairs to keep them together. I do not mean to speak here of the Beautions of America; for we have some of them although happily they are but ephemeral.

—To M. DE MEUNIER. FORD ED., vii, 13. (M., 1795.)

9051. WEALTH, Greediness for.—Our greediness for wealth, and fantastical expense, have degraded, and will degrade, the minds of our maritime citizens. These are the peculiar vices of commerce. —To John Adams. vii, 104. FORD ED., x, 107. (M., 1818.)

9052. WEALTH, Liberty and.—What a cruel reflection that a rich country cannot long be a free one.—TRAVELS IN FRANCE. ix, 319. (1787.)

9053. WEALTH, Overgrown.—If the overgrown wealth of an individual be deemed dangerous to the State, the best corrective is the law of equal inheritance to all in equal degree; and the better, as this enforces a law of nature, while extra-taxation violates it. —NOTE IN TRACY'S POLITICAL ECONOMY. vi, 575. (1816.)

9054. WEALTH, Protection of.—Enough wealthy men will find their way into every branch of the legislature to protect themselves. —To John Adams. vi, 224. FORD ED., ix, 426. (M., 1813.)

9055. WEALTH, Public office and.—For promoting the public happiness those persons, whom nature has endowed with genius and virtue, should be rendered by liberal education worthy to receive, and able to guard the sacred deposit of the rights and liberties of their fellow citizens; and they should be called to that charge without regard to wealth * * * or other accidental condition or circumstance. —DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE BILL. FORD ED., ii, 221. (1779.)

9056. WEATHER, Contemporary observations.—As soon as I get into the house [in New York] I have hired, * * * I will propose to you to keep a diary of the weather here, and wherever you shall be, exchanging observations from time to time. I should like to compare the two climates by contemporaneous observations. My method is to make two observations a day, the one as early as possible in the morning, the other from 3 to 4 o'clock, because I have found the hottest and daylight the coldest point of the 24 hours. I state them in an ivory pocket book in the following form, and copy them out once a week. * * * The first column is the day of the month, and the second the thermometer in the morning. The fourth day in the evening. The third the weather in the morning. The fifth day in the afternoon. The sixth is for miscellaneous, such as the appearance of birds, leafing and flowering of trees, frosts remarkably late or early, Aurora Borealis &c. distinguish weather into fair or cloudy, according as the sky is more or less than half covered with clouds. —To T. M. RANDOLPH. FORD ED., v, 159. (N.Y., 1790.)

9057. WEATHER, Daily observations. —I make my daily observations as early as possible in the morning, and again about four o'clock in the afternoon, these generally showing the maxima of cold and heat in the course of 24 hours. —To —. i, 208. FORD ED., ii, 158. (Wg., 1778.)

9058. WEATHER, Extreme cold.—It is so cold that the ink freezes in my pen, so that my letter will scarcely be legible. * * * In the winter of 1779-80, the mercury in Fahrenheit's thermometer fell at Williamsburg once to six degrees above zero. In 1783-84, I was at Annapolis without a thermometer, and I do not know that there was one in that State; I heard from Virginia, that the mercury was again down to six degrees. In 1789-90, I was at Paris. The mercury here was as low as eighteen degrees below zero, of Fahrenheit. These have been the most remarkable cold winters ever known in America. We are told, however, that in 1762, at Philadelphia, it was twenty-two degrees below zero; in December, 1793, it was three degrees below zero there by my thermometer. On the 31st of January, 1796, it was one and three-fourths degrees above zero. —To John Adams. vi, 397-401. (W., 1801.)

9059. WEATHER, Moon and.—I do not know that the coincidence has ever been remarked between the new moon and the greatest or least degrees of cold, or the full moon and the lesser degrees; or that the reflected beams of the moon attenper the weather at all. On the contrary, I think I have understood that the most powerful concave mirror presented to the moon, and the thousand times focus on the bulb of a thermometer, does not in the least affect it. —To Dr. Hugh WILLIAMSON, iv, 346. FORD ED., vii, 479. (W., 1801.)

9060. WEATHER, Parisian.—From my observations (I guess, because I have not calculated their result carefully) the sun does not shine here [Paris] more than five hours of the twenty-four though the thermometer has been twice as much as in great weight in our government. —To James MONROE. FORD ED., v, 105. (P., 1789.)

9061. WEBSTER (Daniel), Future of.—I am much gratified by the acquaintance made with Mr. Webster. He is likely to become of great weight in our government. —To James MONROE. FORD ED., vi, 327. (M., 1824.)

9062. WEBSTER (Noah), Estimate of.—Though I view Webster as a mere pedagogue, of very limited understanding and very strong prejudices and party passions, yet as editor of a paper and as of the New Haven association, he may be worth striking. —To James MADISON. FORD ED., viii, 80. (M., Aug. 1801.)

—WEIGHTS, Standard of.—See STANDARD (Weights).

9063. WELFARE, Public.—To preserve the peace of our fellow citizens, promote their prosperity and happiness, reunite opinion, cultivate a spirit of candor, moderation, charity and forbearance toward one another, are objects calling for the efforts and sacrifices of every good man and patriot. Our religion enjoins it; our happiness demands it; and no sacrifice is requisite but passions hostile to both. —To THE RHODE ISLAND ASSEMBLY, iv, 397. (W., 1801.)

WELFARE CLAUSE, General.—See General Welfare Clause.
9064. WEST AND SOUTH, Free government in.—It seems to me that in proportion as commercial avarice and corruption advance on us from the north and east, the principles of free government are to retire to the agricultural States of the south and west, as their last asylum and bulwark. With honesty and self-government for her portion, agriculture may abandon contentedly to others the fruits of commerce and corruption.—To Henry Middendorf. vi. 91. (M., Jan. 1813.)

9065. I fear, with you, all the evils which the present lowering aspect of our political horizon so ominously portends. That at some future day, which I hoped to be very distant, the free principles of our government might change with the change of circumstances was to be expected. But I certainly did not expect that they would not over-live the generation which established them. And what I still less expected was, that my favorite Western country was to be made the instrument of change. I had ever fondly cherished the interests of that country relying as a hope of averting the degeneracy of public opinion from our original and free principles. But the bane of local interests artfully prepared for their palate, has decoyed them from their kindred attachments, to alliances alien to them.—To Claiborne W. Gooch. vii. 430. (M., January 1826.)

9066. WEST INDIES, British.—I think that the trade with Great Britain is a ruinous one to ourselves; and that nothing would be an inducement to tolerate it; but a free commerce with their West Indies; and that being denied to us, we should put a stop to the losing branch. The question is, whether they are right in their prognostications that we have neither resolution nor union enough for this.—To T. PLEASANTS. i. 563. (P., 1786.)

9067. WEST INDIES, Coalition with French.—In policy, if not in justice, the National Assembly [of France] should be disposed to avoid oppression, which, falling on us, as well as on their colonies, might tempt us to act together.—To William Short. iii. 276. FORD ED., v. 364. (Pa., 1791.)

9068. WEST INDIES, Commerce with.—The commerce with the English West Indies is valuable and would be worth a sacrifice to us. But the commerce with the British dominion in Europe is a losing one and deserves no sacrifice. Our tobacco they must have from whatever place we make its deposit, because they can get no other, whose quality so well suits the habits of their people. It is not a commodity like wheat which will not bear a double voyage. Were it so, the privilege of carrying it directly to England might be worth something.—To James Madison. FORD ED., iv. 37. (P., 1785.)

9069. Our commerce is in agonies at present, and these would be relieved by opening the British ports to the West Indies.—To John Adams. i. 436. (P., 1785.)

9070. The merchants of this country [France] are very clamorous against our admission into the West Indies, and ministers are afraid for their places.—To James Monroe. FORD ED., iv. 31. (P., 1785.)

9071. The effecting treaties with the powers holding positions in the West Indies, I consider as the important part of our business. It is not of great consequence whether the others treat or not. Perhaps trade may go on with them enough without.—To James Monroe. FORD ED., iv. 31. (P., 1785.)

9072. Access to the West Indies is indispensably necessary to us. Yet how gain it, when it is, on the part of these nations [France and England] to exclude all foreigners from their colonies? The only chance seems to be this: our commerce to the mother countries is valuable to them. We must therefore, and to make this the price of an admission into our West Indies, and to those who refuse the admission, we must refuse our commerce, or load theirs by odious discriminations in our ports.—To James Monroe. i. 351. FORD ED., iv. 58. (P., 1785.)

9073. To nations with which we have not yet treated, and who have possessions in America, we may offer a free vent of our manufactures in the West Indies, whether full or modified admittance into those possessions. But to France, we are obliged to give that freedom for a different compensation: to wit, for her aid in effecting our independence. It is difficult therefore, to say what we have now to offer her, for an admission into the West Indies. Doubtless, it has its price; but the question is what this would be, and whether we worth our while to give it. Were we to propose to give to each other's citizens all the rights of natives, they would of course demand what they should gain by this enlargement of right, and examine whether it would be worth to them as much as their monopoly of their West Indies commerce. If not, that commercial freedom which we wish to preserve, and which indeed is so valuable, leaves us little to offer. An expression in my letter to the Count de Vergennes   wherein I hinted that both nations might, perhaps, come into the opinion that the condition of natives might be a better ground of their considerations for commerce, that of the most favored nation, was intended to furnish an opportunity to the minister of parleying on that subject, if he was so disposed, and to myself, of seeing whereabouts they would begin, that I might communicate it to Congress, if he did not leave it to me to judge of the expediency of pursuing the subject. But no overtures have followed.—REPORT TO CONGRESS. ix. 243. FORD ED., iv. 129. (P., 1785.)

9074. Our commerce with the West Indies had never admitted amelioration during my stay in France. The temper of that period did not allow even the essay, and it was as much as we could do to hold the ground we then had. It was shrewd to grant us admittance to their colonies with salted provisions, &c.—To Gouverneur Morris. iii. 448. FORD ED., vi. 80. (Pa., 1792.)

9075. WEST INDIES, Confederation of.—Could Napoleon obtain, at the close of the present war, the independence of all the West India islands, and their establishment in a separate confederacy, our quarter of the globe would exhibit an example encouraging the futurity. You will live to see much of this. I shall follow, however, cheerfully my fellow laborers, contented with having borne a part in beginning this beauteous reformation.—To Baron Humboldt. v. 581. (M., April 1811.)

9076. WEST INDIES, Dominion of.—Whenever jealousies are expressed as to any supposed views of ours on the dominion of the West Indies, you cannot go farther than the truth in asserting we have none. If there be one principle more deeply rooted than any other in the mind of every American, it is that we should have nothing to do with conquest. As to commerce, indeed, we have strong sensations. In casting our eyes over the earth, we see no instance of a nation forbidden, as we are, by foreign powers, to deal with our neighbors, and obliged with them to carry into another hemisphere, the mutual supplies necessary to relieve mutual wants. * * An exchange of surpluses and wants between neighbor nations, is both a right and a duty, under the moral law, and measures against right should be mollified in their exercise, if it be wished to lengthen them to the greatest term possible.—To William Short. iii. 275. Ford ed., v. 363. (Pa., 1791.)

9077. WEST INDIES, French.—A jealousy of our taking away the French carrying trade is the principal reason which obstructs our admission into their West India Islands.—To M. Limozin. 330. (P., 1787.)

9078. WEST INDIES, French Concession.—France gives us an access to her West India Islands, which, though not all we wish, is extremely valuable to us.—To John Adams. i. 487. (P., 1785.)

9079. France has explained herself generously. She does not mean to interrupt our prosperity by calling for our guarantee. On the contrary, she wishes to promote it by giving us, in all her possessions, all the rights of her native citizens, and to receive our vessels as her vessels.—To James Monroe. Ford ed., vi. 281. (Pa., 1793.)

9080. WEST INDIES, Interposition in.—As to the guarantee of the French Islands, whatever doubts may be entertained of the moment at which we ought to interpose, yet I have no doubt but that we ought to interpose at a proper time, and declare both to England and France, that these Islands are to rest with France, which is the common will of both nations, with the latter for that object.—To James Madison. iv. 103. Ford ed., vi. 502. (M., April 1794.)

9081. WEST INDIES, Liberty in French.—The emancipation of their islands is an idea prevailing in the minds of several members of the National Assembly, particularly those most enlightened and most liberal in their views. Such a step by this country would lead to other emancipations or revolutions in the same quarter.—To John Jay. iii. 96. (P., 1789.)

9082. WEST INDIES, Monopoly of.—I observed [to the Count de Montmorin] that it would be much against our interest that any one power should monopolize all the West India Islands.—To John Jay. iii. 96. (P., 1789.)

9083. WEST INDIES, Negroes in.—What are you doing for your colonies? They will be lost if not more effectually secured. Indeed, no future efforts you can make will ever be able to reduce the blacks. All that can be done, in my opinion, will be to compound with them, as has been done formerly in Jamaica. We have been less zealous in aiding them, lest your government should feel any jealousy on our account. But, in truth, we sincerely wish their restoration and their connection with you, as you do yourselves. We are satisfied that neither your justice nor their distresses will ever again permit their being forced to seek at dear and distant markets those first necessities of life which they may have at cheaper markets, placed by nature at their door, and formed by her for their support.—To General Lafayette. iii. 450. Ford ed., vi. 76. (Pa., 1792.)

9084. I become daily more convinced that all the West India Islands will remain in the hands of the people of color, and a total expulsion of the whites sooner or later take place. It is high time we should foresee the bloody scenes which our children certainly, and possibly ourselves (south of the Potomac) have to wade through, and try to avert them.—To James Monroe. iv. 20. Ford ed., vi. 349. (P., July 1793.)

9085. Inhabited already by a people of their own race and color; climates congenial with their natural constitution; isolated from the other descriptions of men; nature seems to have formed these islands to become the receptacle of the blacks transplanted into this hemisphere.—To James Monroe. iv. 421. Ford ed., viii. 105. (W., 1801.)

9086. WEST INDIES, Opening the.—Your communications to the Count de Moustier, whatever they may have been, cannot have done injury to my endeavors here [Paris], to open the West Indies to us. On this head, the ministers are incomparably mute, though I have often tried to draw them into the subject. I have, therefore, found it necessary to let it lie, till war, or other circumstance, may force it on. Whenever they are at war with England, they must open the Islands to us, and perhaps during that war they may see some price which will make them agree to keep them always open.—To General Washington. ii. 536. Ford ed., v. 57. (P., 1788.)

9087. WEST INDIES, Portuguese.—Portugal [in making a commercial treaty with us] will probably restrain us to their dominions in Europe. We must expressly include the Portuguese [trade] in our laws, and be satisfied with those of the islands, some of which are deemed to be in Africa. We should also contend for an access to their possessions in America * * * To John Adams. i. 495. (P', 1785.)

9088. WEST INDIES, Prosperity of.—Our wishes are cordial for the reestablishment of peace and commerce in those colonies, and to give such proofs of our good faith both to them and the mother country [France] as to suppress all that jealousy which might oppose itself to the free exchange of our mutual productions, so essential to the prosperity of those colonies, and to the preservation of our agricultural interest. This is our true interest and our right, and we have no reason to conceal views so justifiable, though the expression of them may require that the occasions be proper, and the terms chosen with delicacy.—To Gouverneur Morris. iii. 339. Ford ed., v. 450. (Pa., 1792.)

9089. WEST INDIES, Proximity.—Our vicinity to their West India possessions, and to the fisheries is a bridge which a small naval force, on our part, would hold in the mouths of the most powerful of * * the [European] countries.—To John Jay. i. 405. Ford ed., iv. 90. (P., 1785.)

9090. WEST INDIES, San Domingo.—I expressed to [the San Domingo deputies] freely my opinion * * * that as to ourselves
there was one case which would be peculiarly alarming to us, to wit, were there a danger of their falling under the French influence. (W. R. SMITH, iii, 304.) FORD ED., v, 395. (Pa., Nov. 1791.)

WEST POINT, Academy.—See Academy (Military).

9091. EXPLORATION, Michaux expedition.—The chief objects of your journey are to find the shortest and most convenient route of communication between the United States and the Pacific ocean, to deliver the maps of this district, and to learn by what particulars as can be obtained of the country through which the Missouri passes, its productions, inhabitants, and other interesting circumstances. As a channel of communication between these States and the Pacific ocean, the Missouri, so far as it extends, presents itself under circumstances of unquestioned preference. It would seem by the latest maps as if a river called the Oregon interlocked with the Missouri for a considerable distance and entered the Pacific. By these means a communication might be established between the Ohio and the Pacific Sound. But the [Philosophical] Society are aware that these maps are not to be trusted, so far as to be the ground of any positive instruction to you. You will in the course of your journey, take notice of the country you pass through, its general face, soil, rivers, mountains, its productions—animal, vegetable, and mineral—so far as they may be new to us, and may also be useful or very curious. —To ANDRE MICHAUX. ix, 434. FORD ED., vi, 159. (Jan. 1791)

9092. WESTERN POSTS, British retention of.—I had a good deal of conversation with the Count de Vergennes on the situation of affairs between England and the United States, and particularly on their refusal to deliver up our posts. I observed to him that the obstructions thrown in the way of the recovery of their debts were the effect and not the cause. As they pretended, on their refusal to deliver up the posts; that the merchants interested in these debts showed a great disposition to make arrangements with us; that the article of time we could certainly have settled, and probably that of the interest during the war, but that the minister, the contrary disposition to have these matters adjusted. I thought it a sufficient proof that this was not the true cause of their retaining the posts. He concurred as to the justice of our requiring time for the payment of our debts; said nothing which showed a difference of opinion as to the article of interest, and seemed to believe fully that their object was to divert the channel of the fur trade before they delivered up the posts, and that they were aware of the importance of that commerce to us in the West; that they could not foresee what would be the event of this detention; that the situation of the British funds, and desire of their minister to begin to redeem the national debt, seemed to indicate that they could not wish a continuance of the war, but that neither were we in a condition to go to war. I told him I was yet uninformed what Congress proposed to do on this subject, but that we should certainly always count on the good offices of France, and I was sure that the offer of them would suffice to induce Great Britain to do us justice. He said that surely we might always count on the friendship of France. I added that, by the treaty of alliance, she was bound to guarantee our limits to us. They should be established at the moment of peace. He said they were so bound, "noli nos et nostros esse volentes leges nostras."

The letters of Mr. Morris * * * to the President's relate the communications, oral and written, which have passed between him and the ministers; and from these the Secretary of State draws the following inference: That the British court is decided not to surrender the posts in any case. It will use every means to keep them, though our courts of justice are now open to British subjects, they were so long shut after the peace as to have defeated irretrievably the recovery of debts in many cases. They suggest, indeed, the idea of an indemnification of our soldiers. But, probably, we are directed to admit their right to indemnification, they would take care to set it so high as to insure a disagreement. * * * The Secretary of State is of opinion * * * that the demands of the posts * * * should not be again made till we are in readiness to do ourselves the justice which may be refused.—OFFICIAL REPORT, vi, 517. FORD ED., v, 261. (December 1790)

9094. WESTERN TERRITORY, Acceptance of cession.—On receiving the act of Assembly for the Western cession, our delegation agreed on the form of a deed; we then delivered to Congress a copy of the act, and the form of the deed we were ready to execute, but whenever we could agree what they would accept it. They referred the act and deed to a committee, who reported the act of Assembly to comport perfectly with the propositions of Congress, and that the deed was proper in its form and that Congress would accept the same. On the question to agree to the report of the Committee, eight States being present, Jersey was in the negative, and South Carolina and Pennsylvania divided (being represented each by two members). Of course there were five ayes only and the report fell. We determined on consultation that our proper duty was to be still, having declared we were ready to execute, we would leave it to them to come forward and tell us they were ready to part. We did not propose anything further, and showed a perfect indifference. New Hampshire came to town which made us nine States. A member proposed that we should execute the deed and lay it on the table, which after what had been done by Congress would be final, urge the execution of it. New York, which had cut their deed, laid it on the table, where it remained eighteen months before Congress accepted it. We replied, "No", if the lands are not offered for sale the ensuing spring, they will be taken up. New York, which had cut their deed, laid it on the table, where it will, therefore, put it out of our power, by the execution of a deed, to sell them ourselves, if Congress will not. A member from Rhode Island then moved that Congress should accept. Another from Jersey proposed as an amendment a proviso that it should not amount to an acknowledgment of our right. We told them we were not authorized to admit any conditions or provisions; that their acceptance must be simple, absolute and unqualified, or we could not execute. On the question there were six ayes; Jersey, "No"; South Carolina and Pennsylvania divided. The motion dropped, and the House adjourned. On the other hand, about an hour after, the dissenting Pennsylvanian asked and obtained leave to change his "no" into "aye"; the vote then passed and we executed the deed. We have desired an exemplification of it under the Seal of the Commonwealth in Congress in order that the Assembly in not taking any new conditions, which would certainly have defeated their accommodating intentions.—To Governor Benj. Harrison. Ford ed., iii, 411. (A. March 1784.)

9095. WESTERN TERRITORY, Deed of cession.—To all who shall see these presents [here name the delegates] the underwritten delegates for the Commonwealth of Virginia in the Congress of the United States of America and grantees thereof.

Whereas the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia at their sessions begun on the 20th day of October, 1783, passed an "Act entitled 'An Act to authorize the delegates, &c.-in these words, following to which were added:

"Whereas Congress, &c. [reciting the act verbis]."

And whereas the said General Assembly by their Resolution of June 6th, 1783, had constituted and appointed us the said A. B. C. &c., delegates to represent the Commonwealth of Virginia in Congress for one year from the first Monday in November then next following, which resolution remains in full force.

Now, therefore, know ye that we the said A. B. C. &c., by virtue of the power and authority, committed to us by the act of the said General Assembly of Virginia before recited, and in the name and for and on behalf of the said Commonwealth, do by these presents convey, transfer, assign, and make over unto the United States in Congress assembled, for the benefit and advantage of the Virginia claims, the right, title and claim as well of soil as of jurisdiction which the said Commonwealth hath to the territory or tract of country within the limits of the Virginia charter, situate, lying, and being within the Northwardly line of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and to and for the uses and purposes and on the conditions of the said recited act. In testimony whereof we have hereunto subscribed our names and affixed our seals in Congress the—day of— in the year of our Lord 1784, and of the Indenpendence of the United States the eighth.—DEED OF CESSION. Ford ed., iii, 406. (March 1, 1784.)

9096. WESTERN TERRITORY, Division into States.—With respect to the new States, were the question to stand simply in this form: How may the ultramontane territory be disposed of, so as to produce the greatest and most immediate benefit to the inhabitants of the maritime States of the Union? The plan would be more plausible, of laying it off into two or more smaller States, and letting them pay for it; and there is no objection to this. But there would still be something to be said against it, which might render it at least doubtful. But that is a question which good faith forbids us to receive into discussion. This receives the state of the question in its just form: How may the territories of the Union be disposed of, so as to produce the greatest degree of happiness to their inhabitants? With respect to the maritime States, little or nothing remains to be done. With respect, then, to the ultramontane States, will their inhabitants be happiest, divided into States of thirty thousand square miles, not quite as large as Pennsylvania, or into States of one hundred and sixty thousand square miles, each, that is to say, three times as large as Virginia within the Allegany? They would not only be happier in States on that latter size, but it is the only way in which they can exist as a regular Society. Considering the American character in general, that of those people particularly, and the energetic nature of our governments, a State of such extent as one hundred and sixty thousand square miles would consequently consist of the People. These are the circumstances which reduce the Indians to such small societies. They would produce an effect on our people, similar to this. They would not be broken into such small pieces, because they are more habituated to them, and value more a government of regular law. But you would surely reverse the nature of things, in making small States on the ocean, and large ones beyond the mountains. If we could, in our consciences, say, that great States beyond the mountains will make the people happiest, without cruelly compelling them to be contented to be laid off into large States? They certainly will not: and, if they decide to divide themselves, we are not able to restrain them. They will end by separating from us, and confederacy, and becoming its enemies. We and better, then, look forward and see what will be the probable course of things. This will surely be a division of that country into States of a small, or, at most, of a moderate size. If we lay them off into such, they will acquire, and we shall be the advantage of arranging them so as to produce the best combinations of interest. What Congress has already done in this matter is an argument the more in favor of the revolt of those States against a different arrangement, and of their acquiescence under a continuance of the same. Upon this plan, we treat them as fellow citizens; they will have a just share in their own government; they will love us, and pride themselves in an union with us. Upon the other, we treat them as subjects; we govern them, as masters, and bind them as their masters, and break off from us in defiance. I confess to you, that I can see no other turn that these two plans would take. But I respect your opinion, and your knowledge of the country much, to be ever confident in my own.—To James Monroe. i, 587. Ford ed., iv, 246. (P. 1786.)

9097. I find Congress have reversed their division of the Western States and proposed to make them fewer and larger. This is reversing the natural order of things. A tractable people may be governed in large bodies; but, in proportion as they depart from this character, the extent of their government must be less. They themselves, with small divisions, are obliged to reduce their societies.—To James Madison, ii, 66. Ford ed., iv, 333. (P. 1786.)

9098. WESTERN TERRITORY, Government for.—The Committee appointed to prepare a plan for the temporary Government of the Western Territory have agreed to the following resolutions: Resolved, that the territory ceded or to be ceded by individual States to the United States, and the States whereover the same shall have been purchased of the Indians, shall be formed into distinct States bounded in the following manner as nearly as such cessions will admit, that is to say: Northwardly and Southwardly by parallels of latitude so that each State shall comprehend from South to North two degrees of longitude beginning at the 41st degree; the completion of thirty-two degrees North of the equator, but any territory Northward of the 47th degree shall make part of the State next below, and Eastwardly and Westwardly they shall be bounded, those on the Mississippi by that river on one side and the meridian of the lowest point of the rapids of Ohio on the other; and those adjoining on the East by the same meridian on their Western side, and on their Eastern by the meridian of the Western cape of the mouth of the Great Kanawha. And the last meridian between the Ohio, Lake Erie, and Pennsylvania shall be one State. That the settlers within the territory so to be purchased and offered for sale shall, either on their own petition or on the order of Congress, receive authority from them, with appointments of time and place for their free males of full age to meet together for the purpose of establishing a temporary government, to adopt the constitution and laws of any one of these States, so that such laws nevertheless shall be subject to alteration at any future time by Congress; and Congress, subject to a like alteration counties or townships for the election of members for their legislature. That such temporary government shall only continue in force in any State until it shall have acquired 20,000 free inhabitants, when they shall have been admitted to the rights of members of Congress, they shall receive from them authority with appointments of time and place to call a convention of representatives to establish a permanent Constitution and Government for themselves. Provided, that both the temporary and permanent Government, shall be established on the same principles as their predecessors. 1. That they shall forever remain a part of the United States of America. 2. That in their persons, property and territory, they shall be subject to the Government of the United States Congress assembled, and to the Articles of Confederation in all those cases in which the original States shall be so subject. 3. That they shall be subject to pay a part of the federal debts contracted or to be contracted, to be apportioned on them by Congress, according to the same common rule and method of apportionment that shall be made on the other States. 4. That their respective Governments shall be in republican forms, and shall admit no person to be a citizen, who holds any hereditary title. 5. That after the expiration of the Christian era, there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the said States, otherwise than in punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted to have been personally guilty. That whenever any of the said States shall be of free inhabitants, their inhabitants shall then be in any one the least numerous of the thirteen original States, such State shall be admitted by its delegates into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the said original States: After which the admission of the United States in Congress assembled shall be requisite in all those cases, wherein by the Confederation the assent of nine States is now required. Provided the consent of nine States to such admission may be obtained according to the eleventh article of the Articles of Confederation, and till such admission by their delegates into Congress, any of the said States, after the establishment of their temporary Government, shall have authority to keep a sitting Member in Congress, with a right of deliberation but not of voting. That the Territory Northward of the 45th degree, that is to say of the completion of 45° from the Equator and extending to the Lake of the Woods, shall be called Sylvania. That of the territory under the 45th and 44th degrees, that which lies between Lake Michigan and the line of the Lake in which the rapid of the Ohio, Wabash, the Illinois and the Miami of Ohio shall be called Michigan, and that which is Eastward thereof, within the peninsula formed by the lakes and waters of Michigan, Huron, St. Clair and Erie, shall be called Cherronesus, and shall include any part of the peninsula which may extend above the 45th degree. Of the territory under the 43d and 42d degrees, that to the Westward through which the Asensipi or Rock river runs shall be called Asenispia, and that to the Eastward in which are the falls of the Wabash, the mouth of the Miami of Ohio, the Wabash, the Illinois and the Miami of the lake and Sandusky rivers, shall be called Metropotamia. Of the territory which lies under the 41st and 40th degrees the Western, through which the river Illinois runs, shall be called Illinois; that the next adjoining to the Eastward Saratoga, and that between this last and Pennsylvania and extending from the Ohio to Lake Erie shall be called Washington. Of the territory which lies under the 39th and 38th degrees to which shall be added so much of the point of land between Ohio and Mississippi as lies under the 37th degree, that to the Westward within and adjacent to which are the confinements of the rivers Wabash, Shawnee, Tennessee, Ohio, Illinois, Mississippi and Missouri, shall be called Polypotamia, and that to the Eastward, farther up the Ohio, otherwise called the Pelisipi, shall be called Pelisipa. That the preceding articles shall be formed into a charter of Compact, shall be duly executed by the President of the United States in Congress assembled, under his hand and the seal of the United States, shall be promulgated, and shall stand as fundamental constitutions between the thirteen original States, and those now newly described, unalterable but by the joint consent of the United States in Congress assembled, and any State within which such alteration is proposed to be made.—Report on Government for Western Territory. Ford ed. iii. 407. (March 1, 1784.)

0909. The committee to whom was recommended the report of a plan for a temporary government of the Western Territory has agreed with the following propositions: No State shall be ceded or to be ceded by individual States to the United States as is already purchased or shall be purchased of the Indian inhabiteRants and offered for sale. That so much of the territory ceded or to be ceded by individual States to the United States as is already purchased or shall be purchased of the Indian inhabitants and offered for sale shall be divided into districts and shall be offered for sale. That Congress, shall be divided into distinct States and shall, as a body, act as one State, forever, as such cessions will admit; that is to say, by parliaments of latitude, so that each State shall comprehend from South to North two degrees of latitude beginning to count from the completion of the clause of longitude of the Equator; and the meridian of longitude, one of which shall pass through the lowest point of the rapids of Ohio, and the other through the Western Cape of the mouth of the Great Kanawha, but the territory Eastward of this last meridian, between the Ohio, Lake Erie, Lake Michigan and the State of Ohio which is between the same meridians coinciding nearly with the parallel of 39° shall be substituted so far in lieu of that parallel as a boundary line. That the settlers on any territory so purchased and offered for sale, either on their own petition, or on the order of Congress, receive authority from them, with appoints of time and place for their free males of full age, within the limits of their State, to meet together for the purpose of establishing a temporary government, to adopt the constitution and laws of the original States, so that such laws nevertheless shall be subject to alteration by their ordinary legislature; and to erect, subject to a like alteration, counties or townships for the election of members for their legislature. That such temporary government shall continue in being, and may continue in any way until it shall have acquired 20,000 free inhabitants; when giving due proof thereof to Congress, they shall receive from them authority with appointment of time and place to call a convention of representatives to establish a permanent Constitution and Government for themselves. Provided that both the temporary and permanent governments be established on these principles as their basis. 1. They shall forever remain a part of this confederacy of the United States of America s. That in their persons, property, and territory, they shall be subject to the Government of the United States in Congress assembled, and to the articles of Confederation in all those cases in which the original States shall be so subject. 2. That they shall not pay any part of the fund debts contracted or to be contracted, to be apportioned on them by Congress, according to the same common rule and measure, by which apportionments thereof shall be made on the other States. 3. That their respective Governments shall and may be disestablished, and no person to be a citizen who holds any hereditary title. 5. That after the year 1800 of the Christian era, there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the said States, other than in punishment of crimes, wherein the party shall have been convicted to have been personally guilty. That whencesoever any of the said States shall have, of free inhabitants, as many as shall be in any one the least numerous, of the thirteen original States, such State shall be admitted by its delegation, in Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the said original States: provided nine States agree to such admission according to the reservation of the 11th of the Articles of Confederation, and in order to adopt the 28th Article of that instrument, the State of Georgia when its numbers shall be thus increased, it shall be proposed to the Legislatures of the States originally parties thereto, to require the assent of two-thirds of the United States in Congress assembled in all those cases wherein by the said Articles the assent of nine States is now required; which being agreed to by them shall be binding on the new States. Until such admission by their delegates into Congress, any of the said States after the establishment of the permanent Government of Congress shall not be authorized to keep a sitting member in Congress, with a right of debating, but not of voting. That the preceding articles shall be duly executed by the President of the United States in Congress assembled, under his hand and the seal of the United States, be promulgated and shall stand as fundamental constitutions between the thirteen original States and each of the several States now newly described, unalterable but by the joint consent of the United States in Congress assembled, and of the particular State within which such alteration is proposed to be made. That measures not inconsistent with the principles of the Confederation, and necessary for the preservation of peace and good order among the settlers in any of the said new States until they shall assume a temporary government as aforesaid, may from time to time be taken by the United States in Congress assembled.—Western Territory Report. Ford ed., iii, 429. (March 22, 1784.)

9100. WESTERN TERRITORY, Inhabitants.—I wish to see the Western country in the hands of people well disposed, who know the value of the connection between that and the maritime States and who wish to cultivate it. I consider their happiness as bound up together, and that every measure should be taken of friendly terms between the two. It will be an efficacious one to receive them into Congress, as I perceive they are about to desire. To this he added an honest and disinterested conduct in Congress, as to everything relating to them, we may hope for a perfect harmony.—To John Brown. ii, 395. Ford ed., v, 16. (P., 1788.)

9101. In availing our western brethren of those circumstances which favour for promoting their interests, we only perform that duty which we owe to every portion of our Union, under circumstances equally favorable; and, impressed with the inconveniences to which the citizens of Tennessee are subjected in a want of a contiguous State composing their State, I shall be ready to do for their relief, whatever the general Legislature may authorize, and justice to our neighbors permit.—R. to A. Tennessee Legislature. viii, 115. (1803.)

9102. WESTERN TERRITORY, Separation from Virginia. I suppose some people on the western waters who are ambitious to be governors, &c., will urge a separation by authority of Congress. But the bulk of the people westward are already thrown into great ferment by the report of what is proposed, to which I think they will not submit. This separation is unacceptable to us in form only, and not in effect. On the contrary, I may safely say it is desired by the eastern part of our country whenever their western brethren shall think themselves able to stand alone. In the meantime, on the petition of the western counties, a plan is digesting for rendering their access to Congress more easy.—To James Madison. i, 316. Ford ed., iii, 53. (M., 1782.)

9103. I hope our country will of herself determine to cede still further to the meridian of the mouth of the Great Kanawha. Further she cannot govern; so far is necessary for her own well being.—To George Washington. Ford ed., iii, 421. (A., 1784.)

9104. WESTERN TERRITORY, SLAVERY IN.—I am glad to find we have 4,000,000 acres west of Chalafaya. How much better to have every 160 acres settled by an able-bodied militiaman, than by purchasers with their hordes of negroes, to add weakness instead of strength.—To Albert Gallatin. v, 222. (Dec. 1807.)

9105. WHALE OIL, Candles.—A Mr. Barrett has arrived here [Paris] from Boston with letters of recommendation from Governor Bowdoin, Cushing and others to get the privilege of presenting the general bottom, instead of the particular one which had been patented, the last year, for a special company.  I propose to Mr. Barrett that he should induce either his State, or individuals, to send a sufficient number of boxes of the spermaceti candle to give one to every leading house in Paris; I mean to those who lead the ton; and, at the same time to deposit a quantity for sale here and advertise them in the petites attiches.—To John Adams. i, 498. (P., 1785.)

9106. WHALE OIL, Duties on.—The result [of applications to the French government] was to put us on the footing of the Hanseatic towns, as to whale oil, and to reduce the duties to * * * about a guinea and a half the ton. But the oil must be brought in American or French ships, and the indigence is limited to one year. However, as to this, if I expressed to Count de Vergennes my hopes that it would be continued; and should a doubt arise, I should propose at the proper time, to claim it under the treaty on the footing gentis alimentaris.—To John Adams. i, 498. (P., 1785.)

9107. — — —. It being material that the reduction of the duties on whale oil, which would expire with the close of this year, should be revised in time for the whalermen to take measures in consequence, we have applied for a continuance of the reduction, and even for an abolition of all duties.—To John Jay. i, 584. (P., 1786.)

9108. WHALE OIL, England and.—I hope that England will, within a year or two, be obliged to come here [France] to buy whale oil for her lamps.—To John Adams. i, 502. (P., 1785.)

9109. WHALE OIL, Lafayette and.—The importation of our whale oil is, by the successful endeavors of M. de Lafayette, put on a good footing for this year.—To Mr. Otro. i, 559. (P., 1786.)

9110. WHALE OIL, Markets for.—I am trying here [Paris] to get contracts for the supplying the cities of France with whale oil by the Boston merchants. It would be the greatest relief possible to that State, whose commerce is in agonies, in consequence of being sufficient to their oil, in Great Britain, which has, heretofore, been their only market. Can anything be done in this way in Spain? Or do they light their streets there in the night?—To William Carmichael. i, 475. (P., 1785.)

9111. WHALING, Encouragement of.—To obtain leave for our whaling vessels to refit and refresh on the coast of the Brazils [is] an object of immense importance to that class of our citizens. The measures we attempted to take, in Great Britain, which has, heretofore, been their only market. Can anything be done in this way in Spain? Or do they light their streets there in the night?—To John Adams. i, 495. (P., 1785.)

9112. WHEAT, British prohibition of.—The prohibition of our wheat in England would, of itself, be of no great moment, because I do not know that it is much sent there. But its being the subject of a libel on our wheat sanctioned with the name of Parliament, and which can have no object but to do us injury, by spreading a groundless alarm in those countries of Europe where our wheat is constantly and kindly received, it is a mere assassination. If this is not the object, it may be for the purpose of putting us in a position, if it be a weevil, our grain always had that: and the experience of a century has proved that the climate of England is not warm enough to hatch the egg and continue the race, or that some other unknown cause prevents any evil from it.—To Mr. Vaughan. iii, 38. (P., 1789.)

9113. WHEAT, Cultivation of.—The cultivation of wheat is the reverse in every circumstance of that of tobacco. Besides clothing the earth with fertility, and preserving its fertility, it feeds the laborers plenty of rough requires from them only a moderate toil, except in the season of harvest, raises great numbers of animals for food and service, and diffuses prosperity and happiness among the whole. We find it easier to make a hundred bushels of wheat than a thousand weight of tobacco, and they are worth more when made.—Notes on Virginia, viii, 497. Ford ed., iii, 271. (1782.)

9114. WHEAT, Weevils and.—The weevil is a formidable obstacle to the cultivation of wheat with us. But principles are already known which must lead to a remedy. Thus a certain degree of heat, to wilt, that of the common weevil, is necessary to hatch the eggs. If subterranean granaries, or others, therefore, can be contrived below that temperature, the evil will be cured by cold. A degree of heat beyond that which hatches the eggs, we know will kill it. But in aiming at this we easily run the risk that we produce putrefaction. To produce putrefaction, however, three agents are requisite, heat, moisture, and the external air. If the absence of any one of these be secured, the other two may safely be admitted. In this, of the one we want. Moisture then, or external air, must be excluded. This former has been done by exposing the grain in kilns to the action of fire, which produces heat, and extracts moisture at the same time; the latter, by putting the grain into hogheads, covering it with a coating of lime, and heading it up. In this situation its bulk produced a heat sufficient to kill the egg: the moisture is suffered to remain indeed, but the external air is excluded. A nicer operation yet has been attempted: that is, to produce an intermediate temperature of heat between that which kills the egg, and that which produces grain rotation. The threshing the grain as soon as it is cut, and laying it in its chaff in large heaps, has been found very nearly to hit this temperature, though not perfectly, nor always. The heat generates heat sufficient to kill not of the eggs, whilst the chaff commonly restrains it from rising into putrefaction. But all these methods abridge too much the quantity which the farmer can manage, and enable other countries to undersell him, which are not infested with this insect.—Notes on Virginia. viii, 497. Ford ed., iii, 271. (1782.)

9115. WHIGS, Loyalty of.—I do not believe there has ever been a moment, when a single whig in any one State, would not have shuddered at the very idea of a separation of their State from the Confederacy.—Answers to M. de Meunier. ix, 251. Ford ed., iv, 155. (P., 1786.)

9116. WHIGS, Principles of.—Before the Revolution we were all good English Whigs, cordial in their free principles, and in their jealousies of their executive magistrate. These jealousies are very apparent in all our State constitutions.—Autobiography, i, 81. Ford ed., i, 112. (1821.)
9117. WHIGS, Tories and.—It has ever appeared to me, that the difference between the whig and tory of England is, that the whig deduces his rights from the Anglo-Saxon source, and the tory from the Norman.
—To John Cartwright. vii, 355. (M., 1824.)

9118. WHISKY, Commutation.—Rum and other spirits we [Virginia] can furnish to a greater amount than you require  * * and shall be glad to commute into that article some others which we have not, particularly sugar, coffee and salt.—To General Gates. i, 260. (R., 1780.)

9119. —— [As to] your application for spirits, there is not a hoghead belonging to the State, but very great quantities are in the hands of the Continental commissaries. We have special returns of upwards of twenty thousand gallons delivered them by the Commissioners  * * and there are no doubt great quantities of which there is no return.  * * I would observe to you that Baron Steuben informs me that the consumption of spirit has been allowed as a part of the daily ration, but only on particular occasions.—To General Nelson. Ford Ed., ii, 436. (R., 1781.)

9120. WHISKY, Indians and.—I am happy to hear that you have been so favored by the Divine Spirit as to be made sensible of those things which are for your good and that of your people, and of those which are hurtful to you; and particularly that you and they see the ruinous effects which the abuse of spirituous liquors has produced upon them. It has weakened their bodies, enervated their minds, exposed them to hunger, cold, nakedness, and poverty, kept them in perpetual broils, and reduced their population. I do not wonder, then, brother, at your application earliest on behalf of your own people, who have voluntarily gone into these fatal habits, but on all the nations of white people who have supplied their calls for this article. But these nations have done to you only what they do among themselves. They have sold what individuals wish to purchase to the guardian of his own health and happiness. Spirituous liquors are not in themselves bad; they are often found to be an excellent medicine for the sick; it is the improper and intemperate use of them, by those in health, which makes them injurious. But as you find that your people cannot refrain from an ill use of them, I greatly applaud your resolution not to use them at all. We have too affectionate a concern for your happiness to place the paltry gain on the sale of these articles in competition with the injury they do you. And as it is the desire of your nation, that no spirits should be sent among them, I am authorized by the great council of the United States to prohibit them. I will sincerely cooperate with your wise men in any proper measures for this purpose, which shall be agreeable to them. To Brother Handsome Lake. viii, 187. (1802.)

9121. WHISKY, Loathsome effects.—The loathsome and fatal effects of whiskey, destroying the fortunes, the bodies, the minds, and morals of our citizens.—To William H. Crawford. Ford Ed., x, 113. (M., 1818.)

9122. WHISKY, Military supplies.—We approve of your accommodating  * * the Maryland troops with spirits. They really deserve the whole, and I wish we had means of transportation for much greater quantities which we have on hand and cannot convey. This article we could furnish plentifully to you and them.—To General Edward Stevens. i, 253. Ford Ed., ii, 339. (R., 1780.)

9123. WHISKY, Sale to Indians.—The Indians are becoming very sensible of the baneful effects produced on their morals, their health and existence, by the abuse of ardent spirits, and some of them earnestly desire a prohibition of that article from being carried among them. The Legislature will consider whether it be effectuating that desire would not be in the spirit of benevolence and charity, to which they have hitherto practiced toward these our neighbors, and which has had so happy an effect toward conciliating their friendship.—Special Message. viii, 22. (Jan. 1802.)

9124. ——. We have taken measures to prevent spirituous liquors being carried into your country, and we sincerely rejoice at this proof of your wisdom. Instead of spending the produce of your hunting in purchasing this pernicious drink, which produces poverty, broils and discord among the several tribes employed in procuring food and clothing for your families, and increasing instead of diminishing your numbers.
—Address to Miamis and Delawares. viii, 191. (1803.)

9125. ——. Perceiving the injurious effects produced by the Indians' inordinate use of spirituous liquors, Congress passed laws authorizing measures against the vending or distributing such liquors among them. Their introduction by traders was accordingly prohibited, and for some time was attended with the best effects. I am informed, however, that lately the Indians have got into the practice of purchasing such liquors themselves in the neighboring settlements of whites, and of carrying them into their towns, and that in this way our regulations so salutary to them, are now defeated. I must, therefore, request your Excellency to submit this matter to the consideration of your Legislature. I persuade myself that in addition to the moral inducements which will usually occur, they will find it not indifferent to their interests to give up their trade in removing, for their neighbors, this great obstacle to their acquiring industrious habits and attaching themselves to the regular and useful pursuits of life; for this purpose it is much desired that they should pass effectual laws to restrain their citizens from vending and distributing liquors to the Indians.—To... v, 407. (W., Dec. 1808.)

9126. ——. The French and afterwards the English kept the hatched always in your hand, exposing you to be killed in their quarrels, and then gave you whisky that you might quarrel and kill one another.—Indian Address. viii, 235. (1809.)

9127. ——. I have not filled you with whisky, as the English do, to make you promise, or give up what is against your interest, when out of your senses.—Indian Address. viii, 240. (1809.)

9128. What do the English for you? They furnish you with plenty of whisky, to keep you in idleness, drunkenness and poverty.—Indian Address. viii, 233. (1809.)

9129. ——. If we feared you, if we were your enemies, we should have furnished you p.iently with whisky.—Indian Address. viii, 233. (1809.)
9130. WHISKY, Tax on.—I shall be glad if an additional tax of one-fourth of a dollar a gallon on whisky shall enable us to meet our engagements and in some measure produce a single fact of insurrection, unless that term be entirely confounded with occasional riots, and when ordinary process of law has been resorted to, but by no means generally, nor had its effect been duly tried. But it answered the favorite purposes of strengthening government and increasing public debt; and, therefore, an insurrection was announced and proclaimed, and the proclamation was directed against the impecunious and unknown. Where, therefore, it is now too humiliating to excite any feeling but shame.—To JAMES MONROE.
FORD ED., vii, 16. (M., May 1795.)

9133. WHISKY, Insurrection, Military.—The information of our Virginia's militia, returned from the westward, is uniform, that though the people there let them pass quietly, they were objects of their fear; that one thousand men could have cut off their whole force in a thousand places of the Alleghany; that their detestation of the excise law is universal, and has now associated to it a detestation of the government; and that a separation which was perhaps a very distant and problematical event, is now near, and certain, and determined in the mind of every man.—To JAMES MADISON.
FORD ED., vi, 518. (M., Apr. 12.)

9134. WHISKY, Insurrection, Proclamation against.—The proclamation on the proceedings against the laws for raising a revenue on distilled spirits, I return with my signature. I think if, instead of the words, "render laws dictated by weighty reasons of public exigency and policy as acceptable as possible", "render laws as acceptable as possible", it would be better. I see no other particular expressions which need alteration.—To President Washington.
FORD ED., ii, 471. (M., Sep. 1792.)

9135.—I am sincerely sorry to learn that such proceedings have taken place; and I hope the proclamation will lead the persons concerned into a regular line of application which may end either in the ineffectiveness of the law, if it needs it, or in their conviction that it is right.—To President Washington.
FORD ED., i, 114. (M., Sep. 1792.)

9136. Wilkinson (James), Burr's conspiracy.—I have ever and carefully restrained myself from the expression of any opinion respecting General Wilkinson, except in the case of Burr's conspiracy, wherein, after he had got over his first agitations, we believed his decision firm, and his conduct zealous for the defeat of the conspiracy, and although injudicious, yet meriting, from sound intentions, the support of the nation. As to the rest of his conduct, I have always reproved his discourses, to whom it furnishes matter enough for disputation. I classed myself with neither.—To JAMES MONROE.
FORD ED., ix, 332. (M., Jan. 1812.)

9137. Wilkinson (James), Com¬mended.—I sincerely congratulate you on your safe arrival at Richmond, against the impudent surmises and hopes of the band of conspirators, who, because they are as yet permitted to walk abroad, and even to be in the character of witnesses until such a measure of evi¬dence is collected as to be placed securely at the bar of justice, attempt to cover their crimes under noise and insouciance. You have indeed had a fiery trial at New Orleans, but it was soon apparent that the clamorous were only the criminal, endeavoring to turn the public mind from them till they could find a leader upon any other object.—To General Wilkinson. v, 109. FORD ed., ix, 5. (W., June 1807.)

9138. Wilkinson (James), Confidence in.—I am thoroughly sensible of the painful difficulties of your situation, expecting an attack from an overwhelming force, universal in law, surrounded by suspected persons, and in a nation tender as to everything infringing on the rights and especially from the military. You have doubtless seen a good deal of malicious insinuation in the papers against you. This, of course, begot suspicion and distrust in those unacquainted with the line of your conduct. We, who knew it, have not failed to strengthen the public confidence in you: I can assure you that your conduct, as now known, has placed you on ground extremely favorable with the public. Burr and his emissaries found it convenient to sow a distrust in your mind of our dispositions towards you; but I am assured that you will be cordially supported in the line of your duties.—To General Wilkinson. v, 30. FORD ed., ix, 4. (W., Feb. 1807.)

9139. Wilkinson (James), Injustice for.—Your enemies have filled the public ear with slanders, and your mind with trouble on that account. The establishment of their guilt will let the world see what they ought to think of their clamos; it will dissipate the doubts of those who doubted for want of information, and will place you on higher ground in the public estimate and public confidence. No one is more sensible than myself of the injustice which has been aimed at you.—To General Wilkinson. v, 110. FORD ed., ix, 6. (W., June 1807.)

9140. Wilkinson (James), Plans against Burr.—Although we at no time believed Burr could carry away a formidable force out of the Ohio, yet we thought it safest that you should be prepared to receive him with all the force which could be assembled, and with that view our orders were given; and we were pleased to see that without waiting for them, you adopted nearly the same plan yourself, and acted on it with promptitude; the difference between yours and ours proceeding from your expecting an attack by sea, which we knew was impossible, either by England or by a fleet under Truxtun, who was at home; or by our own navy, which we knew was not in eye. The doubt that Burr would really descend with six or seven thousand men, was no doubt founded on what you knew of the numbers which could be raised in the western country for an expedition to Mexico, under the authority of the government; but you were correct in not calculating that the consent of that authority would take from him every honest man, and leave him only the desperadoes of his party, which in no part of the United States can ever be a numerous body.—To General Wilkinson. v, 39. FORD ed., ix, 4. (W., Feb. 1807.)

9141. Wilkinson (James), Suspicions.—General Wilkinson, being expressly declared by Burr to General Eaton, to be engaged with him in his design as his Lieutenant, or first in command, and suspicions of infidelity in Wilkinson being now become very general, a visit was made by the President to New Orleans, and by General Wilkinson, which turned out to his advantage. General Wilkinson was placed under a military court of justice, which was not the proper thing to be done to him on this account, as well as for his disobedience of orders received by him June 11, at St. Louis, to descend with all practicable dispatch to New Orleans, to mark out the site of certain defensive works there, and to repair to take command at Natchitoches, on which business he did not leave St. Louis till September.—The Anas. FORD ed., i, 319. (Oct. 1806.)

9142. William and Mary College, Aid for.—The late change in the form of our government, as well as the contest of arms in which we are at present engaged, calling for extraordinary abilities both in council and field, it becomes the peculiar duty of the Legislature, at this time, to aid and improve [William and Mary] Seminary, in which those who are to be the future guardians of the rights and liberties of their country may be endowed with science and virtue, to watch and preserve the sacred deposit.—William and Mary College Bill. FORD ed., ii, 233. (1779.)

9143. William and Mary College, Attachment for.—To William and Mary, as my alma mater, my attachment has been ever sincere, although not exclusive.—To Patrick K. Rodgers. vii, 328. (M., 1824.)

9144. William and Mary College, Changes.—Being elected, in 1779, one of the Visitors of William and Mary College, a self-electing body, I effected, during my residence in Williamsburg [as Governor of South Carolina] in year, the suppression of that institution, by abolishing the Grammar school, and the two professorships of Divinity and Oriental languages, and substituting a professorship of Law and Police, one of Anatomy, Medicine and Chemistry, and one of Modern Languages; and the charter confining us to six professorships, we added the Law of Nature and Nations, and the Fine Arts to the duties of the Moral professor, and Natural History to those of the professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy.—Autobiography. i, 50. FORD ed., i, 69. (1821.)

9145. William and Mary College, Church establishment.—The College of William and Mary was an establishment purely of the Church of England; the Visitors were required to be all of that Church; the professors were to subscribe its Thirty-nine Articles; its students to learn its catechism; and one of its fundamental objects was declared to be to raise up ministers for that Church. The religious jealously, therefore, on the part of the dissenters took alarm; lest this might give an ascendency to the Anglican sect, and refused acting on that bill. Its local eccentrity, too, and unhealthy annual climate, lessened the general inclination towards it.—Autobiography. i, 48. FORD ed., i, 67. (M., 1821.)

9146. William and Mary College, Rivalry.—When the college [of William and Mary] was located at the middle plantation in 1693, Charles City, on a frontier county, there were very few inhabitants above the falls of the rivers, sixty miles only higher up. It was, therefore, a position nearly central to the population, as it then was; but when the frontier became extended to the Sandy river, three hundred miles west of Williamsburg, the public convenience called, first for a removal of the seat of government, and latterly, not for a removal of the college, but for the establishment of a new one in a more central and healthy location; not disturbing the old one in its possessions or functions, but leaving them unimpaired for the benefit of those to whom it is known. This is therefore, one of the cases where the lawyers say there is damnnum abique injuria; and they instance, as in point, the settlement of a new schoolmaster in the neighborhood of an old one. At any rate, it is one of those cases wherein the public interest rightfully prevails, and the justice of which will be yielded by none, I am sure, with more dutiful and candid acquiescence than the enlightened friends of our ancient and venerable institution. The only rivalship, I hope, between the old and the new (of Virginia) who was doing the most good possible in their respective sections of country.—To Patrick K. Rodgers, vii, 328. (M., 1824.)

9147. WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE, Unfavorable location.—We have in Virginia a college (William and Mary) just well enough endowed to draw out the miserable existence to which a miserable constitution has doomed it. It is moreover eccentric in its position, exposed to all kinds of climate, the lower country is, and therefore, abandoned by the public care, as that part of the country itself is in a considerable degree by its inhabitants.—To Joseph Priestley, iv, 312. Ford ed., vii, 407. (Pa., 1800.) See University of Virginia, 9146. The college was established 1721.

9148. WINDS. Systematic observations on.—I am sorry you have received so little information on the subject of our winds. I had once (before our Revolution-war) a project on the same subject. As I had then an extensive acquaintance over this State (Virginia), I meant to have engaged some person in every county doing me the favor of giving them each a thermometer, to observe that and the winds twice a day, for one year, to wit, at sunrise and at four p. m. (the coldest and the warmest point of the twenty-four hours), and to communicate their observations to me at the end of the year. I should then have selected the days in which it appeared that the winds blew to a centre within the State, and have made a map of them, and seen how far they had analogy with the temperature of the air. I meant this to be merely a specimen to be communicated to the Philosophical Society at Philadelphia, in order to engage them, by means of their correspondents, to have the same thing done in every State, and through a series of years. By selecting the days when the winds centred in any part of the United States, we might, in time, have come to some of the causes which determine the direction of the winds, which I suspect to be very various. But this long-winded project was prevented by the war  * and since that I have been far otherwise engaged. I am sure you will have viewed the subject with more interest than I could. You will be glad to learn your views in some of the hours of delassement, which I hope we are yet to pass together.—To Mr. Volney. iv, 159. (M., 1797.)

9149. WINES, Making.—The culture of the vine is not desirable in lands capable of producing anything else. It is a species of gambling, and desperate gambling, too, wherein, whether you make much or nothing, you are equally ruined. The middling crop alone is the saving point, and that the seasons seldom hit. Accordingly, we see much wretchedness among this class of cultivators. Wine, too, is so cheap in these countries of Europe, that a laborer with us, employed in the cultivation of any other article, may exchange it for wine, more and better than he could raise himself. It is a resource for a country the whole of whose soil is otherwise employed, and which still has some barren spots, and small surplus of population to employ on them. There the vine is good, because it is something in the place of nothing. It may become a resource to us at a still later period; when the increase of population shall increase our productions beyond the demand for them, both at home and abroad. Instead of going on to make an useless surplus of them, we may employ our supernumerary hands on the vine.—To William Drayton, ii, 198. (P., 1787.)

9150. WINES.—An experiment was made in Virginia by a Mr. Mazzei, for the raising vines and making wines. He was an Italian, and brought over with him about a dozen larvae of grape-caterpillar, or other injurious insects, for four or five years. We had made up a subscription for him of £2,000 sterling, and he began his experiment on a piece of land adjoining mine. His intention was, before the time of his people should expire, to import more from France, and establish a little vineyard, and attended to it with great diligence for three years. The war then came on, the time of his people soon expired, some of them enlisted, others chose to settle on other lands and labor for themselves; some were taken away by the gentlemen of the country for gardeners, so that there did not remain a single one with him, and the interruption of navigation prevented his importing others. In this state of things he was himself employed by the State of Virginia to go to Europe as their agent to do some particular business. He rented his place to General Riedesel, whose horses in one week destroyed the whole labor of three or four years; and thus ended an experiment which, from every appearance, would in a year or two more have established the practicability of that branch of culture in America.—To Albert Gallatin, iii, 595. (Pa., 1793.)

9151. —— We could, in the United States, make as great a variety of wines as are made in Europe, not exactly of the same kinds, but doubtless as good. Yet I have ever observed to my countrymen, who think its introduction important, that a laborer cultivating the grape, rich or poor, could not so well manage the business, as to keep both wine and brandy, as to net with the proceeds, to purchase double the quantity of the wine he could make.—To M. Lasteyrie, v, 314. (W., 1808.)

9152. WINES, Sobriety and.—I am persuaded that were the duty on cheap wines put on the same ratio with the dear, it would wonderfully enlarge the field of those who use wine, to the expulsion of whisky. The introduction of a duty on cheap wine, within two years past, has quadrupled in that time the number of those who keep wine, and will ere long increase them tenfold. This would be a great gain to the treasury, and to the sobriety of our country.—To Albert Gallatin, v, 86. Ford ed., ix, 69. (W., June 1807.)

9153. WINES. Tax on.—I rejoice, as a moralist, at the prospect of a reduction of the duties on wine, by our national Legislature. It is an error to view a tax on that liquor as merely a tax on the rich. It is a prohibition of its use to the middling class of our citizens, and a condemnation of them because of their poverty. For, whisky, which is desolating their houses. No nation is drunken where wine is cheap; and none sober, where the dearness of wine substitutes ardent spirits as the common beverage. It is, in truth, the only antidote to the bane of wine. It is not permitted to the people of the State to carry merchandise, and we can drink wine here as cheap as we do grog; and who will not prefer it? Its extended use will carry health and comfort to a much enlarged circle. Every one in easy circumstances (as the bulk of our citizens are) will prefer it to the poison of which they are now driven by their Government. And the treasury itself will find that a penny apiece from a dozen, is more than a groat from a single one. This reformation, however, will require time. —To M. De NEUVILLE. vii, 110. (M., 1818.)

9154. — I think it a great error to consider a heavy tax on wines, as a tax on luxuries. Consider, it is a tax on the health of our citizens. It is a legislative declaration that none but the richest of them shall be permitted to drink wine, and, in effect, a condemnation of all the middling and lower conditions of society to the poison of whisky. * * * It is not the necessity of our treasury that we thus undertake to debar the mass of our citizens the use of not only an innocent gratification, but a healthy substitute instead of a bewitching poison. This aggression on the public taste and comfort has been ever deemed among the most arbitrary and oppressive abuses of the English government. It is one which, I hope, we shall never copy. —To WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD. Ford Ed., x, 112. (M., 1818.) See Life, Jefferson's Habits of.

9155. WIRT (William), Seat in Congress.—I pray you that this letter may be sacredly secret, because it meddles in a line wherein I should myself think it wrong to intermeddle, were it not that it looks to a period when I shall be out of office, but others might think it wrong notwithstanding that circumstance. I suspected, from your desire to go into the army, that you disliked your profession, notwithstanding that your prospects in it were inferior to none in the State. Still, I know that no profession is open to stronger antipathies than that of the law. The object of this letter, then, is to propose to you to come into Congress. That is the great commanding theatre of this nation, and the threshold to whatever department of office a man is qualified to enter. With your reputation, talents, and correct views, used with the necessary prudence, you will at once be placed at the head of the republican body in the House of Representatives; and after obtaining the standing which a little time will ensure you, you may look, at your own will, into the military, the judiciary, diplomatic, or other civil departments, with a certainty of being in either whatever you please. And in the present state of what may be called the eminent talents of our country, you may be assured of being engaged through life in no honorable employments. If you come in at the next election, you will begin your course with a new administration. That administration will be opposed by a faction, small in numbers, but governed by no principle but the most envenomed malignity. They will endeavor to batter down the Executive before it will have time, by its purity and correctness, to build up a confidence with the people, founded on experiment. By supporting them you will lay for yourself a broad foundation in the public confidence, and indeed you will become the Colossus of the public government of your country. * * * Perhaps I ought to apologize for the frankness of this communication. It proceeds from an ardent zeal to see this government (the idol of my soul) continue in good hands, and from a sincere desire to see you whatever you wish to be. —To WILLIAM WIRT. v, 233. (W., Jan. 1808.)

9156. WISDOM, Hereditary.—Wisdom is not hereditary. —To WILLIAM JOHNSON. vii, 291. Ford Ed., x, 227. (M., 1823.)

9157. WISDOM, Honesty and. — A wise man, if nature has not formed him honest, will yet act as if he were honest; because he will find it the most advantageous and wise part in the long run. —To JAMES MONROE. Ford Ed., iv, 40. (P., 1785.)

9158. WISTAR (Caspar), Philosophical society and. — I rejoice in the election of Dr. Wistar [to the presidency of the Philosophical Society], and trust that his senior standing in the Society will have been considered as a fair motive of preference of those whose merits, standing alone, would have justly entitled them to the honor, and who, as juniors, according to the course of nature, may still expect their turn. —To JOHN VAUGHAN. vi, 417. (M., 1815.)

—WOMEN, Appointment to office. — See Offices.

9159. WOMEN, Barbarism and. — The [Indian] women are submitted to unjust drudgery. This, I believe, is the case with every barbarous people. With such, force is law. The stronger sex, therefore, imposes on the weaker. * * * Were we in equal barbarism, our females would be equal drudges. —Notes on Virginia. viii, 305. Ford Ed., xii, 153. (1782.)

9160. WOMEN, Civilization and. — It is an honorable circumstance for man, that the first moment he is at his ease, he allows the internal employments to his female partner, and takes the external on himself. And this circumstance, or its reverse, is a pretty good indication that a people are, or are not at their ease. Among the Indians, this indication fails from a particular cause; every Indian man is a soldier or warrior, and the whole body of warriors constitute a standing army, always employed in war or hunting. To suppose a army, there remain no laborers but the women. Here, then, is something of a military establishment, that the civil part of the nation is reduced to women only. But this is a barbarous perversion of the natural destination of the two sexes—Travels in Lorraine. ix, 396. (1787.)

9161. WOMEN, Domestic life. — You think that the pleasures of Paris more than supply its want of domestic happiness. In other words, that a Parisian is happier than an American. You will change your opinion, and come over to mine in the end. Recollect the women of this capital [Paris], some on foot, some on horses, and some in carriages, hunting pleasure in the streets, in routes and assemblies, and forgetting that they have left it behind them in their nurseries; compare them with our own countrywomen occupied in the tender and tranquil amusements of domestic life, and confess that it is a comparison of Americans and angels.—To MRS. WILLIAM BINGHAM. FORD ED., v, 9. (P., 1788.)

9162. — American women have the good sense to value domestic happiness above all other, and the art to cultivate it beyond all other. There is no part of the earth where so much of this is enjoyed as in America.—To MRS. WILLIAM BINGHAM. FORD ED., v, 9. (P., 1788.)

—WOMEN, Education.—See Education, Female.

9163. WOMEN, Government and.—However nature may by mental or physical disqualifications have marked infants and the weaker sex for the protection, rather than the direction of government, yet among the men who either pay or fight for their country, no line of right can be drawn.—To JOHN H. PLEASANTS. vii, 345. FORD ED., x, 303. (M., 1824.)

9164. WOMEN, Horseback riding.—A lady should never ride a horse which she might not safely ride without a bridle.—To MARY JEFFERSON. FORD ED., v, 328. (P., 1791.)

9165. WOMEN, Labor and.—I observe women and children carrying heavy burdens, and laboring with the hoe. This is an unequivocal indication of extreme poverty. Men, in a civilized country, never expose their wives and children to labor above their force and sex, as long as their own labor can protect them from it.—TRAVELS IN FRANCE. ix, 313. (1787.)

9166. — The women here [Lorraine] as in Germany, do all sorts of work. While one considers them as useful and rational companions, one cannot forget that they are also objects of our pleasures; nor can they ever forget it. While employed in dirt and drudgery, some tag of a ribbon, some ring, or bit of bracelet, earbob or necklace, or something of that kind, will show that the desire of pleasing is never suspended in them.—TRAVELS IN LORRAINE. ix, 396. (1787.)

9167. WOMEN, Natural equality of.—It is civilization alone which replaces women in the enjoyment of their natural equality. That first teaches us to subdue the selfish passions, and to respect those rights in others which we value in ourselves.—NOTES ON VIRGINIA. vii, 305. FORD ED., iii, 153. (1782.)

9168. WOMEN, Needlework.—In the country life of America, there are many moments when a woman can have recourse to nothing but her needle for employment. In a dull company, and in dull weather, for instance, it is ill-mannered to read, ill manners to leave them; no card-playing there among genteel people—that is abandoned to blackguards. The needle is, then, a valuable resource. Besides, without knowing how to use it herself, how can the mistress of a family direct the work of her servants?—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. FORD ED., iv, 373. (1767.)

9169. WOMEN, Politics and.—All the world is now politically mad. Men, women, children talk nothing else, and you know that naturally they talk much, loud and warm. Society is spoiled by it, at least for those who, like myself, are but lookers on. You, too, in America] have had your political fever. But our good ladies, I trust, have been too wise to wrinkle their foreheads with politics. They are contented to soothe and calm the minds of their husbands returning ruffled from political debate.—To MRS. WILLIAM BINGHAM. FORD ED., v, 9. (P., 1768.)

9170. WOMEN, Tenderness for.—Women are formed by nature for attentions, not for hard labor. A woman never forgets one of the numerous train of little offices which belong to her. A man forgets often.—TRAVELS IN FRANCE. ix, 397. (1787.)

9171. WORDS, Use of.—I am not scrupulous about words when they are once explained.—To GEORGE HAMMOND. iii, 515. FORD ED., vi, 187. (P., 1793.)

9172. WORLD, End of.—I hope you will have good sense enough to disregard those foolish predictions that the world is to be at an end soon. The Almighty has never made known to anybody at what time He created it; nor will He tell anybody when He will put an end to it, if He ever means to do it. As to preparations for that event, the best way for you is to be always prepared for it. The only way to be so is, never to say or do a bad thing. If ever you are about to say anything amiss, or to do anything wrong, consider beforehand you will feel something within you which will tell you it is wrong, and ought not to be said or done. This is your conscience, and be sure and obey it. Lord Maker has given us all an internal monitor, and if you always obey it you will always be prepared for the end of the world; or for a much more certain event, which is death. This must happen to all; it puts an end to the world as to us; and the way to be ready for it is never to do a wrong act—To MARTHA JEFFERSON. D. L. J. 70. (1793.)

9173. WORTH, American appreciation of.—I know no country where * * * public esteem is so attached to worth, regardless of wealth [as it is in America].—To MRS. CHURCH. FORD ED., vi, 455. (G., 1793.)

9174. WORTH, Esteem for moral.—My anxieties on this subject will never carry me beyond the use of fair and honorable means, of truth and reason; nor have they ever lessened my esteem for moral worth, nor alienated my affections from a single friend, who did not first withdraw himself. Whenever this happened, I confess I have not been insensible to it; yet have ever kept myself open to a return of their justice.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 562. FORD ED., viii, 312. (M., 1804.)

9175. WRETCHEDNESS, Life and.—The Giver of life gave it for happiness and not for wretchedness.—To James Monroe. i, 310. Ford ed., i, 59. (M., 1782.)

9176. Wright (Frances), Works of.—Miss Wright had before favored me with the first edition of her American work; but her "Few Days in Athens," was entirely new, and has been a treat to me of the highest order. The matter and manner of the dialogue is strictly ancient; and the principles of the scenes are beautifully and candidly explained and contrasted; and the scenery and portraiture of the interlocutors are of higher finish than anything in that line left us by the ancients; and like Ossian, if not ancient, it is equal to the best models of antiquity. I augur, from this instance, that Herculaneum is likely to furnish better specimens of modern than of ancient genius; and may we not hope more from the same pen?—To Marquis Lafayette. vii, 326. Ford ed., x, 282. (M., 1823.)

9177. Writing, For newspapers.—I have preserved through life a resolution, set in a very early part of it, never to write in a public publication, subscribing my name to it, and to engage openly an adversary who does not let himself be seen, is staking all against nothing.—To Edward Randolph. iii, 470. (1792.)

9178. Writing, Illegible.—I return you Mr. Coxe's letter which has cost me much time at two or three different attempts to decipher it. Had I such a correspondent, I should certainly admonish him that, if he would not so far respect my time as to write to me legibly, I should so far respect it myself as not to waste it in decomposing and recomposing his hieroglyphics.—To James Madison. Ford ed., x, 475. (M., 1823.)

9179. Wrong, Correction of.—A conviction that we are right accomplishes half the difficulty of correcting wrong.—To Archibald Thweat. vii, 199. Ford ed., x, 184. (M., 1821.)

9181. Wrong, Resistance to.—We have borne patiently a great deal of wrong, on the consideration that if nations go to war for every degree of injury, there would never be peace on earth. But when patience has begotten false estimates of its motives, when wrongs are pressed because it is believed they will be borne, resistance becomes morality.—To Madame de Stael. v, 133. (W., 1807.)

9182. Wrong, Restrain.—We * * * owe it to mankind, as well as to ourselves, to restrain wrong by resistance, and to defeat those calculations of which justice is not the basis.—Seventh Annual Message. viii, 146. Ford ed., ix, 146.

9183. Wrong, Submission to.—We love peace, yet spurn a tame submission to wrong. R. to A. N. Y. Tammany Society. viii, 127. (1808.)

9184. Wrongs, Republican vs. Monarchical.—Compare the number of wrongs committed with impunity by citizens among us, with those committed by the sovereigns in other countries, and the last will be found most numerous, most oppressive on the mind, and most degrading to the dignity of man.—Answers to M. de Meunier. ix, 292. Ford ed., iv, 147. (P., 1786.)

9185. Wythe (George), Ability of.—The pride of William and Mary College is Mr. Wythe, one of the Chancellors of the State, and Professor of Law. He is one of the greatest men of the age, having held without competition the first place at the bar of our General Court for twenty-five years, and always distinguished by the most spotless virtue.—To Ralph Izard. ii, 428. (P., 1788.)

9186. Wythe (George), American Revolution and.—George Wythe was one of the very few (for I can barely speak of them in the plural number) * * * who, from the commencement of the [Revolutionary] contest, hung our connection with Great Britain on its true hook, that of a common king. His unassuming character, however, made him appear as a follower, while his sound judgment kept him in a line with the freest spirit.—To William Wirt. vi, 368. Ford ed., ix, 469. (M., 1814.)

9187. * * * On the dawn of the Revolution, instead of higgling on half-way principles, which dared to follow their reason, he took his stand on the solid ground that the only link of political union between us and Great Britain, was the identity of our Executive; that that nation and its Parliament had no more authority over us than we had over them, and that we were coordinate nations with Great Britain and Hanover.—To John Saunderson. i, 113. (M., 1820.)

9188. Wythe (George), Cato of America.—No man ever left behind him a character more venerated than George Wythe. His virtue was of the purest tint; his integrity inflexible and his justice exact; of warm patriotism, and, devoted as he was to liberty and the natural and equal rights of man, he might truly be called the Cato of his country, without the accessories of the Roman, for a more disinterested person never lived.*—To John Saunderson. i, 114. (M., 1820.)

9189. Wythe (George), Honor of his age.—The honor of his own, and the model of future times.—To John Saunderson. i, 114. (M., 1820.)

9190. Wythe (George), Lectures of.—Your favor gave me the first information that the lectures of my late master and friend exist in MS. * * * His mind was too accurate, his reasoning powers too strong, to have committed anything to paper materially incorrect. It is unfortunate that there should be laesura in them. But you are mistaken in supposing I could supply them. It is now thirty-seven years since I left the bar, and have ceased to think on subjects of law; and the constant occupation of my mind by other concerns has obliterated it all but the strongest traces of the science. Others, I am sure, can be found equal to it, and none more so than Judge Roane. It is not my time or trouble which I wish to spare on this occasion. They are due, in any extent, to the memory of one who was my second father. My incompetence is the real obstacle; and in any other circumstance connected with the publication, in which I can be useful to his fame, and the public instruction, I will be better ready to do my duty.—To John Tyler. Ford Ed., ix, 288. (M., 1810.)

1911. Wythe (George), Mentor and friend.—Mr. Wythe continued to be my faithful and beloved mentor in youth, and my most intimate friend through life. In 1767, he led me into the practice of the law at the bar of the General Court, at which I continued until the Revolution shut up the courts of Justice.—Autobiography, i, 3. Ford Ed., i, 4. (1821.)

1912. Wythe (George), Supporter of Jefferson.—Mr. Wythe, while speaker [of the Virginia Legislature] in the two sessions of 1777, was an able andconstant associate for mine in whatever was before a committee of the whole. His pure integrity, judgment and reasoning powers, gave him great weight.—Autobiography, i, 41. Ford Ed., i, 56. (1821.)

1913. Wythe (George), Virtuous.—One of the most virtuous of characters, and whose sentiments on the subject of slavery are unequivocal.—To Dr. Price, i, 377. Ford Ed., iv, 83. (Pa., 1785.)

1914. The exalted virtue of the man will be a polar star to guide you in all matters which may touch that element of his character. But on that you will receive imitation from no man; for, as far as I know, he never had an enemy.—To John Saunders, i, 112. (M., 1820.)

—Xenophon.—See Philosophy.

1915. X. Y. Z. Plot, Artful misrepresentation of.—The most artful misrepresentations of the contents of these papers have been published, and have produced such a shock in the republican mind, as has never been seen since our independence. We are to dread the effects of this dismay till their fuller information. J. Madison, iv, 233. Ford Ed., vii, 236. (Pa., April 1798.)

1916. X. Y. Z. Plot, Astonishment over.—The public mind appears still in a state of astonishment. There never was a moment in which the aid of an able pen was so important to place things in their just attitude. On this depend the inchoate movements in the eastern mind, and the fate of the elections in that quarter. * * * I would not propose to your such a task on any ordinary occasion. But be assured that a well-digested analysis of these papers would now decide the future turn of things, which are at this moment on the cren. To James Madison, iv, 234. Ford Ed., vii, 237. (Pa., April 1798.)

1917. X. Y. Z. Plot, Delusion through.—There is a most respectable part of our State [Virginia] who have been engrossed, and who destroy our * In 1807, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Elbridge Gerry and John Marshall were sent on an extraor-dinary mission to the French Republic, the Directory being then in power. Partially they received letters from unofficial persons signed X. Y. and Z, intimating that, as a preliminary to the negotiation, it would be necessary to expend a large sum of money in the way of bribes to the members of the Government. These demands were not acceded to, and the federalists made skilful political use of the incident in their warfare against the republicans.—Editor.

unanimity for the present moment. This disease of the imagination will pass over, because the patients are essentially republican. Indeed, the doctor is now on his way to curt the gout, and the gouty wits do my duty.—To John Tyler. Ford Ed., iv, 259. Ford Ed., vii, 309. (M., 1798.)

1918. There is real reason to believe that the X. Y. Z. delusion is wearing off, and the public mind beginning to take the same direction it was getting in under that misrepresentation. Gerry’s dispatches will tend strongly to open the eyes of the people. Besides this several other impressive circumstances will be bearing on the public mind. The Alien and Sedition laws as before, the direct tax, the additional army and navy, an unsuccessful attempt to get these follies on foot, a prospect of heavy additional taxes as soon as they are completed, still heavier taxes if the government forces on the war recruiting officers lounging at every court-house and decaying the laborer from his work.—Oc. Ford Ed., iv, 265. Ford Ed., vii, 320. (Pa., Jan. 1799.)

1919. The violations of the Constitution, propensities to war, to expense, and to a particular foreign connection [Great Britain], which we have lately seen, are becoming evident to the people, and are distilling that mist which X. Y. Z. had spread before their eyes.—To Edmund Pendleton, iv, 287. Ford Ed., vii, 325. (Pa., Feb. 1799.)

1920. X. Y. Z. Plot, Federalists and.—When Pinckney, Marshall, and Dana were nominated to settle our differences with France, it was suspected by many, from what was understood of their dispositions, that their mission would not result in a settlement of differences, but would produce circumstances tending to widen the breach, and to provoke our citizens to consent to a war with that nation, and union with England. Dana’s resignation and your appointment gave the first gleam of hope of a peaceable issue to the mission. For it was believed that you were sincerely disposed to accommodate; and it was long after your arrival there, before symptoms were observed of that difference of views which had been suspected to exist. In the meantime, however, the aspect of our government towards the French Republic had become so ardent, that the people of America generally took the alarm. To the southward, their apprehensions were early excited. In the eastern States also, they at length began to break out. Meetings were held in many of your towns, and addresses to the government agreed on in opposition to the war. The example was spreading like a wild-fire. Other meetings were called in other places, and a general concurrence of sentiment against the apparent inclinations of the government was imminent; when, most critically for the government, the [X. Y. Z.] demands of October 22d, prepared by your colleague Marshall, with a view to their being made public, dropped into their laps. It was truly a godsend to them, and they made the most of it. Many thousands of copies were printed and dispersed at public expense; and the zealots for war cooperated so heartily, that there were instances of single individuals who printed and dispersed ten or twelve thousand copies at their own expense. The odiousness of the corporal support in the war, was the cause of much and high indignation among the people. Unexperienced in such manoeuvres, they did not permit themselves even to suspect that the nish. I sent him some letters, but in searching for them I found two, too precious to be trusted by mail, of the date of 1801, January 15 and 20, in answer to one I had written him January 26, 1799, two years before. It furnishes authentic proof that in the X. Y. Z. mission to France, it was the wish of Pickens, Marshall, Pinckney and the federalists of that stamp, to avoid a treaty with France and to bring on war, a fact we charged on them at the time and this letter proves, and that their X. Y. Z. report was cooked up to dispose of the avowed French policy. It was, we believe, not of their sentiment, and this is his statement of that transaction. During the two years between my letter and his answer, he was wavering between Mr. Adams and myself, between his attachment to Mr. Adams personally on the one hand, and 60 republican, for he was republican but timid and indecisive.
The event of the election of 1800-1, put an end to his hesitations.—To JAMES MADISON.

9203. YAZOO LANDS, Speculation in.
Arthur Campbell  * * says the Yazzoo bargain is likely to drop with the consent of the purchasers. He explains it thus: They expected to pay for the lands in public paper at par, which they had bought at half a crown a pound.
But the public paper, in the hands of the purchaser, they have gained as much on that as they would have done by investing it in the Yazoo lands; perhaps more, as it puts a large sum of specie at their command, which they can turn to better account. They are, therefore, likely to acquiesce under the determination of the government of Georgia to consider the contract as forfeited by non-payment.—To President WASHINGTON. iii, 251. FORD ED., v.
324. (Pa., 1791.)

9204. YAZOO LANDS, Title to.—I  return the petition of Mr. Moultrie on behalf of the South Carolina Yazoo Company. Without noticing that some of the highest functions of sovereignty are assumed in the very papers which he annexes as his justification, I am of opinion that the government of the United States has no title to the Yazoo lands, or any interest in them. If that government is to have a right to the occupation of their lands, independent of the States within whose chartered lines they happen to be; that until they cede them by treaty or other transaction equivalent to a treaty, no title can be acquired to the lands; that neither under the present Constitution, nor the ancient confederation, had any State or person a right to treat with the Indians, without the consent of the General Government; that that consent has never been given to any treaty for the cession of the lands in question; that the government is determined to exert all its energy for the patronage and protection of the rights of the Indians, and the preservation of peace between the United States and them; and that purchases settlements are made on lands not ceded by them, without the previous consent of the United States, the government will think itself bound, not only to declare to the Indians that such settlements are without the authority or protection of the United States, but to dispossess them also by the public force.—To HENRY
KNOX. iii, 280. FORD ED., v. 370. (Pa., 1791.)

9205. YELLOW FEVER, Cities and.—
[As to] the town which you have done me the honor to name after me, and to lay out according to an idea I had formerly expressed to you.
I am thoroughly persuaded that it will be found handsome and pleasant, and I do believe it to be the best means of preserving the cities of America from the scourge of the yellow fever, which being peculiar to our country, must be derived from some peculiarity in it. That peculiarity I take to be our cloudless skies. In Europe, where the sun does not shine more than half the number of days in the year which it does in America, they can build their town in a solid block with impunity; but here a constant sun produces too great an accumulation of heat to admit that. Ventilation is indispensably necessary. Experience has taught us that it is the air of the towns where this fever is not only not generated, but ceases to be infectious.—To Governor Harrison. iv, 471. (W., 1803.)

9206. I have supposed it practicable to prevent its generation by building our cities on a more open plan. Take, for instance, the checker board for a plan. Let the black squares only be building squares, and the white ones be left open, in turf and trees. Every square of houses will be surrounded by four open squares, and every house will front an open square. The atmosphere of such a town would be like that of the open country, and the susceptible of the diastatata which produce yellow fever. I have proposed that the enlargements of the city of New Orleans * * * shall be on this plan.—To C. F. Volney. iv, 572. (W., 1805.)

9207. I really wish effect to the hints in my letter to you for so laying off the additions to the city of New Orleans, as to shield it from yellow fever. My confidence in the idea is founded in the acknowledged experience that we have never seen the genuine yellow fever extend itself into the country, or even to the outskirts or open parts of a close-built city. In the plan of a town the every square would be surrounded, on every side, by open and pure air, in fact, be a separate town with fields or open suburbs about it.—To Governor Claiborne v, 520. (M., 1810.)

9208. YELLOW FEVER, Infectious.—On the question whether the yellow fever is infectious or endemic, the medical faculty is divided into two parties, and it certainly is not difficult for either to pronounce either party as Dr. Rush proposes. Yet, so far as they are called on to act, they must form for themselves an opinion to act on. In the early history of the disease, I did suppose it to be infectious. Not remain, every party papers on either side, I continued in this supposition until the fever at Alexandria brought facts under my own eye, as it were, proving it could not be communicated but in a local atmosphere, pretty exactly circumscribed. With this supposition of this atmosphere we are unacquainted. We know only that it is generated near the water side, in close built cities, under warm climates. According to the rules of philosophizing when one sufficient cause for an effect is known, it is not within the province of our commerce to produce the fever, microsoma from a human subject are not necessary and probably do not enter into the cause. Still, it is not within my province to decide the question; but as it may be within yours to require the professional opinion of this atmospheric subject, I execute a private duty in submitting Dr. Rush's letter to your consideration.—To Governor Page. Ford ed., viii, 316. (M., 1804.)

9209. YELLOW FEVER, Origin.—Facts appear to have established that it is originated here by a local atmosphere, which is never generated but in the lower, closer, and dirtier parts of our large cities, and in the neighborhood of the water; and that, to catch the disease, you must enter the local atmosphere. Persons having taken the disease in the infected quarter, and going into the country, are nursed and buried by their friends, without an example of a common community, (I mean) the retiring of an epidemic, not a contagious disease.—To C. F. Volney. iv, 570. (W., 1805.)

9210. YELLOW FEVER, Quarantine and. —In the course of the several visitations by this disease [yellow fever], it has appeared that it is strictly local, incident to the cities and on the tide waters only; incommunicable in the country, either by persons under the disease or by goods carried from diseased places; that its access is with the autumn, and that it disappears with the early frost: These restrictions, within narrow limits of time and space, give security even to our maritime cities, during three-fourths of the year, and to the country always. Any attempts to extend this security are unnecessary, yet to satisfy the fears of foreign nations, and cautions on their part not to be complained of in a danger whose limits are yet unknown to them. I have strictly enjoined on the officers at the head of the customs to certify with exactness for their own protection and for the foreign ports, the state of health respecting this fever which prevailed at the place from which she sailed. Under every motive from character and duty to certify the truth, I have no doubt they have faithfully executed this injunction. Much real injury has, however, been sustained from a propensity to identify with this endemic, and to call by the same name, fevers of very different kinds, which have always been known at all times and in almost all countries, and never having been placed among the contagious. As we advance in our knowledge of this disease, as facts develop the source from which individuals receive it, the State authorities charged with the care of the public health, and Congress with that of the general commerce, will be enabled to see that these facts are placed in their respective functions in these departments. The burden of quarantines is at home as well as abroad: their efficacy merits examination. Although the health laws of the States should be found to need no present revival by Congress, yet commerce demands that the attention of the Senate be ever awake to them. 9211. YORKTOWN, Gratitude to France.—If in the minds of any, the motives of gratitude to our good allies were not sufficiently apparent, the part they have borne in this action [Yorktown] must amply evince them.—To General Washington. i, 314. FORD ED., iii, 51. (M., 1781.)

9212. YOUNG MEN, Education.—I am not a friend to placing young men in populous cities [for their education] because they acquire there habits and partialities which do not contribute to the happiness of their after life.—To Dr. Wistar. v, 104. FORD ED., ix, 79. (W., 1807.)

9213. A part of my occupation, and by no means the least pleasing, is the direction of the studies of such young men as ask it. They place themselves in the neighboring village and have the use of my library.
and counsel, and make a part of my society. In advising the course of their reading, I endeavor to keep their attention fixed on the main objects of all science, the freedom and happiness of man. So that coming to bear a share in the councils and government of their country, they will keep ever in view the sole objects of all legitimate government.—To General Kosciusko. v, 599. (M., 1810.)

9214. YOUNG MEN, Enthusiasm of.—Bonaparte will conquer the world if they [the European powers] do not learn his secret of composing armies of young men only, whose enthusiasm and health enable them to surmount all obstacles.—To Mr. Bidwell. v, 16. (W., 1806.)

9215. YOUNG MEN, Future rulers.—They [the students of the University of Virginia] are exactly the persons who are to succeed to the government of our country, and to rule its future enemics, its friendships and fortunes.—To J. Evelyn Denison. vii, 415. (M., 1825.)

9216. YOUNG MEN, Patronizing.—I have written to you in the style to which I have been always accustomed with you, and which perhaps it is time I should lay aside. But while old men are sensible enough of their own advance in years, they do not sufficiently recollect it in those whom they have seen young.—To William Short. iii, 503. Ford ed., vi, 156. (Pa., 1793.)

9217. YOUNG MEN, Public life and.—Wythe's school is numerous. They hold weekly courts and assemblies in the Capitol. The professors join in it, and the young men dispute with elegance, method and learning. This single school, by throwing from time to time new hands well principled, and well-informed into the Legislature, will be of infinite value.—To James Madison. Ford ed., i, 322. (R., 1780.)

9218. YOUNG MEN, Reform and.—The [French] officers, who had been to America, were mostly young men, less shackled by habit and prejudice, and more ready to assent to the suggestions of common sense and feeling of common rights, than others. They come back [to France] with new ideas and impressions.—Auto biography. i, 69. Ford ed., i, 96. (1821.)

9219. YOUNG MEN, Self-government and.—Three sons, and hopeful ones too, are a rich treasure. I rejoice when I hear of young men of virtue and talents, worthy to receive, and likely to preserve the splendid inheritance of self-government, which we have acquired and shaped for them.—To Judge Tyler. iv, 549. (W., 1804.)

9220. —— The sentiments you express * * * are particularly solacing to those who, having labored faithfully in establishing the right of self-government, see in the rising generation, into whose hands it is passing, that purity of principle, and energy of character, which will protect and preserve it through their day, and deliver it over to their sons as they receive it from their fathers. —R. to A. Pittsburg Young Republicans. viii, 141. (1808.)

9221. YOUNG MEN, Slavery and.—I look to the rising generation, and not to the one now in power, for these great reformation. —To General Chastellux. i, 340. Ford ed., iii, 71. (P., 1785.)

9222. —— The college of William and Mary * * * is the place where are collected together all the young men of Virginia under preparation for public life. * * * I am satisfied if you could resolve to address an exhortation to those young men, with all that eloquence of which you are master, that its influence on the future decision of this important question [slavery] would be great, perhaps decisive.—To Dr. Price. i, 377. Ford ed., iv, 83. (P., 1785.)

9223. —— [In Virginia] * * * the sacred side [in the conflict with slavery] is gaining daily recruits from the influx into office of young men grown and growing up. These have sucked in the principles of liberty, as it were, with their mothers' milk; and it is to them I look with anxiety to turn the fate of this question.—To Dr. Price. i, 377. Ford ed., iv, 83. (P., 1785.)

9224. YOUNG MEN, Surrender to.—I leave the world and its affairs to the young and energetic, and resign myself to their care, of whom I have endeavored to take care when young.—To Charles Pinckney. vii, 180. Ford ed., x, 162. (M., 1820.)

9225. YOUNG WOMEN, Power of.—All the handsome young women [of Paris] are for the Tiers Etat, and this is an army more powerful in France than the 200,000 men of the King.—To David Humphreys. iii, 11. Ford ed., v, 87. (P., 1789.)

9226. ZEAL, Fervent.—Fervent zeal is all which I can be sure of carrying into their [Congress] service.—To John Jay. i, 339. (P., 1785.)

9227. ZEAL, Resources of.—Utterly indeed, should I despair, did not the presence of many whom I here see remind me, that in the high authorities provided by our Constitution, I shall find resources of wisdom, of virtue, and of zeal, on which to rely under all difficulties.—First Inaugural Address. viii, 1. Ford ed., viii, 2. (1801.)

9228. ZEAL, Ridicule and.—I fear that my zeal will make me expose myself to ridicule * * * but this risk becomes a duty by the bare possibility of doing good.—To Dr. Ramsay. ii, 216. (P., 1787.)

APPENDIX

REPLY TO LORD NORTH'S CONCILIATORY PROPOSITION

The Congress proceeding to take into their consideration a resolution of the House of Commons of Great Britain, referred to them by the several Assemblies of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, which resolution is in these words: "That it is the opinion, &c., are of opinion:

That the Colonies of America possess the exclusive privilege of giving and granting their own money; that this involves the right of deliberating whether they will make any gift, for what purposes it shall be made, and what shall be the amount of the gift; and that it is a high breach of this privilege for any body of men, extraneous to their constitutions, to prescribe the purposes for which money shall be levied on them; to take to themselves the authority of judging of their conditions, circumstances, and situation, of determining the amount of the contribution to be levied:

That, as they possess a right of appropriating their gifts, so are they entitled at all times to inquire into their application, to see that they be not wasted among the venal and corrupt for the purpose of undermining the civil rights of the givers, nor yet be diverted to the support of standing armies, inconsistent with their freedom, and subversive of their quiet. To propose, therefore, as this resolution does, that the moneys, given by the Colonies, shall be subject to the disposal of Parliament alone, is to propose, that they shall relinquish this right of inquiry, and put it in the power of others, to render their gifts ruinous, in proportion as they are liberal:

That this privilege of giving, or withholding our money, is an important barrier against the undue exerion of prerogative, which, if left altogether without control, may be exercised to our great oppression; and all history shows how efficacious its intercession for redress of grievances, and reestablishment of rights, and how imprudent would be the surrender of so powerful a mediator.

We are of opinion:

That the proposition contained in this resolution is unreasonable and insidious; unreasonable, because if we declare we accede to it, we declare without reservation we will purchase the favor of Parliament, not knowing, at the same time, at what price they will please to estimate their favor. It is insidious, because individual colonies, having bid and bidden again, till they find the avidity of the seller unattainable by all their powers, are then to return into opposition, divided from their sister Colonies, whom the minister will have previously detached by a grant of easier terms, or by an artful procrastination of a definitive answer:

That the suspension of the exercise of their pretended power of taxation being expressly made commensurate with the continuing of our gifts, these must be perpetual to make that so: whereas no experience has shown that a gift of perpetual revenue secures a perpetual return of duty, or of kind dispositions. On the contrary, the Parliament itself, wisely attentive to this observation, are in the established practice of granting their own money from year to year only.

Though desirous and determined to consider, in the most dispassionate view every advance towards reconciliation, made by the British Parliament, let our brethren of Britain reflect what could have been the sacrifice to men of free spirits, had even fair terms been proffered by free-men when attended as these were, with circumstances of insult and defiance. A proposition to give our money, when accompanied with large fleets and armies, seems addressed to our fears, rather than to our freedom. With what patience, would they have received articles of treaty, from any power on earth, when borne on the point of the bayonet, by military plenipotentiaries? We think the attempt unnecessary and unwarrantable to raise upon us, by force or by threats, our proportional contributions to the common defence, when all know, and themselves acknowledge, we have fully contributed, whenever called to contribute, in the character of free-men.

We are of opinion it is not just that the Colonies should be required to oblige themselves to other contributions, while Great Britain possesses a monopoly of their trade. This does of itself lay them under heavy contribution. To demand, therefore, an additional contribution in the form of a tax, is to demand the double of their equal proportion. If we are to contribute equally with the other parts of the empire, let us equally with them enjoy free commerce with the whole world. But while the restrictions on our trade shut to us the resources of wealth, is it just we should bear all other burthens, equally with those to whom every resource is open?

We conceive, that the British Parliament has no right to intermeddle with our provisions for the support of civil government, or administration of justice; that the provisions we have made are such as please ourselves. They answer the substantial purposes of government, and of justice, and other purposes than these should not be answered. We do not mean that our people shall be burthened with oppressive taxes to provide sinecures for the idle or wicked, under color of providing for a civil list. While Parliament pursue their plan of civil government within their own jurisdiction, we hope, also, to pursue ours without molestation.

We are of opinion the proposition is altogether unsatisfactory because it imports only a suspension, not a renunciation of the right to tax us; because, too, it does not propose to repeal the several acts of Parliament, passed for the purposes of restraining the trade, and altering the form of government of one of the Eastern Colonies; extending the boundaries, and changing the government and religion of Quebec; enlarging the jurisdiction of the Courts of Admiralty and Vice-admiralty; taking from us the rights of trial by jury of the vicinage in cases affecting both life and prosperity; transporting us into other countries to be tried for criminal offences; exempting, by mock trial, the murderers of Colonists from punishment; and for quartering soldiers upon us, in times of profound peace. Nor do they renounce the power of suspending our own legislatures, and of legislating for us themselves in all cases whatsoever. On the contrary, to show they mean no discontinuance of injury, they pass acts, at the very time of holding out this proposition, for restraining the commerce and fisheries of the Province of New England; and for interdicting the trade of the other Colonies, with all foreign nations. This proves unequivocally, they mean not to relinquish the exercise of indiscriminate legislation over us.

Upon the whole, this proposition seems to have been held up to the whole world to deceive it into a belief that there is no matter in dispute between us but the single circumstance of the mode of levying taxes, which mode they are so good as to give up to us, of course that the Colonies are unreasonable if they are not, thereby, perfectly satisfied; whereas, in truth, our adversaries not only still claim a right of demanding ad libitum, and of taxing us themselves to the full amount of their demands if we do not fulfil their pleasure, which leaves us without anything we can call property, but, what is of more importance, and what they keep in this proposal out of sight, as if no such point was in contest, they claim a right of altering our charters, and established laws which leave us without the least security for our lives or liberties.

The proposition seems, also, calculated more particularly to lull into fatal security our well-affected fellow subjects on that other side of the water, till time should be given for the operation of those arms which a British minister pronounced would instantaneously reduce the "cowardly" sons of America to unreserved submission. But, when the world reflects how inadequate to justice are the vaunted terms, when it attends to the rapid and bold succession of injuries, which, during a course of eleven years, have been aimed at these Colonies, when it reviews the pacific and respectful expostulations, which, during that whole time, have been made the sole arms we oppose to them, when it observes, that our complaints were either not heard at all, or were answered with new and accumulated injuries; when it recollects, that the minister himself declared on an early occasion, "that he would never treat with America, till he had brought her to his feet"; and that an avowed partisan of ministry has, more lately, denounced against America the dreadful sentence "Delenda est Carthago"; and that this was done in the presence of a British senate, and being unrepri\-

"This is Jefferson's draft. Congress made several verbal alterations.—EDITOR.
A court of inquiry held in Rhode Island in 1762, with a power to send persons to England to be tried for offences committed here, was considered at our session [Virginia House of Burgesses] of the spring of 1773, as demanding attention. Not thinking our old and leading members up to the point of forwardness and zeal which the times required, Mr. [Patrick] Henry, Richard Henry Lee, Francis L. Lee, Mr. [Dabney] Carr and myself agreed to meet in the evening, in a private room of the Raleigh [tavern], to consult on the state of things. It was then recollected, and by that of all the members was that of coming to an understanding with all the other Colonies to consider the British claims as to come one’s cause to all, and to produce a unity of action; and, for this purpose, that a Committee of Correspondence in each Colony would be the best instrument for intercommunication; and that their first measure would probably be, to propose a meeting of deputies from every Colony, at some central place, who should be charged with the direction of the measures which should be taken by all, and to which the corresponding committees of the other Colonies were appointed to be added, and to which their resolutions agreed upon, but I urged that it should be done by Mr. [Dabney] Carr, my friend-in-law, then a new member, to whom I wished an opportunity should be given of making known to the house his great worth and talents. It was so agreed; he moved them, they were agreed to nem. con., and a Committee of Correspondence appointed, of whom Peyton Randolph, the Speaker, was chairman. The Governor (then Lord Dunmore) dissolved us, but the Committee met the next day, prepared a circular letter to the Speakers of the other Colonies, enclosing to each a copy of the resolutions already left with their chairman to forward them by expresses.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. 1. 5.  FORD ED. 7.  (1821.)

The next event which excited our sympathies for Massachusetts, was the Boston port bill, by which that port was to be shut up on the 1st of June, 1774. This arrived while we [Virginia House of Burgesses] were in session in the spring of that year. The lead in the House, on these subjects, being no longer left to the old members, Mr. Henry, R. H. Lee, Francis L. Lee, and Mr. [Patrick] Henry, was accepted by the members. The resolutions of the House were recollected, and the proposition made, of voting to the measures which were boldly to take an unequivocal stand in the line with Massachusetts, determined to meet and consult on the proper measures in the council chamber, for the benefit of the library in that room. We were under conviction of the necessity of arousing our people from the lethargy into which they had fallen, as to passing events; and thought that the appointment of a day of general fasting and prayer would be most likely to call up and alarm their attention. No example of such a solemnity had existed since the days of our distresses in the war of ’55, since which a new generation had grown up. With the help, therefore, of Rushworth, whom we rummaged over for the revolutionary precedents and forms of the Puritans of that day, preserved by him, we cooked up a resolution, somewhat modernizing their phrases, for appointing the 1st day of June, on which the port bill was to commence, for a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, to implore Heaven to avert from us the evils of civil war, to inspire us with firmness in our measures, and not to turn the hearts of the King and Parliament to moderation and justice. To give greater emphasis to our proposition, we agreed to wait the next morning on Mr. [Robert] Nicholas, whose grave and religious character was more in unison with the tone of our resolution, and to solicit him to move it. We accordingly went to him in the morning. He moved it the same day; the 1st of June was proposed; and it passed without opposition. The Governor dissolved us as usual. * * We returned home, and in our several counties invited the clergy to meet assemblies of the people on the 1st of June to perform the ceremonies of the day, and to address to them discourses suitable to the effect of the day, the whole colony, was like a shock of electricity, arousing every man, and placing him erect and solidly on his centre.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. 1. 6.  FORD ED. 9.  (1821.)

The Governor dissolved us as usual. We retired to the Apollo, agreed to an association, and the resolution was recommitted to the committee of correspondence to the corresponding committees of the other Colonies, to appoint delegates to meet in Congress at such place, annually, as should be convenient, to direct, from time to time, the measures required by the general interest: and we declared that an attack on any one Colony, should be considered as an attack on the whole. This was in May [27, 1774]. We further recommended to the several counties to elect delegates to meet at Williamsburg, the 1st of August, ensuing, to consider the state of the Colony, and particularly to appoint delegates to a general Congress, should that measure be acceded to by the committees of correspondence generally. It was acceded to; Philadelphia was appointed for the place, and the 5th of September for the time of meeting.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY. 1. 7.  FORD ED. 11.  (1821.)

Respecting the question, whether Committees of Correspondence originated in Virginia or Massachusetts,* you suppose me to have claimed it for Virginia; but certainly I have never made such a claim. The idea, I suppose, has been taken up from what is said in Wirt’s Life of Patrick Henry, page 87, and from an inexact attention to its precise terms. It is there said, “this House (of Burgesses, of Virginia) had the merit of originating that powerful engine of resistance, Corresponding Committees between the Legislatures and the different Colonies”. That the fact, as here expressed is true, your letter bears witness, when it says, that the resolutions of Virginia, for this purpose, were transmitted to the speakers of the different legislatures, and laid, at the same time, before that body, who appointed a committee for the specified object: adding, “thus, in Massachusetts, there were two Committees of Correspondence, one chosen by the people, the other appointed by the House of Assembly; in the former, Massachusetts preceded Virginia; in the latter, Virginia preceded Massachusetts”. To the origination of committees for the interior correspondence between the counties and towns of a State, I know of no claim on the part of Virginia; and certainly none was ever made by myself. I perceive, however, one error, into which memory had led me. Our Committee for national correspondence, was appointed in March, '73, and I well remember, that going to Williamsburg, in the month of June following, Peyton Randolph, our chairman, told me that messengers bearing dispatches between the two States, had crossed each other by the way, that of Virginia carrying our propositions for a committee of national correspondence, and that of Massachusetts, bringing, as my memory suggested, a similar proposition. But here I must have misremembered; and the resolutions brought us from Massachusetts, were probably those you mention of the town-meeting of Boston, on the motion of Mr. Samuel Adams, appointing a committee "to state the rights of the colonists, and of that province in particular, and the infringements of them; to communicate them to the several towns, as the sense of the town of Boston, and to request, of each town, a free communication of its sentiments on the subject." I suppose, therefore, that these resolutions were not received, as you think, while the House of Burgesses was in session in March, 1773, but a few days after we rose, and were probably what was sent by the messenger, who crossed ours by the way. They may, however, have been still different. I must, therefore, have been mistaken in supposing, and stating to Mr. Wirt, that the proposition of a committee for national correspondence was nearly simultaneous in Virginia and Massachusetts.—To SAMUEL A. WELLS. i, 115. FORD ED., X. 127. (M., 1819.)

Resolved, That it be an instruction to the said deputies, when assembled in General Congress, with the deputies from the other States of British America, to propose to the said Congress, that a grand and important address be presented to his Majesty, as Chief Magistrate of the British Empire, the united complaints of his Majesty's subjects in America: complaints which are excited by many unwarrantable encroachments and usurpations, attempted to be made by the legislature of one part of the empire, upon the rights which God, and the laws have given equally and independently to all. To represent to his Majesty that these, his States, have often individually made humble application to his imperial throne, to obtain, through its intervention, such redress of their injured rights; to none of which was expedient justice done. Humbly to hope that the same considerations, the language of truth, and divested of those expressions of servility, which would persuade his Majesty that we are asking favors, and not rights, shall obtain from his Majesty a more respectful acceptance: and this his Majesty will think we have reason to expect, when he reflects that he is no more than the chief officer of the people, appointed by the laws, and circumscribed with definite powers, to assist in working the great machine of government, erected for their use, and, consequently, for their superstition; and, in order that these, our rights, as well as the invasions of them, may be laid more fully before his Majesty, to take a view of them, from the origin and first settlement of these countries.

To remind him that our ancestors, before their emigration to America, were the free inhabitants of the British dominions in Europe, and possessed a right, which nature has given to all men of departing from the country in which chance, not choice, has placed them of going in quest of new habitations, and of there establishing new societies, under such laws and regulations as to the happiness of those within the bounds of the same, and under this universal law, in like manner, left their native wilds and woods in the North of Europe, had possessed themselves of the Island of Britain, then less charged with inhabitants, and had established there that system of laws which has so long been the glory and protection of that country. Nor was ever any claim of superiority or dependence asserted over them, by that mother country from which they had migrated; and were such a claim made, it is believed his Majesty's subjects in Great Britain have too firm a feeling of the rights derived to them from their ancestors, to bow down the sovereignty of their State before such visionary pretensions.

And it is thought that no circumstance has occurred to distinguish, materially, the British from the Saxon emigration. America was conquered, and her settlements made and firmly established, at the expense of individuals, and not of the British public. Their own blood was spent in acquiring lands for their settlement, their own fortunes expended in making that settlement; and they have acquired by the lives they have lost, and by the exertions of individual ardor and fortitude, a territory which they have for themselves alone have right to hold. No shilling was ever issued from the public treasures of his Majesty, or his ancestors, for their assistance, till of very late times, after the Colonies had become established on a firm and permanent footing. That then, indeed, having become valuable to Great Britain for her commercial purposes, his Parliament was pleased to lend them assistance against an enemy who would fain have drawn to herself the benefits of their commerce, to the great aggrandizement of herself, and danger of Great Britain. Such assistance, and in such circumstances, they had often before been given to Portugal and other allied States, with whom they carry on a commercial intercourse. Yet these States never supposed, that by calling in her aid, they thereby submitted themselves to her sovereignty. Had such terms been proposed, they would have rejected them with disdain, and trusted for better, to the moderation of their enemies, or to a vigorous exertion of their own force. We do not, however, mean to underrate the rights or the advantages which Great Britain and her Saxon ancestors had to show that they cannot give a title to that authority which the British Parliament would arrogate over us; and that may amply be repaid by our giving to the inhabitants of Great Britain such exclusive privileges in trade as may be advantageous to them, and, at the same time, not too restrictive to ourselves. That settlement having been thus effected in the wilds of America, the emigrants thought proper to adopt that system of laws, under which they had hitherto lived in the mother country, and to continue their union with her, by submitting themselves to the same common sovereign, who was thereby made the central link, connecting the several parts of the empire thus newly multiplied.

But that not long were they permitted, however far they thought themselves removed from the hand of oppression, to hold undisturbed the rights thus acquired at the hazard of their lives and loss of their fortunes. A family of princes was then on the British throne, whose reasonable crimes against their people, brought on them, afterwards, the exertion of those sacred and sovereign rights of punishment, reserved in the hands of the people for cases of extreme necessity, and judged by the constitution unsafe to be delegated to any other judicature. While every day brought forth some new and unjustifiable exertion of power over their subjects on that side of the water, it was not to be expected that those here, much less able at that time to oppose the designs of despotism, should be exempted from injury. Accordingly, this country was invaded and fortuitous measures got up in Great Britain, by these Princes, several times, parted out and distributed among the favorites and followers of their fortunes; and, by an assumed right of the Crown alone, were erected into distinct and independent governments; a measure which, it is believed, his Majesty's prudence and understanding would prevent him from imitating at this day; as no exercise of such power, of dividing

*The Summary View was not written for publication. It was a draft I had prepared for a petition to the King, which I meant to propose in my place as a member of the convention of 1774. Being stopped on the road by sickness, I sent it on to the Speaker, who laid it on the table for the perusal of the members. It was thought too strong for the times, and to become the act of the convention, but was printed by subscrip-and dismembering a country, has ever occurred in his Majesty's realm of England, though now of very ancient standing; nor could it be justified or acquiesced under there, or in any part of his Majesty's government.

That the exercise of a free trade with all parts of the world, possessed by the American colonists, as of natural right, and which no law of their own had taken away or abridged, was next the object of unjust encroachment. Some of the colonies having thought proper to continue the administration of their government in the name and under the authority of his Majesty, King Charles the First, whom, notwithstanding his late deposition by the Commonwealth of England, they continued in the sovereignty of their State, the Parliament, for the Commonwealth, took the liberty of high offence, and assumed upon themselves the power of preventing their trade with all other parts of the world except the Island of Great Britain. This arbitrary act, however, they soon recalled, and by solemn treaty entered into on the 12th day of March, 1651, between the said Commonwealth, by their Commissioners, and the colony of Virginia by their House of Burgesses, it was expressly stipulated by the eighth article of the said treaty, that they should have " free trade as the people of England do enjoy to all places and with all nations, according to the laws of that Commonwealth?" But that, upon the restoration of his Majesty, King Charles the Second, their rights of free commerce fell once more a victim to arbitrary power, and by several acts of his reign, as well as of some of his successors, the trade of the colonies was laid under such restrictions, as show what hopes they might form from the justice of a British Parliament, were its uncontrollable power admitted over these States.* History has informed us, that bodies of men as well as individuals, are susceptible of the spirit of tyranny. A view of these acts of Parliament for regulation, as it has been affectedly called, of the American trade ground on which privileges were removed out of the case, would undeniably evince the truth of this observation. Besides the duties they impose on our articles of export and import, they prohibit our going to any markets Northward of Cape Finisterre, in the kingdom of Spain, for the sale of commodities which Great Britain will not take from us, and for the purchase of others, with which she cannot supply us; and that, for no other than the arbitrary purpose of purchasing for themselves, by a sacrifice of our rights and interests, certain privileges in their commerce with us who, in justice to Britain, might have seen that, their exclusive trade with America will be continued, while the principles and power of the British Parliament be the same, have indulged themselves in every exorbitance which their avarice could dictate or our necessity extort; have raised their commodities called for in America, to the double and treble of what they sold for, before such exclusive privileges were given them, and of what better commodities of the same kind would cost us elsewhere; and, at the same time, given us much less for what we carry thither, than might be had at more convenient ports. That these acts prohibit us from carrying, in quest of other purchasers, the surplus of our tobaccos, remaining after the consumption of Great Britain is supplied; so that we must leave them with the British merchant, for whatever he will please to allow us, to be by him re-shipped to foreign markets, where he will reap the benefits of making sale of them for full value.

That, to heighten still the idea of Parliamentary justice, and to show with what moderation they are like to exercise power, where themselves are to feel no part of its weight, we take leave to mention to his Majesty, certain other acts of the British Parliament, by which they would prohibit us from manufacturing, for our own use, the articles we raise on our own lands, with our own labor. By an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty, King George the Second, an American subject is forbidden to make a hat for himself, of the fur which he has taken, perhaps, on his own soil; an instance of despotism, to which no parallel can be produced in the most arbitrary frames of government. The same year, the fifth of the reign of King Charles the Second, one of the Articles of the treaty made, 34th Anne 6. 13 C. 2 C. 18. 15 C. 1 c. 11. 15 C. 2 C. 7. 7 W. M. C. 22. 11 W. 34 Anne 6 C. 2 C. 13. NOTE BY JEFFERSON.

This act also shows, that the British Parliament may prohibit us, to be by him re-shipped to foreign markets, where he will reap the benefits of making sale of them for full value. That, to heighten still the idea of Parliamentary justice, and to show with what moderation they are like to exercise power, where themselves are to feel no part of its weight, we take leave to mention to his Majesty, certain other acts of the British Parliament, by which they would prohibit us from manufacturing, for our own use, the articles we raise on our own lands, with our own labor. By an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty, King George the Second, an American subject is forbidden to make a hat for himself, of the fur which he has taken, perhaps, on his own soil; an instance of despotism, to which no parallel can be produced in the most arbitrary frames of government. Proceeding from this principle, that no act which, by either of the principles of those political principles, which exempt us from the jurisdiction of the British Parliament, and which in which we declare these acts void, is, that the British Parliament has no right to exercise authority over us.

That these exercises of usurped power have not been confined to instances alone, in which themselves were interested; but they have also intermeddled with the regulation of the internal affairs of the Colonies. The act of the 9th of Anne for establishing a post office in America, seems to have had little connection with British convenience, except that of accommodating his Majesty's ministers and favourites with the sale of a lucrative and easy office.

That thus we have hastened through the reigns which preceded his Majesty's, during which the violations of our rights were less alarming, because repeated at more distant intervals, than that rapid and bold succession of injuries, which is likely to distinguish the present from all other periods of American story. Scarcely have our minds been able to emerge from the astonishment into which one stroke of Parliamentary thunder has involved us, before another more heavy and more alarming is fallen on us. Single acts of tyranny may be ascribed to the accidental opinion of a day; but a series of oppressions, begun at a distinguished period, and pursued unalterably through every change of ministers, too plainly prove a deliberate, systematic plan of reducing us to slavery.

But that one other act passed in the same seventh year of his reign, having been a peculiar attempt, must ever require peculiar mention. It is entitled "An Act for the suppression of riots and tumults in the town of Boston 14 G. 3."

APPENDIX

One free and independent Legislature, hereby takes upon itself to suspend the powers of another, free and independent as itself; thus exhibiting a phenomenon unknown in nature, the creator and creature of its own power. Not only the principles of common sense, but the common feelings of human nature must be surrendered up, before his Majesty's subjects here, can be persuaded to believe that they hold their political existence at the will of a British Parliament. Shall these governments be dissolved, their property annihilated, and their people reduced to a state of nature, at the imperious breath of a body of men whom they never saw in whom they never confided, and over whom they have no powers of punishment or removal, let their crimes against the American public be ever so great? Can any one reason be assigned, why one hundred and sixty thousand electors in the island of Great Britain, should give law to four millions in the States of America, every individual of whom is equal to every individual of that body of strength to which they were subjected, instead of being a free people, as we have hitherto supposed, and mean to continue ourselves, we should suddenly be found the slaves, not of one, but of one hundred and sixty thousand tyrants; distinguished, too, from all others, by this singular circumstance, that they are removed from the reach of fear, the only restraining motive which may hold the hand of a tyrant.

That, by an Act 14 G. 3. to discontinue in such manner, and for such time as are therein mentioned, the right of discharging or suspending the importation of merchandise, at the town and within the harbor of Boston, in the province of Massachusets Bay, in North America, which was passed at the last session of the British Parliament, a large and populous town, whose trade was their sole subsistence, was deprived of that trade, and involved in utter ruin. Let us for a while, suppose the question of right suspended, in order to examine this act on principles of justice. An act of Parliament had been passed, imposing duties on tea, in the American colonies; but the masters of the East India Company, who, till that time, had never sent a pound of tea to America on their own account, step forth on that occasion, the asserters of Parliamentary right, and send hither many shiploads of that obnoxious commodity. The masters of their several vessels, however, on their arrival in America, wisely attended to admonition, and returned with their cargoes. In the province of New England alone, the remonstrances of the people were disregarded, and a compliance, after being many days waited for, was flatly refused. Whether on this, the master of the vessel was governed by his obstinacy, or his instructions, let those who know, say. There are extraordinary situations which require extraordinary interposition. An exasperated people, who feel that they possess power, are not easily restrained within limits strictly regular. A number of them assembled in the town of Boston, threw the tea into the ocean, and dispersed without doing any other act of violence. If in this they did wrong, the wrong is redressed by a quarter of the kingdom. But of other acts of that kind it would be objected, that they had ever, in any instance, been obstructed or diverted from the regular course, in favor of popular offenders. They should, therefore, have not been distrusted on this occasion. But that ill-fated colony had formerly been bold in their enmities against the house of Stuart, and were now devoted to ruin, by that unseen hand which governs the momentous affairs of this great empire, in which all local independences and many worthless ministerial dependents, went in a moment. It was constant office it had been to keep that government embroiled, and who, by their treacheries, hope to obtain the dignity of British knighthood, without calling for a party accused, without asking a proof, without attempting a distinction between the guilty and the innocent, the whole of that ancient and wealthy town, is in a moment reduced from opulence to beggary. Men who had spent their lives in extending the British commerce, who had invited, in that place, the wealth their honest endeavors had merited, found themselves and their families, thrown at once on the world for subsistence by its charities. Not the hundredth part of the inhabitants of that town, had been concerned in the act complained of; many of them were in Great Britain, and in other parts beyond sea; yet all were involved in one indiscriminate ruin, by a new executive power, unheard of till then, that of a British Parliament. A property of the value of many millions of money, was sacrificed to revenge, not repay, the large and thoughtless sums which the inhabitants of those towns had spent in maintaining a war in which they were not to be answered. And when is this tempest to be arrested in its course? Two wharves are to be opened again when his Majesty shall think proper; the residue, which lined the extensive shores of the bay of Boston, are forever interdicted the exercise of commerce. This little exception seems to have been thrown in for no other purpose, than that of setting a precedent for investigating his Majesty with legislative powers. If the pulse of his people shall beat calmly under this experiment, another and more extensive will be the result. It is customary, in nations of which the people, by common sense, to pretend that this exception was made, in order to restore its commerce to that great town. The trade, which cannot be received at two wharves alone, must of necessity be transferred to some other place; to which it will soon be followed by that of the two wharves. Considered in this light, it would be an insolent and cruel mockery at the annihilation of the town of Boston.

The act for the suppression of riots and tumults in the town of Boston 14 G. 3. passed also in the last session of Parliament, a murder committed there, is, if the Governor pleases, to be tried in the court of King's Bench, in the island of Great Britain, by a jury of Middlesex.

The witnesses, too, on receipt of such a sum as the Governor shall think it reasonable for them and succeeding kings have adopted the opinion of these unjust judges. Since the establishment, however, of the British constitution, at the glorious Revolution, on its free and ancient principles, neither his Majesty, nor his ancestors, have exercised such a power of dissolutions in the island of Great Britain; and when his Majesty was petitioned by the united voice of his subjects the first time, to dissolve a Parliament, who had continued in being, when his ministers were heard to declare, in open Parliament, that his Majesty possessed no such power by the constitution. But how different their language, and his practice, here! To declare, as their duty required, the known rights of their country, to oppose the usurpation of every foreign judicature, to disregard the imperious mandates of a minister or governor, have been the avowed causes of dissolving Houses of Representatives in America. But if such powers be really vested in his Majesty, as they have been heretofore placed to awe the members of that representative body, who their constituents, when they have notoriously made sale of their most valuable rights, when they have assumed to themselves powers which the people never put into their hands, then, indeed, their continuing in office becomes dangerous to the State, and calls for an exercise of the power of dissolution. Such being the case for which the representative body should, and should not, be dissolved, will it not appear strange, to an unbiases observer, that that of Great Britain, under a constitution, and with which this is so much in practice,

But your Majesty, or your Governors, have carried this power beyond every limit known or provided for by the laws. After dissolving one House of Representatives, they have refused to call another, so that, for a great length of time, the Legislature provided by the laws, has been out of existence. From the nature of things, every society must, at all times, possess within itself the sovereign powers of legislation. The feelings of human nature revolt against the idea of being subject to an unrepresented body of men. The sovereign rights of the dangers which, perhaps, threaten immediate ruin. While those bodies are in existence to whom the people have delegated the powers of legislation, they alone possess, and may exercise, those powers. But when they are dissolved, by the lopping off of one or more of their branches, the power reverts to the people, who may use it to unlimited extent, either assembling together in person, sending deputies, or in any other way they may think proper. We forbear to trace completely the effects of this principle, as practiced in Great Britain,

That we shall, at this time also, take notice of an error in the nature of our land holdings, which crept in at a very early period of our settlement. The introduction of the Feudal tenures into the kingdom of England, though ancient, is well enough understood to set this matter in a proper light. In the earlier ages of the Saxon settlement, feudal holdings were certainly altogether unknown, and very few, if any, had been introduced at the time of the Norman Conquest. Our Saxon ancestors held their lands, as they did their personal property, in absolute dominion, disencumbered with any superior, answering nearly to the nature of those possessions which the feudalist termed alodial. William the Norman, first introduced that system generally. The lands which had belonged to those who fell in the battle of Hastings, and in the subsequent insurrections of his reign, formed a considerable proportion of the lands of the whole kingdom. These he granted out, subject to feudal duties, as did he also those of a great number of his new subjects, who, by persuasions or threats, were induced to surrender them for that purpose. But still, much was left in the hands of his Saxon subjects, held of no superior, and not subject to feudal conditions. These, therefore, by express laws, enacted to render uniform the system of military defence, were made liable to the same military duties as if they had been feudals; and the Norman lawyers soon found means to saddle them, also, with the other feudal burdens. But still they had not been surrendered to the king, they were not derived from his grant, and therefore they were not liable to him. But, the general principle of treating them that they were "hold of the Crown," which was borrowed from those holdings which were truly feudal, and only applied to others for the purposes of illustration. Feudal holdings were, therefore, but exceptions out of the Saxon laws of possession, under which all lands were held in absolute right. These, therefore, still form the basis or groundwork of the Common law, to prevail wheresoever the exceptions have not taken place.

America was not conquered by William the Conqueror. When the Colonies were rendered to him, or any of his successors. Possessions there are, undoubtedly, of the alodial nature. Our ancestors, however, who migrated hither, were laborers, not lawyers. The fictitious principle, that all lands belong originally to the king, they were early persuaded to believe real, and accordingly took grants of their own lands from the Crown. And while the Crown continued to grant for small sums and on reasonable rents, there was no inducement to arrest the error, and lay it open to public view. But his Majesty has lately taken him to suspicion of a plot so situated of holding, to the double of what they were; by which means, the acquisition of lands being rendered difficult, the population of our country is likely to be checked. It is time, therefore, for us to lay this matter before his Majesty, and to de-clar, that he has no right to grant lands of himself. From the nature and purpose of civil institutions, all the lands within the limits, which any particular party has circumscribed around itself, are assumed by that party, and subject to their allotment; this may be done by themselves assembled collectively, or by their legislature, to whom they may have delegated sovereign authority; and, if they are allotted in neither of these ways, each individual of the society, may appropriate to himself such lands as he finds vacant, and occupancy will give him title.

That, in order to enforce the arbitrary measures before complained of, his Majesty has, from time to time, used monarchical measures, the bodies of armed forces, not made up of the people here, but raised by the authority of our laws. Did his Majesty possess such a right as this, it might swallow up all our other rights, whenever he should think proper. But his Majesty has no right to land a single armed man on our shores; and those whom he sends here are

* On further inquiry, I find two instances of dissolutions before the Parliament would, of itself, have been at an end, viz.: the Parliament called to meet August 24, 1698, was dissolved by King William, December 19, 1700, and a new one was called to meet February 6, 1701, which was also dissolved, November 11, 1701, and a new one met December 30, 1701.—Note by Jefferson.
liable to our laws, for the suppression and punishment of riots, routs, and unlawful assemblies, or are hostile bodies invading us in defiance of law. When, in the course of the late war, it became expedient that a body of Hanoverian troops should be brought over for the defence of Great Britain, his Majesty's grandfather, our late sovereign, did not pretend to introduce them under any authority he possessed. Such a measure would have given just alarm to his subjects of Great Britain, whose liberties would not be safe if armed men of another country, and of another spirit, might be brought into the realm at any time, without the consent of their legislature. He, therefore, applied to Parliament, who passed an act for that purpose, limiting the number to be brought in, and the time they were to continue. In like manner is his Majesty restrained in every part of the empire. He possesses indeed the executive power of the laws in every State; but they are the laws of the particular State, which he is to administer within that State, and not those of any one within the limits of another. Every State must judge for itself, the number of armed men which they may safely trust among them, of whom they are to consist, and under what restrictions they are to be laid. To render these proceedings still more criminal against our laws, instead of subjecting the military to the civil power, his Majesty has expressly made the civil subordinate to the military. But can his Majesty thus put down all law under his feet? Can he erect a power superior to that which erected himself? He has done it indeed by force; but let him remember that force cannot give right.

That these are our grievances, which we have thus laid before his Majesty, with that freedom of language and sentiment which becomes a free people, claiming their rights as derived from the laws of nature, and not as the gift of their Chief Magistrate. Let those flatter, who fear; it is not an American art. To give praise where it is not due might be well from the venal, but it would ill become those who are asserting the rights of human nature. They know, and will, therefore, say, that kings are the servants, not the proprietors of the people. Open your breast, Sire, to liberal and expanded thought. Let not the name of George the Third, be a blot on the page of history. You are surrounded by British counsellors, but remember that they are parties. You have no ministers for American affairs, because you have none taken from among us, nor amenable to the laws on which they are to give you advice. It behooves you, therefore, to think and to act for yourself and your people. The great principles of right and wrong are legible to every reader; to pursue them, requires not the aid of many counsellors. The whole art of government consists in the art of being honest. Only aim to do your duty, and mankind will give you credit where you fail. No longer persevere in sacrificing the rights of one part of the empire to the inordinate desires of another; but deal out to all equal and impartial right. Let no act be passed by any one legislature which may infringe on the rights and liberties of another. This is the important post in which fortune has placed you. holding the balance of a great, if a well-poised empire. This, Sire, is the advice of your great American council, on the observance of which may perhaps depend your felicity and future fame, and the preservation of that harmony which alone can continue, both to Great Britain and America, the reciprocal advantages of their connection. It is neither our wish nor our interest to separate from her. We are willing, on our part, to sacrifice everything which reason can ask, to the restoration of that tranquillity for which all must wish. On their part, let them be ready to establish union on a generous plan. Let them name their terms, but let them be just. Accept of every commercial preference it is in our power to give, for such things as we can raise for their use, or they make for ours. But let them not think to exclude us from going to other markets to dispose of those commodities which they cannot use, nor to supply those wants which they cannot supply. Still less, let it be proposed, that our properties, within our territories, shall be taxed or regulated by any power on earth, but our own. The God who gave us life, gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy, but cannot disjoin them.

This, Sire, is our last, our determined resolution. And that you will be pleased to interpose, with that efficacy which your earnest endeavors may insure, to procure redress of these our great grievances, to quiet the minds of your subjects in British America against any apprehensions of future encroachment, to establish fraternal love and harmony through the whole empire, and that may continue to the latest ages of time, is the fervent prayer of all British America.—i, 124. FORD ED., i, 426. (1774.)
A Declaration by the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled.

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature’s God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with [inherent and] inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, [begun at a distinguished period and] pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies: and such is now the necessity which constrains them to [expense] their former systems of government. The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of [unremitting] injuries and usurpations [among which appears no solitary fact to contradict the uniform tenor of the rest, but all have] in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world [for the truth of which we pledge a faith yet unsullied by falsehood.]

He has refused his consent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained; and, when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature, a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly [and continually] for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time after such dissolutions to cause others to be elected, whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise, the state remaining, in the meantime, exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass

*The parts struck out by Congress are printed in italics and enclosed in brackets those inserted by Congress are placed in the margin. In paragraph 2, line 2, the edition of JEFFERSON’S WRITINGS, printed by Congress, and also the FORD EDITION give “inalienable rights” as the text in the engrossed copy of the Declaration. In the first draft of the instrument Jefferson wrote “unalienable”, which he changed to “inalienable” in the draft reported to Congress. In the United States Statutes At Large the word is “inalienable”. The Hon. John Hay, Secretary of State, gives a certification of the text in the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 4, 1900.

JOHN P. FOLEY, Esq., Brooklyn, N. Y.: SIR—In response to your letter, * * * I have to advise you that the text of the Declaration of Independence (the original MS.) as signed by the delegates, reads, at the point of your inquiry—“unalienable rights”, while the text of Jefferson’s MS. draft, as amended in committee by Franklin and Adams, reads “inalienable rights”. The latter is the paper printed in Ford’s edition of Jefferson’s Writings, in fac simile. * * *

others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has [suffered] the administration of justice [totally to cease in some of these states] refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

He has made [our] judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices [by a self-assumed power], and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat up their substance.

He has kept among us in times of peace standing armies [and ships of war] without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitutions and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation for quartering large bodies of armed troops among us; for protecting them by a mock trial from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these States; for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world; for imposing taxes on us without our consent; for depriving us [ ] of the benefits of trial by jury; for transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offences; for abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries, so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these [states]; for taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments; for suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated government here [withdrawing his governors, and declaring us out of his allegiance and protection].

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation and tyranny already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy [ ] unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow citizens taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

He has [ ] endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions [of existence].

[He has incited treasonable insurrections of our fellow citizens, with the allurements of forfeiture and confiscation of our property.

He has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel powers, is the warfare of the Christian king of Great Britain. Determined to keep open a market where men should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or to restrain this execrable commerce.

And that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished dye, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them, by murdering the people upon whom he also obtruded them: thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another].

In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms: our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injuries.

A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a [ ] people [who mean to be free. Future ages will scarcely believe that the hardness of one man adventured, within the short compass of twelve years only, to lay a foundation so broad and disguised for tyranny over a people fostered and fixed in principles of freedom].

Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend [a] jurisdiction over [these our states]. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here [no one of which could warrant so strange a pretension: that these were effected at the expense of our own blood and treasure, unassisted by the wealth or the strength of Great Britain; that in constituting indeed our several forms of government, we had adopted one common king, thereby laying a foundation for perpetual league and amity with them; but that submission to their parliament was no part of our constitution, nor ever in idea, if history may be credited: and], we [ ] appealed to their native justice and magnanimity [as well as to] the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations which [were likely to] interrupt our connection and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity [and when occasions have been given them, by the regular course of their laws, of removing from their councils the disturbers of our harmony, they have, by their free election, re-established them in power. At this very time too, they are permitting their chief magistrate to send over not only soldiers of our common blood, but Scotch and foreign mercenaries to invade and destroy us. These facts have given the last stab to agonizing affection, and manly spirit bids us to renounce forever these unfeeling brethren. We must endeavor to forget our former love for them, and hold them as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends. We might have been a free and a great people together; but a communication of grandeur and of freedom, it seems, is below their dignity. Be it so, since they will have it. The road to happiness and to glory is open to us too. We will tread it apart from them, and], acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our [eternal] separation [ ]!

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America in General Congress assembled, do in the name, and by the authority of the good people of these [states reject and renounce all allegiance and subjection to the kings of Great Britain and all others who may hereafter claim by, through or under them; we utterly dissolve all political connection which may heretofore have subsisted between us and the people or parliament of Great Britain: and finally we do assert and declare these colonies to be free and independent states], and that as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do.

And for the support of this declaration, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America in General Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do in the name, and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do.

And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.—i, 19. FORD ED., ii, 42.
PREAMBLE TO THE VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION

Whereas, the delegates and representatives of the good people of Virginia, in convention assembled, on the twenty-ninth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, reciting and declaring, that whereas George the Third, King of Great Britain and Ireland, and Elector of Hanover, before that time intrusted with the exercise of the kingly office in the government of Virginia, had endeavored to pervert the same into a detestable and insupportable tyranny, by putting his negative on laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good; by denying his governors permission to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation for his assent, and when so suspended, neglecting to attend to them for many years; by refusing to pass certain other laws unless the persons to be benefited by them would relinquish the inalienable right of representation in the legislature; by dissolving legislative assemblies, repeatedly and continually, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions of the rights of the people; when dissolved by refusing to call others for a long space of time, thereby leaving the political system without any legislative head; by endeavoring to prevent the population of our country, and for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners; by keeping among us, in time of peace, standing armies and ships of war; by affecting to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power; by combining with others to subject us to a foreign jurisdiction, giving his assent to their pretended acts of legislation for quartering large bodies of armed troops among us; for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world; for imposing taxes on us without our consent; for depriving us of the benefit of trial by jury; for transporting us beyond the seas for trial for pretended offences; for suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever; by plundering our seas, ravaging our coasts, burning our towns, and destroying the lives of our people; by inciting insurrection of our fellow-subjects with the allurements of forfeiture and confiscation; by prompting our negroes to rise in arms among us—those very negroes whom, by an inhuman use of his negative, he had refused us permission to exclude by law; by endeavoring to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions of existence; by transporting hither a large army of foreign mercenaries to complete the work of death, desolation and tyranny, then already begun, with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy unworthy the head of a civilized nation; by answering our repeated petitions for redress with a repetition of our injuries; and finally, by abandoning the helm of government and declaring us out of his allegiance and protection—by which several acts of misrule, the government of this country, as before exercised under the crown of Great Britain, was totally dissolved—did, therefore, having maturely considered the premises, and viewing with great concern the deplorable condition to which this once happy country would be reduced unless some regular, adequate mode of civil policy should be speedily adopted, and in compliance with the recommendation of the general Congress, ordain and declare a form of government of Virginia.—Poore's Federal and State Constitutions.
DEBATES ON THE ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION

On Friday, July 12 [1776], the committee appointed to draw the Articles of Confederation reported them, and, on the 22d, the House resolved themselves into a committee to take them into consideration. On the 30th and 31st of that month, and 1st of the ensuing, those articles were debated which determined the proportion, or quota, of money which each state should furnish to the common treasury, and the manner of voting in Congress. The first of these articles was expressed in the original draught in these words: "Art. XI. All charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence, or general welfare, and allowed by the United States assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several colonies in proportion to the number of inhabitants of every age, sex, and quality, except Indians not paying taxes, in each colony, a true account of which, distinguishing the white inhabitants, shall be triennially taken and transmitted to the Assembly of the United States, as the law directs."

Mr. Chase moved that the quotas should be fixed, not by the number of inhabitants of every condition, but by that of the "white inhabitants." He admitted that taxation should be always in proportion to property, that this was, in theory, the true rule; but that, from a variety of difficulties, it was a rule which could never be adopted in practice. The value of the property in every State, could never be estimated justly and equally. Some other measure for the wealth of the State must therefore be devised, some standard referred to, which would be more simple. He considered the number of inhabitants as a tolerably good criterion of property, and that this might always be obtained. He therefore thought it the best mode which we could adopt, with one exception only: he observed that negroes are property, and as such, cannot be distinguished from the lands or personalities held in those States where there are few slaves; that the surplus of profit which a Northern farmer is able to lay by, he invests in cattle, horses, &c., whereas a Southern farmer does not. There is no more reason, therefore, for taxing the Southern States on the farmer's head, and on his slave's head, than the Northern ones on their farmers' heads and the heads of their cattle; that the method proposed would, therefore, tax the Southern States according to their numbers and their wealth conjunctly, while the Northern would be taxed on numbers only; that negroes, in fact, should not be considered as members of the State, more than cattle, and that they have no more interest in it.

Mr. John Adams observed, that the numbers of people were taken by this article, as an index of the wealth of the State, and not as subjects of taxation; that, as to this matter, it was of no consequence by what name you called your people, whether by that of freemen or of slaves; that in some countries the laboring poor were called freemen, in others they were called slaves; but that the difference as to the state was imaginary only. What matters it whether a landlord, employing ten laborers on his farm, gives them annually as much money as will buy them the necessaries of life, or gives them those necessaries at short hand? The ten laborers add as much wealth annually to the State, increase its exports as much in the one case as the other. Certainly five hundred freemen produce no more profits, no greater surplus for the payment of taxes, than five hundred slaves. Therefore, the State in which the laborers called freemen, should be taxed no more than that in which are those called slaves. Suppose by an extraordinary operation of nature or of law, one-half the laborers of a State could in the course of one night be transformed into slaves; would the State be made the poorer or the less able to pay taxes? That the condition of the laboring poor in most countries, that of the fishermen particularly of the Northern States, is as abject as that of slaves. It is the number of laborers which produces the surplus for taxation, and numbers, therefore, indiscriminately, are the fair index of wealth; that it is the use of the word "property" here, and its application to some of the people of the State, which produces the fallacy. How does the Southern farmer procure slaves? Either by importation or by purchase from other States. Whether he imports or adds to the number of slaves, and proportionately to its profits and abilities to pay taxes; if he buys from his neighbor, it is only a transfer of a laborer from one farm to another, which does not change the annual produce of the State, and therefore, should not change its tax; that if a Northern farmer works ten laborers on his farm, he can, it is true, invest the surplus of ten men's labor in cattle; but so may the Southern farmer, working ten slaves, that a State of one hundred thousand freemen can maintain their cattle, than one of one hundred thousand slaves. Therefore, they have no more of that kind of property; that a slave may indeed, from the custom of speech, be more properly called the wealth of his master, than the free laborer might be called the wealth of his employer; but as to the State, both were equally its wealth, and should, therefore, equally add to the quota of its tax.

Mr. Harrison proposed, as a compromise, that two slaves should be counted as one freeman. He affirmed that slaves did not pay the same tax in every State as freemen, and doubted if two effected more than was paid by the price of labor; the hire of a laborer in the Southern colonies being from 8 to £12, while in the Northern it was generally £4.

Mr. Wilson said, that if this amendment should take place, the Southern colonies would have all the benefit of slaves, whilst the Northern ones would bear the burthen: that slaves increase the profits of a State, which the Southern States mean to impose on the Northern, which of course fall so much the heavier on the Northern than the Southern; that as a State, they occupy the places of freemen, and eat their food. Dismiss your slaves, and freemen will take their places. It is our duty to lay every discouragement on the importation of slaves; but this amendment would give the jus trium liberorum to him who would import slaves; that other kinds of property were pretty equally distributed throughout the colonies; there were as many cattle, horses and sheep, in the South, as in the North; but not so slaves, because it has been observed that the Southern States have always been to make every farmer pay poll taxes upon all his laborers, whether they be black or white; and the practice of the Southern colonies has always been to make every farmer pay poll taxes upon all his laborers, whether they be black or white. He acknowledges, indeed, that freemen work the most; but they consume the most also. They do not produce a greater surplus for taxation. The slave is neither fed nor clothed so expenseively as a freeman. Again, white women are exempted from labor generally, but negro women are not. In this, then, the Southern States have an advantage as the article now stands. It has sometimes been said, that slavery is necessary, because the commodities they raise would be too dear for market if cultivated by freemen; but now it is said that the labor of the slave is the dearest.

Mr. Payne urged the original resolution of Congress, to proportion the quotas of the States to the numbers of their free inhabitants.

Dr. Witherspoon was of opinion, that the value of lands and houses was the best estimate of the wealth of a nation, and that it was practicable to obtain such a valuation. This is the true barometer of wealth. The one now proposed is imperfect in itself, and unequal between the States. It has been objected that negroes eat the food of freemen, and, therefore, should be taxed; horses also eat the food of freemen; therefore they also should be taxed. It has been said too, that in carrying slaves into the estimate of the taxes the State is to pay, we do no more than the States in Greece, between whom, an always take slaves; the latter, had made the objection which the individual is to pay. But the cases are not parallel. In the Southern colonies, slaves are the whole colony; but they do not pervade the whole continent. That as to the original resolution of Congress, to proportion the quotas according to the souls, it was temporary only, and related to the moneys heretofore emitted: whereas we are now entering into a new compact, and therefore stand on original ground.

The question, in what proportions the amendment proposed was rejected by the votes of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, against those of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina. Georgia was divided.

The other article was in these words. "Art. XVII. In determining questions, each colony shall have one vote."

July 3, 1787. Present forty-one members. Mr. Chase observed this article was the most likely to divide us, of any one proposed in the draught then under consideration: that the larger colonies had threatened they would not confederate at all, if their weight in Congress should not be equal to the numbers of people they added to the confederacy; while the smaller ones declared against a union, if they did not retain an equal vote for the protection of their rights. That it was of the utmost consequence to bring the parties together, as, should we sever from each other, either no foreign power will ally with us at all, or the different States will form different alliances, and thus increase the horrors of those scenes of civil war, and bloodshed which in such a state of separation and independence, would render us a miserable people. That our interests, our peace required that we should confederate, and that mutual sacrifices should be made to effect a compromise of this difficult question. He was of opinion, the smaller colonies would lose their rights, if they were not in some instances allowed an equal vote; and, therefore, that a discrimination should take place among the questions. He concluded that as the States of the confederacy would confederate in some questions concerning life or liberty, and the greater ones, in all respecting property. He therefore, proposed, that in votes relating to money, the voice of each colony should be proportioned to the number of its inhabitants.

Dr. Franklin thought, that the votes should be so proportioned in all cases. He took notice that the Delaware counties had bound up their delegates to disagree to this article. He thought it necessary extraordinary language to be held by any State, that they would not confederate with us, unless we would let them dispose of our money. Certainly, if we vote equally, we ought to pay equally; but the smaller States will hardly purchase the privilege at this price. That had he lived in a State where the representation, originally equal, had become unequal by time and accident, he might have submitted rather than disturb government; but that we should be very wrong to set out in this practice, when it is in our power to establish what is right. That at the time of the formation of the Constitution of the United States, it was the object of the convention who drew it, and the smaller States now do; but experience had proved that no unfairness had ever been shown them: that their advocates had prognosticated that it would again happen, as in times of old, that the whale would swallow Jonas, but he thought the prediction reversed in event, and that Jonas had swallowed the whale; for the Scotch had in fact got possession of the government, and gave laws to the English. He reproved the original agreement of Congress to vote by colonies, and, therefore, was for their voting, in all cases, according to the number of taxables.

Dr. Witherspoon opposed every alteration of the article. All men admit that a confederacy is necessary. Should the idea get abroad that there is likely to be no union among us, it will damp the minds of the people, diminish the glory of our struggle, and lessen its importance; because it will open to our view future prospects of war and dissension among ourselves. If an equal vote be refused, the smaller States will become vassals to the larger; and all experience has shown that the vassals, like the Helots of Sparta, and the provinces of Rome. He observed that foreign powers, discovering this blemish, would make it a handle for disengaging the smaller States from so unequal a confederacy. That the colonies should in fact be considered as individuals; and that, as such, in all disputes, they should have an equal vote: that they are now collected as individuals, making a bargain with each other, and, of course, had a right to vote as individuals. That in the East India Company they voted by persons, and not by their proportion of stock. That the injuries of war the smaller States were as much interested as the larger, and therefore, should vote equally; and indeed, that the larger States were more likely to bring war on the confederacy, in proportion as their frontier was more extensive. He admitted that equality of representation was an excellent principle, but then it must be of things which are co-ordinate; that is, of things similar, and of the same nature: that nothing relating to individuals could ever confederate without respect to persons, with respect to persons, to be distinct and separate, independent and a federal union. The union of England was an incorporating one; yet Scotland had suffered by that union; for that its inhabitants were drawn from it by the hopes of places and employments; nor was it an instance of equality of representation; because, while Scotland was allowed nearly a thirteenth of representation, they were to pay only one-fourth of the land tax. He expressed his hopes, that in the present enlightened state of men's minds, we might expect a lasting confederacy, if it was founded on fair principles.
John Adams advocated the voting in proportion to numbers. He said that we stand here as the representatives of the people: that in some States the people are many, in others they are few; that therefore, their vote here should be proportioned to the numbers from whom it comes. Reason, justice and equity never had weight enough on the face of the earth, to govern the councils of men. It is interest alone which does it, and it is interest alone which can be trusted: that the bargain together. Thequestion is not what we the mathematical representation of interests without doors: that the individuality of the colonies is a mere sound. Does the individuality of a colony increase its wealth or numbers? If it does, pay equally. If it does not add weight in the scale of the confederacy, it cannot add to their rights, nor weigh in argument. A. has £50, B. £500, C. £1000 in partnership. Is it just they should equally dispose of the moneys of the partnership? It has been said, we are independent individuals making a bargain together. The question is not what we the mathematical representation of interests without doors: that the individuality of the colonies is a mere sound. Does the individuality of a colony increase its wealth or numbers? If it does, pay equally. If it does not add weight in the scale of the confederacy, it cannot add to their rights, nor weigh in argument.

Dr. Rush took notice, that the decay of the liberties of the Dutch republic proceeded from three causes. 1. The perfect unanimity requisite on all occasions. 2. Their obligation to consult their constituents. 3. Their voting by provinces. This last destroyed the equality of representation, and the liberties of Great Britain also are sinking from the same defect. That a part of our rights is deposited in the hands of our legislatures. There, it was admitted, there should be an equality of representation. Another part of our rights is deposited in the hands of Congress: why is it not equally necessary there should be an equal representation there? Were it possible to collect the whole body of the people together, they would determine the questions submitted to them by their majority. Why should not the same majority decide when voting here, by their representatives? The larger colonies are so providentially divided in situation, as to render every fear of their combining visionary. Their interests are different, and their circumstances dissimilar. It is more probable they will become rivals, and leave it in the power of the smaller States to give preponderance to any scale they please. The voting by the number of free inhabitants, will have one excellent effect, that of inducing the colonies to discourage slavery, and to encourage the increase of their free inhabitants.

Mr. Hopkins observed, there were four larger, four smaller, and four middle-sized colonies. That the four largest would contain more than half the inhabitants of the confederated States, and therefore, would govern the others as they should please. That history affords no instance of such a thing as equal representation. The Germanic body votes by States. The Helvetic body does the same; and so does the Belgic confederacy. That too little is known of the ancient confederations, to say what was their practice.

Mr. Wilson thought, that taxation should be in proportion to wealth, but that representation should accord with the number of freemen. That government is a combination or result of the will of the people which will or ought to be perfect; and that, so far as it departs from this, it becomes imperfect. It has been said that Congress is a representation of States, not of individuals. I say, that the objects of its care are all the individuals of the States. It is strange that annexing the name of “State” to ten thousand men, should give them an equal right with forty thousand. This must be the effect of magic, not of reason. As to those matters which are referred to Congress, we are not so many States; we are one large State. We lay aside our individuality, whenever we come here. The Germanic body is a burlesque on government; and their practice, on any point, is a sufficient authority and proof that it is wrong. The greatest imperfection in the constitution of the Belgian confederacy is their voting by provinces. The interest of the whole is constantly sacrificed to that of the small States. The history of the war in the reign of Queen Anne sufficiently proves this. It is asked, shall nine colonies put it into the power of four to govern them as they please? I invent the question, and ask, shall two millions of people put it in the power of one million to govern them as they please? It is pretended, too, that the smaller colonies will be in danger from the greater. Speak in honest language and say, the minority will be in danger from the majority. And is there an assembly on earth, where this danger may not be equally pretended? The truth is, that our proceedings will then be consonant with the interests of the majority, and so they ought to be. The probability is much greater, that the larger States will disagree, than that the smaller, on which earth, which shall be for the interests of Virginia, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, and which will not also be for the interest of the other States.

These articles, reported July 12, '76, were debated from day to day, and time to time, for two years, were ratified July 9, '78, by ten States, by New Jersey on the 26th of November of the same year, and by Delaware on the 29th of December following. Maryland alone held off two years more, according to them March 1, '80, and thus closing the obligation.—i. 26. Ford ed., i. 38.
A BILL FOR ESTABLISHING RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

SECTION I. Well aware that the opinions and belief of men depend not on their own will, but follow involuntarily the evidence proposed to their minds; that Almighty God hath created the mind free, and manifested His supreme will that free it shall remain by making it altogether insusceptible of restraint; that all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burthens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy Author of our religion, who being Lord both of body and mind, yet chose not to propagate it by coercions on either, as was in his Almighty power to do, but to exalt it by its influence on reason alone; that the impious presumption of legislature and ruler, civil as well as ecclesiastical, who, being themselves but fallible and uninspired men, have assumed dominion over the faith of others, setting up their own opinions and modes of thinking as the only true and infallible, and as such endeavoring to impose them on others, hath established and maintained false religions over the greatest part of the world, and through all time; That to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves and abhors is sinful and tyrannical; that even the forcing him to support this or that teacher of his own religious persuasion, is depriving him of the comfortable liberty of giving his contributions to the particular pastor whose morals he would make his pattern, and whose powers he feels most persuasive to righteousness; and is withdrawing from the ministry those temporary rewards, which, proceeding from an approbation of their personal conduct, are an additional incitement to earnest and unremitting labors for the instruction of mankind, that our civil rights have no dependence on our religious opinions, any more than our opinions in physics or geometry; and therefore the proscribing any citizen as unworthy the public confidence by laying upon him an incapacity of being called to office of trust or emolument, unless he profess or renounce this or that religious opinion, is depriving him injudiciously of those privileges and advantages to which, in common with his fellow citizens, he has a natural right; that it tends also to corrupt the principles of that very religion it is meant to encourage, by bribing with a monopoly of worldly honors and emoluments, those who will externally profess and conform to it; that though indeed these are criminals who do not withstand such temptation, yet neither are those innocent who lay the bait in their way; that the opinions of men are not the object of civil government, nor under its jurisdiction; that to suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion, and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles on supposition of their ill tendency is a dangerous fallacy which at once destroys all religious liberty, because he being of course judge of that tendency, will make his opinions the rule of judgment, and approve or condemn the sentiments of others only as they shall square with or differ from his own; that it is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order; and finally, that truth is great and will prevail if left to herself; that she is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error, and has nothing to fear from the conflict unless, by human interposition, disarmed of her natural weapons, free argument and debate; errors ceasing to be dangerous when it is permitted freely to contradict them:

SECT. II. We, the General Assembly of Virginia, do enact that no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burthened in his body or goods, or shall otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief; but that all men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinions in matters of religion, and that the same shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect their civil capacities.

SECT. III. And though we well know that this Assembly, elected by the people for the ordinary purposes of legislation only, have no power to restrain the acts of succeeding Assemblies, constituted with powers equal to our own, and that, therefore, to declare this act to be irrevocablce would be of no effect in law; yet we are free to declare, and do declare, that the rights hereby asserted are of the natural rights of mankind, and that if any act shall be hereafter passed to repeal the present or to narrow its operations, such act shall be an infringement of natural right.—viii, 454. Ford ed., ii, 237. (1786.)
KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS

1. Resolved, That the several States composing the United States of America, are not united on the principle of unlimited submission to their General Government; but that, by a compact under the style and title of a Constitution for the United States, and of Amendments thereto, for special purposes,—delegated to that government certain definite powers, reserving, each State to itself, in its Federal capacity, all other powers, vested in its own self-government; and that whenever the General Government assumes undelegated powers, its acts are unauthoritative, void, and of no force: that to this compact each State acceded as a State, and is an integral party, its co-States forming, as to itself, the other party: that the Government created by this compact was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself; since that would have made its discretion, and not the Constitution, the measure of its powers: that for all other purposes, and in the powers having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as of the mode and measure of redress.

2. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States, having delegated to Congress a power to punish treason, counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States, piracy, and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations, and no other crimes whatsoever; and it being true as a general principle, and one of the amendments to the Constitution having also declared, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people", therefore the act of Congress, passed on the 14th day of July, 1798, and intituled "An Act in addition to the act intituled 'An Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States'", as also the act passed by them on the 25th day of June, 1789, intituled "An Act to punish frauds committed on the Bank of the United States", and all their other acts which assume to create, define, or punish crimes, other than those so enumerated in the Constitution, are altogether void, and of no force: that the power to create, define, and punish such other crimes is reserved, and, of right, appertains solely and exclusively to the respective States, each within its own territory.

3. Resolved, That it is true as a general principle, and is also expressly declared by one of the amendments to the Constitution, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people"; and that no power over the freedom of religion, freedom of speech, or freedom of the press being delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, all lawful powers respecting the same did of right remain, and were reserved to the States or the people; that thus was manifested their determination to retain to themselves the right of judging how far the licentiousness of speech and of the press may be abridged without lessening their useful freedom, and how far those abuses which cannot be separated from their use should be tolerated, rather than the use be destroyed. And thus also they guarded against all abridgment by the United States of the freedom of religious opinions and exercises, and retained to themselves the right of protecting the same, as this State, by a law passed on the general demand of its citizens, had already provided for the human constraint of interference. And that in addition to this general principle and express declaration, another and more special provision has been made by one of the amendments to the Constitution, which expressly declares, that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press"; thereby guarding in the same sentence, and under the same words, the freedom of religion, of speech, and of the press, as an exercise thereof: that this never was thrown down vol. xxii. the sanctuary which covers the others, and that libels, falsehoods, and defamation, equally with heresy and false religion, are withheld from the cognizance of Federal tribunals. That, therefore, the act of Congress of the United States, passed on the 14th day of July, 1798, intituled "An Act in addition to the act intituled 'An Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States'" which does abridge the freedom of the press, is not law, but is altogether void, and of no force.

4. Resolved, That alien friends are under the jurisdiction of the United States, and not of the States, in all cases whatever; that Congress, have the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution; and that in the exercise of that power for the year 1798, it passed an act intituled "An Act concerning aliens", which assumes powers over alien friends, not delegated by the Constitution, is not law, but is altogether void, and of no force.

5. Resolved, That in addition to the general principle, as well as the express declaration, that powers not delegated are reserved. another and more special provision, inserted in the Constitution from abundant caution, has declared that the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to bind themselves, by the Congress prior to the year 1808"; that this Commonwealth does admit the migration of alien friends, described as the subject of the said act concerning aliens: that a provision against prohibiting their migration, is a provision against all acts equivalent thereto, or it would be nugatory: that to remove them when migrated, is equivalent to a prohibition of their migration, and is, therefore, contrary to the said provision of the Constitution; and that, among other things, committed of the Commonwealth, on his failure to obey the simple order of the President to depart out of the United States, as is undertaken by said act intituled "An Act concerning aliens" is contrary to the Constitution, one amendment to which has provided that "no person shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law"; and that another having provided that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence", the same act, undertaking to authorize the President to remove a person out of the United States, who is under the protection of the law, on his own suspicion, without accusation, without jury, without public trial, without confrontation of the witnesses against him, without hearing witnesses in his favor, without defence, without counsel, is contrary to the provision also of the Constitution, is therefore not law, but utterly void, and of no force: that transferring the power of judging any person, who is under the protection of the laws, from the courts to the President, the united States, or any of the States, is expressly prohibited by the article of the Constitution which provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in courts, the judges of which shall hold their offices during good behavior"; and that the said act is void for that reason also. And it is further to be noted, that this transfer of judiciary power is to that magistrate of the General Government who already possesses all the Executive and a negative on all Legislative powers.

8. Resolved, That a committee of conference and correspondence be appointed, who shall have the charge to communicate the preceding resolutions to the Legislatures of the several States: to assure them that this Commonwealth continues in the same esteem of their friendship and union which it has manifested from that moment at which a common danger first suggested a common union: that it considers union, for specified national purposes, and particularly those specified in their late Federal compact, to be friendly to the peace, happiness and prosperity of all the States; that faithful to that compact, according to the plain intent and meaning in which it was understood and accepted by the several parties, it continues to consider that it does also believe, that to take from the States all the powers of self-government and transfer them to a general and consolidated government, without regard to the special delegations and reservations solemnly agreed to in that compact, is not for the peace, happiness or prosperity of these States; and that, therefore, this Commonwealth is determined, as it doubts not its co-States are, to submit to undegraded, and consequently unlimited powers in no man, or body of men on earth: that in cases of an abuse of the delegated powers, the members of the General Government, being chosen by the people, would be the best means of redress of a constitutional remedy; but, where powers are assumed which have not been delegated, a nullification of the act is the rightful remedy; that every State has a natural right in cases not within the compact (casus non faderis), to nullify of their own authority all assumptions of power by others within their limits: that without this right, they would be under the dominion, absolute and unlimited, of whosoever might exercise this right of judgment for them: that nevertheless, this Commonwealth, from motives of the public good, is now resolved and determined, for the better vindication of their rights, to bring the subject to a final determination. And the further resolution is, that the Commonwealth, in order to satisfy the President and the citizens of the United States, that they have no design to infringe any right, or commit any act for which they have no authorization in the Constitution as cognizable by them; that they may transfer its cognizance to the President, or any other person, who may himself be the accused, counsel, judge, and jury, whose suspicions may be the evidence, his order the sentence, his officer the executioner, and his breast the sole record of the transaction: that a very numerous and valuable description of the inhabitants of these States being, by this precedent, reduced, as outlaws, to the absolute dominion of one man, and the barrier of the Constitution thus swept away from us all, no rampart now remains against the passions and the powers of a majority in Congress to protect from a like exportation, or other more grievous punishment, the minority of the same body, the legislators, judges, governors, and councillors of the States, nor their other peaceable inhabitants, who may venture to reclaim the constitutional rights and liberties of the States and people, or who for other causes, good or bad, may be obnoxious to the views, or marked by the suspicions of the President, or be thought dangerous to his or their personal safety; but the citizen will then, by the advice of the President, be made to suffer the severest punishment, even in their own person: that the friendless alien has indeed been selected as the safest subject of a first experiment; but the citizen will soon follow, or rather, has already followed, for already has a Sedition Act marked him as its prey; that these and successive acts of the same character, unless arrested at the threshold, necessarily drive these States into revolution and blood, and will furnish new calumnies against republican government, and new pretexts for those who wish it to be believed that man cannot be governed but by a rod of iron; that it would be the most dangerous of all punishments, when the confidence in the men of our choice to guard our rights, is translated into the assurance of despotic—free government is founded in jealousy, and not in confidence: it is jealousy and not confidence which preserves limited constitutions, to bind down those whom we are obliged to trust with power: that our Constitution has accordingly fixed the limits to which, and no further, our confidence may go; and let the honest advocate of confidence read the Alien and Sedition Acts, and say if the Constitution has not been wise in fixing limits to the government it created, and whether we should be wise in destroying those limits. Let him say what the government is, if it be not a tyranny, which the men of our choice have conferred on our President, and the President of our choice has assented to, and accepted over the friendly strangers to whom the mild spirit of our country and its laws have pledged hospitality and protection: that the men of our choice have more respected the bare suspicions of the President, than the solid right of innocence, the claims of justification, the sacred force of truth, and the forms and substance of law and justice. In questions of power, then, let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution. That this Commonwealth does, therefore, call on its co-States for an expression of their sentiments on the acts concerning aliens, and for the punishment of certain crimes herein before specified, plainly declaring whether these acts are or are not authorized by the Federal compact. And it doubts not that their sense will be so announced as to prove their attachment unaltered to limited government, whether general or particular. And that the rights and liberties of their co-States will be exposed to no dangers by remaining embarked in a common bottom with their own. That they will concur with this Commonwealth in considering the said acts as so palpably against the Constitution as to amount to an undisguised declaration that that compact is not meant to be the measure of the powers of the General Government, but that it will proceed in the exercise over these States, of all powers whatsoever: that they will view this as seizing the rights of the States, and consolidating them in the hands of the General Government, with a power assumed to bind the States (not merely in the cases made Federal (casus foederis) but) in all cases whatsoever, by laws made, not with their consent, but by others against their consent; that this would be to surrender the form of government we have chosen, and live under one deriving its powers from its own will, and not from our authority; and that the co-States, recurring to their natural right in cases not made Federal, will concur in declaring these acts void, and of no force, and will each take measures of its own for providing that neither these acts, nor any others of the General Government not plainly and intentionally authorized by the Constitution, shall be exercised within their respective territories.

9. Resolved, That the said committee be authorized to communicate by writing or personal conferences, at any times or places whatever, with any person or persons who may be appointed by any one or more co-States to correspond or confer with them; and that they lay their proceeding before the next session of Assembly.—ix, 464. FORD ED., vii, 289. (1798.)
First Inaugural Address
March 4, 1801

Friends and fellow-citizens:

Called upon to undertake the duties of the first executive office of our country, I avail myself of the presence of that portion of my fellow-citizens which is here assembled, to express my grateful thanks for the favor with which they have been pleased to look toward me, to declare a sincere consciousness that the task is above my talents, and that I approach it with those anxious and awful presentiments which the greatness of the charge and the weakness of my powers so justly inspire. A rising nation, spread over a wide and fruitful land; traversing all the seas with the productions of their industry; in commerce with nations who feel power and forget right; advancing rapidly to destinies beyond the reach of mortal eye,—when I contemplate these transcendent objects, and see the honor, the happiness, and the hopes of this beloved country committed to the issue and the auspices of this day, I shrink from the contemplation, and humble myself before the magnitude of the undertaking. Utterly, indeed, should I despair, did not the presence of many whom I here see remind me that in the other high authorities provided by our Constitution I shall find resources of wisdom, of virtue, and of zeal, on which to rely under all difficulties. To you, then, gentlemen, who are charged with the sovereign functions of legislation, and to those associated with you, I look with encouragement for that guidance and support which may enable us to steer with safety the vessel in which we are all embarked, amid the conflicting elements of a troubled world.

During the contest of opinion through which we have passed, the animation of discussion and of exactions has sometimes not from birth but from improvement, and the sense of them: enlightened by a benign religion, professed, indeed, and practiced in various forms, yet all of them inculcating honesty, truth, temperance, gratitude, and the love of man; acknowledging and adoring an overruling Providence, which, by all its dispensations, proves that it delights in the happiness of man here, and his greater happiness hereafter; with all these blessings, what more is necessary to make us a happy and prosperous people? Still one thing more, fellow-citizens,—a wise and frugal Government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, which shall leave them liberally to pursue their own interests in ways which will not be injurious to the community, and shall be arrived at in the quiet and fair progress of opinion, and truth, and justice, and virtue, shall try experiment, shall correct error by patient experiments, shall correct error by patient experiments, shall correct error by patient experiments, shall correct error by patient experiments, shall correct error by patient experiments.

Let us then, with a courage and confidence, pursue our own federal and republican principles, our attachment to our Union and representative government. Kindly separated by nature and a wide ocean from the exterminating havoc of one quarter of the globe; too high-minded to endure the degradations of the others; possessing a chosen country, with room enough for our descendants to the hundredth and thousandth generation; entertaining a due sense of our equal right to the use of our own faculties, to the acquisitions of our industry, to honor and confidence from our fellow-citizens, resulting not from birth, but from acquisitions, and the sense of them: enlightened by a benign religion, professed, indeed, and practiced in various forms, yet all of them inculcating honesty, truth, temperance, gratitude, and the love of man; acknowledging and adoring an overruling Providence, which, by all its dispensations, proves that it delights in the happiness of man here, and his greater happiness hereafter; with all these blessings, what more is necessary to make us a happy and prosperous people? Still one thing more, fellow-citizens,—a wise and frugal Government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, which shall leave them liberally to pursue their own interests in ways which will not be injurious to the community, and shall be arrived at in the quiet and fair progress of opinion, and truth, and justice, and virtue, shall try experiment, shall correct error by patient experiments, shall correct error by patient experiments, shall correct error by patient experiments, shall correct error by patient experiments, shall correct error by patient experiments.

About to enter, fellow-citizens, on the exercise of duties which comprehend every thing dear and valuable to you, it is proper that you should understand what I deem the essential principles of our Government, and, consequently, those which ought to shape its administration. I will confine myself within the narrow limits of the inquiry into that, which is the great purpose of all its limitations. Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none; the support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the safest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; a jealous care of the right of election by the people, a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped by the sword of revolution, where peaceable remedies are unprovided; absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority,— the vital principle of republics, from which is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism; a well-disciplined militia,— our best reliance in peace and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority; economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts and sacred preservation of the public faith; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid; the diffusion of information and arraignment of all abuses at the bar of public reason; freedom of religion; freedom of the press; freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected. These principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us, and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation. The wisdom of our sages and the blood of our heroes have been devoted to their attainment. They should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civic instruction, the touch-stone by which to try the services of those we trust; and should we wander from them in moments of error or of alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps, and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.

I repair, then, fellow-citizens, to the post you have assigned me. With experience enough in subordinate offices to have seen the difficulties of this, the greatest of all, I have learned to expect that it will rarely fail to the lot of imperfect man to retire from this station with the reputation and the favor which bring him into it. Without pretensions to that high confidence reposed in our first and greatest revolutionary character, whose pre-eminent services had entitled him to the first place in his country's love, and destined for him the fairest page in the volume of faithful history, I ask so much confidence only as may give firmness and effect to the legal administration of your affairs. I shall often go wrong, through defect of judgment. When right, I shall often be thought wrong by those whose positions will not command a view of the whole ground. I ask your indulgence for my own errors, which will never be intentional; and your support against the errors of others, who may condemn what they would not if seen in all its parts. The approbation implied by your suffrage is a consolation to me for the past; and my future solicitude will be to retain the good opinion of those who have bestowed it in advance, to conciliate that of others by doing them all the good in my power, and to be instrumental to the happiness and freedom of all.

Relying, then, on the patronage of your good will, I advance with obedience to the work, ready to retire from it whenever you become sensible how much better choice it is in your power to make. And may that Infinite Power which rules the destinies of the universe, lead our councils to what is best, and give them a favorable issue for your peace and prosperity.— viii, i. FORD ED., viii, 1. (March 4, 1801.)
Proceeding, fellow-citizens, to that qualification which the Constitution requires before my entrance on the charge again conferred upon me, it is my duty to express the deep sense I entertain of this new proof of confidence from my fellow-citizens at large, and the zeal with which it inspires me so to conduct myself as may best satisfy their just expectations.

On taking this station, on a former occasion, I declared the principles on which I believed it my duty to administer the affairs of our commonwealth. My conscience tells me that I have, on every occasion, acted up to that declaration, according to its obvious import, and to the understanding of every candid mind.

In the transaction of your foreign affairs, we have endeavored to cultivate the friendship of all nations, especially those with which we have the most important relations. We have done them justice on all occasions, favor where favor was lawful, and cherished mutual interests and intercourse on fair and equal terms. We are firmly convinced, and we act on that conviction, that with nations, as with individuals, our interests soundly calculated, will ever be found inseparable from our moral duties; and history bears witness to the fact, that a just nation is taken on its word, when recourse is had to armaments and wars to bridge others.

At home, fellow-citizens, you best know whether we have done well or ill. The suppression of unnecessary offices, of useless establishments and expenses, enabled us to discontinue our internal taxes. These, covering our land with officers, and opening our doors to their intrusions, had already begun that process of domiciliary vexation, which, once entered, is scarcely to be restrained from reaching, successively, every article of produce and property. If, among these taxes some minor ones fell which had not been inconvenient, it was because their amount would not have paid the officers who collected them, and because, if they had any merit, the State authorities might adopt them instead of others less approved.

The remaining revenue, on the consumption of foreign articles, is paid cheerfully by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts. Being collected on our seaboard and frontiers only, and incorporated with the transactions of our mercantile citizens, it may be the pleasure and pride of an American to ask, what farmer, what mechanic, what laborer, even the tax-gatherer of the United States? These contributions enable us to support the current expenses of the Government; to fulfill contracts with foreign nations; to extinguish the native right of soil within our limits; to extend those limits; and to apply such a surplus to our public debts as places at a short day their final redemption; and, that redemption once effected, the revenue thereby liberated may, by a just partition among the States, and a corresponding amendment of the Constitution, be applied, in time of peace, to rivers, canals, roads, arts, manufactures, education, and other great objects, within each State. In time of war, if injustice by ourselves or others must sometimes produce war, increased, as the same revenue will be increased by population and consumption, and aided by other resources reserved for that crisis, it may meet, within the year all the expenses of the year, without encroaching on the rights of future generations, by burdening them with the debts of the past. War will then be but a suspension of useful works; and a return to a state of peace, a return to the progress of improvement.

I have said, fellow-citizens, that the income reserved has enabled us to extend our limits; but that extension may possibly pay for itself before we are called on, and, in the mean time, may keep down the accruing interest; in all events, it will repay the advances we have made. I know that the acquisition of Louisiana has been disapproved by some, from a candid apprehension that the enlargement of our territory would endanger its union. But who can limit the extension of our federal union? When a single State, instead of the present thirteen, shall be added to our Confederacy, the less will it be shaken by local passions; and, in any view, is it not better that the opposite bank of the Mississippi should be settled by our own brethren and children, than by strangers of another family? With which shall we be most likely to live in harmony and friendly intercourse?

In matters of religion, I have considered that its free exercise is placed by the Constitution independent of the powers of the General Government. I have therefore undertaken, on no occasion, to prescribe the religious exercises suited to it, but have left them as the Constitution found them, under the direction and discipline of State and Church authorities acknowledged by the several religious societies.

The aboriginal inhabitants of these countries I have regarded with the commiseration their history inspires. Endowed with the faculties and the rights of men, breathing an ardent love of liberty and independence, and occupying a country which left them no desire but to be undisturbed, the stream of overflowing population from other regions directed itself on these shores. Without power to divert, or habits to contend against, they have been overwhelmed by the current, or driven before it. Now reduced within limits too narrow for the hunter state, humanity enjoins us to teach them agriculture and the domestic arts, to encourage them to the pursuits which alone can enable them to maintain their place in existence, and to prepare them, in time, for that state of society which to bodily comforts adds the improvement of the mind and morals. We have, therefore, liberally furnished them with the implements of husbandry and household use; we have placed among them instructors in the arts of first necessity; and they are covered with the agis of the law against aggressors from among ourselves.

But the endeavors to enlighten them on the fate which awaits their present course of life, to induce them to exercise their reason, follow its dictates, and change their pursuits with the change of circumstances, have powerful obstacles to encounter. They are combated by the habits of their bodies, prejudice of their minds, ignorance, pride, and the influence of interested and crafty individuals among them, who feel themselves something in the present order of things, and fear to become nothing in any other. These persons inculcate a sanctimonious reverence for the customs of their ancestors; that whatsoever they did must be done through all time; that reason is a false guide, and to advance under its counsel in their physical, moral, or political conditions, is perilous innovation; that their duty is to remain as their Creator made them—ignorance being safety, and knowledge full of danger. In short, my friends, among them is seen the action and counteraction of good sense and bigotry. They, too, have their anti-philosophers, who find an interest in keeping things in their present state, which leads reformation, and are therefore devoted to maintain the ascendency of habit over the duty of improving our reason and obeying its mandates.

In giving these outlines, I do not mean, fellow-citizens, to arrogate to myself the merit of the measures; that is due, in the first place, to the reflecting character of our citizens at large, who, by the weight of public opinion, influence and strengthen the public measures. It is due to the sound discretion with which they select from among themselves those to whom they intrust the legislative duties. It is due to the zeal and wisdom of the characters thus selected, who lay the foundations of public happiness in wholesome laws, the execution of which alone remains for others. And it is due to the able and faithful auxiliaries whose patriotism has associated with me in the executive functions.

During this course of administration, and in order to disturb it, the artillery of the press has been levelled against me; as though I had been the author and promoter of all the misfortunes and iniquities of our nation. Whether false, or whether well meant, to the nature of my calling, I have thought, and do still think, it a fit and proper subject for their animadversions. The public judgment will correct false reasonings and opinions, on a full hearing of the part. And what has been said may be drawn to the inestimable liberty of the press and its demoralizing licentiousness. If there be, as I still believe, a will to restrain, its supplement must be sought in the censorship of public opinion.

Contemplating the union of sentiment now manifested so generally, as augmenting harmony and happiness to our future course, I offer to our country sincere congratulations. With those, too, not yet rallied to the same point, the disposition to do so is gaining strength. Facts are piercing through the veil drawn over them; and our doubting brethren will at length see that the mass of their fellow-citizens, with whom they cannot yet resolve to act, as to principles and measures, think as they think, and desire what they desire; that our wish, as well as theirs, is, that the public efforts may be directed honestly to the public good, that peace be cultivated, civil and religious liberty unassailed, law and order preserved, equality of rights maintained, and that state of property, equal or unequal, which results to every man from his own industry, or that of his father's. When satisfied of these views, it is not in human nature that they should not approve and support them. In the meantime, let us cherish them in with patient affection; let us do them justice, and more than justice, in all competitions of interest.—and we need not doubt that truth, reason, and their own interests, will at length prevail.—will gather them into the fold of their country, and will complete their entire union of opinion which gives to a nation the blessing of harmony, and the benefit of all its strength.

I shall now enter on the duties to which my fellow-citizens have again called me, and shall proceed in the spirit of those principles which they have approved. I fear not that any motives of interest may lead me astray. I am sensible of no passion which could seduce me, knowingly, from the path of justice; but the weaknesses of human nature, and the limits of my own understanding, will produce errors of judgment sometimes injurious to your interests. My servants, guide their councils, and prosper their measures, that whatsoever they do shall result in your good, and shall secure to you the peace, friendship, and approbation of all nations.—viii, 40. ADDRESS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF VIRGINIA

The "Valedictory Address of the General Assembly of Virginia", which was agreed to on the 7th of February, 1809, gives a good idea of the high estimation in which Jefferson was held by his party, and the great majority of his countrymen, when he retired from the Presidency. It is as follows:—

"Sir.—The General Assembly of your native State cannot close their session, without acknowledging your services in the office which you are just about to lay down, and bidding you a respectful and affectionate farewell.

"We have to thank you for the model of an administration conducted on the purest principles of republicanism; for pomp and state laid aside; patronage discarded; internal taxes abolished; a host of superfluous officers disbanded; the monarchic maxim that 'a national debt is a national blessing', renounced, and more than thirty-three millions of our debt discharged; the native right to nearly one hundred millions of acres of our national domain extinguished; and, without the guilt or calamities of conquest, a vast and fertile region added to our country, far more extensive than her original possessions, bringing along with it the Mississippi and the port of Orleans, the trade of the West to the Pacific ocean, and in the intrinsic value of the land itself, a source of permanent and almost inexhaustible revenue. These are points in your administration which the historian will not fail to seize, to expand, and teach posterity to dwell upon with delight. Nor will he forget our peace with the civilized world, preserved through a season of uncommon difficulty and trial; the good will cultivated with the unfortunate aborigines of our country, and the civilization humanely extended among them; the lesson taught the inhabitants of the coast of Barbary, that we have the means of chastising their piratical encroachments, and awing them into justice; and that theme, on which, above all others, the historic genius will hang with rapture, the liberty of speech and of the press, preserved inviolate, without which genius and science are given to man in vain.

"In the principles on which you have administered the government, we see only the continuation and maturity of the same virtues and abilities, which drew upon you in your youth the resentment of Dunmore. From the first brilliant and happy moment of your resistance to foreign tyranny, until the present day, we mark with pleasure and with gratitude the same uniform, consistent character, the same warm and devoted attachment to liberty and the Republic, the same Roman love of your country, her rights, her peace, her honor, her prosperity.

"How blessed will be the retirement into which you are about to go! How deservedly blessed will it be! For you carry with you the richest of all rewards, the recollection of a life well spent in the service of your country, and proofs the most decisive, of the love, the gratitude, the veneration of your countrymen.

"That your retirement may be as happy as your life has been virtuous and useful; that our youth may see, in the blissful close of your days, an additional inducement to form themselves on your model, is the devout and earnest prayer of your fellow-citizens who compose the General Assembly of Virginia."—RAYNER'S Life of Jefferson, p. 494.
ADDRESS TO THE INHABITANTS OF ALBEMARLE CO., IN VIRGINIA

Returning to the scenes of my birth and early life, to the society of those with whom I was raised, and who have been ever dear to me, I receive, fellow-citizens and neighbors, with incopressible pleasure, the cordial welcome you were so good as to give me. Long absent on duties which the history of a wonderful era made incumbent on those called to them, the pomp, the turmoil, the bustle and splendor of office; have drawn but deeper sighs for the tranquil and irresponsible occupations of private life, for the enjoyment of an affectionate intercourse with you, my neighbors and friends, and the endearments of family love, which nature has given us all, as the sweetner of every hour. For these I gladly lay down the distressing burthen of power, and seek, with my fellow-citizens, repose and safety under the watchful cares, the labors and perplexities of younger and abler minds. The anxieties you express to administer to my happiness, do, of themselves, confer that happiness; and the measure will be complete, if any endeavors to fulfil my duties in the several public stations to which I have been called, have obtained for me the approbation of my country. The part which I have acted on the theatre of public life, has been before them; and to their sentence I submit it; but the testimony of my native county, of the individuals who have known me in private life, to my conduct in its various duties and relations, is the more grateful, as proceeding from eye-witnesses and observers, from triers of the vicinage. Of you, then, my neighbors, I may ask, in the face of the world, "whose ox have I taken, or whom have I defrauded? Whom have I oppressed, or of whose hand have I received a bribe to blind mine eyes therewith"? On your verdict I rest with conscious security. Your wishes for my happiness are received with just sensibility, and I offer sincere prayers for your own welfare and prosperity.—To THE INHABITANTS OF ALBEMARLE COUNTY, VA. V, 439. FORD ED., IX, 250. (M., April 3, 1809.)
DECLARATION AND PROTEST OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA*

We, the General Assembly of Virginia, on behalf, and in the name of the people thereof, do declare as follows:

The States of North America which confederated to establish their independence of the government of Great Britain, of which Virginia was one, became, on that acquisition free and independent States, and as such, authorized to constitute governments, each for itself, in such form as it might choose, and to enter into a compact (which is called the Constitution of the United States of America), by which they agreed to unite in a single government as to their relations with each other, and with foreign nations, and as to certain other articles particularly specified. They retained at the same time, each to itself, the other rights of independent government, comprehending mainly their domestic interests.

For the administration of the Federal branch, they agreed to appoint, in conjunction, a distinct set of functionaries, legislative, executive and judiciary, in the manner settled in that compact; while to each, severally, and of course remained its original right of appointing, each for itself, a separate set of functionaries, legislative, executive and judiciary, also, for administering the domestic branch of their respective governments.

These two sets of officers, each independent of the other, constitute thus a whole of government, for each State separately; the powers attributed to that one, as specifically made federal, exercised over the whole, the residuary powers, retained to the other, exercisable exclusively over its particular State, foreign herein, each to the others, as they were before the original compact.

To this construction of government and distribution of its powers, the Commonwealth of Virginia does religiously and affectionately adhere, opposing, with equal fidelity and firmness, the usurpation of either set of functionaries of the rightful powers of the other.

But the Federal branch, as a branch of the whole, has a right of enlarging its own powers by constructions, inferences, and indefinite deductions from those directly given, which this Assembly does declare to be usurpations of the powers retained to the independent branches, mere interpolations into the compact, and direct infractions of it.

They claim, for example, and have commenced the exercise of a right to construct roads, open canals, and effect other internal improvements within the territories and jurisdictions exclusively belonging to the several States, which this Assembly does declare has not been given to that branch by the constitutional compact, but remains to each State among its domestic and unalienated powers, exercisable within itself and by its domestic authorities alone.

This Assembly does further disavow and declare to be most false and unfounded, the doctrine that the compact, in authorizing its Federal branch to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States, has given it thereby a power to do whatever they may think, or pretend, would promote the general welfare, which construction would make that, of itself, a complete government, without limitation of powers; but that the plain sense and obvious meaning were, that they might levy the taxes necessary to provide for the general welfare, by the various acts of power therein specified and delegated to them, and by no others.

Nor is it admitted, as has been said, that the people of these States, by not investing their branches with all the means of bettering their condition, have denied to themselves any which may effect that purpose; since, in the distribution of these means they have given to that branch which belong to its department, and to the States have reserved separately the residue which belong to them separately. And thus by the organization of the two branches taken together, have completely secured the first object of human association, the full improvement of their condition, and reserved to themselves all the faculties of multiplying blessings.

Whilst the General Assembly thus declares the rights retained by the States, rights which they have never yielded, and which this State will never voluntarily yield, they do not mean to raise the banner of dissatisfaction, or of separation from their sister States, co-parties with themselves to this compact. They know and value too highly the blessings of their Union as to foreign nations and questions arising among themselves, to consider every infraction as to be met by actual resistance. They do not affectionately the opinions of those possessing the same rights under the same instrument, to make every difference of construction a ground of immediate rupture. They would, indeed, consider such a rupture as among the greatest calamities which could befall them; but not the greatest. There is yet one greater, submission to a government of unlimited powers. It is only when the hope of avoiding this shall have become absolutely desperate, that further forbearance could not be indulged. Should a majority of the co-parties, therefore, contrary to the expectation and hope of this Assembly, prefer, at this time, acquiescence in these assumptions of power by the Federal member of the government, we will be patient and suffer much, under the confidence that time, ere it be too late, will prove to them also the bitter consequences in which usurpation will involve us all.

In the meanwhile, we will bear with them, rather than separate from them, every misfortune, save that of living under a government of unlimited powers. We owe everything to our co-parties, and to our duty to posterity, to our government at large, to the nation in which we live; to keep up our character with temper and with perseverance the great experiment which shall prove that man is capable of living in society, governing itself by laws self-imposed, and securing to its members the enjoyment of life, liberty, property, and peace; and further to show, that even when the govern-

* This paper was entitled by Jefferson, "The Solemn Declaration and Protest of the Commonwealth of Virginia, on the Principles of the Constitution of the United States of America, and on the violations of them", Jefferson sent it to Madison in December, 1825, with an explanatory letter (vii, 422. FORD ED., X, 348) in which he said: "It may, in spite of the waving flag, it may break the western coalition, by offering the same thing in a different form. It will be viewed with favor in contrast with the Georgia opposition, and fear of strengthening that. It will be an example of a temperate mode of opposition in future and similar cases."—EDITOR.
ment of its choice shall manifest a tendency to degeneracy, we are not at once to despair but that the will and the watchfulness of its sounder parts will reform its aberrations, recall it to original and legitimate principles, and restrain it within the rightful limits of self-government. And these are the objects of this Declaration and Protest.

Supposing, then, that it might be for the good of the whole, as some of its co-States seem to think, that the power of making roads and canals should be added to those directly given to the Federal branch, as more likely to be systemically and beneficially directed, than by the independent action of the several States, this Commonwealth, from respect to these opinions, and a desire of conciliation with its co-States, will consent, in concurrence with them, to make this addition, provided it be done regularly by an amendment of the compact, in the way established by that instrument, and provided also, it be sufficiently guarded against abuses, compromises, and corrupt practices, not only of possible, but of probable occurrence.

And as a further pledge of the sincere and cordial attachment of this Commonwealth to the Union of the whole, so far as has been consented to by the compact called "The Constitution of the United States of America" (constructed according to the plain and ordinary meaning of its language, to the common intendment of the time, and of those who framed it); to give also to all parties and authorities, time for reflection and consideration, whether, under a temperate view of the possible consequences, and especially of the constant obstructions which an equivocal majority must ever expect to meet, they will still prefer the assumption of this power rather than its acceptance from the free will of their constituents; and to preserve peace in the meanwhile, we proceed to make it the duty of our citizens, until the Legislature shall otherwise and ultimately decide, to acquiesce under those acts of the Federal branch of our government which we have declared to be usurpations, and against which, in point of right, we do protest as null and void, and never to be quoted as precedents of right.

We, therefore, do enact, and Be It Enacted by the General Assembly of Virginia, That all citizens of this Commonwealth, and persons and authorities within the same, shall pay full obedience at all times to the acts which may be passed by the Congress of the United States, the object of which shall be the construction of post roads, making canals of navigation, and maintaining the same in any part of the United States, in like manner as if said acts were totidem verbis, passed by the Legislature of this Commonwealth.—ix, 496. Estrangement and Reconciliation of Jefferson and Adams

[To Mrs. John Adams.]

Dear Madam,—The affectionate sentiments which you have had the goodness to express in your letter of May 20, towards my dear departed daughter, have awakened in me sensibilities natural to the occasion, and recalled your kindness to her, which I shall ever remember with gratitude and friendship. I can assure you with truth, they had made an indelible impression on her mind, and that to the last, on our meetings after long separations, whether I heard lately of you, and how you did, were among the earliest of her enquiries. In giving you this assurance I perform a sacred duty for her, and, at the same time, am thankful for the occasion furnished me, of expressing my regret that circumstances should have arisen, which have seemed to draw a line of separation between us. The friendship with which you honored me has been preserved, however, although circumstances have been passing which might be trying to some minds, I never believed yours to be of that kind, nor felt that my own was. Neither my estimate of your character, nor the esteem founded in that, has ever been lessened for a single moment, although doubts whether it would be acceptable may have forbidden manifestations of it.

Mr. Adams’s friendship and mine began at an earlier date. It accompanied us through long and important scenes. The different conclusions we had drawn from our political reading and reflections, were not permitted to lessen personal esteem; each party being conscious they were the result of an honest conviction in the other. Like differences of opinion existing among our fellow citizens, attached them to one or the other of us, and produced a rivalry in their minds which did not exist in ours. We never stood in one another’s way; for if either had been withdrawn at any time, his favorers would not have gone over to the other, but would have sought for some other heterogeneous opinions. This consideration was sufficient to keep down all jealousy between us, and to guard our friendship from any disturbance by sentiments of rivalry; and I can say with truth, that one act of Mr. Adams’s life, and one only, ever gave me a moment’s personal displeasure. I did consider his last appointments to office as personally unkind. They were from among my most ardent political enemies, from whom no faithful cooperation could ever be expected; and laid me under the embarrassment of acting through men whose views were to defeat mine, or to counteract the opinion of putting others in other places. It seemed but common justice to leave a successor free to act by instruments of his own choice. If my respect for him did not permit me to ascribe the whole blame to the influence of others, it left something for friendship to forgive, and after brooding over it for some little time, and not always resisting the expressing of it, I forgave it cordially, and returned to the same state of esteem and respect for him which I had so long subsisted. Having come into life a little later than Mr. Adams, his career has preceded mine, as mine is followed by some other; and it will probably be closed at the same distance after him which time originally placed between us. I maintain for him, and shall carry into private life, an uniform and high measure of respect and good will, and for yourself a sincere attachment.

[To Mrs. John Adams.]

Dear Madam,—Your favor of the 1st inst. was duly received, and I would not have again intruded on you, but to rectify certain facts which seem not to have been presented to you under their true aspects. My charities to Callender are considered as rewards for his calamities. As early as 1796, I was told in Philadelphia that Callender, the author of the “Political Progress of Britain”, was in that city, a fugitive from persecution for having written that book, and in distress. I had read and approved the book; I considered him as a man of genius, unjustly persecuted. I knew nothing of his private character, and immediately expressed my readiness to contribute to his relief, and to serve him. It was a considerable time after, that, on application from a person who thought of him as I did, I contributed to his relief, and afterwards reciprocated the contribution. Himself I did not see till long after, nor ever more than two or three times. When he first began to write, he told some useful truths in his coarse way; but nobody sooner disapproved of his writing than I did, or wished more that he would be silent. My charities to him were no more meant as encouragements to his secessions, than those I give to the wretch at my door are meant as rewards for the vices of his life, and to make them chargeable to myself. In truth, they would have been greater to him, had he never written a word after the work for which he fled from Britain.

But another fact is, that “I liberated a wretch who was suffering for a libel against Mr. Adams”. I do not know who was the particular wretch alluded to; but I discharged every person under punishment or prosecution under the Sedition law, because I considered, and now consider, that law to be a nullity, as absolute and as palpable as if Congress had ordered us to fall down and worship a golden image; and that it was as much my duty to arrest its execution in a proper stage, as it should have been to have rescued from the fiery furnace those who should have been cast into it for refusing to worship the image. It was accordingly done in every instance, without asking what the offenders had done, or against whom they had offended, but whether the pains they were suffering were inflicted under the pretended Sedition law. It was certainly possible that my motives for contributing to the relief of Callender, and liberating sufferers under the Sedition law, might have been, as you say, encourage, and re-warding their conduct; but it would also have been those which inspire ordinary charities to objects of distress, meritorious or not, or the obligation of an oath to protect the Constitution, violated by an unauthorized act of Congress. Which of these were my motives, must be decided by a regard to the general tenor of my life. On this I am not afraid to appeal to the nation at large, to posterity, and still less to that Being who sees Himself our motives, who will judge us from His own knowledge of them, and not on the testimony of "Porcupine" or Fenno. You observe, there has been one other act of my administration personally unkind, and suppose it will readily suggest itself to me. I declare on my honor, Madam, I have not the least scruple about what act is alluded to. I never did a single thing with an unkind intention. * * *—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 555. FORD ED, viii, 308. (July 1804.)

[To Mrs. John Adams.]

Your letter, Madam, of the 18th of August, has been some days received, but a press of business has prevented the acknowledgment of it; perhaps, indeed, I may have already trespassed too far on your attention. With those who wish to think amiss of me, I have learned to be perfectly indifferent; but where I know a mind to be ingenious, and to need only truth to set it to rights, I cannot be as passive. The act of personal unkindness alluded to in your former letter, is said in your last to have been the removal of your eldest son from some office to which he was highly indebted, and from which he must have been a commissioner of bankruptcy. But I declare to you, on my honor, that this is the first knowledge I have ever had that he was so. It may be thought, perhaps, that I ought to have enquired who were such, before I appointed others. But it is to be observed, that the former law permitted the judges to name commissioners occasionally only, for every case as it arose, and not to make them permanent officers. Nobody, therefore, being in office, there could be no remonstrance. The judges, you well know, have been considered as highly federal; and it was feared that this was exclusive of the other states. The Legislature, dissatisfied with this, transferred the nomination to the President, and made the offices permanent. The very object in passing the law was, that he should correct, not confirm, what was deemed the partiality of the judges. I thought it, therefore, proper to inquire, not whom they had employed, but whom I ought to appoint to fulfil the intentions of the law. In making these appointments, I put in a proportion of federalists, equal, I believe, to the proportion they bear in numbers through the Union generally. Had I known that your son had acted, it would have been a real pleasure to me to have preferred him to some who were named in Boston, in what was deemed the same line of politics. To this I should have been led by my knowledge of his integrity, as well as my sincere dispositions towards yourself and Mr. Adams.* * * The candor manifested in your letter, and which I ever believed you to possess, has alone inspired the desire of calling your attention, once more, to those circumstances of fact and motive by which I claim to be judged. I hope you will see these intrusions on your time to be, what they really are, proofs of my great respect for you. I tolerate with the utmost latitude the right of others to differ from me in opinion without imputing to them criminality. I know too well the weakness and uncertainty of human reason to wonder at its different results. Both of our political parties, at least the honest part of them, agree conscientiously in the same object—the public good; but they differ essentially in what they deem the means of promoting that good. One side believes it best done by one composition of the governing powers: the other, by a different one. One fears most the ignorance of the people: the other, the selfishness of rulers independent of them. Which is right, time and experience will prove. We think that one side of this experiment has been long enough tried, and proved not to promote the good of the many; and that the other has not been fairly and sufficiently tried. Our opponents think the reverse. With which other opinion the body of the profession of publicc councils must not prevail. My anxieties on this subject will never carry me beyond the use of fair and honorable means, of truth and reason; nor have they ever lessened my esteem for moral worth, nor alienated my affections from a single friend, who did not first withdraw himself. Whenever this has happened, I confess I have not been insensible to it; yet have ever kept myself open to a return of their justice. I conclude with sincere prayers for your health and happiness, that yourself and Mr. Adams may long enjoy the tranquillity you desire and merit, and see in the prosperity of your family what is the consummation of the last and warmest of human wishes.—To MRS. JOHN ADAMS. iv, 560. FORD ED, viii, 310. (M., Sep, 11, 1804.)

[To Dr. Benjamin Rush.]

I receive with sensibility your observations on the discontinuance of friendly correspondence between Mr. Adams and myself, and the concern you take in its restoration. This discontinuance has not proceeded from me, nor from the want of sincere desire and of effort on my part, to renew our intercourse. You know the perfect coincidence of principle and of action, in the early part of the Revolution which produced a high degree of mutual respect and esteem between Mr. Adams and myself. Certainly no man was ever truer than he was, in that day, to those principles of rational republicanism which, after the necessity of throwing off our monarchy, dictated all our efforts in the establishment of a new government. And although he swerved, afterwards, towards the principles of the English constitution, our friendship did not abate on that account.* * * The federalists, who the federalists played off, about that time, to beat down the friends to the real principles of our Constitution, to silence by terror every expression in their favor, to bring us into war with France and alliance with England, and finally to homologize our Constitution with that of England. Mr. Adams, you know, was overwhelmed with feverish addresses, dictated by the fear, and often by the pen, of the bloody bogy, and was seduced by them into some open indications of his new principles of government, and in fact, was so elated as to mix with his kindness a little superciliousness towards me. Even Mrs. Adams, with all her good sense and prudence, was sensibly flushed. And you recollect the short suspension of our intercourse, and the circumstance which gave rise to it which you were so good as to bring to an early explanation, and have set to rights, to the cordial satisfaction of us all.*

Two or three years after, having had the misfortune to lose a daughter, between whom and Mrs. Adams there had been a considerable attachment, she made it the occasion of writing me a letter, in which, with the tenderest expression of concern at this event, she carefully avoided a single one of friendship towards myself, and even concluded it with the wishes of her who once took pleasure in subscribing herself your friend, Abigail Adams". Unpromising as was the complexion of this letter, I determined to make an effort towards removing the cloud from between us. This brought on a correspondence which I now enclose for your perusal, after which be so good as to return it to me, as I have never communicated it to any mortal breathing, before. I send it to you, to convince you I have not been wanting either in the desire, or the endeavor to remove this misunderstanding. Indeed, I thought it highly disgraceful to us both, as indicating minds not sufficiently elevated to prevent a public competition from affecting our personal friendship. I soon found from the correspondence that conciliation was desperate, and yielding to an intimation in her last letter, I ceased from further explanation+.

I have gone into these details, that you might know everything which had passed between us, might be fully possessed of the state of facts and dispositions, and judge for yourself whether they admit a revival of that friendly intercourse for which you are so kindly solicitous. I shall certainly not be wanting in anything on my part which may second your efforts, which will be the easier with me, inasmuch as I do not entertain a sentiment of Mr. Adams, the expression of which could give him reasonable offense.—To Dr. Benjamin Rush. v, 538. Ford ed., ix, 299. (M., Jan. 1811.)

[To Dr. Benjamin Rush.]

I communicated to you the correspondence which had parted Mrs. Adams and myself, in proof that I could not give friendship in exchange for such sentiments as she had recently taken up towards myself, and avowed and maintained in her letters to me. Nothing but a total renunciation of these could admit a reconciliation, and that could be cordial only in proportion as the return to ancient opinions was believed sincere. In these jaundiced sentiments of hers I had associated Mr. Adams, knowing the weight which her opinions had with him, and notwithstanding she declared in her letters that they were not communicated to him. A late incident has satisfied me that I wronged him as well as her, in not yielding entire confidence to this assurance on her part. Two of the Mr. —, my neighbors and friends, took a tour to the northward during the last summer. In Boston they fell into company with Mr. Adams, and * * * passed a day with him at Braintree. He spoke out to them everything which came uppermost *, and seemed most disposed to dwell on those things which happened during his own administration. He spoke of his masters, as he called his Heads of departments, as acting above his control, and often against his opinions. Among many other topics, he adverted to the unprincipled licentiousness of the press against myself, adding, "I always loved Jefferson, and still love him". This is enough for me. I only needed this knowledge to revive towards him all the affections of the most cordial moments of our lives. Changing a single word only in Dr. Franklin's character of him, I knew how to be always an honest man, often a great one, but sometimes incorrect and precipitate in his judgments: and it is known to those who have ever heard me speak of Mr. Adams, that I have ever done him justice myself, and defended him when, asailed by others, with the single exception as to political opinions. But with a man possessing so many other estimable qualities, why should we be dissoizalized by mere differences of opinion in politics, in religion, in philosophy, or anything else? His opinions are as honestly formed as my own. Our different views of the same subject are the result of a difference in our organization and experience. I never withdrew from the society of any man on this account, although many have done it from me; much less should I do it from one with whom I had gone through, with hand and heart, so many trying scenes. I wish, therefore, but for an apposite occasion to express to Mr. Adams my unchanged affections for him. There is an awkwardness which hangs over the resuming a correspondence so long discontinued, unless something could arise which should call for a letter. Time and chance may perhaps generate such an occasion, of which I shall not be wanting in promptitude to avail myself. From this fusion of mutual affections, Mrs. Adams is, of course, separated. It will only be necessary that I never name her. In your letters to Mr. Adams, you can, perhaps suggest my continued cordiality towards him, and knowing this, should an occasion of writing first present itself to him, he will, perhaps, avail himself of it, as I certainly will, should it first occur to me. No ground for jealousy now existing, he will certainly give fair play to the natural warmth of his heart.—To Dr. Benjamin Rush. vi, 30. Ford ed., ix, 299. (P.F., Dec. 1811.)
