

COLLECTED WORKS OF JOHN STUART MILL

VOLUME XII

The Collected Edition of the works of John Stuart Mill has been planned and is being directed by an editorial committee appointed from the Faculty of Arts and Science of the University of Toronto, and from the University of Toronto Press. The primary aim of the edition is to present fully collated texts of those works which exist in a number of versions, both printed and manuscript, and to provide accurate texts of works previously unpublished or which have become relatively inaccessible.

Editorial Committee

F. E. L. PRIESTLEY, General Editor

J. M. ROBSON, Associate Editor

V. W. BLADEN, ALEXANDER BRADY, J. B. CONACHER

W. LINE, R. F. MCRAE, A. S. P. WOODHOUSE

MARSH JEANNERET, FRANCES HALPENNY

The Earlier Letters of
John Stuart Mill
1812-1848

Edited by

FRANCIS E. MINEKA

The Class of 1916 Professor of English
Cornell University

With an Introduction by

F. A. HAYEK, F.B.A.

University of Freiburg i.B.

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO PRESS
ROUTLEDGE & KEGAN PAUL

*Copyright, Canada, 1963, by University of Toronto Press
Printed in Canada
London: Routledge & Kegan Paul*

TO THE MEMBERS OF
THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY CLASS OF 1916

Preface

CREDIT FOR THE CONCEPTION of this edition belongs to Professor F. A. Hayek, who while a member of the faculty of the London School of Economics nearly twenty years ago began an organized effort to assemble the widely scattered early letters of John Stuart Mill. At that time the only collected edition of Mill's correspondence was the one edited by Hugh S. R. Elliot which was published in 1910. It contained 268 letters, largely from the last twenty-five years of Mill's life; only fifty-two of the letters were from the period covered by the present edition. A considerable number of the early letters had been published elsewhere, but in no one place could one find the correspondence for the period of Mill's life to which approximately three-fourths of his Autobiography is devoted.

Professor Hayek's decision to assemble as complete a collection as possible through the year 1848 was wholly sound. In that year, with the publication of Principles of Political Economy, Mill became a widely recognized public figure, and his correspondence thereafter often took on much more of a public character as his advice and his opinions were sought by correspondents from all over the civilized world. By 1848, also, were virtually completed most of the correspondences with the friends and intimates of his youth and early manhood, with Thomas Carlyle, John Sterling, J. P. Nichol, Robert Barclay Fox, W. J. Fox, Gustave d'Eichthal, Auguste Comte, Alexis de Tocqueville, and John and Sarah Austin. These series of letters constitute the best supplement to the most interesting and moving sections of Mill's Autobiography, for they reveal many sides of Mill's intellectual and emotional development during the formative and most productive years of his life.

These were the years of which he later said, in commenting on his early reaction against orthodox Benthamism, "I found the fabric of my old and taught opinions giving way in many fresh places, and I never allowed it to fall to pieces, but was incessantly occupied in weaving it anew." The new strands in the fabric were by no means wholly of British origin, though Mill acknowledged the importance of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Carlyle in the reshaping of many of his views. The imported strands came in part from Germany (usually somewhat transmuted in the writings of Carlyle, Coleridge, and Coleridge's disciple, John Sterling), but more significantly from France. Most important were the strands emanating from the Saint-

Simonians (as seen in the correspondence with D'Eichthal) and from the positivism of Comte and the critical views of democracy held by Tocqueville.

Mill was not engaged solely in reweaving the fabric of his opinions during these years, however; he was also busily engaged in trying to influence the opinions of others. For five years he edited a radical quarterly, the London and Westminster Review, and during that same time he worked behind the scenes to force the Radicals in Parliament into concerted action. The letters between 1835 and 1840 present the best picture available of his activities as an editor and of his hopes and frustrations as a thwarted politician.

Little will be found in the present edition, however, to throw more light upon one of the major influences in Mill's life between 1831 and 1848—that of Mrs. Taylor. I have included the two letters of this period by Mill to Mrs. Taylor which Professor Hayek first published in his John Stuart Mill and Harriet Taylor: Their Friendship and Subsequent Marriage (1951), but no additional letters to Mrs. Taylor before 1849 have been found.

The 534 letters and excerpts of letters published herein comprise all the personal letters that I have been able to find, except that I have excluded a small number of undated and undatable short notes of little significance. No effort has been made to include the letters written for publication in newspapers, which are listed in the Bibliography of the Published Writings of John Stuart Mill edited by Ney MacMinn, J. R. Hains, and James McNab McCrimmon (1945), nor to include official letters written by Mill in carrying out his duties at the East India Company.

All fifty-two of the letters before 1849 published by Elliot, including eighteen to Carlyle, eighteen to John Sterling, and six to Edward Lytton Bulwer, have been re-collated wherever possible and for the first time annotated. Included also are some other series of Mill's early letters that had been published before the appearance of Elliot's edition: twenty to Gustave d'Eichthal, edited by Eugène d'Eichthal; twelve to John Pringle Nichol, edited by William Knight; twenty-one to John Robertson, edited by Mrs. G. D. M. Towers; forty-four to Auguste Comte, edited by Lucien Lévy-Bruhl; fifteen to Robert Barclay Fox, edited by H. N. Pym; nine to Macvey Napier edited by the latter's son; and eighteen letters and excerpts from letters, largely to Mill's family, included by Alexander Bain in his life of Mill.

Several other series were published after Elliot's edition appeared: thirteen letters to W. J. Fox in Richard Garnett's life of Fox; nine to George Henry Lewes in Anna T. Kitchel's George Lewes and George Eliot; and fourteen to Alexis de Tocqueville edited by J.-P. Mayer in his collected edition of Tocqueville's work. All have been re-collated wherever the originals have been available.

Mill's letters to John Pringle Nichol have not been found, and the text of these is that published by William Knight. The text of the letters to Tocqueville is reproduced from J.-P. Mayer's edition of the works of Tocqueville and has not been re-collated, though additional annotation has been provided. Even very brief published excerpts from otherwise unlocated letters have been included, in the hope that they may provide clues to the eventual finding of the originals.

It has been possible to add a good many as yet unpublished letters to the various series published by Elliot and others—notably letters to Carlyle, D'Eichthal, R. B. Fox, W. J. Fox, and Napier. A number of additional series, of which hitherto either none or only a scattered few had been published, appear in print for the first time: letters to Edwin Chadwick, Albany Fonblanque, John and Sarah Austin, Joseph Blanco White, William Tait, Aristide Guilbert, Henry S. Chapman, John Mitchel Kemble, Henry Cole, and Sir John F. W. Herschel. In all, this edition contains 238 hitherto unpublished letters and 72 letters which have previously unpublished passages.

While Professor Hayek was chiefly responsible for the assembling of the letters, the work of editing and annotating has been mine. The method I have followed in preparing the text has been to reproduce the original as closely as possible, and I have rarely yielded to the temptation to insert a bracketed sic. I have silently transferred in a relatively small number of letters dates and addresses from the end to the heading of the letter. In rare instances only has punctuation been inserted and then the insertion has been noted. Mill's letters in French are presented as they were written; errors have not been corrected and obsolete spellings have not been modernized. The text of his letters to Comte has been collated with the originals in the Library of the Johns Hopkins University; the text of Lévy-Bruhl's edition differs in paragraphing, punctuation, and spelling from that of the original letters, though in other respects it is very accurate.

The first note to each letter provides the following information: the location of the manuscript when it is known (some transcribed by Professor Hayek as early as 1943 cannot now be located); addresses and postmarks where they have been available; the place of publication of previously published letters. If no printed source is indicated, the letter, to the best of my knowledge, has hitherto been unpublished. Except for several letters published in full by Michael Packe in his biography of Mill, no mention has been made of excerpts published by him, since he had full access to Professor Hayek's collection. The editor has located over sixty additional letters since the publication of Mr. Packe's biography.

A good deal of effort has been expended upon dating as accurately as possible letters not dated by Mill. Sometimes it has been possible to do such dating by means of external evidence that is corroborative of details in the letter (e.g., Letters 11 and 382); at other times I have had to depend solely on internal evidence. In some instances previously published letters (e.g., Letters 47 and 96) were incorrectly dated, and corrections have had to be made.

Recipients of letters and names of persons mentioned have normally been identified only on the occasion of their first appearance in the letters. To avoid the necessity of an over-abundance of cross-references, an extensive name and subject index is provided. The page reference set in bold type after an indexed name indicates the location of the identifying note. Authors of books mentioned in the letters usually have not been otherwise identified.

While I have made some successful efforts to enlarge Professor Hayek's original collection, I am by no means assured that additional early letters may not yet make their appearance. In fact, I hope that the publication of this edition will bring to light many more. Efforts to trace many once in the possession, for instance, of Alexander Bain, the first biographer of Mill, have proved thus far unavailing. I should appreciate receiving information of any uncollected Mill letters, since I am planning, in collaboration with Professor Dwight N. Lindley of Hamilton College, an edition of the later (1849–1873) letters. If additional early letters come out of hiding, it may be possible to include them in an appendix to the later letters.

There remains the pleasant task of acknowledging generous help from many persons and institutions. Professor Hayek in his Introduction to this edition has acknowledged some of his indebtednesses during the period when he was collecting the letters. Since he has turned over to me all his extensive correspondence relating to the collecting, it is incumbent upon me to acknowledge on his behalf—and my own—major contributions during that period by the following persons: W. H. Browning, W. C. Dickinson, the late Mrs. Vera Eichelbaum, Miss Philippa G. Fawcett, J. L. Harlan, the late Norman E. Himes, the late Lord Keynes, J. A. La Nauze, Ney MacMinn, J. M. McCrimmon, Emery Neff, A. M. Carr Saunders, Hill Shine, the Right Rev. Charles L. Street, Jacob Viner, and Gordon Waterfield. In addition many individuals, too numerous to mention here, generously answered queries and offered useful suggestions.

My own debts incurred since I took over in 1953 the task of editing the letters have likewise been many. In efforts to enlarge Professor Hayek's collection I have been aided by H. L. Beales, Joseph Hamburger, Peter M. Jackson, Cecil Lang, J.-P. Mayer, Anna J. Mill, James M. Osborn, John M.

Robson, Henry Siegel, Jack Stillinger, and William E. S. Thomas. Alice Kaminsky, Dwight N. Lindley, Emily Morrison, and Robert Scholes have provided me at various times with valuable research and editorial assistance. Among my colleagues at Cornell I have received generous help in spotting allusions and tracing quotations from M. H. Abrams, Robert M. Adams, Harry Caplan, David Davis, J.-J. Demorest, Ephim G. Fogel, and Gordon Kirkwood, and from a former colleague, Luitpold Wallach. Professor John M. Robson of the University of Toronto by his critical reading of the manuscript at a late stage gave me the benefit of his extensive knowledge of Mill, thereby considerably improving the edition. A former graduate student of mine, Dr. Eileen Curran, collated some letters for me and supplied useful information from her detailed knowledge of the history of English periodicals. George H. Healey and Felix Reichmann of the Cornell University Library staff have been unfailingly helpful. Mertie Decker and Eleanor Rosica have typed what must have seemed to them endless numbers of pages of manuscript. Among British librarians I have been chiefly indebted to Mr. G. Woledge and Mr. C. G. Allen of the British Library of Political and Economic Science of the London School of Economics, to Mr. A. N. L. Munby of the Library of King's College, Cambridge, and to J. S. Ritchie of the National Library of Scotland. J.-P. Mayer and his publishers (the Librairie Gallimard) have granted me permission to reprint the letters of Mill in the copyrighted edition of the works of Alexis de Tocqueville. Indebtedness to the many libraries which possess the originals of these letters is recorded in the notes to the letters, but I should like to express here in particular my thanks to the four libraries which have by far the largest holdings: those of The Johns Hopkins University, the London School of Economics, the National Library of Scotland, and Yale University. I acknowledge also with gratitude a Faculty Research Grant from Cornell University and funds for travel and research from the endowment provided by the Cornell Class of 1916 for the Professorship which I have the honour to hold.

Professor Hayek at the close of his Introduction implies that in this project the fun was all his, but the hard work, mine. I can only say that I have deeply appreciated the opportunity he gave me to do the work. I have had fun too.

FRANCIS E. MINEKA

Cornell University
September 1, 1962

The hope expressed in the foregoing Preface that more of Mill's earlier letters can still be located has been in small part fulfilled by the addition of three letters that have come to light while this edition was in process.

Since pagination was already completed at this point, the three letters have been added at the end of the second volume (Volume XIII of the Collected Works) and assigned numbers appropriate to their place in the sequence. References to these additional letters have been included in the Index.

F.E.M.

May 15, 1963

Contents

PREFACE	vii
INTRODUCTION, by F. A. Hayek	xv
ABBREVIATIONS AND SHORT TITLES	xxv
THE LETTERS, 1812–1837
1812–1830, 3	1831, 69
1832, 94	1833, 136
1834, 204	1835, 247
1836, 291	1837, 316
THE LETTERS, 1837–1848
1838, 367	1839, 395
1840, 417	1841, 461
1842, 495	1843, 565
1844, 618	1845, 653
1846, 690	1847, 706
1848, 730
INDEXES
General Index	745
Index of Correspondents	780
Facsimile of Letter 1, to Jeremy Bentham, from MS in the British Museum facing page 3
Facsimile of Letter 405, to Macvey Napier, from MS in the British Museum facing page 367

Introduction

BY F. A. HAYEK

JOHN STUART MILL has not been altogether fortunate in the manner in which his memory was served by those most concerned and best authorized to honour it. It is true that his stepdaughter, heir, and literary executor, Helen Taylor, promptly published the Autobiography, which chiefly determined the picture posterity formed of Mill, and that the only other manuscript ready for publication was also rapidly printed. But during the next forty years, while Mill's fame persisted undiminished, little was done either to make his literary work more readily accessible or his other activities better known. There are few figures of comparable standing whose works have had to wait nearly a hundred years for a collected edition in English to be published. Nor, while his reputation was at its height, did any significant information become available that would have enabled another hand to round off the somewhat angular and fragmentary picture Mill had given of himself. He had been quite aware that his more public activities would be of interest to later generations and had begun to mark some of the copies of his letters which he had kept as suitable for publication. But Helen Taylor appears increasingly to have been more concerned to prevent others from encroaching upon her proprietary rights than to push on with her own plans for publication. It was only when the material so jealously guarded by her finally passed to one of Mrs. Mill's granddaughters, Mary Taylor, that an outsider was called in to publish some of the more readily accessible correspondence. Again, however, Mary Taylor reserved to herself part of the task which she was hardly qualified to carry out and in fact did not bring to completion. When at last after her death the papers in her possession became generally accessible, interest in Mill seems to have been at a low point and those papers were allowed to be widely dispersed. Nothing illustrates better the temporary eclipse of his fame than that some of the institutions which then acquired important parts of these papers did not trouble to catalogue them for another fifteen years.

It would seem that at least in his native country, during the period between the two great wars, Mill was regarded as one of those outmoded figures of the recent past whose ideas have ceased to be interesting because they have become commonplace. Most of the battles he fought had been won and to many of those who knew his name he probably appeared as a somewhat dim figure whose On Liberty they had been made to read at school but whose "Victorian" outlook had lost most of its appeal. There was, perhaps, also some suspicion that his reputation had been somewhat exaggerated and that he had not been a great original genius but rather an honest, hardworking, and lucid expositor of ideas that other and greater minds had originated. He even came to be regarded, very unjustly, as the last of the "orthodox" tradition in economics and politics. In fact, however, few men have done more to create the intellectual climate in which most of what he stood for was finally taken for granted.

The gradual but steady revival of the interest in John Stuart Mill in the course of the last twenty years is based on a truer understanding of the significance of his work.¹ Though nothing could be more misleading than to represent him as a "typical" Victorian or a "typical" Englishman (he certainly was neither), he was one of the most representative figures of the changes of thought that were germinating during his lifetime. During the forty years after his death he governed liberal thought as did no other man, and as late as 1914 he was still the chief source of inspiration of the progressive part of the intellectuals of the West—of the men whose dream of an indefinitely peaceful progress and expansion of Western civilization was shattered by the cataclysms of war and revolution. But even to that development Mill had unquestionably contributed by his sympathies for the rising aspirations of national self-determination and of socialism. His reputation declined with the confidence in the steady advance of civilization in which he had believed, and for a time the kind of minds who had believed in him were attracted by more revolutionary thinkers.

It must probably still be admitted that it is not so much for the originality of his thinking as for its influence on a world now past that Mill is chiefly of importance today. We may still discover that he is a better guide to many of our present problems than is generally appreciated. But there can be no question that his influence is such that to the historian of thought all information we have about Mill's activities, his contacts, and about the channels through which ideas reached him and through which he acted upon others is nearly as important as his published work. This is particularly true of a man like Mill who strove to keep his mind open to new ideas but upon whom accident and personal idiosyncrasies nevertheless acted to decide in some measure what would and what would not enter his system of thought.

The present volume contains some of the most important sources of information we have on all the different spheres of Mill's activities. The work on the collection of these letters started about the same time as the new interest in Mill began to make itself felt but for reasons presently to be explained, publication has been long delayed. Some of the early results of these efforts have however already been used in various contributions to our knowledge of Mill which have appeared during this period, particularly in Mr. Michael Packe's vivid Life of John Stuart Mill (1954). The following brief account of the circumstances which led to the present edition may be found useful.

1. This new interest is by no means confined to the Western world. A bibliography of John Stuart Mill, published in Keizai Ronshu, The Economic Review of Kansai University (Osaka), VI, no. 7 (Nov., 1956), lists, in addition to about 350 works about Mill in European languages, over 180 in the Japanese language alone!

Although more than fifty years ago there were published two volumes of Letters of John Stuart Mill, edited by Hugh S. R. Elliot, these were in the main confined to the last twenty-five years of Mill's life. Of the earlier and most productive period the edition contained only three series of letters which happened to have been returned to Mill or his heirs. Many more belonging to this period have been published in some thirty different places, while an even larger number of unpublished letters was found to be dispersed among many private and public collections.

This unsatisfactory state of affairs, of which every student of nineteenth-century ideas must soon become aware, induced me nearly twenty years ago to attempt to bring together the main body of Mill's early correspondence as a supplement to the existing collection. This soon proved a much bigger task than I had anticipated and a task, moreover, which in one sense I had started too late and in another sense too early. Eighteen or even thirteen years earlier I should still have found together all or at least part of Mill's own papers which in the meantime had been dispersed; and as it soon appeared, much important information had been destroyed by fire during the bombing of London only a few months before I started my work. On the other hand, wartime conditions in England made inaccessible for the next five years some of the material that had to be examined. In the circumstances I carried the task of collection as far as was then possible, but had in the late forties to postpone its completion, first temporarily and then, consequent upon my move from London to Chicago, indefinitely. By then I had completed the editing of one rather special set of Mill's letters which, for reasons explained in the Introduction to the edition published in 1951 (John Stuart Mill and Harriet Taylor: Their Friendship and Subsequent Marriage [London and Chicago, 1951]) seemed to demand separate treatment. That experience taught me that if I was not for years to abandon all my other work I could not adequately perform the same task for the complete collection. I was therefore only too grateful when not long after, an expert in the field, Professor Francis E. Mineka of Cornell University, agreed to assume responsibility for that arduous task.

The editing of the present volume is entirely his and in the course of this work he has also been able to add to the collection of transcripts I had assembled over sixty additional hitherto unpublished letters by Mill.

It may be useful if, before commenting on the character of the present volumes, I give a brief account of the fate of the books and papers which were in Mill's possession at the time of his death, so far as this became known in the course of the search for his letters. Mill died on May 7, 1873, at Avignon, where for the preceding fifteen years he had spent much of his time in the house he had bought to be near his wife's grave.² His step-daughter and sole heir, Helen Taylor, continued to live there most of the time for another thirty years, jealously guarding her exclusive rights to all of Mill's literary remains and steadfastly refusing requests for permission to publish any of his letters. The draft of a letter of hers written not long after Mill's death (on the back of a letter addressed to her, dated July 30, 1873) shows that she was then contemplating publication of some of his letters:

I have all my dear stepfather's letters, preserved, looked through from time to time by himself, arranged in order by myself, and left by him in my hands with directions, verbal and written, to deal with them according to my judgement. When the more pressing task of the publication of his MSS. is completed, I shall, if I live, occupy myself with his correspondence, if I do not live it will be for my literary Executors to decide what to do with it.³

It seems that by "all [her] dear stepfather's letters" she meant no more than the drafts he had begun to keep from about 1848 or 1849. But she did make some efforts to recover from the heirs of his correspondents sets of earlier letters in exchange for those written to him and it was probably in this manner that the letters to Sterling and Bulwer included in the Elliot edition came to be among the Mill papers.

Nothing came of Helen Taylor's plans for publication and the Mill papers rested at the Avignon cottage until 1904, when Helen Taylor's niece Mary Taylor (the younger daughter of Mrs. Mill's son Algernon) succeeded in persuading the old lady, who at seventy-three appears to have been somewhat peculiar and senile, to return to England. Early in 1905 a friend of Mary Taylor's (Mary Ann Trimble, who earlier had spent some time at Avignon with Mary Taylor) returned to Avignon and, with the assistance of a married couple who had accompanied her from England

2. As I am revising this Introduction for publication (January, 1962) I learn that last autumn this house, visited by so many admirers of John Stuart Mill, was torn down, the operations actually beginning while a committee formed to assure its preservation and conversion into a museum was holding its first meeting!

3. The Mill-Taylor Collection, British Library of Political and Economic Science (London School of Economics), vol. 53.

(according to a diary Mary Taylor kept at the time) did there "the work of three months in three weeks. Half a ton of letters to be sorted, all manner of rubbish to be separated from useful things, books to be dusted and selected from, arrangements to be made for sale, and 18 boxes to be packed."⁴

A considerable part of Mill's library and at least some of his papers were disposed of at a sale held at Avignon from May 21 to 28, 1905.⁵ Some of the manuscripts were acquired by a local bookseller, Romanille, from whom at least one bound volume was bought by an American scholar,⁶ while a London clergyman bought a manuscript entitled "On Social Freedom" which he published (reputedly with the consent of Helen Taylor, who had died a few months before it appeared) as a posthumous work of Mill in the Oxford and Cambridge Review of June, 1907, and which was republished in book form under Mill's name as late as 1941, though it now appears that it was not a work by Mill but a manuscript sent to Mill for his opinion by one of his admirers.⁷

On their return to England Helen Taylor had been taken by her niece to Devon, where she died at Torquay on January 29, 1907. As she appears, in the words of the younger woman, long before that time to have "lost her memory to a great extent," all business, even the signing of legal documents, was conducted on her behalf by Mary Taylor. One of the first steps taken by the latter soon after the return to England was, on the advice of John Morley, to give that part of Mill's and Helen Taylor's library which had been stored in London to Somerville College (one of the women's colleges at Oxford). Miss Taylor retained a few books and Somerville College was to be entitled to dispose of what it did not want and in the course of 1906 actually sold some of the books.⁸

4. Ibid., vol. 58.

5. The manuscripts mentioned in the two following notes which are known to derive from this sale bear a printed label inside the front cover which states "De la bibliothèque de / John Stuart Mill / Vendue à Avignon / les 21, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28 Mai 1905." Some at least of the books are reported to have been bought by the poet Paul Mariéton and to have been left by him to the library at Avignon (see Jules V éran, "Le Souvenir de Stuart Mill à Avignon," Revue des deux mondes, septembre 1937), but attempts by several persons to find them there have failed.

6. This volume of manuscripts of various minor published works by Mill was bought by Professor George Herbert Palmer of Harvard University and given by him to the library of his University where it is now preserved in the Houghton Library, classed as "MS Eng 1105."

7. See the article by Jules V éran cited in note 5 above, and, for the evidence showing that the manuscript is not by Mill, J. C. Rees, Mill and His Early Critics (Leicester: University College, 1956).

8. There was also a story current in London twenty years ago that some of Mill's books had been given at some time to Morley College (a workingmen's college in the South of London); but though the library of that institution escaped when the main building was destroyed by bombs, no such books can be traced now, and unless they

It seems that shortly after Helen Taylor's death Mary Taylor placed the collection of Mill's correspondence in the hand of Mr. Hugh S. R. Elliot. Little is known about him or the authority he was given and the fragments of information we have about the proceedings are somewhat puzzling. There is extant an account by Mr. Elliot of his relations to Mary Taylor⁹ from which the following passages may be quoted:

As to the private letters of Mill to his wife & daughter, we hesitated for a very long time about them; but Miss Taylor, who is a lady of very peculiar ideas and habits, did not wish them to be published. She has it in her mind to bring out another volume in a few years' time, consisting exclusively of Mill's letters to his wife, daughter, and sisters; but wants to delay this until the last of Mill's sisters¹⁰ is dead. Whether it will ever be done I cannot say. She guards the letters very jealously; and it was only after much pressure and persuasion that I was allowed to see them at all.

As to her published introduction, following mine in the book, it was entirely an afterthought. In the study of the private letters, I formed a very unfavourable opinion both of Mrs. Mill and of Miss Helen Taylor. It appeared to me that they were both selfish and somewhat conceited women, and that Mill (who must have been a very poor judge of character) was largely deceived with regard to them. Of course I could not state my views openly in a book which is published by Miss Mary Taylor at her own expense. But in my original introduction, I found it impossible to allude to the women without unconsciously conveying into my language some suggestion of what I thought. To this Miss Mary Taylor took the strongest possible exception. I reconsidered the whole matter, but found myself unable to speak any more favourably of them than I had done. For some days Miss Taylor declined even to see me, and we were completely at a deadlock; but at last it was agreed that I should omit all mention of Mill's private life and that Miss Taylor should herself write a second introduction (for which I took no responsibility) and say what she liked. I did not greatly care for her contribution, but it was a necessary compromise. Myself, however, I entertain no sort of doubt that Miss Taylor is right in her main belief that there was no "guilty" intrigue. . . .

There is, on the other hand, an account which the late Sir Frederick R. Chapman gave twenty-five years ago in a letter to an American scholar:

Miss Mary [Taylor] mentioned another fact that seemed very strange to me. She had placed the whole of the copies of Mr. Mill's correspondence at the disposal of Mr. Elliot when assisting him in the preparation of the published letters. When he had made his selection he induced her to destroy the rest save only what she termed the "intimate letters" which she intended to embody in another book. I understand that the book has never appeared.

—
were among a quantity of books stored in the destroyed main building the story is probably incorrect. On the whole it seems that all the books, except "a box" returned to Mary Taylor, stored in the Pantechnicon in 1905, were given to Somerville College, which still has the original list.

9. In a letter by Hugh Elliot to Lord Courtney, dated May 8, 1910. MS at London School of Economics.

10. Mrs. Mary Colman, who died on January 15, 1913.

Assuming that she has told me the actual facts I should say that her weakness is as remarkable as Mr. Elliot's meaningless advice or request to destroy the balance of the letters which must have been very numerous.¹¹

Though Sir Frederick's recollection was no doubt correct, there is every reason to doubt Miss Taylor's account of the events and it is by no means certain that any destruction of letters did take place at that time (whatever may have happened at Avignon in 1905). Not only most of the letters which Mr. Elliot published but so many others are known to have been preserved that I am on the whole inclined to think that nothing was destroyed then.

Mary Taylor appears to have proceeded with her plan of preparing a further volume of family letters and it seems that by the beginning of 1918 she had, with the assistance of Miss Elizabeth Lee (sister of Sir Sidney Lee and author of the article on Helen Taylor in the Dictionary of National Biography), completed a typescript and was negotiating through a literary agent (Mr. A. P. Watts) with Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. concerning publication. Since the files of all parties involved (the literary agent, the publishers, Miss Mary Taylor's solicitors and, at least in part, her literary executors) were destroyed by fire during the London "Blitz" in December, 1940, it is now impossible to say with certainty why it was not published. But some letters of Mary Taylor together with the recollections of one of the partners of the literary agents (Mr. C. A. Watts, who in his old age still distinctly remembered the "irresponsible Miss Mary Taylor") show that after a period of irresolution Miss Taylor suffered a "nervous breakdown," accompanied by insomnia and illusions. After certification she was in March, 1918, taken to an institution in London where she died on November 6, 1918.

In her will Mary Taylor had left all copyrights and letters and correspondence referring to John Stuart Mill and Helen Taylor to the National Provincial Bank Ltd. as residuary legatees and literary executors who were to be free to use this material in any way they saw fit. An inventory of her possessions mentions among the contents of "a gunpowder proof safe," a collection of "Public Letters to and from J. S. Mill A to Z," and a packet of private letters. The former together with various other manuscript material the Bank decided, on the report of a Mr. P. W. Sergeant who had been asked to value them, to sell by auction, while it was thought that "the intimate letters relating to the family quarrel . . . could not be offered for sale publicly."

11. A letter by Sir Frederick R. Chapman to Professor J. M. McCrimmon, now of the University of Illinois, Urbana, Illinois, dated July 26, 1935. I wish to thank Professor McCrimmon for letting me have the text of this letter and permitting me to reprint it. The episode is briefly discussed on p. vi of Professor McCrimmon's doctoral dissertation in Northwestern University Library.

A first sale was accordingly held at Sotheby's of London on March 29, 1922, which produced a gross amount of £276.19.—. Of this, however, £200 were paid on behalf of the Trustees of the Carlyle House Memorial Trust for a set of seventy-seven letters by Thomas Carlyle to Mill (which in the following year were published by Mr. Alexander Carlyle in Letters of Thomas Carlyle to John Stuart Mill, John Sterling and Robert Browning [London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1923]). The twenty-one lots of Mill manuscripts proper seem all to have been bought by various London booksellers and altogether to have fetched no more than £76.19.—. They appear to have contained numerous notebooks, mostly botanical, and miscellaneous correspondence. Most of the Mill manuscripts now in various American libraries derive from this sale.¹² Quantitatively the largest part (although much of it of a kind not readily salable otherwise) was in 1926 sold by one of the booksellers to the Library of the London School of Economics, where it constitutes the nucleus of the Mill-Taylor Collection, since much enriched by many additions.

Because of the loss of part of the relevant files of the National Provincial Bank, we do not know why the sale of a large part of the papers was postponed for five years. But on June 27, 1927, Sotheby's sold another fourteen lots described as "The Property of Miss Mary Taylor, dec.," containing mostly letters to Mill, but also one lot containing "upwards of 132 autograph letters to his wife on literary work and travel." It seems that both the material now at Yale University Library and that acquired by Lord Keynes and now at King's College, Cambridge, derive from this sale. The National Provincial Bank apparently retained only the small collection of correspondence exchanged between Mill and his brothers and sisters and a few family documents and portraits, all of which were in 1943 presented by the Bank to the London School of Economics for inclusion in the Mill-Taylor Collection.

Although it seemed appropriate to use this occasion to give an account of what happened to Mill's own books and papers, the material deriving from them could in fact make little contribution to the present edition. This is intended to cover the period up to 1849, which, because Mill did not then keep copies of his letters, is so little represented in Elliot's edition of his letters, which was based on his papers. In so far as the present collection was to go beyond bringing together the considerable number of earlier letters that had been published in a great variety of places and a few unpublished ones known to be preserved in libraries, the main effort had to be directed towards tracing descendants of Mill's correspondents in the hope that some of their papers might be preserved. This indeed absorbed the greater part of the time I was able to devote to the project, yet the results were not great. Even in England, where in general family papers are preserved perhaps longer than anywhere else, two wars have led to the destruction of much of the extraordinary quantity of manuscript material which had accumulated by 1914. It was not so much destruction by enemy action as the appeal for old paper for salvage and the insistence of air-raid wardens that lofts should be cleared of all inflammable matter which caused most of the loss. In more than one instance it seemed at least likely that what I was searching for had only a short while before left the place where it had rested undisturbed for two or three generations. I should add that wherever I succeeded in tracing descendants of Mill's correspondents, my inquiries were invariably met with the greatest courtesy and helpfulness. I can of course not claim that I have exhausted even all the likely leads and no doubt in the course of time further letters by Mill will turn up by accident. But while I do not feel that further systematic search in England would be likely to produce much, there may well be such opportunities on the Continent and particularly in France which, during the greater part of the time I was engaged on this work, was inaccessible to me. If, for instance, good fortune had somewhere preserved the letters which for some years after his visit to France as a boy Mill wrote to his "first friend" Antoine Jérôme Balard,¹³ later a distinguished chemist, these would probably tell us more about his early development than any document which might still be found in England.

12. See the annotated catalogues of this and the second sale in the British Museum Library.

There are various obligations I have incurred in the work on the material now published in this volume and which I wish to acknowledge in this place. All the work I did on the collection was done while I held a professorship at the London School of Economics and Political Science and I have received all sorts of assistance from the Economic Research Division of that institution, including the provision of assistance and of some funds for various incidental expenditures. Dr. Ruth Borchardt and Miss Dorothy Salter (now Mrs. F. H. Hahn) in succession helped me for long periods of the work. I must also especially mention the Library of the London School of Economics, or the British Library of Political and Economic Science as it is officially called, which as custodian of the Mill-Taylor Collection not only has provided much of the material of this book but also has often helped by buying at my suggestion documents to which I otherwise might not have obtained access. It was in these circumstances very generous of the authorities of the School to give first to me and then to Professor Mineka permission to use the material collected in any way we thought best. Of the many others who in various ways have helped I ought to single out the National Provincial Bank Ltd. which, after so many years conscientiously watching over the interests of Mill's heirs, finally decided to hand over to the uses of scholarship what the bombs had spared of the papers of the late Mary Taylor.

13. Cf. the reference to Balard in Mill's letter to Auguste Comte dated August 12, 1842—Letter 367 in the present collection.

The chief credit for the appearance of this edition, however, belongs of course to the editor. Only those who have tried their hands at this kind of task at least on a small scale will appreciate the amount of painstaking care and ingenuity that has to be devoted to an edition of the size of the present one before the reader can use it with the implicit trust and ease which a good editor's work assures. I am the more indebted to Professor Mineka because he was prepared to take over the more burdensome part of the task I had half-playfully commenced. The tracing of unpublished manuscripts is the kind of detective work which most people will enjoy doing as a recreation in their spare time. But while the pleasure of the hunt was largely mine, the solid hard work to which the reader owes this edition is entirely Professor Mineka's.

F.A.H.

University of Chicago
January, 1962

Abbreviations and Short Titles

A. Carlyle: Letters of Thomas Carlyle to John Stuart Mill, John Sterling and Robert Browning, ed. Alexander Carlyle, New York, 1923

Arsenal: Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, Paris

Autobiog.: Autobiography of John Stuart Mill, published for the first time without alterations or omissions from the original manuscript in the possession of Columbia University, with a Preface by John Jacob Coss, New York, 1924

BFR: The British and Foreign Review, or European Quarterly Journal, 1835–44

Bain, JSM: Alexander Bain, John Stuart Mill: A Criticism: With Personal Recollections, London, 1882

Bain, James Mill: Alexander Bain, James Mill: A Biography, London, 1882

Brit. Mus.: British Museum, London

Caroline Fox, Journals. See Pym

Cosmopolis: "Letters of John Stuart Mill to Gustave d'Eichthal," ed. Eugène d'Eichthal, in Cosmopolis, VI (April-May, 1897), 21–38, 348–66, and IX (Feb.-March, 1898), 368–81, 780–90

D'Eichthal Corresp.: John Stuart Mill, Correspondance inédite avec Gustave d'Eichthal, 1828–1842, 1864–1871, éd. Eugène d'Eichthal, Paris, 1898 (same as preceding, but translated into French)

Dissertations: John Stuart Mill, Dissertations and Discussions: Political, Philosophical, and Historical, 4 vols., London, 1859–75

ER: The Edinburgh Review, 1802–1929

Early Draft: The Early Draft of John Stuart Mill's Autobiography, ed. Jack Stillinger, Urbana, 1961

Elliot: The Letters of John Stuart Mill, ed. Hugh S. R. Elliot, 2 vols., London, 1910

FQR: The Foreign Quarterly Review, 1827–46

Fawcett: Mrs. [Millicent] Fawcett, Life of the Right Hon. Sir William Molesworth, London, 1901

Fraser's: Fraser's Magazine for Town and Country, 1830–82

Garnett: Richard Garnett, The Life of W. J. Fox . . ., concluded by Edward Garnett, London, 1910

Hayek: F. A. Hayek, John Stuart Mill and Harriet Taylor: Their Friendship and Subsequent Marriage, London and Chicago, 1951

JSM: John Stuart Mill

- Johns Hopkins: The Johns Hopkins University Library
- Kew: Archives of the Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew
- King's: Keynes Collection, King's College Library, Cambridge University
- Kitchel: Anna T. Kitchel, George Lewes and George Eliot: A Review of Records, New York, 1933
- Knight: "Unpublished Letters from John Stuart Mill to Professor Nichol," ed. William Knight, in Fortnightly Review, LXVII (May, 1897), 660-78
- LSE: The British Library of Political and Economic Science, at the London School of Economics and Political Science
- LWR: London and Westminster Review, 1836-40
- Leeds: Brotherton Library, University of Leeds
- Lévy-Bruhl: Lettres inédites de John Stuart Mill à Auguste Comte, publiées avec les réponses de Comte, éd. L. Lévy-Bruhl, Paris, 1899
- Lindley: Dwight N. Lindley, "The Saint-Simonians, Carlyle, and Mill," unpublished Columbia University dissertation, 1958 (available from University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Mich.)
- Logic: John Stuart Mill, A System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive; Being a Connected View of the Principles of Evidence and the Methods of Scientific Investigation, 2 vols., London, 1843
- MR: The Monthly Repository, 1806-38
- MacMinn, Bibliog.: Bibliography of the Published Writings of John Stuart Mill, ed. Ney MacMinn, J. R. Hains, and James McNab McCrimmon, Evanston, Ill., 1945
- Mayer: Alexis de Tocqueville, Œuvres, papiers et correspondances, édition définitive publiée sous la direction de J.-P. Mayer, Paris, 1951- , tome VI, Correspondance anglaise, éd. J.-P. Mayer et Gustave Rudler, Paris, 1954
- Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent: Francis E. Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent: The Monthly Repository, 1806-38, Chapel Hill, N.C., 1944
- Morrison: Catalogue of the Collection of Autograph Letters and Historical Documents Formed between 1865 and 1882 by Alfred Morrison, compiled and annotated under the direction of A. W. Thibaudau, 6 vols., London, 1883-92, IV
- NLS: The National Library of Scotland, Edinburgh
- Napier Corresp.: Selections from the Correspondence of the late Macvey Napier, Esq., ed. by his son, Macvey Napier, London, 1879
- Packe: Michael St. John Packe, Life of John Stuart Mill, London, 1954
- Pankhurst: Richard K. P. Pankhurst, The Saint Simonians, Mill and Carlyle, London, [1957]
- Pym: Memories of Old Friends, Being Extracts from the Journals and Letters of Caroline Fox, from 1835 to 1871, ed. H. N. Pym, 2nd ed., 2 vols., London, 1882
- QR: The Quarterly Review, 1809-

Tait's: Tait's Edinburgh Magazine, 1832–61

Thom: The Life of the Rev. Joseph Blanco White, Written by Himself; with Portions of his Correspondence, ed. John Hamilton Thom, 3 vols., London, 1845

Towers: C. M. D. [Robertson] Towers, "John Stuart Mill and the London and Westminster Review," Atlantic Monthly, LXIX (Jan., 1892), 58–74

Tuell, John Sterling: Anne Kimball Tuell, John Sterling: A Representative Victorian, New York, 1941

UCL: Library of University College, the University of London

WR: Westminster Review, 1824–1914

Yale: Yale University Library

THE EARLIER LETTERS OF JOHN STUART MILL
1812-1837

My dear Sir,

121

Mr. Walker is ~~a~~ very intimate friend of mine, who lives at
No. 31 in Berkeley square. I have engaged him, ~~as soon as~~ ^{he is} soon coming here, first to go to your house, and get from me
the 3^d and 4th volumes of Hooker's Roman history. But I am ~~going to~~ ^{recapitulating} the 1st and 2^d volumes, having finished them all except a few pages of the 2^d. I will be glad if you will let him have the 3^d and 4th volumes. I am very sincerely
Yours, John Stuart Mill.
Greenwich, 1812.

. . . 1812-1830 . . .

1. TO JEREMY BENTHAM¹

[July 28, 1812]²

MY DEAR SIR,

Mr. Walker³ is a very intimate friend of mine, who lives at No. 31 in Berkeley Square. I have engaged him, as he is soon coming here, first to go to your house, and get for me the 3.^d and 4.th volumes of Hooke's Roman history.⁴ But I am recapitulating⁵ the 1.st and 2.^d volumes, having finished them all except a few pages of the 2.^d. I will be glad if you will let him have the 3.^d and 4.th volumes.

I am yours sincerely

JOHN STUART MILL.

Newington Green,
Tuesday 1812.

1. Addressed: Jeremy Bentham Esq. / Queen Square Place / Westminster. The holograph of this letter (Brit. Mus. Add. MSS 33,544, f. 621) is believed to be the earliest extant in the handwriting of John Stuart Mill.

Jeremy Bentham (1748 NS-1832). The intimate connection between James Mill and the great Utilitarian philosopher began about 1808, when JSM was two years old. In 1810 Bentham, in order to maintain a closer collaboration with the elder Mill, gave him as a residence the house once John Milton's, which Bentham owned and which adjoined Bentham's home known as Queen Square Place. A few months' trial of the house proved it to be so little habitable that Mill was obliged to move his family. Until 1814 they lived at Newington Green, when Bentham at last secured Mill as a neighbour by leasing No. 1 Queen Square and renting it to him at a reduced rate. Bentham, who had also been a child prodigy, interested himself in JSM's education. Beginning in 1809 the Mill family often paid extended summer visits to Bentham at his summer homes, first at Barrow Green House, Oxted, and later at Ford Abbey. (See Letters 2 and 3.) Shortly before JSM wrote this letter his father had evidently mentioned to Bentham his forebodings of what his own untimely death might mean to his son's education. Bentham, in a letter to James Mill dated July 25, 1812, promised, "if you will appoint me Guardian of Mr. John Stewart [sic] Mill, I will in the event of his father's being disposed of elsewhere, take him to Q.S.P. [Queen Square Place] and there or elsewhere, by whipping or otherwise, do what soever . . . necessary and proper, for teaching him to make all proper distinctions, such as between the Devil and the Holy Ghost, and how to make Codes and Encyclopedias and whatsoever else may be proper to be made, so long as I remain an inhabitant of this vale of tears . . ." (MS at Yale). A portion of James Mill's acceptance of the offer, printed in Bain, James Mill, pp. 119-20, expresses the hope that "we may perhaps leave him [JSM] a successor worthy of both of us."

2. A note on the verso in another (probably Bentham's) hand says 29 July 1812, but Tuesday of that week fell on July 28.

3. For this note, and notes 4 and 5, see next page.

2. TO AN UNIDENTIFIED FRIEND OF THE FAMILY¹

September 13, 1814

I have arrived at Ford Abbey without any accident, and am now safely settled there. We are all in good health, except that I have been ill of slight fever for several days, but am now perfectly recovered.

It is time to give you a description of the Abbey.² There is a little hall and a long cloister, which are reckoned very fine architecture, from the door, and likewise two beautiful rooms, a dining-parlour and a breakfast-parlour adorned with fine drawings within one door; on another side is a large hall, adorned with a gilt ceiling; and beyond it two other rooms, a dining and drawing-room, of which the former contains various kinds of musical instruments, and the other is hung with beautiful tapestry.

To this house there are many staircases. The first of them has little remarkable up it, but that three rooms are hung with tapestry, of which one contains a velvet bed, and is therefore called the velvet room. The looking-glass belonging to this room is decorated with nun's lace.

Up another staircase is a large saloon, hung with admirable tapestry, as

3. Unidentified.

4. Nathaniel Hooke, The Roman History, from the Building of Rome to the Ruin of the Commonwealth (4 vols., London, 1738-71, and later editions). By a happy coincidence JSM's essay based on Hooke's history has been preserved. A friend of the family copied it out in a manuscript now in the possession of the British Museum (Add. MSS 33,230). The six-year-old JSM did more, however, than merely recapitulate uncritically Hooke's history, as this footnote reveals: "Plutarch (vi[vide] p. 273, 301) calls this man Publicola. But Hooke (vi p. 255) and Dionysius Halicarnassus (chronology of the Consuls (pp. 766-7) calls him Poplicola. It is always spelt Ποπλικολας (Poplicola) in Greek not Πυβλικολας (Publicola). Therefore that is the reason of its being Poplicola in Dionysius not Publicola, as in Plutarch. Livy also calls him Poplicola. I know not the reason of its being Poplicola in Hooke and Livy. It is also spelt Ποπλιος (Poplius) in Greek, not Πυβλιος (Publius). It must doubtless be a mistake in Langhorne's Plutarch."

5. Substituted for "going over," which has been crossed out.

* * * *

1. Published in Bain, JSM, pp. 4-5. MS not located. The portion in brackets is Bain's summary. Bain says, "The event which gave rise to the letter was the migration of the whole family (in July) to Bentham's newly acquired residence, Ford Abbey, in Somersetshire." The first paragraph would seem to suggest a somewhat earlier date than Bain gives. On July 30 James Mill wrote Francis Place from Ford Abbey: "Mrs. Mill & the children arrived in safety on Monday evening. . . . John has had a pretty sharp indisposition for the last two days; occasioned by something in disorder in the digestive system, which a sudden change in times & modes of dieting has probably occasioned. Today he is better; but he has had so much fever, as to be already weakened" (Brit. Mus. Add. MSS 37,949, f. 18).

2. This was the first year of Bentham's occupancy of Ford Abbey. The Mill family spent substantial portions of the following three years with him there. For other accounts of the building, see Bain, James Mill, pp. 129-36; Works of Jeremy Bentham, ed. J. Bowring (Edinburgh and London, 1838-43), X, 478-80; and C. M. Atkinson, Jeremy Bentham (London, 1905), p. 163.

also a small library. From this saloon issues a long range of rooms, of which one is fitted up in the Chinese style, and another is hung with silk. There is a little further on a room, which, it is said, was once a nursery; though the old farmer Glyde, who lives hard by, called out his sons to hear the novelty of a child crying in the Abbey! which had not happened for the whole time he had lived here, being near thirty years. Down a staircase from here is a long range of bedrooms, generally called the Monks' Walk. From it is a staircase leading into the cloisters. The rest of the house is not worth mentioning. If I was to mention the whole it would tire you exceedingly, as this house is in reality so large that the eight rooms on one floor of the wing which we inhabit, which make not one-quarter of even that floor of the whole house, are as many as all the rooms in your house, and considerably larger.

I have been to the parish church which is at Thornecomb. Mr. Hume³ has been here a great while. Mr. Koe⁴ came the other day, and Admiral Chietekoff⁵ is expected. Willie⁶ and I have had rides in Mr. Hume's curricule.

[He goes on to say—] What has been omitted here will be found in a journal which I am writing of this and last year's journeys. [He then incontinently plunges again into descriptive particulars about the fish-ponds, the river Axe, the deer-parks, the walks, and Bentham's improvements.]

3. TO MRS. HARRIET BURROW¹

Ford Abbey, Oct. 27th 1817

DEAR GRANDMOTHER,

I write to you now, as both my Sisters are writing, and there is not likely to be another parcel going to town for a great while.

I have very little news to tell you: Willie has informed you of the accident which has happened to James's² eye. Willie, Harriet,³ and Clara,⁴ have

3. Joseph Hume (1777–1855), radical MP 1818–55, was a lifelong friend of James Mill from the time of their schooldays at Montrose Academy in Scotland.

4. John Herbert Koe (1783–1860), barrister, and later judge of county courts, had been for some time an amanuensis of Bentham.

5. Paul Vasilievitch Tchitchagof (or Chichagov) (1767–1849), Russian admiral, was a friend of Bentham and his brother, Sir Samuel, who had spent a number of years in Russia.

6. Wilhelmina Forbes Mill (1808–1861), JSM's eldest sister.

* * * *

1. MS at LSE. Addressed: Mrs. Burrow. Published in Packe, p. 35.

Mrs. Burrow, JSM's maternal grandmother, was of a Yorkshire family. After the death of her husband she continued to administer his private asylum for the insane at Hoxton.

2. James Bentham Mill (1814–1862), JSM's brother.

3. Harriet Isabella Mill (1812–ca. 1897).

4. Clara Esther Mill (1810–1886).

begun music: and you learn from Willie's and Clara's letters, this also. Willie and Clara are ready to begin the first lesson: Harriet has not finished the treble notes.

The rainy weather has at length set in here, after an exceedingly dry autumn. I am however very glad to say, that no rain now can do any injury to the crop, which is almost all in.

We are still learning to write. How much Willie and Clara have improved you will know by reading their letters.

I hope that all my aunts and uncles are very well. I did not know that I had a new little cousin, till Willie saw it in the paper. I believe my Mother has written to you a very long letter: and I suppose that she has told you all the little news that we have: so that I have very little to tell you: moreover, I had only two days notice to write four letters: or else I would probably have written more.

We are all in very good health, except little Jane,⁵ who has got a little cough. I had lately the tooth-ache very bad. I hope that you are also in very good health.

Since we were here, there has been a groping in the pond for eels. Mr. Bragg's two sons went into the mud, (after almost all the water had been let out) and groped with their hands for eels. Those caught were, many of them, very large ones. A number of trout, caught in the river, were afterwards put in that pond.

All of us send our love to you and all our other relations, and our good friends. I am,

Your affectionate Grandson

JOHN STUART MILL

4. TO SIR SAMUEL BENTHAM¹

Acton Place, Hoxton, July 30, 1819

MY DEAR SIR,

It is so long since I last had the pleasure of seeing you that I have almost forgotten when it was, but I believe it was in the year 1814, the first year we were at Ford Abbey. I am very much obliged to you for your inquiries with respect to my progress in my studies; and as nearly as I can remember I will endeavour to give an account of them from that year.

5. Jane Stuart Mill (1816?–1883).

* * * *

1. Published in Bain, JSM, pp. 6–9. MS not located. A copy of the first three paragraphs, in an unidentified hand, is at Johns Hopkins. On June 17, 1820, Jeremy Bentham in a letter to David Ricardo discussing the importance of securing James Mill's assistance in establishing a "Chrestomathic" school in Bentham's garden, cited

In the year 1814, I read Thucydides, and Anacreon, and I believe the Electra of Sophocles, the Phœnissæ of Euripides, and the Plutus and the Clouds of Aristophanes. I also read the Philippics of Demosthenes.

The Latin which I read was only the Oration of Cicero for the Poet Archias, and the (first or last) part of his pleading against Verres. And in Mathematics, I was then reading Euclid; I also began Euler's Algebra, Bonnycastle's principally for the sake of the examples to perform. I read likewise some of West's Geometry.

Æt. 9.—The Greek which I read in the year 1815 was, I think, Homer's Odyssey. Theocritus, some of Pindar, and the two Orations of Æschines, and Demosthenes on the Crown. In Latin I read the six first books, I believe, of Ovid's Metamorphoses, the five first books of Livy, the Bucolics, and the six first books of the Æneid of Virgil, and part of Cicero's Orations. In Mathematics, after finishing the first six books, with the eleventh and twelfth of Euclid, and the Geometry of West, I studied Simpson's Conic Sections and also West's Conic Sections, Mensuration and Spherics; and in Algebra, Kersey's Algebra, and Newton's Universal Arithmetic, in which I performed all the problems without the book, and most of them without any help from the book.

Æt. 10.—In the year 1816 I read the following Greek: Part of Polybius, all Xenophon's Hellenics, The Ajax and the Philoctetes of Sophocles, the Medea of Euripides, and the Frogs of Aristophanes, and great part of the Anthologia Græca. In Latin I read all Horace, except the Book of Epodes; and in Mathematics I read Stewart's Propositiones Geometricæ, Playfair's this "letter, which I believe you [Ricardo] saw, and which though I have never told him [James Mill], I intend to trumpet forth in print" as proof of James Mill's skill as an educator. "The letter in question is one written by John Mill in answer to one from my Brother to me, concerning the progress made by him in his studies." (The Works and Correspondence of David Ricardo, ed. Piero Sraffa [11 vols., Cambridge, 1951–55], VIII, 198.) There is no evidence that the letter was printed before Bain published it. Bain records that the letter was given to J. A. Roebuck in 1827 by Jeremy Bentham's amanuensis, and that it was endorsed in Bentham's handwriting:

1819	John Mill
July	to	Acton
30	S B	place
J Ms and Sisters
Studies since 1814
15 years old
24 May 1821

Sir Samuel Bentham (1757–1831), younger brother of Jeremy, naval architect and engineer, rose to the rank of brigadier general in the service of Russia; in England, was Inspector General of Navy Works, 1795–1807, and Commissioner of the Navy, 1807–12. After retirement he bought an estate in the south of France. This letter may have served to pave the way for Sir Samuel's invitation to JSM to come to France for an extended residence in 1820–21. Its account of his studies should be compared with that in his Autobiography.

not James 1824-1825
no track see Bentham at Acton
Benthamian
at Acton
1824
Bentham
Bentham

Trigonometry at the end of his Euclid, and an article on geometry in the Edinburgh Encyclopædia. I also studied Simpson's Algebra.

Æt. 11.—In the year 1817 I read Thucydides a second time, and I likewise read a great many Orations of Demosthenes and all Aristotle's Rhetoric, of which I made a synoptic table. In Latin I read all Lucretius, except the last book, and Cicero's Letters to Atticus, his Topica, and his treatise, De Partitione Oratoria. I read in Conic Sections an article in the Encyclopædia Britannica (in other branches of the mathematics I studied Euler's Analysis of Infinities and began Fluxions, on which I read an article in the Encyclopædia Britannica), and Simpson's Fluxions. In the application of mathematics I read Keill's Astronomy and Robinson's Mechanical Philosophy.

Æt. 12.—Last year I read some more of Demosthenes, and the four first Books of Aristotle's Organon, all which I tabulated in the same manner as his Rhetoric.

In Latin, I read all the works of Tacitus, except the dialogue concerning oratory, and great part of Juvenal, and began Quintilian. In Mathematics and their application, I read Emerson's Optics, and a Treatise on Trigonometry by Professor Wallace, of the Military College, near Bagshot, intended for the use of the cadets. I likewise re-solved several problems in various branches of mathematics; and began an article on Fluxions in the Edinburgh Encyclopædia.

Æt. 13.—This year I read Plato's dialogues called Gorgias and Protagoras, and his Republic, of which I made an abstract. I am still reading Quintilian and the article on Fluxions, and am performing without book the problems in Simpson's Select Exercises.

Last year I began to learn logic. I have read several Latin books of Logic: those of Smith, Brerewood, and Du Trieu,² and part of Burgersdicius, as far as I have gone in Aristotle. I have also read Hobbes' Logic.

I am now learning political economy. I have made a kind of treatise from what my father has explained to me on that subject,³ and I am now reading Mr. Ricardo's work⁴ and writing an abstract of it. I have learnt

2. Seven years later JSM and the friends associated with him in the study club that met at George Grote's home in Threadneedle Street reprinted Du Trieu's work (see Autobiog., p. 85): Philippus Du Trieu, Manuductio ad Logicam; sive Dialectica Studiosae Juventuti ad Logicam Praeparandae. Ab Editione Oxoniensi anni 1662 Recusa. Londini, typis B. M'Millan, 1826. A copy of this rare reprint is at the University of Chicago; another is at Somerville College, Oxford.

3. JSM's first instruction in the subject was given to him by his father during their walks (Autobiog., p. 19): "He expounded each day a portion of the subject, and I gave him next day a written account of it, which he made me rewrite over and over again until it was clear, precise, and tolerably complete. . . . The written outline of it which resulted from my daily compte rendu served him afterwards as notes from which to write his Elements of Political Economy."

4. David Ricardo, Principles of Political Economy and Taxation (London, 1817);

a little natural philosophy, and, having had an opportunity of attending a course of lectures on chemistry, delivered by Mr. Phillips, at the Royal Military College, Bagshot,⁵ I have applied myself particularly to that science, and have read the last edition of Dr. Thomson's system of chemistry.

What English I have read since the year 1814 I cannot tell you, for I cannot remember so long ago. But I recollect that since that time I have read Ferguson's Roman and Mitford's Grecian History. I have also read a great deal of Livy by myself. I have sometimes tried my hand at writing history. I had carried a history of the United Provinces from their revolt from Spain, in the reign of Phillip II., to the accession of the Stadtholder, William III., to the throne of England.

I had likewise begun to write a history of the Roman Government, which I had carried down to the Licinian Laws. I should have begun to learn French before this time, but that my father has for a long time had it in contemplation to go to the Continent, there to reside for some time.⁶ But as we are hindered from going by my father's late appointment in the East India House,⁷ I shall begin to learn French as soon as my sisters have made progress enough in Latin to learn with me.

James Mill played a major part in the production of this work, for it was undertaken by his reluctant friend only after Mill's persistent insistence.

Ricardo seems to have been genuinely interested in JSM's development, invited the boy to his home, and on the very day (Sept. 5, 1823) when he was stricken with his fatal illness addressed to James Mill an extended criticism of a paper by JSM on the measure of value (Works of David Ricardo, IX, 385-87).

5. For an account of this experience and of the impression made by JSM at the College, see his father's letter to Ricardo, Oct. 26, 1818 (Works of David Ricardo, VII, 313-14). Ricardo in reply commented on JSM's retired education and noted the boy's "need of that collision which is obtained only in society, and by which a knowledge of the world and its manners is best acquired" (ibid., p. 326).

6. That James Mill had talked with his friends about moving his family to France as early as the autumn of 1814 may be seen in a letter from Edward Wakefield to Francis Place, Nov. 27, 1814 (Brit. Mus. Add. MSS 35,152, ff. 114-15). On Sept. 6, 1815, James Mill wrote to Francis Place to encourage the latter to join him in moving to the Continent: "I foresee nothing there which would make it uncomfortable for us to reside as soon as we please. Assure yourself that the French people will soon be very quiet & contented slaves, & the despotism of the Bourbons a quiet, gentle despotism. There I may live cheap—my children will acquire a familiarity with the language & with the manners & character of a new people. When they have enough of this we shall remove into Germany, till the same effects are accomplished, & after that if we please, we may go to Italy. We shall then return accomplished people, and, men & women of us, I hope, able to do something for the cause of mankind. We shall, at any rate, have plenty of knowledge; the habit of living upon little; & a passion for the improvement of the condition of mankind" (Brit. Mus. Add. MSS 35,152, ff. 160-64).

7. He was appointed on May 12, 1819, as Assistant to the Examiner of India Correspondence at a salary of £800. Rising by fairly rapid steps, he became head of the office, with the rank of Examiner, on Dec. 1, 1830. JSM was appointed a junior clerk in the office on May 21, 1823.

I have now and then attempted to write Poetry. The last production of that kind at which I tried my hand was a tragedy. I have now another in view in which I hope to correct the fault of this.

I believe my sister Willie was reading Cornelius Nepos when you saw her. She has since that time read some of Cæsar; almost all Phædrus, all the Catiline and part of the Jugurtha of Sallust, and two plays of Terence; she has read the first, and part of the second book of Lucretius, and is now reading the Eclogues of Virgil.

Clara has begun Latin also. After going through the grammar, she read some of Cornelius Nepos and Cæsar, almost as much as Willie of Sallust, and is now reading Ovid. They are both now tolerably good arithmeticians; they have gone as far as the extraction of the cube root. They are reading the Roman Antiquities and the Greek Mythology, and are translating English into Latin from Mair's Introduction to Latin Syntax.

This is to the best of my remembrance a true account of my own and my sisters' progress since the year 1814.

I hope Lady Bentham, and George,⁸ and the young ladies are in good health.

Your obedient, humble servant,

JOHN STUART MILL.

To Sir Saml. Bentham.

5. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

Montpellier² 17 Janv. 1821

MADAME

Je n'ai reçu que depuis deux jours la lettre dont vous avez bien voulu m'honorer. Croyez, Madame, à ma reconnaissance de tout ce qu'elle contient: reconnaissance qui aurait été grande, si vous aviez écrit sous de

8. George Bentham (1800–1884), son of Sir Samuel, became one of the most distinguished of nineteenth-century botanists.

* * * *

1. Addressed: A / Madame Austin. MS at King's.

Sarah Austin, née Taylor (1793–1867), translator and miscellaneous writer. She married John Austin (1790–1859), later known as a writer on jurisprudence, in 1819. Their first home was in Queen Square, in close proximity to the homes of Jeremy Bentham and James Mill. JSM quickly grew fond of the Austins, and they were close friends for many years. JSM studied German with Mrs. Austin, and in 1821–22 Roman law with her husband. As a young man JSM often greeted her in his letters as "Dear Mütterlein," but in later life he criticized her severely (The Early Draft of John Stuart Mill's Autobiography, ed. Jack Stillinger [Urbana, 1961], pp. 147–48).

2. JSM was the guest of Sir Samuel Bentham and family from June, 1820, to June, meilleures auspices: jugez donc combien elle doit l'être dans le cas actuel. J'avoue que je ne suis point digne de cet effort que vous avez fait pour m'écrire: puisque deux ou trois lignes à la fin d'une lettre à mon père sont tout ce que vous avez eu de ma part, depuis que j'ai quitté l'Angleterre. Je vous prie de vouloir bien pardonner ma négligence, et recevoir cette lettre en expiation de ma faute. Puisque vous lisez toutes mes lettres à mon père, il est inutile que je vous raconte la manière dont je m'occupe ici: la lettre qui accompagne celle-ci vous donnera tous les renseignements là dessus que vous pouvez désirer. Il ne me reste donc plus qu'à vous remercier des bons conseils que vous me donnez: ne doutez pas qu'ils ne produisent tout l'effet que vous souhaitez.

Le cours publics que je suis dans ce moment ne termineront pas encore de quelque temps. Le professeur de Logique³ ne fait guère que d'entrer dans son sujet: le professeur de Zoologie⁴ n'a fait encore que douze leçons. Il est cependant probable que si les cours durent encore longtemps, je n'en attends pas la fin: Je partirai d'ici au milieu du mois prochain, pour retourner à Paris. J'aurai donc l'honneur de vous revoir avant qu'il soit longtemps: J'espère que nous aurons l'occasion de causer ensemble sur toutes les choses dont vous parlez, et sur beaucoup d'autres dont je n'ai pas la place ni le temps de vous entretenir momentanément. Ce sera alors que j'aurai l'honneur de vous assurer moi même de ma reconnaissance, non seulement de l'intérêt que vous prenez à tout ce qui m'arrive, mais de la bonté avec laquelle vous vous êtes donné la peine de soigner l'éducation de mes sœurs: Je ne sais si elles sentent toute l'étendue de cette bonté, mais je vous assure que je la sens, et que je ne manquerai pas de vous en remercier, à mon retour, de vive voix. — Je suis très fâché que vous ne jouissiez pas d'une santé pareille à mes vœux: J'espère qu'elle vous sera 1821, first at Sir Samuel's château in the valley of the Garonne, then at an apartment in Toulouse. In the fall, after an extended tour of the Pyrenees, the Bentham's took him to a new estate which they had purchased near Montpellier. For about six months JSM attended courses in the Faculté des Sciences in the local university. A manuscript letter-journal addressed to his father and covering approximately the first six months of his stay in France is in the British Museum (Add. MSS 31,909). Professor Anna Jean Mill has recently published most of this journal as well as portions of a contemporary notebook of JSM which is in her possession: John Mill's Boyhood Visit to France (Toronto, 1960).

3. One M. Gergonne, "a very accomplished representative of the eighteenth century metaphysics" (JSM, Autobiog., chap. II). Identified by Professor Mill as Joseph Diez Gergonne (1771–1859), professor of astronomy and Dean of the Academy at Montpellier. An exercise book containing JSM's notes on Gergonne's lectures on logic is at LSE. Professor Mill prints the text of the notes on the 19th lecture (John Mill's Boyhood Visit to France, pp. 110–15). Another notebook, entitled by JSM, "Traite de Logique / redigé d'après le cours de Philosophie / de M. Gergonne / Doyen de la Faculté des Sciences / de l'Académie de Montpellier / avec des Notes / par J. Mill," is in the Pierpont Morgan Library.

4. Professor Mill identifies him as Jean Michel Provençal.

bientôt rendue. Veuillez bien, assurez M^r votre époux de mes sentimens de reconnaissance pour lui; et croyez, Madame, que je serai toujours,

Votre serviteur très obligé

Pardonnez mon embrouillement.

J. S. MILL

6. TO JAMES MILL¹

[Paris]

25 Avril 1821

MON CHER PÈRE,

Je vous écris cette lettre de Paris, où je suis arrivé hier, après un heureux voyage. Vous voyez que mon départ a été un peu retardé, presque de jour en jour, mais je n'ai pas la place de vous donner des détails: ce sera pour la prochaine lettre que je ne tarderai pas à vous envoyer. Il y a long tems que je ne vous ai rien écrit. Ce n'est pas qu'il me manquait de la matière, mais il y a bien près d'un mois que je devais partir incessamment de Montpellier, par conséquent pour diminuer le post, je n'ai pas voulu pas écrire avant mon arrivée ici. J'aurai encore de quoi remplir deux longues lettres pour ramener le journal à la date de la présente. Je vous les enverrai de suite.

J'apprends par vos deux lettres à M. Say,² qu'il a eu l'extreme complaisance de me communiquer, qu'il est décidé que j'irai passer quelque tems à Caen. Je suis bien convaincu que vous avez formé cette détermination après avoir bien pesé le pour et le contre: et c'est certainement vous êtes le plus capable d'en juger. Cependant malgré le respect que je dois à M. Lowe,³ et les bontés qu'il a pour moi, je ne vous cache pas que je suis fâché d'aller chez lui en revenant de chez M. Bentham, et cela principalement parceque je vois bien que cela fait de la peine à toute la famille. Ne croyez pas qu'ils soient guidés par l'amour propre, mais leur plus grand desir était toujours que je revinsse chez vous aussitôt que je les eusse quittés pourque vous puissiez juger des instructions qu'ils ont eu la bonté de me donner, et savoir si leurs idées cadrent avec les vôtres. Ce n'est pas le sentiment d'un seul d'entre eux mais de toute la famille; et je ne puis que me féliciter qu'ils n'aient pas su d'abord que je devais aller

1. Original not located. Text from copy contained in unpublished letter of Jeremy Bentham to Sir Samuel Bentham, in Brit. Mus., Add. MSS 33,545, f. 516.

2. Jean Baptiste Say (1767-1832), prominent French economist. In 1814 Say had visited England and through James Mill had been introduced to Ricardo and Bentham. JSM was a guest in Say's home for a time in 1820. (See Works of David Ricardo, VI, xxv.)

3. Joseph Lowe, a Scottish friend of James Mill and a writer on statistical subjects, who had emigrated to Caen in 1814.

ailleurs que chez vous après les avoir quittés: car s'ils l'avaient su je suis persuadé qu'ils ne se seraient jamais donnés tant de peine pour mon instruction—Je ne puis plus écrire; croyez que je serai toujours votre dévoué et obéissant fils

J. S. MILL

7. TO JAMES MILL¹

[Norwich]

[Autumn, 1822]²

[The letter begins with a short account of his studies. He read Blackstone (with Mr. Austin) three or four hours daily, and a portion of Bentham's "Introduction" (I suppose the "Morals and Legislation") in the evening.] I have found time to write the defence of Pericles³ in answer to the accusation which you have with you. I have also found some time to practise the delivery of the accusation, according to your directions. [Then follows an account of a visit of ten days with the Austins to the town of Yarmouth, with a description of the place itself. The larger part of the letter is on the politics of Norwich, where "the Cause" (Liberal) prospers ill, being still worse at Yarmouth. He has seen of Radicals many; of clear-headed men not one. The best is Sir Thomas Beever,⁴ whom he wishes to be induced to come to London and see his father and Mr. Grote.⁵ At Yarmouth he has dined with Radical Palmer,⁶ who had opened the borough to the Whigs; not much better than a mere Radical.] I have been much entertained by a sermon of Mr. Madge,⁷ admirable as against

1. Published in Bain, JSM, pp. 27–28. MS not located. The portions in brackets are Bain's summary.

2. According to Bain, the letter was undated, but written while on a visit to Norwich with the Austins. The approximate date, however, can be inferred from the reference to the composition of the defence of Pericles here and in the succeeding letter.

3. In his Autobiog. (pp. 50–51) JSM records that after he wrote his first argumentative essay in the summer of 1822 his father recommended that his next exercise in composition should be of the oratorical kind: "Availing myself of my familiarity with Greek history and ideas and with the Athenian orators, I wrote two speeches, one an accusation, the other a defence of Pericles, on a supposed impeachment for not marching out to fight the Lacedemonians on their invasion of Attica."

4. A mis-spelling of the name of Sir Thomas Branthwayt Beevor (1798–1879), a Norfolk squire who became a supporter of William Cobbett.

5. See Letter 8, n. 1.

6. Presumably Nathaniel Palmer (1779–1854), solicitor. The Examiner for Jan. 20 and May 19, 1822, in reports of Norfolk County meetings on Jan. 12 and May 11, 1822, respectively, summarized portions of the remarks by Mr. N. Palmer of Yarmouth, attacking the Tory ministry.

7. Rev. Thomas Madge (1786–1870), co-pastor of Octagon Chapel (Unitarian), Norwich, 1811–25; minister of Essex Street Chapel, Strand, London, 1825–60.

Calvinists and Catholics, but the weakness of which as against anybody else, I think he himself must have felt. [The concluding part of the letter should have been a postscript—]

I wish I had nothing else to tell you, but I must inform you that I have lost my watch. It was lost while I was out of doors, but it is impossible that it should have been stolen from my pocket. It must therefore be my own fault. The loss itself (though I am conscious that I must remain without a watch till I can buy one for myself) is to me not great—much less so than my carelessness deserves. It must, however, vex you—and deservedly, from the bad sign which it affords of me.

8. TO MR. AND MRS. GEORGE GROTE¹

Q[ueen] S[quare] 14 Nov^r. 1822

MY DEAR SIR AND MADAM,

I crave pardon for addressing you jointly. It is a liberty for which, like a true lawyer, I have two reasons, a technical and a rational one. My technical reason (for confirmation of which vide Blackstone) is that baron and feme are one person in law. My utilitarian reason is that to do otherwise might imply that I failed of rendering to one of you, the tribute of gratitude which your friendship so justly deserves at my hands.

I have little news to tell you, save that which regards the Util. Soc.² On this subject my father still preserves the most profound silence. (I am sure that I shall often remind you of the pleasure with which I anticipate its meetings, by the life-and-death style in which I speak and write about it). The unsettled state of mind in which Alfred³ has been, and is still kept, from the uncertainty of his destination, has prevented him from giving any attention to the thing: and I have great fears that in the event of his being able to enter into it at all he will still have too little time to read and to study hard on Utilitarian subjects. Still I have great hopes of him, but I

1. MS in the possession of Mr. E. F. Buxton, Fairbridge, Tonhill, Kent, in 1944.

George Grote (1794–1871), banker, MP (1832–41), and historian of Greece, was introduced to James Mill by David Ricardo in 1819 and soon became an intimate of the Bentham-Mill circle. He and his wife Harriet (née Lewin) frequently entertained many of the Benthamite group in their home over the banking establishment in Threadneedle Street. Except for some later periods of estrangement from Mrs. Grote, JSM was a lifelong associate of the couple.

2. The Utilitarian Society, the first of the study and discussion groups with which JSM was associated (Autobiog., p. 56). The Society at first consisted of only three members, Richard Doane, W. G. Prescott, and JSM. Later members included Eyton Tooke, William Ellis, George J. Graham, and J. A. Roebuck.

3. Identification uncertain. Possibly Alfred Say, son of the French economist, J. B. Say.

have greater hopes of R. Doane,⁴ who as I see, is very much in earnest about the thing, who has read my father's *Pol. Ec.*⁵ with great attention as a preparative. He has also made considerable progress in writing his introductory essay; and I will venture to prophecy, from what I know of him by his conversation and by the application which he shows, notwithstanding his want of encouragement, that he will be an active and useful member, and will profit by the Society, as well as that he will be a source of profit to all the other members.—I have not seen Mr. W. Prescott⁶ since I saw you last, but it is unnecessary that I should see him till Alfred's fate is decided. As for myself, I have not only completed Jug True,⁷ but have commenced writing for the *Util. Rev.*⁸ and I hope that, on your return, the Defence of Pericles,⁹ which is now undergoing a transmutation from a highly illegible to a tolerably legible state, will undo all the impression which the accusation may have made on your mind. (A propos, pardon this scrawl).

You who interest yourself so strongly in favour of M. Berchet,¹⁰ will be delighted with Santa Rosa:¹¹ who grows every day in the good opinion of all the Utilitarians who see him. I hope to see him play a conspicuous role in your society: both for his own sake, and for yours.

ERRATUM in your letter. For STERN MORALIST read DESPONDING PHILANTHROPIST. It is the more appropriate appellation. The other I do not think at all correct.

Yours ever

J. S. MILL

4. Richard Doane, then an amanuensis to Jeremy Bentham. It was he who secured permission for the Society to meet in Bentham's house. Doane was called to the bar of the Inner Temple in 1830, and practised in the courts until his death on Feb. 8, 1848.

5. Elements of Political Economy (London, 1821).

6. William George Prescott (1800–1865), then junior partner in the banking firm of Grote, Prescott, & Co.

7. The reference is obscure, but may be to his lost "reply to Paley's Natural Theology" (Early Draft, ed. Stillinger, p. 79). Bentham and his friends often denominated Christianity as Jug (shortened form of Juggernaut).

8. Possibly the plans for the Society included the establishment of such a review, but the reference is more probably to the long-projected Benthamite organ which eventually materialized in Jan., 1824, as the Westminster Review.

9. See preceding letter, n. 3.

10. Probably Giovanni Berchet, Italian poet and patriot then a refugee in England, rather than Ambrogio Berchet, likewise an Italian refugee. See M. C. W. Wicks, The Italian Exiles in London, 1816–1848 (Manchester, 1937).

11. Santorre Annibale de Rossi de Pomarolo, Count of Santarosa (1783–1825), Italian patriot, who had arrived in London in early Oct., 1822, after having been denied further refuge in France. Santarosa was an especial favourite of Sarah Austin. See ibid., and Gordon Waterfield, Lucie Duff Gordon (London, 1937), p. 36.

9. TO EDWIN CHADWICK¹

Saturday afternoon
[February 19, 1827]

DEAR CHADWICK

As Graham² is unable to walk tomorrow we had better perhaps postpone our walk to next Sunday.

Very truly yours
J. S. MILL

10. TO EDWIN CHADWICK¹

E.I.H. [East India House]
Monday
[March 26, 1827]

DEAR CHADWICK

If you have any influence with Thwaites,² you will oblige me greatly by exercising it in favour of a gentleman of the name of Taylor³ who is about to appear for the first time as a public singer, at the Concert at Covent Garden or Drury Lane (I forget which) on Wednesday. I could tell you much about Mr Taylor which would interest you very strongly in his behalf, but this I reserve till I see you. I believe his qualifications to be of a very high order, but he does not ask to be praised, he is only anxious that if he

1. Addressed: Edwin Chadwick Esq / 9 Lyon's Inn. Postmark: 8 MORN 8 / 19 FE / 1827. MS at UCL.

Edwin (later Sir Edwin) Chadwick (1800–1890), sanitary reformer. At this time, a law student and journalist; secretary to Jeremy Bentham, 1831–32; member of various Poor Law, factory, and sanitary commissions. A lifelong friend and correspondent of JSM.

²George John Graham (1801–1888), a member of JSM's Utilitarian Society; in 1838 became Registrar General of Births and Deaths.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Edwin Chadwick Esq. / 9 Lyon's Inn. Postmark: 2.A.NOON / MR26 / 1827 and T.P. / Lombard St. Paper watermarked 1818. MS at UCL.

2. The proprietor of the Morning Herald, for whom Chadwick had worked as a reporter.

3. Edward Taylor (1784–1863), after having failed in business, was at this time embarking upon a career in music, in which he achieved distinction. From 1837 to 1863 he was Gresham Professor of Music, Gresham College, London. His performance on March 28, 1827, at Covent Garden was favourably reviewed in the Morning Chronicle on March 29. JSM had probably become acquainted with the Taylor family of Norwich through John Austin and his wife Sarah (Taylor) Austin.

should sink, he may sink quietly, without being treated with severity or with ridicule.

Very truly yours

J. S. MILL

I should say perhaps that I write to you not at his request but at that of his relations who are my very particular f[riends].⁴

J.S.M.

11. TO EDWIN CHADWICK¹

Thursday

½ past four

[April 12, 1827]

DEAR CHADWICK

Being engaged to breakfast with M^cCulloch² tomorrow, I cannot walk before breakfast—but if the weather should be sufficiently fine to tempt you out I shall hope to meet with you chez Graham at eleven: Elliott³ has been informed.

I hope you are not the “young law student of Lyon’s Inn” whose chère amie tried to throw herself into the Thames yesterday?

yours most truly

J. S. MILL

P.S. What is the reason that you lawyers always have pens with nibs an inch wide?

12. TO EDWIN CHADWICK¹

Saturday

2 o’clock

[1827?]

DEAR CHADWICK

Graham is absolutely engaged tomorrow, & I am conditionally so. I have therefore agreed with Grant² not to walk tomorrow unless Elliott comes,

4. Corner torn off.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Edwin Chadwick Esq. MS at UCL. Published in S. E. Finer, The Life and Times of Sir Edwin Chadwick (London, 1952), p. 11, but dated 1824. The date is established by the event recorded in the second paragraph. The Times on April 12, 1827, p. 3, reported the attempted suicide of one Mary Ann Jones, who had been “cohabiting with a young law student of Lyon’s Inn.”

2. John Ramsay McCulloch (1789–1864), economist.

3. Thomas Frederick Elliot (1808–1880), nephew of the first Earl of Minto, and later Permanent Assistant Under-Secretary for the Colonies, 1849–68.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Edwin Chadwick Esq. / 9 Lyon’s Inn. MS at UCL.

2. Horace Grant (1800–1859), a colleague of JSM in the Examiner’s office at the India House, 1826–45.

which I understand is not probable—But if you think he will come, pray come yourself and I shall be ready to join you.

Very truly yours

J. S. MILL

13. TO JEREMY BENTHAM¹

[ca. April 24, 1827]

I certainly did not understand you to have expressed any desire that my name should be in the title page. Nevertheless, if you positively require it, I am willing that it should be so,² rather than that you should imagine I had taken less pains with the work under the idea of its being (so far as I am concerned) anonymous. But I confess I should greatly prefer that my name should be omitted. That the work should be benefited by it is out of the question. I myself might be benefited inasmuch as it would prove that you thought me worthy to be the editor of a work of yours. But on

1. MS at Yale. Draft of letter on sheet used first to cover letter of another person addressed to "J. Bentham Esq. / 2 Queen Square Place / Westminster" and then to cover a note addressed "John S. Mill Esq." It is endorsed in JSM's hand "Notes from Mr. Bentham respecting the publication of my name as editor of his Rationale of Evidence" and has a label attached, "Notes from Mr. Bentham 1827 to 1830. No. 1." Published in part in Packe, p. 73.

Yale also has three letters by Bentham on this matter, to one of which this is evidently an answer.

Q.S.P. 18 Apr. 1827

Dear John

It is matter of no small surprise to me to see the title page without your name to it. Nothing could be more clearly understood between us than that it should be there. I do not say that the word title page was used on that occasion—but such was the meaning. If what you have done has been written under a different impression, so much the worse for me—and if the book be good for any thing, for the [world?] at large.

J.B.

J. S. Mill Esq.

Q.S.P. 24 / Apr. 1827

My dear John

Your name is of far too great importance to the work to be omitted in the title page to it.

J.B.

J. S. Mill Esq.

My substituted title I suppose you have. / If you have not you will let me know.

2. Bentham accepted JSM's reluctantly given consent:

Q.S.P. 24 Apr. / 1827

Dear John

Amen.

If you know not what that means send to the Booksellers for a Hebrew Dictionary.

J.B.

J. S. Mill Esq.

P.S. Name at the end of the Preface the other hand very little of the labour which I have bestowed upon the book appears on the face of it, or can be known to any one who was not acquainted with the MS.³ If my name were annexed to it people would think that I wished to make a parade either of your good opinion [of]⁴ me, or of the few notes which I have added.⁵ The notes are not of sufficient value to make it of any consequence to the public to know who wrote them—I should be very sorry to be suspected of wishing to obtain a reputation at a cheap rate by appearing before the public under the shelter of your name.

14. TO EDWIN CHADWICK¹

DEAR CHADWICK

[1827?]

Tooke² cannot come this evening—therefore I must beg you to defer your visit till further notice—Tuesday & Friday next he is disengaged, therefore I hope you will also keep yourself at liberty for one of those days—I cannot yet answer for myself.

Yours ever

J. S. MILL

15. TO EDWIN CHADWICK¹

DEAR CHADWICK

Tuesday
[1827?]

Tooke will be with me tonight.

Yours ever

J. S. MILL

3. JSM had begun in late 1824 or early 1825 preparing the Rationale of Judicial Evidence for publication. "Mr. Bentham had begun the treatise three times, at considerable intervals, each time in a different manner, and each time without reference to the preceding. . . . These three masses of manuscript it was my business to condense into a single treatise." (Autobiog., p. 80.) He had also to make Bentham's involved style readable, and to supply "any lacunae which he had left." The work was published in 1827 in five volumes, with a Preface signed John S. Mill. For JSM's later attitude to this work, see Letter 226, esp. n. 2.

4. Page torn.

5. The word "added" is crossed out but the word substituted for it, which may have been "appended," is mostly torn away.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Edwin Chadwick Esq. / 9 Lyon's Inn. Paper watermarked 1825. MS at UCL.

2. William Eyton Tooke (1808–1830), son of the economist Thomas Tooke (1774–1858) and one of JSM's closest friends. His suicide in 1830 (see Letter 29) deeply affected JSM.

* * * *

1. Watermark: 18[25?]. Paper appears identical with that of preceding letter. MS at UCL.

16. TO ARTHUR AYLMER¹

[Nov. 27, 1827]

London Debating Society

SIR

The half yearly subscription² for September last being now due, you are requested to forward it, with all arrears of former subscriptions, to my address.

I am, Sir

Your most ob^t. Serv^t.

J. S. MILL, Treasurer

1 Queen Square
Westminster

17. TO EDWIN CHADWICK¹

E.I.H.

Friday

[Dec. 22, 182(??)]

DEAR CHADWICK

I am requested by Mr. & Mrs. George Grote to beg the favour of your company at dinner this day se'nnight at six—62 Threadneedle Street. You will meet Graham and Roebuck,² & probably myself.

Very truly yours

J. S. MILL

1. Addressed: Arthur Aylmer Esq / 41 Great Russel [sic] Street / Bloomsbury. Postmarks: ??? / ??? / 1827; 2AN0ON2 / 27NO / 1827; ?ANOON? / 28[?]NO / 1827; and ??? / 27 NO / ??? On outside in another hand: "Turn Over" "Gone away not known where / T Redbourn / R T [?] Summers [?]" MS at LSE; a page of JSM's "Speech on the Church" (published in Autobiography by JSM, with an Appendix of Hitherto Unpublished Speeches, ed. Harold J. Laski [London, 1924], pp. 310–25) is written on verso. Actually a form letter in another hand; JSM filled in "September," his signature and address, and wrote the address on the outside.

Aylmer has not been identified.

Early Draft, ed. Stillinger (pp. 112–15) contains a somewhat fuller account of the founding and early years of the London Debating Society than does Autobiog.

2. Ten shillings.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Edwin Chadwick Esq. / 9 Lyon's Inn. Postmark: 2A. NOON / DE 22 182[?]. MS at UCL.

2. John Arthur Roebuck (1801–1879), politician. At this time a law student, he had first been introduced to JSM at the India House by Thomas Love Peacock about 1824. For some years Roebuck, George John Graham, and JSM (the "Trijackia" they called themselves) were very close friends. The cause of the ultimate break between JSM and Roebuck in the 1830's was probably Roebuck's disapproval of JSM's attachment to Mrs. John Taylor.

18. TO W. H. FERRELL¹

[Jan. 14, 1828]

London Debating Society

SIR,

I have the honour to recal [sic] your attention to my last half yearly circular, and to request that your arrears of Subscription, amounting to £1 may be discharged at your earliest convenience.

I have the honour to be,

Your obedient Servant

J. S. MILL, Treasurer.

1 Queen Square
Westminster

19. TO CHARLES COMTE¹

Londres, 25 janvier 1828.

MON CHER MONSIEUR COMTE

Je m'occupe depuis quelque temps d'une critique de la Vie de Bonaparte par Sir Walter Scott,² et surtout des deux premiers volumes, contenant une esquisse historique de la révolution française. Je ne me dissimule pas combien la tâche que je me suis imposée est au dessus de mes forces; mais on est ici dans une si crasse ignorance sur la révolution, et tous, jusqu'aux individus les plus instruits, ont des idées tellement ridicules sur la nature de cette crise politique, qu'avec mon peu de lumières et de connaissance des faits j'ai crû pouvoir faire quelque chose pour dessiller les yeux de mes compatriotes. C'est pour avoir des renseignemens un peu moins imparfaits sur quelques-uns des évènements les plus remarquables de la révolu-

1. Addressed: W. H. Ferrell Esq / 22 Hatton Garden. Postmarks: 12 NOON 12 / 14 JA / 1828 and 10FNOON10 / JA 15 / 1828. On outside in another hand: "Gone away not known where—G [?]. Ellis / E. Midzoth" [?] obscured by postmark. MS at LSE; the last page of JSM's "Speech on the Church" is written across the outside of the letter; across the letter itself is written: "write to Bowring." Like Letters 16, 21, and 23, this is a form letter; JSM filled in the amount of arrears (£1), his signature and address, and wrote the address on the outside.

Ferrell has not been identified.

* * * *

1. Addressed: A Monsieur / Monsieur Comte / Rue Richer / à Paris / France. Postmarks: Angleterre, and Janvier / 28 / 1828. MS at LSE.

François Charles Louis Comte (1782–1837), liberal political writer, son-in-law of the economist J. B. Say.

2. Published as "Scott's Life of Napoleon," WR, IX (April, 1828), 251–313.

tion, que j'ose vous prier de vouloir bien m'indiquer les preuves sur lesquelles s'appuient trois faits, énoncés comme certains dans votre Histoire de la Garde Nationale.³

1° L'intention qu'eut la cour, dans les jours antérieurs à l'époque de 14 juillet, de faire le procès des chefs du parti populaire.

2° L'intention qu'elle eut de faire la contre-révolution, en-faisant partir le roi de Versailles pour aller à Metz, à l'époque du repas des gardes du corps dans les premiers jours d'octobre 1789.

3° Les assurances solennelles faites par le roi à M. de Lafayette, avant le voyage de Varennes, qu'aucun projet d'évasion n'était entré dans sa tête.

Les preuves que j'ai pu recueillir sur ces trois faits ont bien assez de poids pour que moi en me[. . . ?]⁴ particulier je n'en doute nullement. Cependant elles ne montent pas audessus d'une grande probabilité, et il faut quelque chose de plus que des probabilités, pour satisfaire à un public aussi prévenu que le nôtre. Vous me ferez donc, Monsieur, le plus grand plaisir, en m'indiquant les moyens de parvenir à une certitude plus parfaite à l'égard de ces circonstances.

D'ailleurs, comme il est probable que vous ayez lû l'ouvrage de Sir Walter Scott, je n'ai pas besoin de vous dire combien d'obligation je vous aurais de toute indication que vous voulussiez bien me donner relativement aux erreurs de ce livre. Elles sont si nombreuses, qu'il est impossible de les relever toutes; mais, d'autant qu'on connaît un plus grand nombre, on est à portée de faire une meilleure choix, pour démontrer l'infidélité de cet ouvrage prétendu historique, et le faire tomber dans le décrédit absolu qu'il mérite.

Pour vous épargner pourtant une peine inutile, je dois vous dire que je sais déjà à peu près tout ce qu'on peut apprendre en lisant la plupart des Mémoires sur la Révolution, ainsi que les ouvrages historiques de Mignet,⁵ Toulangeon,⁶ et autres. Dans le cas donc où vous eussiez la bonté de me donner quelques renseignemens, il n'est pas besoin de vous occuper de ces matières-la.

Mon père me charge de le rappeler à votre souvenir, et de vous prier de servir d'interprète à ses sentimens auprès de M^{me} votre épouse, ainsi que de M. et M^{me} Say, et de leur aimable famille. Veuillez bien agréer le témoignage de mon respect et de mon amitié.

J. S. MILL

3. Histoire de la Garde nationale de Paris . . . (Paris, 1827).

4. MS torn.

5. F. A. M. Mignet, Histoire de la Révolution française de 1789 à 1814 (Paris, 1824; London, 1826). JSM had reviewed it with high praise in WR, V (April, 1826), 385-98.

6. François Emmanuel, vicomte de Toulangeon, Histoire de France depuis la Révolution de 1789 . . . (Paris, 1801-10).

20. TO JOHN BOWRING¹10th March 1828.

MY DEAR SIR

Your letter, which I received this morning, is a more good-natured one than I fear mine was. I am much obliged to you for not being offended at my taking huff as I did, and I will now tell you exactly what I think of Mr George Bentham's book²—and what I am ready to say of it, if you think that it would be more satisfactory to Mr Bentham³ than an entire omission.

I do not think that Mr. G. B's book affords any proof of want of talent—far from it—but many of haste, and want of due deliberation. This mistake was, as it seems to me, that of supposing that he was qualified to write on such a subject as Logic after two or three months' study, or that so young a logician was capable of maintaining so high a ground as that of a critic upon Whately.⁴ The consequences of his mistake have been twofold: first of all, he has produced nothing but minute criticism, which even when most just, is particularly annoying to the person criticized when so much stress appears to be laid upon it. This minute criticism is often just, sometimes very acute, but frequently, also, if I am not mistaken, altogether groundless. Instead of this, a good critic on Whately should have laid down as a standard of comparison, the best existing or the best conceivable exposition of the science, & examined how far Whately's book possesses the properties which should belong to that. In the second place, Mr George Bentham seems not to be aware, that Dr Whately is a far greater master of the science than he is, & that the public will think the disproportion still greater than it is. It would therefore have been wiser in him not to have assumed the tone of undisputed & indisputable superiority over Whately, which marks the greater part of his critique. To be entitled to do this, a writer should not only be superior, but prove himself to be superior, in knowledge of the subject, to the author whom he criticizes. He should let people see that if he differs from Whately, it is not because W. knows more than he but because he knows more than W.

1. Addressed: John Bowring Esq. / 4 Highbury Park. Postmark: EVEN. 4 / MAR 10 / 1828. MS at LSE. Published with one omission in Packe, p. 65.

John Bowring (1792–1872), linguist, writer, and later statesman, had been editor of the Westminster Review since its inception in 1824. He was a close associate of Jeremy Bentham and became his literary executor.

2. George Bentham published An Outline of a New System of Logic in 1827.

3. Jeremy Bentham, George's uncle.

4. Richard Whately (1787–1863), then Principal of St. Alban's Hall, Oxford, and later (1831) made Archbishop of Dublin, had published his Elements of Logic in 1826.

I have put this more strongly, and enlarged upon it more fully, to you, than I should in the W. R.⁵ But I should think it wrong, in noticing the book, not to say something of this sort.

Very truly yours,
J. S. MILL

21. TO BENJAMIN KEEN¹

[April 23, 1828]

London Debating Society

SIR

The half yearly subscription for March last being now due, you are requested to forward it, with all arrears of former subscriptions, to my address.

Arrears £2
Subscrⁿ 10/

I am, Sir
You most ob^t. Serv^t.

J. S. MILL, Treasurer

1 Queen Square
Westminster

22. TO CHARLES COMTE¹

Londres
27 juin
1828

MON CHER M. COMTE

Vous me ferez plaisir en voulant bien accepter quelques exemplaires de ma critique de Walter Scott,² dont M. Bodin³ a la bonté de se charger. Je vous prie d'en garder autant que vous voudrez, et de placer les autres

5. No such review by JSM appeared in the Westminster.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Benjamin Keen Esq. / 1 Pump Court / Temple. Postmarks: 7. NIGHT.7/23.AP/1828 and 10.F.NOON.10/AP.25/1828. Endorsed: [Neither direction nor signature is legible] / T. Forth. MS at LSE; written on the verso of a page of the debating speech published by Laski as "Notes of my Speech against Sterling" (Autobiog. ed. Harold J. Laski, pp. 300–309). A form letter in another hand, except for details filled in by JSM, as in Letters 16 and 18.

Keen has not been identified.

* * * *

1. Addressed: A Monsieur / Monsieur Comte. MS at LSE.
2. See Letter 19, n. 2.
3. Possibly Félix Bodin (1795–1837), journalist and historian.

comme vous le trouverez bon. Je vous engage seulement à en faire part à M. Say, et de lui en donner un ou deux, s'il veut bien me faire l'honneur de les accepter.—Comme il est très probable que j'écrive encore quelques articles de revue, sur la révolution française et sur l'ancien régime, je désirerais beaucoup que ceux qui pourraient avoir les moyens et la bonne volonté de me faire parvenir des renseignemens utiles là dessus, pûssent juger au moyen de cette brochure, quelles sont ceux qui me manquent. Au reste, je ne vois guère que [?] moi en angleterre qui rendent justice à la révolution.

Agréez, Monsieur, l'expression de mes sentimens respectueux.

J. S. MILL

J'ai lieu de vous remercier très sincerement, de m'avoir fait faire la connaissance de M. Victor Jacquemont.⁴ Il me paraît très estimable à tous les égards.

23. TO ARCHIBALD THOMSON¹

[Nov. 26, 1828]

London Debating Society

SIR

The half-yearly subscription for September last being now due, you are requested to forward it, with all arrears of former subscriptions, to my address.

Arrears 10/

I am, Sir,

Subscrⁿ 10/

Your most ob^t. Serv^t.

J. S. MILL, Treasurer

The same to Mr Alfred Thomson (£ 1.)

1 Queen Square

Westminster

23A. TO THOMAS COATES (see page 742)

4. Victor Jacquemont (1801–1832), naturalist and traveller. Presumably JSM met him in London, where he consulted with British authorities and the East India Company before sailing for India in the summer of 1828.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Archibald Thomson Esq. / 17 Mitre Court Buildings / Temple. Postmarks: ?? ??? ?? / 26 NO / 1828 and ??VEN / NO 27 / 1828 and T.P. / B^dWay We^r. Endorsed: Gone abroad. [Two illegible signatures]. MS at LSE; written on the verso of a page of the debating speech published as "Notes of my Speech against Sterling" (Autobiog., ed. Harold J. Laski, pp. 300–309). A form letter in another hand, except for details filled in by JSM, as in Letters 16, 18, and 21.

Neither Thomson has been identified.

24. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹London, 11th March, 1829

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I have been so much occupied of late that I have not had leisure even to think of writing to you, and if your brother² had not afforded me the present opportunity, I should probably have deferred that pleasure some time longer. I hope that you will receive the Statements and Reports of the Council of the London University³ along with this letter, the Warden⁴ having promised to send them to me in time to be given to your brother before his departure. If he should omit to do so, which I trust he will not, I will take the earliest subsequent opportunity of sending them to you. I am glad to hear that you are busily engaged in writing on the subject of England, and am not surprised to learn that you find a great number of unexpected difficulties in giving an account of the state of society here.⁵ As there is nobody even in England who is by any means qualified to treat so immense a subject with any thing like completeness, it would be very wrong in you to be discouraged by finding that there is a great deal that you do not know—it is sufficient if you know, as I am satisfied you do, very much on the subject of England which is known to few, perhaps to none of your countrymen. It would have been a good thing for the interest of your book, if you had been here at this moment: you would have seen, what you did not see when you were here, a state of great political excitement. The excitement does not reach the labouring classes, but it pervades all the rest of the community to such a degree that, as I am credibly informed, it has to a great degree put a stop to buying and selling, at least

1. Addressed: A Monsieur / M. Gustave d'Eichthal / à Paris. Draft (incomplete) at LSE. MS at Arsenal. Published, with minor errors, in Cosmopolis, VI, 22–25, and in D'Eichthal Corresp.

Gustave d'Eichthal (1804–1886), son of a rich Jewish banking family, first became acquainted with the writings of Henri Saint-Simon through his mathematics teacher, Auguste Comte. D'Eichthal on a visit to England first saw JSM on May 30, 1828, when he accompanied Eytton Tooke to a meeting of the London Debating Society at which JSM spoke. D'Eichthal became a close friend of JSM, his chief contact with the Saint-Simonians, and a lifelong correspondent.

2. Adolphe d'Eichthal, younger brother of Gustave.

3. The first report of the council of the recently established University had been made on Oct. 30, 1826. Other early reports and statements by the Council are listed in H. H. Bellot, University College, London, 1826–1926 (London, 1929), App. I, pp. 429–30.

4. Leonard Horner (1785–1864), geologist and educator, was Warden of London University, 1827–31.

5. D'Eichthal's projected book on England was never completed. His son, Eugène d'Eichthal, later published some of the notes he had taken for the book: "Condition de la classe ouvrière en Angleterre (1828)," in Revue historique, LXXIX (May, 1902), 63–95.

on a large scale, as no one can think of any thing except the Catholic question. Since the debate in the House of Commons, and the majority of 188 in favour of the question, nobody doubts the success of the bill;⁶ and it is very gratifying, and most creditable to our ministers, that they have not clogged the measure with any objectionable or ungracious provisos or restrictions. The most disgraceful artifices have been employed by the Duke of Cumberland⁷ and Lord Eldon⁸ in order to work upon the mind of the King; & it is a fact which you may rely upon, that the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor,⁹ and Mr Peel,¹⁰ left Windsor on Wednesday last out of office, their resignations having been accepted, & the Anti-Catholics had already begun to arrange a ministry when the King grew alarmed and sent off an express to beg the Duke of Wellington still to consider himself in office. It is of the greatest importance that the probable effect of this measure should be known in France. Its effect in Ireland will be a trifle compared to its effect in England. It forms an era in civilization. It is one of those great events, which periodically occur, by which the institutions of a country are brought into harmony with the better part of the mind of that country—by which that which previously existed in the minds only, of the more intelligent portion only of the community, becomes the law of the land, and by consequence raises the whole of the community to its own level. The greatest advance in the national mind, until thus adopted by the government and incorporated in the institutions of the country, is the advance only of the leading minds, of those who already were furthest in advance: It does not bring forward the whole nation, but widens the distance between the advanced posts and the rear. Much as we have improved in the last 20 years, it is only a part of us that has improved, there remained millions of men in a state of the same brutal ignorance and obstinate prejudice in which they were half a century ago. But this measure will bring forward the rear-guard of civilization: it will give a new direction to the opinions of those who never think for themselves, & who on that account can never be changed unless you change their masters & guides. The intelligent classes lead the government, & the government leads the

6. This was a division on the first reading of the Catholic Emancipation bill in the early morning hours of Saturday, March 6. Final passage of the bill in the House of Commons came on March 30, and in the House of Lords on April 10; royal assent was granted on April 13, 1829.

7. Ernest Augustus, Duke of Cumberland (1771–1851), fifth son of George III, had long been strongly opposed to any relaxation of the Catholic penal laws.

8. John Scott, first Earl of Eldon (1751–1838), jurist, was twice Lord Chancellor.

9. John Singleton Copley, Baron Lyndhurst (1772–1863), had succeeded Eldon as Lord Chancellor in 1827.

10. Sir Robert Peel (1788–1850), long an opponent of Catholic Emancipation, but convinced that the country was determined to have it, in March 1829 introduced the bill for granting the measure.

stupid classes.—Besides all this, the alteration of so important and so old a law as that which excludes Catholics from political privileges, has given a shake to men's minds which has loosened all old prejudices, and will render them far more accessible to new ideas and to rational innovations on all other parts of our institutions: our ministry, moreover, having been so reviled and attacked by the Tory & high church party that it never can act in concert with them again, must now throw itself wholly on the liberals for support. As for the Tory party, it is broken; it is entirely gone. It placed all on this stake, & it has lost it. What would not in itself have taken much from their power, will now utterly destroy it, because, as they had mustered all their strength to resist this question, it is their decisive overthrow. Ten or twelve years ago, Lord Sidmouth¹¹ said to an acquaintance of mine, that the King's government had not strength to do any thing which the clergy opposed. That idea is now at an end; the clergy have opposed this with all their might, & as they have failed, the influence of the church, its moral influence at least, is gone. The Church has no hold on the affections of the people: All its influence rested upon the opinion of its power: It is now seen to have very little power; and the effect of this discovery will be so great that I really begin to think that I shall see the downfall of the church in my time. I have said nothing to you on any subject except the Catholic question, but it is so much the most important event now happening that I could hardly have chosen a topic likely to be more interesting to you. By the way, it is now certain that our ministers are disposed to carry freedom of trade even further than their predecessors: I hope that you will do the same. Believe me,

Yours ever

J. S. MILL.

25. TO JOHN STERLING¹

India House
Wednesday
[April 15, 1829]

DEAR STERLING

I have given a greater number of perusals to your note than I believe I ever gave to any epistle before. I should not however have troubled you with any answer to it, if you had not seemed to take sufficient interest in 11. Henry Addington, first Viscount Sidmouth (1757–1844), Tory politician.

* * * *

1. Published in Elliot, I, 1–3. MS at King's. The date has been pencilled in in a different hand. Paper bears 1827 watermark.

John Sterling (1806–1844), son of Edward Sterling (1773–1847), the "Thunderer" of The Times, though a writer of some merit, is best known as the subject of Thomas what concerns me, to lead me to believe that I might talk to you upon a subject so entirely personal as the state of my own mind without your considering it a bore or an intrusion. I was unwilling that you should leave the London Debating Society without my telling you how much I should regret that circumstance if it were to deprive me of the chance not only of retaining such portion as I already possess, but of acquiring a still greater portion of your intimacy—which I value highly for this reason among many others, that it appears to me peculiarly adapted to the wants of my own mind; since I know no person who possesses more, of what I have not, than yourself, nor is this inconsistent with my believing you to be deficient in some of the very few things which I have. But though I feared that this loss to myself would, or at least might, be the consequence of your resignation I never imputed that resignation to any other cause than those which you have stated, and which are, in good truth, cause sufficient. I am now chiefly anxious to explain to you, more clearly than I fear I did, what I meant when I spoke to you of the comparative loneliness of my probable future lot. Do not suppose me to mean that I am conscious at present of any tendency to misanthropy—although among the very various states of mind, some of them extremely painful ones, through which I have passed during the last three years, something distantly approximating to misanthropy was one.² At present I believe that my sympathies with society, which were never strong, are, on the whole, stronger than they Carlyle's finest biography. After leaving Cambridge in 1827, he was associated with his college friend, Frederick Denison Maurice, in the editing of the Athenæum, July-Dec., 1828. Disciples of S. T. Coleridge, he and Maurice joined the London Debating Society "as a second Liberal and even Radical party, on totally different grounds from Benthamism and vehemently opposed to it" (JSM, Autobiog., p. 90). In two debates devoted to discussing the respective merits of Wordsworth and Byron, JSM allied himself for the first time with Sterling and the Coleridge-Wordsworthians. (See Karl Britton, "J. S. Mill: A Debating Speech on Wordsworth, 1829," Cambridge Review, LXXIX [March 8, 1958], 418-23.) This was the beginning of the intimate friendship with Sterling, to whom JSM later said he had been more attached than he had ever been to any other man (Autobiog., p. 108). Sterling likewise testified to the value of the friendship: in a letter to his son, July 29, 1844, he wrote, "My intimacy with him [JSM] has been one of the great fortunes of my life,—though hardly—I suppose were ever two creatures more unlike than he & I" (Tuell, John Sterling, p. 69).

The occasion of this letter was Sterling's resignation from the London Debating Society. In the first draft of his Autobiography (see Early Draft, ed. Stillinger, p. 133) JSM attributed Sterling's resignation to an especially sharp exchange between the two of them in a debate involving their political philosophy. The resignation was followed, however, by the development of an even closer personal friendship than had previously existed. The earliest extant letter of Sterling to JSM, March 31, 1830 (King's), is concerned with seeking JSM's advice on assisting the Spanish rebels.

2. This seems to be the only reference in an extant letter to JSM's soul-crisis, which had its onset in the winter of 1826-27 and which is discussed in Autobiog., chap. v. Similar later disturbances, however, are mentioned in letters to Carlyle, e.g. Letter 72.

ever were. By loneliness I mean the absence of that feeling which has accompanied me through the greater part of my life, that which one fellow traveller, or one fellow soldier has towards another—the feeling of being engaged in the pursuit of a common object, and of mutually cheering one another on, and helping one another in an arduous undertaking. This, which after all is one of the strongest ties of individual sympathy, is at present, so far as I am concerned, suspended at least, if not entirely broken off. There is now no human being (with whom I can associate on terms of equality) who acknowledges a common object with me, or with whom I can cooperate even in any practical undertaking without the feeling, that I am only using a man whose purposes are different, as an instrument for the furtherance of my own. Idem sentire de republicâ, was thought by one of the best men who ever lived to be the strongest bond of friendship:³ for republicâ I would read “all the great objects of life,” where the parties concerned have at heart any great objects at all. I do not see how there can be otherwise that idem velle, idem nolle, which is necessary to perfect friendship.⁴ Being excluded therefore from this, I am resolved hereafter to avoid all occasions for debate, since they cannot now strengthen my sympathies with those who agree with me, & are sure to weaken them with those who differ.—Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL

26. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

London, 15th May 1829

MY DEAR D'EICHTHAL,

Many thanks to you for your interesting letter, which has been read not only by Tooke² and myself but by several others of our friends with very great pleasure. Before I say more, I will answer the question which

3. The thought of the quotation is characteristically Ciceronian, though it has not been possible to find in Cicero's writings a statement worded precisely in JSM's phrasing. Cf. Cicero, De Amicitia, iv, 15; De Officiis, I, xvi, 51; and Oratio Pro Cnæo Plancio, ii, 5.

4. Cf. Idem velle atque nolle, ea demum firma amicitia est (“An identity of likes and dislikes is after all the only basis of friendship”), Sallust, Bellum Catilinae, xx, 15. Cf. also this passage: “A question was started, how far people who disagree in a capital point can live in friendship together. Johnson said they might. Goldsmith said they could not, as they had not the same idem velle atque idem nolle—the same likings and the same aversions.” (James Boswell, Life of Samuel Johnson, ed. J. W. Croker [London, 1839], III, 218.)

* * * *

1. Addressed: A Monsieur / M. Gustave d'Eichthal. MS at Arsenal. Published in part in Cosmopolis, VI, 25–28, and in D'Eichthal Corresp., pp. 7–12.

2. Eyton Tooke also corresponded with D'Eichthal; some of his letters are in D'Eichthal Corresp.

your brother has just put to me in your name. The Parliamentary accounts of the expenses of management, amounts of deposit, and other information relating to Saving Banks are not at all mixed up with those of Benefit Societies. They are quite separate.—Nothing of much importance or interest has taken place here since the settlement of the Catholic question,³ except the discussion respecting the duties on Silk,⁴ which shews that our ministry is disposed not only to persevere in the measures of their predecessors with respect to free trade, but to carry the principle still further. It is much to be feared that they will not take the opportunity which the present state of our relations with Portugal affords, for abrogating the Methuen treaty,⁵ by which we are bound to admit the Portugal wines at a lower duty than those of other countries. If we were free from this engagement, it might be hoped that your ministry would consent to lower the duties on some of our manufactures, on condition of our lowering those on your wines. But I suppose the stupid affairs of Russia & Turkey would prevent any discussions between the two Governments on commercial policy at present.⁶—I am glad to hear that you have made so much progress in your work on England.⁷ I am however inclined to think from your letter to Tooke, that there is some danger of your praising this country beyond its due. You were very naturally struck with the superiority of the English to the French in all those qualities by which a nation is enabled to turn its productive and commercial resources to the best account. But this superiority is closely connected with the very worst point in our national character, the disposition to sacrifice every thing to accumulation, & that exclusive & engrossing selfishness which accompanies it. I am well aware how much of this is owing to our political institutions, under which every thing is accessible to wealth and scarcely any thing to poverty. But I fear that the commercial spirit, amidst all its good effects, is almost sure to bring with it wherever it prevails, a certain amount of this evil; because that which necessarily occupies every man's time & thoughts for the greater part of his life, naturally acquires an ascendancy over his mind disproportionate to its real importance; & when the pursuit of wealth, in a degree

3. See Letter 24, n. 6.

4. An extensive debate on the subject had taken place in the House of Commons on April 13 and 14.

5. English policy was in opposition to the reactionary King Miguel I, who had usurped the throne of Portugal. His young niece Maria, the legitimate Queen, was at this time in England. The Methuen Treaty had been in force since 1703. By it and a similar arrangement with Spain, Portuguese and Spanish wines had long been admitted into England at a much lower duty than French wines.

6. England and France were both deeply concerned in the Russo-Turkish War of 1828–29, and later this year both participated in a settlement of it which also guaranteed the independence of Greece.

7. See Letter 24, n. 5.

greater than is required for comfortable subsistence,—an occupation which concerns only a man himself & his family,—becomes the main object of his life, it almost invariably happens that his sympathies & his feelings of interest become incapable of going much beyond himself & his family. You must have observed even while you were here, although mixing as you did, with the best class of Englishmen, how difficult it is to interest them in any thing which has not some bearing upon what they call their advancement in life. In all countries you find men in middle life in a great degree selfish & worldly, but there are few countries besides this where even the young men are many of them avowedly so. In France or Germany the laughable aberrations of sentiment & enthusiasm are common, the odious ones of coldness & selfishness rare. In this country the reverse is the case. Here, it requires great tact & knowledge of society to enable a man to appear deeply in earnest on any subject without exposing himself to be laughed at—& the etiquette of what is called good society is to appear profoundly insensible to every impression, external or internal. You say that you dread to think what a great nation we shall be, now when we have got rid of bigotry. I do not myself think that bigotry was, or is, our worst point. It is indifference, moral insensibility, which we have need to get rid of. I wish that I saw the least chance of our improving in this respect, without either a political revolution, or such a change in our national education as it would, I fear, require a revolution to bring about. You are far ahead of us in France. You have only to teach men what is right, & they will do it: they are uninformed, but they are not prejudiced, & are desirous & eager to learn. Here, the grand difficulty is to make them desire to learn. They have such an opinion of their own wisdom that they do not think they can learn; & they have too little regard for other people to care much whether they learn or no, in things which only interest the nation in general, or mankind at large. Our middle class moreover have but one object in life, to ape their superiors; for whom they have an open-mouthed & besotted admiration, attaching itself to the bad more than to the good points, being those they can most easily comprehend & imitate. It is true that those who wish to do good, are here enabled, by that esprit d'association which you so much admire, to effect more, in proportion to their numbers, than they do in France. It is a great fault in your nation to surround themselves as you say with an atmosphere of personal vanity, which makes them desire to get all the honour of every thing to themselves, & not to call in the cooperation of others lest they should be compelled to share the credit with them. The fault of your public men certainly is, a desire for display. Here there is not so much anxiety of that kind. Applause which “leads to nothing”, is less valued. But the applause which has exchangeable value, that which produces its worth in pounds sterling, or in substantial power, the applause of the ruling classes, is as highly esteemed & as anxiously sought after here as elsewhere. We are it is true improving rapidly; chiefly however in throwing off prejudices. We no longer think our institutions the best possible; but we commit gross blunders in every attempt we make to mend them. Still it is something to have a fair field open. Sound ideas and good sense applied to public affairs, have, I believe, considerably more chance of being listened to & exercising influence at the present moment than at any time in the last hundred years. But where are they to be found? There are no men of talents among us. Our writers & our orators are, almost to a man, des gens mediocres. I do not know whether yours are any better; probably not; but they will be. We have at any rate not one member of either house of parliament who approaches within twenty degrees of M. de Broglie.⁸—Tooke desires me to ask you, whether you can recommend to him any French works adapted for the instruction of the people on the elements of the sciences of politics & morals. It seems that the Society for the Diffusion of Useful (or rather Useless) Knowledge⁹ has appointed a Translation Committee, of which Tooke is likely to be one of the most active members. I suppose that if there be any such works they must be very recent, I am almost sure there are none prior to the present century.—He also wishes to know whether you can point out any works which it would be worth while for him to read, for his own instruction, on French Administration, & on the science of Administration in general—a science so little studied here that we are indebted to France both for the name & the very idea.—Of course the thing goes on here as well as every where else, but it has been so little thought of or studied scientifically that the very word itself is not yet naturalized in our island. Tooke also wishes to know whether a collection of the works of St Simon¹⁰ & his school, just sufficient to give him an idea of their general views &

8. Achille Léonce Victor Charles, duc de Broglie (1785–1870), liberal statesman.

9. The Society, which Thomas Love Peacock nicknamed the “Steam Intellect Society,” had been founded in 1826 under the leadership of Henry Brougham to publish in inexpensive editions works on science, history, economics, ethics, and philosophy. For a good brief account of the Society’s activities, see R. K. Webb, The British Working Class Reader, 1790–1848 (London, 1955), pp. 66–73.

10. Claude Henri de Rouvroy, comte de Saint-Simon (1760–1825), founder of the school of French socialist thought which was to be the subject of many of JSM’s letters during the next three years. For studies of his connections with the movement, see Emery Neff, Carlyle and Mill (New York, 1926); Richard K. P. Pankhurst, The Saint Simonians, Mill and Carlyle (London, [1957]); and the unpublished Columbia University doctoral dissertation by Dwight N. Lindley, “The Saint-Simonians, Carlyle, and Mill” (1958), available from University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Mich. The best modern study of Saint-Simon is Frank E. Manuel’s The New World of Henri Saint-Simon (Cambridge, Mass., 1956).

principles, would be voluminous or expensive. I am only now about to begin to read the work of M. Comte¹¹ which you so strongly recommended to me. When I have read it, I shall be extremely desirous of having some discussion with you on the principles of the Producteur party, especially that respecting "l'hérédité de la propriété," on which subject their doctrine as you express it seems to me a great heresy, but of course I cannot tell what I should think of it until I know with what qualifications & reservations they receive it. I myself think, with Mr Bentham, that property ought to escheat to the state in preference to collateral heirs, where there is no testamentary disposition. You will probably have perceived from our debates that the proposition of introducing some system of Poor Rates into Ireland is about to be seriously entertained by our Government.¹² The progress of opinion on this subject within a few years has been very striking. I am inclined to think that the discussions on this subject will be extremely instructive, & well worthy of attentive consideration from your statesmen.

Believe me yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

27. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

London 8th October 1829

MY DEAR D'EICHTHAL

I can hardly expect forgiveness for having allowed so long an interval to elapse without writing to you, especially after you so warmly invited me, not only to write, but to correspond and discuss with you on some of the subjects on which it is of most importance that you, and I, and all men, should think rightly. The truth is however that it was long before I found time to read the books which you were so kind as to leave with me, and since that time I have been too much occupied with other things to be

11. Auguste Comte (1798–1857), pioneer sociologist and founder of positivism, with whom JSM conducted an extensive correspondence between 1841 and 1847 (see Letters 334 ff.), though the two never met. In 1828 D'Eichthal had sent JSM a copy of Système de politique positive, which Comte had written while still a disciple of Saint-Simon and which formed the Troisième cahier du Catéchisme des Industriels (1823).

12. The question had been discussed in the House of Commons on May 7, and on May 14 Lord Darnley presented a petition in the House of Lords for the extension of the English Poor Laws to Ireland in a modified form.

* * * *

1. Addressed: A Monsieur / M. Gustave d'Eichthal / à Paris. MS at Arsenal. Published, with minor errors, in Cosmopolis, VI, 28–32, and in D'Eichthal Corresp., pp. 13–21.

able to write to you at all. I have not yet been able to read any of the articles of the Producteur.² I cannot therefore give you my opinion so fully as I may perhaps hereafter, on the doctrines of the St Simon school. As far however as I can judge at present, if I were ever to become a proselyte of that school, it would rather be on the grounds of your last letter to me, than of any of the books I have read. In your letter I do not know that there is much in which I disagree though there are some things. I cannot say as much for the books. When I read the "Opinions Littéraires, Philosophiques et Industrielles"³ which I took up with some expectations, I was perfectly astonished at the shallowness of it. It appeared to me the production of men who had neither read nor thought, but hastily put down the first crudities that would occur to a boy who had just left school. When, however, I read Comte's "Traité de Politique Positive,"⁴ I was no longer surprised at the high opinion which I had heard you express of the book, & the writer, and was even seduced by the plausibility of his manner into forming a higher opinion of the doctrines which he delivers than on reflexion they appear to me at all entitled to. I find the same fault with his philosophy, that he does with the philosophy of the eighteenth century [;] it is only the partie critique which appears to me sound, the partie organique appears to me liable to a hundred objections. It abounds indeed, with many very acute remarks though all of them of a kind which the progress of events is suggesting at this moment to all minds, which are au niveau du siècle throughout Europe: but it is a great mistake, a very common one too, which this sect seem to be in great danger of falling into to suppose that a few striking and original observations, are sufficient to form the foundation of a science positive. M. Comte is an exceedingly clear and methodical writer, most agreeable in style, and concatenates so well, that one is apt to mistake the perfect coherence and logical consistency of his system, for truth.⁵ This power of systematising, of tracing a principle to its remotest consequences, and that power of clear and consecutive exposition which generally accompanies it, seem to me to be the characteristic excellencies of all the good French writers; and are nearly connected with their characteristic defect, which seems to me to be this: They are so well satisfied with the clearness with which their con-

2. A periodical (Oct., 1825–Dec., 1826) established after the death of Saint-Simon by his disciples, edited for the first six months as a weekly by a M. Cerclet and thereafter as a monthly by Barthélemy Prosper Enfantin.

3. By various writers, including Saint-Simon, Léon Halévy, Dr. Joseph Bailly, and Charles Duveyrier, Paris, 1825.

4. Evidently Comte's Système de politique positive. See Letter 26, n. 11.

5. This passage should be read in the light of Macaulay's slashing criticism of James Mill in three successive numbers (March, June, and Oct., 1829) of the Edinburgh Review, a criticism which is also reflected in JSM's Logic, VI, vii and viii. See also Autobiog., pp. 110–13.

clusions flow from their premisses, that they do not stop to compare the conclusions themselves with the fact though it is only when they will stand this comparison that we can be assured the premisses have included all which is essential to the question. They deduce politics like mathematics from a set of axioms & definitions, forgetting that in mathematics there is no danger of partial views: a proposition is either true or it is not, & if it is true, we may safely apply it to every case which the proposition comprehends in its terms: but in politics & the social science, this is so far from being the case, that error seldom arises from our assuming premisses which are not true, but generally from our overlooking other truths which limit, & modify the effect of the former. It appears to me therefore that most French philosophers are chargeable with the fault which Cousin imputes to Condillac,⁶ of insisting upon only seeing one thing when there are many, or seeing a thing only on one side, only in one point of view when there are many others equally essential to a just estimate of it. If I were to point out all the instances in which this fault is observable in Comte's book, I must go through every page, for it pervades his whole book; & as it seems to me, it is this fault which alone enables him to give his ideas that compact & systematic form by which they are rendered in appearance something like a science positive. To begin with the very first and fundamental principle of the whole system, that government and the social union exist for the purpose of concentrating and directing all the forces of society to some one end. He cannot mean that government should exist for more than one purpose, or that this one purpose should be the direction of the united force of society to more than one end. What a foundation for a system of political science this is! Government exists for all purposes whatever that are for man's good: and the highest & most important of these purposes is the improvement of man himself as a moral and intelligent being, which is an end not included in M. Comte's category at all. The united forces of society never were, nor can be, directed to one single end, nor is there, so far as I can perceive, any reason for desiring that they should. Men do not come into the world to fulfil one single end, and there is no single end which if fulfilled even in the most complete manner would make them happy. Then again when M. Comte comes to enquire what this end is, it must be either the dominion of man over man, which is conquest, or the dominion of man over nature, which is production: the first was the end of society in the ancient world & in the feudal ages, (not true in the least)—this is gone by, therefore the other must be the end of society now: why so, pray? Are conquest & production, the only two

6. The closest approximation to this criticism of Condillac that the present editor has been able to find is in the third lecture of Victor Cousin's Cours de l'histoire de la philosophie: Histoire de la philosophie du XVIII^e siècle (2 vols., Paris, 1829).

conceivable purposes that human beings can combine for! This is one of a thousand things which shew that the St Simon philosophy could only originate in France. If M. Comte were a native of England, where this idol "production" has been set up and worshipped with incessant devotion for a century back, & if he had seen how the disproportionate importance attached to it lies at the root of all our worst national vices, corrupts the measures of our statesmen, the doctrines of our philosophers & hardens the minds of our people so as to make it almost hopeless to inspire them with any elevation either of intellect or of soul, he would have seen that a philosophy which makes production expressly the one end of the social union, would render the only great social evil, of which there is much danger in the present state of civilisation, irremediable. It leads too, to the grand practical conclusion of the St Simon school, that the business of government must be placed in the hands of the principal industriels, the pouvoir temporel at least, & the pouvoir spirituel in the savans & artistes: I do not know how it may be in France, but I know that in England these three are the very classes of persons you would pick out as the most remarkable for a narrow & bigotted understanding, & a sordid & contracted disposition as respects all things wider than their business or families. I have a thousand things more to say on this subject, but I must pass to another. There is according to M. Comte only one law of the development of human civilisation. You who have been in England can say whether this is true. Is it not clear that these two nations, England & France, are examples of the advance of civilisation by two different roads, & that neither of them has, nor probably ever will, pass through the state which the other is in? It is the lower animals which have only one law, that of their instinct. The order of the developement of man's faculties, is as various as the situations in which he is placed. It is melancholy to observe how a man like M. Comte has had all his views of history warped & distorted by the necessity of proving that civilisation has but one law, & that a law of progressive advancement; how it blinds him to all the merits of the Greeks & Romans (& the demerits of the middle ages) because there was improvement in some things at such periods, he thinks there must have been so in all: why not allow that while mankind advanced in some things, they went back in others? There is positively no place for England in M. Comte's system: he has given a list of all the states which the social system can be in, and England is in none of them. Notwithstanding all this there are many excellent & new remarks in M. Comte's book: & if people could be contented to take part & leave the rest, these doctrines would probably receive the proper corrections & modifications & would be very valuable. But if the proselytes of Saint Simon insist upon forming a sect, which is a character above all to be avoided by independent thinkers [,] & imagine themselves under a necessity, if they belong to the sect, to take all its dogmas without exception or qualification, they will not only do no good but I fear immense mischief. Substituting one fragment of the truth for another is not what is wanted, but combining them together so as to obtain as large a portion as possible of the whole. I have not even left myself space to tell you with how much pleasure I have read your pamphlet, which has made almost an entire convert of me, and the few sheets which your brother shewed me of your work on England.⁷ I shall however write to you again by your friend, I hope I may now say our friend, M. Victor Lanjuinais,⁸ whom I hope I shall see more of when he returns from Scotland; what I have seen of him I like extremely. Meanwhile believe me

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

28. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

India House
London

7th November 1829

MY DEAR D'EICHTHAL,

As I am several letters in your debt, I take advantage of the departure of our friend M. Lanjuinais² to pay one instalment. To my great regret I have seen but little of M. Lanjuinais during his residence here, having been prevented first by his absence from town, then by my own, afterwards by his again, and finally by his departure before the expected period. However he permits us to hope that we shall see him again for a short time in the early part of next summer.—One object which I have in writing to you at present is to inform you of a project which we have formed and which there is some prospect though but a doubtful one of our being able to realize, of starting a morning newspaper, of which Chadwick should be the editor, and almost all your friends in this country frequent writers.³ The prospects of success would be very encouraging. You know in how low a state the newspaper press of this country is. In France the best thinkers & writers of the nation, write in the journals & direct public

7. See Letter 24, n. 5.

8. Victor Lanjuinais (1802–1869), economist and liberal politician.

* * * *

1. Addressed: A Monsieur / M. Gustave d'Eichthal / à Paris. MS at Arsenal. Published, with errors and omissions, in Cosmopolis, VI, 32–38, and in D'Eichthal Correspond., pp. 22–34. D'Eichthal's answer appears in the latter volume, pp. 39–68.

2. See preceding letter, n. 8.

3. Nothing came of this projected newspaper.

opinion; but our daily & weekly writers are the lowest hacks of literature, which when it is a trade, is the vilest & most degrading of all trades, because more of affectation & hypocrisy, & more subservience to the baser feelings of others, are necessary for carrying it on, than for any other trade, from that of a brothelkeeper upwards. We are not in so low a state here, as not to have in some measure found this out; & there is consequently rather a general sense of the needfulness of some newspaper conducted by men really in earnest about public objects, & really forming their opinions from some previous knowledge & not from the mere appearances of the moment, or the convenience of party advocacy. The old ties of party and the attachment to established opinions have at the same time been so greatly weakened among all the reading classes, that the times are very favourable for starting new opinions, and especially any which hold out sufficient hopes of extensive good, to enlist in their behalf that enthusiasm and dévouement, which are now wandering about the world seeking an object worthy of them. We possess moreover the means of rendering this paper the best as a mere vehicle of intelligence; as a mere newspaper in short, which yet exists; & have therefore no doubt of its success provided we can raise the money which of course is doubtful, but of which we have considerable hopes. As this newspaper will pay very particular attention to French affairs, and will endeavour, as one of its grand objects to make its readers understand not only French politics but the whole social state of France, including all that is doing in the world of literature & philosophy by that active and important member of the European community, & in short to explain the character of that general movement which is taking place in the human mind all over the Continent of Europe but especially in France, we shall be very anxious to have a first rate correspondent at Paris, capable of supplying, (along with the general news of the day in politics, literature & philosophy) sound & enlarged views on all these subjects. I imagine there is scarcely any person except yourself who, with the other necessary qualifications, possesses that knowledge of England, which a Frenchman writing for Englishmen would need, & I am speaking the sentiments of all my expected collaborateurs when I request, that if we succeed in realizing our scheme, you will undertake this department of it. We should wish to have regular letters as often as you could find time to write them, similar to those in the Times, which, though by no means first rate, have done great good here. Of course we should not wish you to undertake so great a portion of our labour without participating in our reward (the pecuniary part of it I mean) either in the shape of a regular engagement, or of a proportion of the profits in case of success, according to your own preference, and to the amount of capital which we can succeed in raising, to commence our operations. If by ill fortune you should not be disposed to undertake what I have proposed to you, I beg that you will consider whether there is any other person whom you could recommend to us for the same purpose, or with whom you could divide the task. In the mean time, as it is best that a scheme of this sort should be known to as few persons as possible until it is certain of being prosecuted, it will be desirable that you should not speak of it more than may be necessary for obtaining what we want.—I have not left myself room to say much to you on the Saint Simon school, & indeed, having been out of town, I have not yet had an opportunity of reading any of the articles of the Producteur.⁴ I am chiefly anxious at present to tell you of the things which I approve and admire in this school, as I am rather afraid that my former letter may have left an impression on your mind, that I do not think so highly of them as I actually do. In the first place then I highly approve and commend one of the leading principles of their system, which they have established to conviction, the necessity of a Pouvoir Spirituel. They have held out as the ultimate end towards which we are advancing & which we shall one day attain, a state in which the body of the people, i.e. the un-instructed, shall entertain the same feelings of deference & submission to the authority of the instructed, in morals and politics, as they at present do in the physical sciences. This, I am persuaded, is the only wholesome state of the human mind; & the knowledge that we ought to look to it as the ultimate end, has a great tendency to protect us from many errors which the philosophers of the 18th century fell into, & which all will be liable to who suppose that the diffusion of knowledge among the labouring classes & the consequent improvement of their intellects is to be the grand instrument of the regeneration of mankind. Before, however, this state can be attained or even aimed at it is necessary that several great steps should be taken in the improvement of the social organisation; & principally that the great social sinister interests should be removed, since while these exist, those, who would otherwise be the instructed classes, have no motive to obtain real instruction in politics & morals, & are subjected to biasses from which the students of the physical sciences are exempt. They can drive a trade in the ignorance and prejudices of others; they either write for the classes who have sinister interests, and minister to their selfishness and malevolence, or else, addressing themselves to the common people, they find in the well grounded discontent of the people against their institutions sufficient materials for acquiring popularity without either instructing their intellects, or cultivating right habits of feeling and judging in their minds. I object altogether to the means which the St Simonists propose for organizing the pouvoir spirituel. It appears to me that you cannot organise it at all. What is the pouvoir spirituel but the insensible influence of mind over mind? The instruments of this are private communication, the pulpit, & the press. If you attempt to collect together the instructed, you must have somebody to chuse them, & determine who they are: in what respect, then, will this differ from an elective national assembly, with a qualification for eligibility, not a qualification of property but of education?—The second great service which in my opinion the St Simonists have rendered, is not by having been the first to notice (for all persons of course have adverted to it more or less) but having illustrated more copiously than had been done before, and having paid more attention & attached more importance than other philosophers to the fact, that institutions which if we consider them in themselves, we can hardly help thinking it impossible should ever have produced any thing but the most unqualified mischief (the Catholic church for example) may yet, at a particular stage in the progress of the human mind, have not only been highly useful but absolutely indispensable; the only means by which the human mind could have been brought forward to an ulterior stage of improvement. A due attention to this great truth, which is the result of enlarged views of the history of mankind, is also thereby a necessary condition to those views. Without it, there is no possibility of viewing or judging past times with candour, or trying them by any standard but that of the present. And yet, he who does not do this, will judge the present as ill as the past. For surely at every present epoch there are many things which would be good for that epoch, though not good for the being Man, at every epoch, nor perhaps at any other than that one: & whoever does not make this distinction must be a bad practical philosopher even for his own age, yet he will not make the distinction for the present who does not make it for the past. Every age contains countries, every country contains men, who are in every possible state of civilisation, from the lowest of all, to the highest which mankind have reached in that age, or in that country. Yet one hardly meets with a single man who does not habitually think & talk as if whatever was good or bad for one portion of these countries or of these individuals was good or bad for all the other portions. It is very unlikely that any person who is imbued with the spirit of the St Simon school, should fall into this error. They have, and their system tends to produce even as it appears to me in excess, that eclecticism, and comprehensive liberality, which, as it widens the range both of our ideas and of our feelings, is far more pardonable & less mischievous even when most exagéré, than the opposite fault. They have that spirit which is most opposed to the spirit of criticism and disceptation; that which induces us, not to combat but to pass over & disregard the errors in what is presented to us, in order to seize and appropriate to ourselves that portion or fragment (however diminutive) of truth, which there must necessarily be at the bottom of every error, which is not a mere fallacy in ratiocination. As the great danger to mankind is not from seeing what is not, but from overlooking what is; since clever & intelligent men hardly ever err from the former cause, but no powers of mind are any protection against the evils arising from imperfect and partial views of what is real; since not errors but half truths are the bane of human improvement, it seems to follow that the proper mode of philosophizing & discussing for a person who pursues the good of mankind & not the gratification of his own vanity, should be the direct opposite of the philosophie critique of the last century: it should consist, not in attacking men's wrong opinions, but in giving them that knowledge which will enable them to form right ones that will push off the wrong ones, as the new leaves push off the withered ones of the last year. The great instrument of improvement in men, is to supply them with the other half of the truth, one side of which only they have ever seen: to turn round to them the white side of the shield, of which they seeing only the black side, have cut other men's throats & risked their own to prove that the shield is black. It is not sufficiently considered by many zealots for even right opinions, that you have done little or nothing for a man when you have merely given him an opinion. An opinion suggests hardly anything to an uninformed mind; it may become a watchword, but can never be a moving & influencing and living principle within him. Words, or any thing which can be stated in words, benefit none but those minds to whom the words suggest an ample store of correct and clear ideas, & sound & accurate knowledge previously acquired concerning the things which are meant by the words. It is therefore of little use altering men's opinions, & it is often very mischievous to unsettle them, until you have brought their minds to that higher state of cultivation, of which better opinions are the natural & almost spontaneous growth. But merely in order to do this, we must not attack their opinions en masse, but fix our attention on what is good in those opinions, & endeavour to lead them on from this & through this to something better. This is practical eclecticism. Without intending it I have been illustrating at great length one of the most valuable parts of the St Simon philosophy, though not at all peculiar to it, the distinction between the partie critique & the partie organique of any philosophy & between the critical, & the organical, epochs of the human mind. I am inclined to think that one idea connected with this matter, did really originate with them, viz. that a principle may be valuable & in a certain sense even true comme principe critique which comme principe organique or even as a simple logical proposition is false. The logical explanation of this I take to be, that a proposition, though false as a whole, may comprehend as part of itself, may logically include the negation of some prevailing error. I think that the St Simonists have also great merit in having pointed out as the first step in the investigation of practical political truths, to ascertain what is the state into which, in the natural order of the advancement of civilisation the nation in question will next come; in order that it may be the grand object of our endeavours, to facilitate the transition to this state. Keeping this in view, it will often follow, that we must uphold or even establish institutions which are liable to produce great evils, evils which in other states of society might be without alloy; provided that these institutions have, at the same time, a tendency to counteract other mischievous tendencies, which happen to be more prevailing or more to be apprehended in that age, by which of course must always be meant, in that state of the human mind. On this subject I should differ from the St Simonists, chiefly in this respect; they seem to think that the mind of man, by a sort of fatality or necessity, grows & unfolds its different faculties always in one particular order, like the body; & that therefore we must be always either standing still, or advancing, or retrograding; whereas I am satisfied, that better consideration would shew, that different nations, indeed different minds, may & do advance to improvement by different roads; that nations, & men, nearly in an equally advanced stage of civilization, may yet be very different in character, & that changes may take place in a man or a nation, which are neither steps forward nor backward, but steps to one side. Here ends, I believe, all that I have to say at present on the St Simon school.—Tooke has shewn me all your letters; in the last there are two things which pleased me extremely. One is your remark that analysis & synthesis have directly opposite meanings in mathematics from what they have in philosophy: this, which is not only a just but a profound observation, also occurred to Dugald Stewart,⁵ the second volume of whose Philosophy of the Mind contains that with many other excellent remarks on similar subjects. The other is, your observation that there is no incompatibility between the morality of enlightened self-interest & that of dévoûement: neither of these phrases comprises the principle of morals, but they express two kinds of impulses, both of which might, & do to a certain extent, lead men to virtue, & which it is desirable to put forward alternately as incentives to it, according to the age, the nation, or even the individual, whom you are addressing.

4. See preceding letter, n. 2.

I hope soon to hear from you after having merited that pleasure by these two long letters. For the present believe me

Yours most sincerely

J. S. MILL.

5. Dugald Stewart (1753–1828), Scottish philosopher. His Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind appeared in three volumes between 1792 and 1827.

29. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹London, 9th February 1830

MY DEAR GUSTAVE

I had for several weeks been on the point of writing to you a long letter on the great subject which you have so deeply at heart, and had just for the first time obtained an interval of leisure for that purpose, when the horrible event took place which has deprived me of one whom I had counted upon as a friend and companion through my whole life.² I could not mix up the first intelligence of our loss with an abstract philosophical discussion. Poor M^r Tooke³ was anxious that you should be informed of it, and wished me to communicate it to you, but I anxiously hoped that you might learn it first through some other channel. I am deeply indebted to you, my dear Gustave, for your expressions of sympathy in my own affliction.⁴ There is no ground for the apprehensions which you express of my being overcome and crushed by this unexpected blow. Many who knew him and loved him less than I did, have felt the immediate shock much more forcibly. It is not the intensity, but the durability of such grief, which bears hard upon me, and I feel it most in the enervation, & almost extinction, for the present, of all my activity, and all my concern for mankind or for my duties. It seems to me as if I had never cared for any one but him, and had never laboured but for his sympathy and approbation. Yet though I should detest myself if I ever ceased to think and feel as I now do concerning his loss, I know that this effect of it will not last. The more affectionately I cherish his memory, the more ardently shall I pursue those great objects in which he took so deep an interest. I should care little for life or for mankind, but for the thought that there are among them a few men like him, & that all have in them the capacity of becoming at least an approximation to what he was. There are yet two or three living, but for whom I should no longer value existence: for though there have been a few, very few, who had sufficient native energy and firmness to pursue cheerfully the good of posterity, without being

1. Addressed: A Monsieur / Monsieur Gustave d'Eichthal / Place des Victoires No 5 / à Paris. Postmarks: Fevrier/15/1830/ and F/11-4. MS at Arsenal. Published, with minor errors and omissions, in Cosmopolis, VI, 348-55, and in D'Eichthal Corresp., pp. 117-30. The latter work also includes the last letter of Eyton Tooke to D'Eichthal (pp. 90-110) and D'Eichthal's letter of Feb. 3 to JSM on Tooke's death (pp. 111-16).

2. Eyton Tooke committed suicide on Jan. 27, 1830. For a notice of the inquest, see Examiner, Jan. 31, 1830, p. 76. Henry Solly in These Eighty Years (London, 1893), I, 134-38, attributes Tooke's derangement to what Tooke mistakenly thought was an unrequited love for Solly's sister. See also, however, Letter 117.

3. Thomas Tooke, the father of Eyton.

4. In D'Eichthal's letter of Feb. 3, 1830, to JSM. See n. 1 above.

upheld by the aid and encouragement of some in their own generation, I am so far removed from that state of mind that I can just understand it sufficiently to believe it possible. But as I have said before, those who made life valuable to me are not all gone, and though scarcely any of them were equal to Eyton and none superior to him in purity and singleness of mind combined with warmth and kindness of affection, yet I cannot entirely droop or relax in my exertions while they survive, and remain unchanged towards me, and progressively improving in the developement of their intellectual and moral capabilities. I know too, that our loss will be an additional bond of connexion to me with those who loved him and who pursue the great objects of his life. The time however when I shall feel this effect of it has not yet arrived.

While I write this, I have received your note enclosing Eyton's last letter to you:⁵ the expression of his last thoughts and feelings on the great interests of humanity. It was kind in you to send it, particularly now when the last relic of our friend must be so valuable to you. I had however seen it already, as he shewed it to me before he sent it off. I accept gratefully your offer of sending a reply to it, addressed to me; but I do so, only because I should be interested by any thing which you would write on those topics; for though I fundamentally agreed with him, his objections to the St Simonian philosophy are not exactly those on which I should mainly insist, nor are stated in the exact terms or manner in which I should urge them. I am not about to make this letter a controversial one, for this event has so scattered my thoughts that I have been able to carry on no continued train of reflexion since it occurred. Besides, I have a great dislike to controversy, and am persuaded that discussion, as discussion, seldom did any good. This may shew you how completely I am cured of those habitudes critiques, which, you seem to suppose, are the only obstacle to my adopting the entire doctrine of your school. The esprit critique is almost the only one which prevails among the best and most instructed men of this country as well as of France; and it will be one of the objects of my philosophical and practical labours, (as it would have been one of those of poor Eyton if he had happily lived to pursue his designs), to contribute to the formation of a better spirit. This is a debt which I owe partly though not entirely to the St Simonian school: I had much changed from what I was, before I read any of their publications; but it was their works which gave order and system to the ideas which I had already imbibed from intercourse with others, and derived from my own reflexions. A part of the objection I have to controversy, is that it keeps up the esprit critique. I am averse to any mode of eradicating error, but by establishing and inculcating (when that is practicable) the opposite truth; a truth of some kind inconsistent with that moral or intellectual state of mind from which the errors arise. It is only thus that we can at once maintain the good that already exists, and produce more. And I object to placing myself in the situation of an advocate for or against a cause. I will read the books of those from whom I differ, I will consider patiently and mature in my own mind the ideas which they suggest, I will make up my own opinion, and set it forth with the reasons. When I see any person going wrong, I will try to find out the fragment of truth which is misleading him, & will analyse and expound that; I will suggest to his own mind not inculcate in him as from mine the idea which I think will save him. And when this is done, or at least if it were universally done, no one's offended amour propre would make him cling to his errors; no one would connect, with the adoption of truth, the idea of defeat; and no one would feel impelled by the ardour of debate & the desire of triumph, to reject, as almost all now do whatever of truth there really is in the opinions of those whose ultimate conclusion differs from theirs. In short, I do not insist upon making others give up their own point of view & adopt mine, but I endeavour myself to unite whatever is not optical illusion in both. When by this means I shall have clearly embraced in my own view the entire truth, & shall be able to represent to others that whole, of which they have before seen a part, I shall have great confidence in their ultimate adoption of it. Truth will then have no enemy but the esprit critique, which makes men unwilling to look for truth in the midst of error; & I am unwilling to strengthen this spirit by maintaining any opinions in the spirit of argumentation and debate. This being the system which I have determined to act upon, I shall of course apply it to my intercourse with you. I will read every thing which you may be so kind as to send me, whether from yourself or from the results of the united labours of your school. All that I have read of their works is of a character to make me wish to be acquainted with all their other speculations. If the result of the perusal of these works should be, my entire conversion, which I regard as extremely unlikely, I shall at once confess it; if I desire further explanations, I shall solicit them from your kindness, and I will always state to you my reasons for differing where I do differ. But on no account will I discuss with you. And therefore I do not feel that I should be justified in encouraging the project which you give me some hints that you have formed, of coming to England with a view to my complete initiation in the St Simonian doctrine. As a friend whom I extremely value, and who shared with me the friendship of him whom we have lost, it would give me great pleasure to see you, and to converse with you; and I am both touched and flattered that you should think me of so much importance either to yourself or to society, as to think of undertaking a journey with the sole view of bringing me over to opinions identical with your own. But I am well convinced that if this be ever accomplished, it will not be the effect of any sudden or rapid conviction produced by a few days or weeks of verbal discussion, but the result of time and my own reflexions aided by those works, & those suggestions, which I hope you will continue to furnish me with, from time to time. I should therefore decline all verbal controversy even if you were here. It would only risk the weakening or altering our present feelings towards each other, as we should probably find each other much more intractable than we expect, and as almost every man shews himself in dispute worse than he really is & appears unreasonably wedded to his opinions when called upon to defend them on a sudden, & is apt to put forward other arguments than those which have really made an impression on his own mind.

5. Evidently Tooke's letter of Jan. 19, 1830. See n. 1.

I no longer adhere to the objections I formerly urged against the St Simonian school, as some of the points which I objected to, appeared from a perusal of the Producteur (every word of which I have read with as great care and interest as any book I ever saw) never to have been held by them in the sense in which I thought them objectionable, & as you informed me in your answer⁶ to my two letters that the other points had been given up. I was much pleased to find that although you are a sect, you are an improving sect, and that your creeds are not made up never to be altered. Of all the improvements in your doctrine, mentioned in your letter, I fully approve: but I still retain all my objections to your practical views, to your organisation, which appears to me impracticable, & not desirable if practicable, like that of Mr Owen.⁷ You know, however, that I have not yet read or heard the reasons which you can adduce and my mind therefore remains open to conviction. But your proposal that when I am convinced of the soundness of your views I should correspond and cooperate with your society induces me to state to you at once the reasons which would prevent me from doing so even if I were convinced that the whole body of your doctrine is true. It appears to me utterly hopeless and chimerical to suppose that the regeneration of mankind can ever be wrought by means of working on their opinions. I think that mankind, and I am sure that my own countrymen, are in a state of mind which renders them incapable of receiving a true doctrine générale, or of understanding it in a true sense if they did receive it. In France it is perhaps possible that they might receive it, but not in the sense in which it is meant, nor would it produce, even admitting its truth, the good effects which you

6. D'Eichthal's letter of Nov. 23, 1829 (D'Eichthal Corresp., pp. 39–68) rather than his letter of Dec. 1, 1829 (ibid., pp. 69–89).

7. Robert Owen (1771–1858), wealthy manufacturer and pioneer socialist, sponsor of various communal experiments in both England and America, author of A New View of Society (1813–14). For JSM's account of his and his friends' debates with Owenites in 1825, see Autobiog., pp. 86–88.

anticipate from it. I can conceive a whole people professing St Simonism, and acting precisely as they do now, just as there have been & are many entire nations professing Christianity, & whose conduct is yet utterly selfish and worldly, and in defiance of the whole scheme of Christian ethics. In England, on the other hand, the very idea of beginning a reformation in men's minds by preaching to them a comprehensive doctrine, is a notion which never would enter into the head of any person who has lived long enough in England to know the people. Englishmen habitually distrust the most obvious truths, if the person who advances them is suspected of having any general views. To produce any effect on their minds, you must carefully conceal the fact of your having any system or body of opinions, and must instruct them on insulated points, & endeavour to form their habits of thought by your mode of treating single and practical questions. When you have gained a high reputation with them for knowledge of facts, & skill and judgment in the appreciation of details, you may then venture on enlarged views; but even then, very cautiously and guardedly. A journal which should start by a systematic exposition of far-sighted views and extended principles, would not have twenty subscribers. I conceive therefore that your school, in their method of proceeding, by declaring themselves the apostles of a new doctrine, and seeking to inculcate that doctrine first, and to produce all other kinds of good as consequences of that, are violating the first & greatest rule of their own philosophy, which is, that we ought to consider what is the stage through which, in the progress of civilization, our country has next to pass, and to endeavour to facilitate the transition & render it safe & healthy. I am convinced that my own country & I suspect that France must pass through several states before it arrives at St Simonism, even if that doctrine is true; & that although we ought to arrive if we can at a general system of social philosophy, and to keep it always in our own view, we ought not to address it to the public, who are by no means ripe for its reception, but to avail ourselves of the good which is in them, to educate their minds by accustoming them to think rightly on those subjects on which they already think, to communicate to them all the truths which they are prepared for, and (in England at least where the philosophie critique has never yet got the better of the doctrine théologique et féodale) to endeavour to alter those parts of our social institutions and policy which at present oppose improvement, degrade and brutalize the intellects and morality of the people, & by giving all the ascendancy to mere wealth, which the possession of political power confers, prevents the growth of a pouvoir spirituel capable of commanding the faith of the majority, who must and do believe on authority. You are also I am convinced mistaken in supposing that the religious feelings which prevail here, are of a character with which St Simonism would at all be capable of allying itself. But of this I must write hereafter, and it shall be soon. Excuse the very imperfect exposition of my sentiments which I have given. Mr Tooke I understand is somewhat recovered from the dreadful shock, Mrs Tooke is still very ill. I have seen neither since it occurred.

Yours affectionately

J. S. MILL.

On reading this letter again today (10th. February) I think I can express my meaning better by saying that I conceive your error to be this: you imagine that you can accomplish the perfection of mankind by teaching them St Simonism, whereas it appears to me that their adoption of St Simonism, if that doctrine be true, will be the natural result and effect of a high state of moral and intellectual culture previously received: that it should not be presented to the minds of any who have not already attained a high degree of improvement, since if presented to any others it will either be rejected by them, or received only as Christianity is at present received by the majority, that is, in such a manner as to be perfectly inefficacious.

I have a thousand other things to write, and your future letters shall be answered without any repetition of this unseemly delay.

J.S.M.

30. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

March 6, 1830

MY DEAR GUSTAVE

I take the opportunity of a friend who is going to Paris, for fulfilling the intentions of our deceased friend as expressed in his last letter to you, by sending you the enclosed pamphlet of Dr Channing,² the American preacher. I quite agree in his admiration of it, and I conceive that it expresses very clearly and forcibly the great vice of your system as well as that of Mr Owen, and many others qui courent le monde aujourd'hui. I hope you will read it and tell me what you think of it.

I have read and forwarded the letter to Mr Burns.³ The report which it

1. MS at Arsenal.

2. William Ellery Channing (1780–1842), Unitarian clergyman and writer. One may conclude from Tooke's remarks in his last letter to D'Eichthal, Jan. 19, 1830 (D'Eichthal Corresp., p. 106), that the pamphlet must have been the reprint of a Christian Examiner article of Channing's: Remarks on the Disposition which now prevails to form Associations, and to accomplish all objects by organized masses (London: Edward Rainford, 1830). Collected editions of Channing's works usually reprint it with the title: "Remarks on Associations." It contains interesting anticipations of some of JSM's views in On Liberty, particularly on the values of individuality and the dangers of the tyranny of society.

3. William Burns, author of The New Era of Christianity; or, its influence on the moral regeneration of society (London, 1831). See Pankhurst, p. 43.

contains of the proceedings at one of your meetings would have convinced me if I were not already satisfied, of the unfitness of your scheme for this country at least. It would be impossible to induce any one here to look at it with a serious face. I wonder how you have hitherto escaped the jokers and epigrammatists of the Parisian salons.

Pray be so good as to make my remembrances to Adolphe. I will write to him as soon as I have time & I hope he will write to me.

Yours in great haste

J. S. MILL.

31. TO HENRY COLE¹

India House. 26 May. 1830.

MY DEAR COLE

As I know that you are acquainted with Dr Hooker,² which is an honour I have not attained to, I should be obliged to you if you would do me the favour to communicate to him the accompanying notes which I made in looking over his excellent British Flora³ just published. I request you however to do so only in case you should think on reading them, that there is any thing in them which might possibly be interesting to Dr Hooker.

The only points which I myself think of any consequence, are those which relate to Ænanthe aprifolia & Vicia sativa, & you would not be far wrong if you were to suppose that most of the remainder are put down chiefly to make up a number. However it is possible that some of the Stations mentioned may be unknown to Dr Hooker.

As I am very favourably situated for observing the plants of Surrey, which have hardly been observed at all since Ray's⁴ time if we except those in the immediate vicinity of London, which are figured in Curtis's Flora

1. MS at Kew.

For earlier evidence of what became JSM's lifelong interest in botany see John Mill's Boyhood Visit to France, ed. Anna Jean Mill. Over the years he contributed many notes to the Phytologist (see MacMinn, Bibliog.). A number of his notebooks containing botanical observations are in the Mill-Taylor Collection of LSE.

Henry (later Sir Henry) Cole (1808–1882), official and editor, was later a member of many commissions dealing with public exhibitions. He first became acquainted with JSM in the London Debating Society and in the summer of 1832 accompanied him on a walking tour.

2. Sir William Jackson Hooker (1785–1865), botanist and director of Kew Gardens.

3. The British Flora (London, 1830).

4. John Ray (1627–1705), sometimes called the father of natural history in England.

Londinensis⁵ and many of which appear to have become extinct in the situations where Curtis found them I may possibly be able hereafter to make other communications of a nature similar to this, if the present one should prove to be of any use. I have explored some parts of the County very fully, and almost every part of it more or less, but I expect to make many more discoveries before I have done.

Pray excuse my troubling you in this matter, and believe me

Yours ever,

JOHN S. MILL

32. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

7th August 1830

DEAR M^{rs} AUSTIN

At your request I put into writing what I said to you the other night on the subject of Mr Austin's lectures.² What appears to me of most importance is that he should not spend time in endeavouring to make the lectures which have been already delivered, better than they are. They stand greatly in need of curtailment, but I do not believe that there is a single member of the class who would wish them to be changed in any other respect. There is only one opinion expressed in the lectures which I have heard controverted at all; & the manner of exposition has excited the admiration of every body. The only fault found is, that the different points are over explained; that they are dwelt upon longer & repeated oftener, than is necessary to a complete understanding of them. I am certain that all which the class would desire in respect to the earlier lectures is that they should be very much abridged & perhaps many of the historical details dispensed with altogether: not because those details are not con-

5. William Curtis (1746-1799), botanist and entomologist. An edition in five volumes of his Flora Londinensis, enlarged by G. Graves and W. J. Hooker, is dated London, 1777-1828.

* * * *

1. Addressed: M^{rs} John Austin / 26 Park Road. Sealed by a red seal, bearing the letters JSM. MS in the possession of Mr. Gordon Waterfield.

2. When the University of London opened in 1828, John Austin, who had been appointed in 1827 to the chair of jurisprudence and the law of nations, was unable because of ill health to lecture in the first session. He began his lectures in the fall of 1829 to a large class of able students. Though an eloquent, profound, and original lecturer, he did not continue to attract students, because of his passion for accuracy and elaboration. In Nov., 1830, so few students registered that he postponed beginning the course until Jan., 1831, when eight students enrolled. He persevered for two more years but gave up lecturing after June, 1833, though he did not resign his chair until Jan., 1835. See Bellot, University College, pp. 96-102. Eventually JSM contributed part of his notes on Austin's lectures to fill a lacuna in the MS when they were published in full.

sidered useful & interesting, but because it is impossible to do every thing, and because there are other things which they are much more anxious to know.—Though the class were extremely delighted with the course as far as it went, they certainly were very much disappointed that Mr Austin did not get through a greater portion of the subject; & they anticipate with great pleasure the completion of it in the lectures on which he has obtained for them the privilege of attendance, at the conclusion of the next year's course. The only thing which in my opinion could at all endanger the permanent success & utility of the professorship, would be his not being able to include a view of all the essential parts of the science in his next series of lectures. Now the present class very well know that next to his health, the great cause of his getting through so little was his being obliged to prepare his lectures as he went on, not having them ready written. If he spends any time in improving his present lectures, more than is necessary for sufficiently shortening them, he will be in precisely the same difficulty, with the remainder of his subject, as he was this year with the whole of it. On the contrary, if he contents himself with using the scissors abundantly, & sets about the preparation of the subsequent lectures immediately, he will be several months in advance, & will be able, without that fatigue & harassing excitement which destroy his health, to prepare the lectures carefully, include a large portion of the subject in each, & avoid repetition & over explanation.

I would not recommend his continuing the Tables at present, as those which are printed embrace the entire field of law, & it is of so much more importance that he should complete his course of lectures next year.

From the very high opinion which has been expressed of the last course by those to whom I have lent my notes, I have considerable hopes that the class next year will be satisfactory in respect of numbers. But I should not be at all discouraged even if the number was small—because it is only a complete course, which can do much to spread the reputation of the lecturer. If he should be able to complete the subject next year, I have not the least doubt that he will have a numerous class the year after.

I deem it however of the greatest importance with a view to his class next year, that he should deliver an interesting introductory lecture. I know his well grounded aversion to vague generalities, & I know as certainly as he does, that it is impossible to teach any thing that is worth knowing of a whole science, in a short general view. But it is not necessary that an introductory lecture should be an abridged view of the science. The best introductory lectures extant are not so: Brown's³ introductory lecture to his course of metaphysics for example. The proper notion of an introductory lecture seems to be that it should resemble the preface to a book, which gives the reasons for writing the book & the reasons for reading it. Especially on the moral sciences, whose rank as sciences or whose scientific character itself is not generally recognized, there seems to be an ample field for remarks of a most useful description in opening a course of lectures. He might explain, what is meant by general jurisprudence: in what respect a course of jurisprudence differs from a course of lectures on the law of any particular country, & also from lectures on the science or art of legislation: the grounds of the opinion, that there really is a science of general jurisprudence, & that it is worth studying: proof of the perverting & confusing effect of the study of law as it is commonly pursued, without being accompanied by the study of jurisprudence: examples of the erroneous notions usually formed as to what jurisprudence is, & the silly talk of Blackstone,⁴ & others of our lawyers, when they erect the technical maxims of their own law into principles of jurisprudence. All these topics, with a hundred others of the same kind, which will occur to Mr Austin himself, would afford ample materials for a highly useful introductory lecture, & one which need not be chargeable with vagueness or generality. I am satisfied, & so are several others of the class, that if his introductory lecture of last year had treated of these topics, in the manner in which we all know he would have treated them if at all, his class would have been twice as numerous as it was. I am quite convinced that if he delivers a lecture of this kind next year, he will have a numerous class, & that if he does not, he will have a comparatively small one.

3. Thomas Brown (1778–1820), professor of moral philosophy at Edinburgh and a highly popular lecturer. The reference here is to his Lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind (4 vols., Edinburgh, 1820).

But if he will not write such a lecture as this, let him not think of writing another but deliver the first lecture of the course itself as his introductory lecture. The general remark last year in his class room after the close of his lecture on Law in general, was, that it was very unfortunate that he had not delivered that very lecture instead of his introductory one.

Yours affectionately

J. S. MILL.

P.S. The one opinion which, as I mentioned in the letter, has been controverted, is this: that every right of action must be founded on an injury. Excuse bad penmanship, as I write unavoidably in haste.

4. Sir William Blackstone (1723–1780), judge, first professor of English law at Oxford, author of the famous and influential Commentaries on the Laws of England (4 vols., Oxford, 1765–69).

JSM is here in the Benthamite tradition in criticizing Blackstone; Bentham's first sizable book, A Fragment on Government (1776), was an attack on the Commentaries.

33. TO JAMES MILL¹

[Paris]

[Aug. 13, 1830]

I have had some conversation with M. Say,² and a great deal with Adolphe d'Eichthal and Victor Lanjuinais, and I have been a very assiduous reader of all the newspapers since I arrived. . . . At present, if I were to look only at the cowardice and imbecility of the existing generation of public men, with scarcely a single exception, I should expect very little good; but when I consider the spirit and intelligence of the young men and of the people, the immense influence of the journals, and the strength of the public voice, I am encouraged to hope that as there has been an excellent revolution without leaders, leaders will not be required in order to establish a good government. [He then goes on to give a detailed account of how the revolution was accomplished—the flinching of the generals of the army, the cowardice and meanness of Dupin³ above everybody. He has the lowest opinion of the ministry, not a Radical among them except Dupont de l'Eure;⁴ all mere place-hunters. Thiers,⁵ at the meeting for organizing the resistance, showed great weakness and pusillanimity. (I heard him long afterwards say he detested Thiers.) Of the new measures he praises most the lowering of the age-qualification to the Chamber from 40 to 30: he

1. Published in part in Bain, JSM, pp. 41–42. MS not located. The portion in brackets is Bain's summary.

JSM seems to have arrived in Paris during the week of Aug. 8; he remained until the first week of Sept. The Revolution had arisen swiftly after the publication on July 26 of reactionary ordinances which violated the Charter of 1815 by suppressing the liberty of the press, dissolving the recently elected chambers, and proclaiming a new electoral law. By July 30 the Revolution was in effect completed when Charles X revoked the new ordinances. On July 31 the Duke of Orleans, Louis Philippe, was proclaimed Lieutenant General of the kingdom, and on Aug. 2 Charles abdicated. Louis Philippe was formally offered the throne on Aug. 7, and took the oath of office as King of the French on Aug. 9.

2. Probably Jean Baptiste Say rather than his son Horace Emile Say (1794–1860), also an economist.

3. André Marie Jean Jacques Dupin (1783–1865), called Dupin aîné, a cautious participant in the overthrow of Charles X, was too much attached to the cause of Louis Philippe to suit the republicans.

4. Jacques Charles Dupont (de l'Eure) (1767–1855), liberal statesman, member of the Chamber of Deputies from 1817 to 1848. He was appointed Minister of Justice by the new government, but after struggling in vain against the reactionary tendencies of the new dynasty, resigned his post before the end of the year.

5. Louis Adolphe Thiers (1797–1877), historian and statesman, then virtually at the beginning of his long political career, which culminated in the Presidency, 1871–73. In Jan., 1830, with Armand Carrel and François Mignet he had founded the National newspaper, which supported the liberal opposition to Charles X's government. He favoured constitutional monarchy rather than a republic, however, and played a major role in publicizing and advancing the claims of Louis Philippe to the throne.

has seen no one that attaches due importance to this change.] I am going to the Chamber of Deputies to-morrow with Mr. Austin, and next week, I am to be introduced to the Society of "Aide-toi,"⁶ where I am to be brought in contact with almost all the best of the young men, and there are few besides that I should at all care to be acquainted with. . . . I have heard an immense number of the most affecting instances of the virtue and good sense of the common people.

34. TO JAMES MILL¹

[Paris]

August 20th, 1830.

I have mixed very much among the people since I arrived, and have taken every opportunity which I could find or make of conversing with persons of all classes. The result so far exceeds all my previous expectations of good, that I can scarcely trust it without further experience. The fact with which I have been most struck in the French people, is the extraordinary simplicity of character which seems to pervade them all, especially the working classes. I have conversed with many who have taken part in the three days' contest, not to mention the wives and families of some of them, and I have invariably found that their sole anxiety was to convince me that they had acted right, or rather there seemed to be no design to make any particular impression upon me, but they appeared to come out with what was uppermost in their own minds, and that was the morality and lawfulness of their resistance. I have not perceived the slightest tinge of fanfaronnade or vanity in their language or in their sentiments. I have not heard one word of self-applause, nor boasting about the heroism or dévouement of the people of Paris, nor any credit taken to themselves for

6. Aide-toi, le ciel t'aidera, a political society formed during the Restoration to combat reaction and foster liberal ideas. Among its members were Barrot, Béranger, Carrel, Duchâtel, Guizot, Lafayette father and son, and J. B. Say. See also Letter 36.

* * * *

1. Published, but with no identification of authorship, in the Examiner, Aug. 29, 1830, p. 547, as one of three letters on the "State of the Public Mind and of Affairs at Paris." A prefatory note was appended: "We have been favoured with copies of the following letters from two gentlemen, whose knowledge, ability, and exalted principles, induce us to attach great value to all their opinions and statements. The importance of the subject matters treated in the letters, and the close insight they give us of the state of affairs at Paris, have induced us to insert them entire, though we thus somewhat transgress the space usually allotted for political disquisition."

The two gentlemen were undoubtedly John Arthur Roebuck and JSM. Evidence for this identification may be found in the present editor's article, "JSM: Letters on the French Revolution of 1830," Victorian Studies, I (Dec., 1957), 137-54. The MS has not been located.

having preserved order or avoided excesses; it does not seem to occur to them at all that they have done any thing extraordinary. They had but one idea, that of fighting for their legal rights, and the observance of the legal rights of others followed as an immediate corollary. The inconceivable purity and singleness of purpose, almost amounting to naïveté, which they all shew in speaking of these events, has given me a greater love for them than I thought myself capable of feeling for so large a collection of human beings, and the more exhilarating views which it opens of human nature will have a beneficial effect on the whole of my future life. Though I mention particularly their language and conduct with respect to politics, I have seen the same simplicity of character in their every day intercourse, and I could relate various traits of it, but I will not, because none of them separately prove much, though their number, and the total absence of all indications of a contrary nature, constitute a strong body of evidence.

Another most striking circumstance, is the total absence of acrimony with which they speak of the authors of the attempt to establish despotism. This speaks wonderfully in favour of their character as a people, even if it should lead them, as I fear it will, to a culpable leniency in their treatment of these great offenders. The feeling of satisfaction at having got rid of men whom they despised, appears to have superseded all personal feelings of hostility against the individuals, and the struggle bore in their minds so exclusively the character of self-defence, that the ulterior purpose of executing vengeance upon their enemies hardly occurred to them. The conduct of the manufacturing population of the faubourgs has been exemplary. Attempts were made to excite disturbances among them, with a view to the destruction of machinery and the exclusion of foreign artisans. A large body of them assembled and marched to the Prefecture of Police with a petition on these two subjects. The prefect, M. Girod (de l'Ain)² came out and agreed [argued?] the matter quietly with them, in a short and pithy speech, upon which they very peaceably marched back. The next day, however, the attroupemens were rather more numerous and considerable, and I know from several quarters, that the government were seriously alarmed; they arrested some of the instigators, some of whom proved to be criminals returned from the galleys, and three were printers of an ultra-Catholic and royalist journal. But the next day all was quiet, and people who had been much alarmed the day before, confessed that there was no danger. It is very curious to see proclamations stuck about the streets, from all sorts of obscure individuals, sometimes of the humblest class, on all subjects which came uppermost. On this occasion there appeared several excellent placards from common workmen, explaining to their fellow-labourers the interest which they had in maintaining the security of property, and the advantage they ultimately derive from all improvements in the productive power of labour. I will try to procure one or two of these placards and take them to England with me, though I fear it will be rather difficult to get them. Among other curious placards which are stuck up, there is an exculpatory one from the charcoal-carriers (charbonniers). A deputation of these people had waited upon Charles the Tenth a few days before the coup d'état on the occasion of a fête, and it had been reported that one of them had used some expressions of encouragement to him, which gave great offence to the remainder of the people. The charbonniers finding themselves in consequence slighted and looked shy upon by the other classes of the people, put forth this proclamation, signed by several of them in behalf of the rest, saying, that they had gone to the Tuileries because they could not help it, as they would have been thrown out of employment and reduced to starvation if they had not, but that none of their number had used any such expressions as those described [ascribed?] to them, and that they had fought like the others on the 28th and 29th. This vindication, which I have seen numbers of men in ragged coats spelling out as they best could on the walls, did not, it seems, produce the desired effect; consequently the charbonniers assembled, hoisted an enormous tri-coloured flag, and proceeded to the Prefecture of Police, where the eternal M. Girod de l'Ain came out and was harangued by them; heard their justification of themselves, and their complaint against the sort of stigma which had been thrown upon them; told them that he believed their story, and hoped that nobody would thereafter say any thing to their disadvantage, so thereupon they marched back. I have seen as much of my former friends at Paris as their time would allow, and have made a number of new acquaintances; this, however, is a very bad time for making the acquaintance of any of the known men, as they are for the most part employed, or are soon likely to be employed on public duties. I have, however, been able to compare a multitude of testimonies on the recent and present state of affairs, and have found that what I have hitherto told you is perfectly correct in the gross, though incorrect in many of the details. Thus, I have now reason to believe that what I told you respecting the good conduct of Lafitte³ during the revolution was at least exaggerated and that he was scarcely an exception to the general apathy and cowardice

2. Louis Gaspard Amédée Girod (de l'Ain) (1781–1847), Orleanist politician, under the new government Prefect of Police in Paris from Aug. 1 to Nov., 1830. His speech to the workers referred to was made on Aug. 16.

3. Jacques Laffitte (1767–1844), financier and statesman. His house in Paris had been virtual headquarters of the moderates who gained control of the Revolution. Although one of the leaders in the movement to place the Duke of Orleans on the throne, he was within a year bitterly regretting that action. On Nov. 3, 1830, he became President of the Council of Ministers but in March, 1831, he was ignominiously ousted.

of the monied classes. On the other hand, it is not true that none of the Deputies took part in the fight. There are about fifteen or sixteen, all members of the extrême gauche, whom, as I am assured by ——— of the Society Aide-toi the Society can perfectly count upon as the devoted friends of the people (and this I already begin to see in their Parliamentary conduct). Of these, as many as were at Paris, took a share from the first in the whole business, and ran the same risk with the others. You will not be surprised to hear that Lafayette⁴ and his son are among these fifteen or sixteen, but Benjamin Constant⁵ is not, nor Lafitte, nor Casimir Perier,⁶ nor almost any one whom you probably knew by name. Though the libéraux in the Chamber of Deputies are generally so little to be relied upon (and those in the Upper House are in general much worse), I have the greatest confidence in the force of circumstances and of public opinion. The cry is becoming general for the dissolution of the Chamber, and there are already signs, that in order to prolong their political existence, they will consent to make a number of the required concessions. Within the last day or two the newspapers have assumed a much more decided tone than before in favour of important alterations in the constitution, and in particular a considerable extension of the elective franchise. There are about 100 resignations or annulations of election, and a law is now passing through the Chamber, compelling all who accept places to vacate their seats, as in England. This law is retrospective to the beginning of the present session, and it is said that many place-holders will lose their seats. These elections are expected to strengthen exceedingly the bands of the côté gauche. The

4. The aged Lafayette (he was seventy-three), who assumed command of the National Guard, was the one leader of the liberal forces who by his tremendous prestige and popularity might have been able to establish a republic. Though his sympathies were republican, he was gradually persuaded to accept as then safer for France what he hoped would be a "popular throne, in the name of the national sovereignty, surrounded by republican institutions." His public acceptance of Louis Philippe on the balcony of the Hotel de Ville on July 31 ended the hopes of the republicans and clinched the throne for Louis Philippe. In the following Dec., Lafayette, having served his purpose for the King, was ousted from the command of the National Guard. His son, Georges Washington Motier de Lafayette (1779–1849), a member of the Chamber of Deputies, had been away from Paris during the "Three Days" of the Revolution, but returned on Aug. 1.

5. Benjamin Constant de Rebecque (1767–1830), influential writer and liberal politician. Lafayette had written him on July 26: "A terrific game is being played here. Our heads are at stake. Bring yours along." Although in failing health, Constant drove at once to Paris and participated in the deliberations of the leading deputies. In August he was appointed President of the Legislative Committee of the Council of State. Louis Philippe gave him 200,000 francs to pay his debts.

6. Casimir Périer (1772–1832), financier and statesman, a moderate liberal who had at first tried to mediate between the liberals and the throne, had been a member of the provisory commission of five during the Revolution, and had only reluctantly accepted Charles X's dethronement and Louis Philippe's elevation. He succeeded Lafitte as head of the ministry in March, 1831.

Society Aide-toi, which contributed so greatly to the success of the two last general elections, will apply itself with the same rigour, and with a great increase of power, to the management of the approaching partial one. My next letter⁷ will relate chiefly to this Society, which is one of the most powerful and best organized political bodies that ever existed, and the leading members of which will most certainly, in a few years, direct the destinies of France. They are quite eager to place me au courant of all their proceedings, and to give me all kinds of information concerning France, and I shall endeavour to keep up a correspondence with some of them when I return to England, as I think it may be of considerable use. I had almost forgotten to tell you that one of the things most talked of here, is a proposition for reading [sending?] a deputation to thank the people of England for their subscriptions. I believe that an exaggerated notion of the amount of the money subscribed had much to do with this scheme, and that it is not likely to be realized immediately, if at all. If the deputation goes, * * * will probably be a member of it.

I have not told you a tenth part of what I have to say. I shall write again in a day or two.

35. TO JAMES MILL¹

Paris, Aug. 21, 1830

Affairs are now in so strange and critical a situation, that I have determined to write you a letter to-day, in spite of my having sent you a hasty, long epistle yesterday. I hope the matter it will contain will prove a sufficient apology.

The Chamber of Deputies is now an Assemblée Constituante, possessing, in fact, the power of working any reform, no matter how extensive. No outward force opposes itself, or can oppose itself, to its determinations, on any ground derived from right springing from existing or past institutions. It has elected a monarch: it has suppressed the religion of the state; it has declared every peer created by Charles to be no longer a peer. Its power, in short, is illimitable, provided it act in accordance with the will of the people. The fear is not, that it will hazard too much, that it will exceed the people's wishes, but that it will fall far short of what the people most vehemently desire. It seems the universal opinion, that both in ability and intention it is unfit for its situation—that it is no fair representation of the French nation—that it is calculated seriously to retard improvement, and in great measure for the present moment to nullify, in a beneficial sense, the effects of the present revolution. Elected under circumstances widely different from the present, its intended mission was of a different character from that which has now devolved on it. Under Charles the electors and the vast body of the people had identical interests; the popular candidates were then those who combated Charles: under Philippe the electors and the people have widely different interests; they who were popular candidates have lost that character, and since the courage of the Parisian workmen has routed the old enemy, and placed them at the head of affairs, they have begun to play the master, and to attempt the subjugation of the very class to whom they owe even their very existence. This is practised after various forms and under various names; all their proceedings being replete with deeply instructive lessons for those who are accustomed to abuse the people.

7. Letter 36 not 35.

* * * *

1. Printed, like the preceding letter (see n. 1), in the Examiner, Aug. 29, 1830, pp. 547–48. MS not located.

When the workmen of Paris, after three days' fighting, had driven out Charles and dispersed his army, they were absolute masters of the city. In the midst of their highest excitation, in the moment of victory, surrounded by their dead and wounded brothers, fathers, aye, and children and wives and mothers—these men, these ignorant, despised, and long-abused people shrunk from all unnecessary carnage—the moment resistance ceased, that moment they abstained from assault—they took equal care of the soldier who had opposed and of the citizen who had aided them. Surrounded by every temptation that perfect licence could offer, not one excess was committed. Vast treasures passed through their hands untouched, and signal punishment was immediately the lot of any one who for one instant departed from the strictest honesty and decorum. (One man was shot by his comrades for stealing a melon.) These men were actually starving, and yet they would take no recompense. Having effected their glorious object, they calmly retired to their homes and resumed their accustomed avocations. The educated and the rich now came upon the stage. The hour of danger was passed, one government was overthrown, another was to be framed. Compare the conduct of this party with that of the people, the mob, who had fought during the ever memorable three days.

No sooner was it ascertained that all danger was really past, than a hungry crowd appeared, eager for place and careless of public interests. The old generals and courtiers of Napoleon, the abettors and fautors of Charles, the rich bourgeois, all appeared in the character of place-hunting courtiers of Philippe. A spectacle more disgusting can hardly be imagined. The scoundrels who had been the willing instruments of despotism under Charles, and Louis, and Napoleon, now came to be on the watch for the good things that were to be anew distributed in consequence of the popular victory. The Chamber of Deputies was, in fact, now to be the distributor. In the first place the crown was given to the Duke of Orleans: this was perhaps a matter politically wise, or at least necessary. Then came the Ministers. You know the choice. Sebastiani,² who has never done, and is incapable of doing any thing good: Gérard,³ whose first act has been to create himself a Marshal of France: Dupin, who has lost all public confidence by his cowardice and base servility: Guizot,⁴ a favourer of the new Aristocracy: Louis,⁵ who is universally disliked, perhaps I might say despised: in short, not one person, Dupont excepted, has been chosen who has the confidence and good will of the people. Now come the acts of those persons. First, a constant striving to shield the instruments of the late Government from punishment. The magistrature continued. The very men who had opposed the liberty of the press; who had condemned and severely punished every writer who was bold enough to attack the Ministry of Charles; who to their utmost had striven to maintain his abominable despotism; these men are continued in their situations. Next, in the moment when a new Government was to be framed, a mere juridical law, viz. relating to punishment, is introduced, solely to preserve the late Ministers from death. Then comes the series of operations carried on to maintain power in their own hands. The first grand instrument to this end is delay; this, in the first days of their sitting, was so palpable, that it roused the indignation of the young men who surrounded the door of the Chamber, and gave a healthy movement to this corrupt body, by the salutary influence of fear. There was shown an unwillingness to propose explicit and formal guarantees; these, however, they were obliged to propose. The King, better than they, met them more than half way; he was more willing to offer than they to propose guarantees. The law of election next occupied their attention. It is curious to see how this has been dealt with. When we first arrived, every journal, with perhaps the single exception of the Courier,

2. Count François Horace Bastien Sebastiani (1772-1851), Minister of the Navy in the new government, and later Minister of Foreign Affairs. Like Périer, he had been reluctant to make the break with King Charles.

3. Count Etienne Maurice Gérard (1773-1855) had been one of Napoleon's favourite generals and was long an opponent of the Bourbons. He co-operated closely with Lafayette during the Three Days. Despite JSM's statement he seems not to have been made a marshal until the following year.

4. François Pierre Guillaume Guizot (1787-1874), historian and statesman. Though a former president of the Society Aide-toi and a leader of the liberal opposition to the government of Charles X, he sought a middle way between absolutism and democracy. On July 27 he had been called upon to draft the protest of the deputies against the ordinances which had provoked the Revolution. He has been called the champion of "a monarchy limited by a limited number of bourgeois." From Aug. to Nov., 1830, he was Minister of the Interior in the new government and thereafter held various posts; from Oct., 1840, to the fall of Louis Philippe in the Revolution of 1848, he was the master spirit of the government. JSM later came to regard Guizot as a great thinker and writer (see Letters 282 and 304).

5. Baron Joseph Dominique Louis (1755-1837) held the portfolio of finance until Nov., 1830.

endeavoured to stultify the people, and convince them that no necessity for change existed. This would not do, the public were too wise, so, gradually, step by step, and as slowly as possible, the journals have turned round, and now the lowering the suffrage is almost universally proposed; but the Chamber has done nothing more than abolish the double vote and make the age required in the elector 25, in the elected 30. The qualification has not been touched, neither as regards the deputy nor the electors. They have been exceedingly busy, however, in changing the prefects, the mayors, and all the place-holders in the departments. Their friends have now come in, and the situation of deputy has at length become a profitable appointment. But as for regulating the internal government in a way to secure peace and safety to the citizens, they seem never to dream of the necessity of such a thing. Every thing really important is formally put off to the next session, and matters by which humbug may have influence are taken into consideration. They now pretend to be occupied with the accusation of the Ministers. They have instituted a committee, which committee yesterday moved for new powers, and obtained them; but they have so completely mystified their very plain duty, that I can by no means understand what they are driving at. One thing is plain, they are doing every thing to create delay, in the hope that the public indignation will subside.

During all these sad delays the country is really without a Government, and here we cannot but compare the conduct of the people and the Deputies, and offer homage to the former. Without a Government, the country is nevertheless perfectly quiet: since the revolution not a single murder or robbery has taken place in Paris. Again, the poor starving workmen assembled some days since, and went in a body to the Prefect, beseeching him to exclude all the foreign workmen. The Prefect made them an excellent speech, pointing out to them the error under which they lay, and the poor fellows immediately returned, and quietly dispersed. Are not these speaking examples of true devotion to the cause of good government; as splendid as the conduct of the Deputies is base? I know no more important matter for investigation than would be now the state of the popular mind at Paris, and the causes which produced it. There appears among the victors of the three days no personal feeling, nothing but a desire to manifest to the world the justice of their cause, to prove that they have been actuated by no sinister interests, but were led on solely first to defend themselves, and then to rid themselves of an evil which was no longer supportable. The same spirit which then directed still continues to influence them. No riot, no attempt at pillage, no vain glory has been manifested by them. They calmly await the requisite reform of their Government, despairing indeed of much good from the present Chamber, but looking forward with hope to the next. So far from the journals being now in advance of the people, it is plain that the people are impelling the journals forward. They have now to make a great advance, or others will arise, and being au niveau of the people, will completely ruin the existing papers. It is strange to see how little of true knowledge those now in existence contain. They all can declaim well, but I have often heard more real sense, and really applicable knowledge, in one conversation, than has been contained in all the journals that have appeared since I arrived here. A new and very different set of instructors is now evidently required by the people.

36. TO JAMES MILL¹

[Paris]

27 August 1830

finished on the 28th

I have been exceedingly fortunate during my stay here, in having been brought into contact with a much greater number of persons such as I most desired to know, than I could possibly have had reason to expect at a time when all persons of any note are so much occupied. I am even much inclined to believe that I know more of the views and expectations professed by the different coteries than many of the men themselves, as it seems to me that most people at Paris associate chiefly with the men, and read the journals, of their own precise nuance d'opinion. But I consider myself particularly fortunate in having formed an acquaintance with M. Tanneguy Duchâtel,² and with the principal members of the society Aide-toi.

I have had some most interesting conversations with M. Duchatel whose correspondence with Mr. Wilmot Horton³ you probably remember. I knew him by reputation as one of the most enlightened men in France, and particularly as one of those who had profited most by the writings of the English political economists. I found that this was perfectly true. He seems to me to unite in an extraordinary degree the best qualities of a young Frenchman (for he seems to be under thirty) with the acquirements of an instructed Englishman, and especially with a knowledge of details and a habit of reflection on important practical questions, which few Frenchmen possess, the events of the last fifteen years having called into exercise few valuable qualities except those of a party pamphleteer, or at most a writer on the first principles of government. Most of the men with whom I converse seem to be well aware of this deficiency, or at least, readily admit it when stated. If there were many young men like Duchâtel, you would soon see a great difference in the character of their newspapers and of their parliamentary debates. At present any one of twenty men whom one could name in England could write every day the leading articles of all their newspapers as rapidly as his pen could move. But now when all the great questions of legislation, education, & social improvement in general will be brought on the tapis successively, the men who are already prepared to discuss these subjects avec connaissance de cause will soon occupy almost exclusively the ear of the public, & will also, if things go on smoothly, obtain the greatest influence in the government. Duchâtel is already appointed a conseiller d'état. What he told me about the present state of politics I will tell you another time. The information he gave me concerning the state of the labouring classes, the division of property, the restraints on population, & the state of education I have not time to put on paper just now, but I believe that Roebuck has written a long letter to Mr. Grote⁴ on the subject, which he has probably shewn to you. I shall see M. Duchâtel as often as I can while I remain here, & shall endeavour to obtain his permission to correspond with him. He made very particular enquiries respecting you and your occupations.

1. Addressed: James Mill Esq. / East India House / London / Angleterre /. Postmarks: 28 / AOUT / 1830 and AU 31 / 1830. MS in the Charles A. Brown Collection in the University of Rochester Library, Rochester, N.Y. First published in Victorian Studies, I (Dec., 1957), 137-54.

2. Charles Marie Tanneguy, comte Duchâtel (1803-1867), one of the founders of the Globe, later held various ministerial posts.

3. Sir Robert John Wilmot-Horton (1784-1841) had published in four series An Inquiry into the Causes and Remedies of Pauperism (London, 1830), the third series of which contained a correspondence with Duchâtel.

The society Aide toi et le Ciel t'aidera is composed of men probably much less instructed than M. Duchâtel, but far more democratic in their opinions and more capable of taking a leading part in turbulent times by their qualifications as men of action. They are all young men, & most of them have been engaged in active hostility to the government from very early youth; several who belonged to the society have even suffered capital punishment for having engaged in some of the numerous conspiracies which have existed at different periods since the restoration. M. Odilon-Barrot,⁵ the most distinguished avocat in the Courts at Paris, was president of the society for some time, & is still a member, but being now préfet of Paris he of course can take no part in their proceedings. The present organisation of the society was, I believe, formed for the purpose of facilitating anti-royalist elections under the Villèle ministry:⁶ they had, and

4. George Grote had been in Paris in the spring of 1830 and had been introduced to the Lafayette circle. On July 29 he opened a credit with his banker at Paris (Jacques Laffitte) for £500 for the use of the committee directing the revolutionary cause at the Hôtel de Ville (see Mrs. Grote, The Personal Life of George Grote [London, 1873], pp. 63–65).

5. Camille Hyacinth Odilon Barrot (1791–1873), liberal politician, had joined the National Guard and taken active part in the Revolution. He served also on the committee appointed to usher the deposed King out of the country.

6. The reactionary ministry of Jean Baptiste Seraphin Joseph, comte de Villèle (1773–1854), lasted from 1822 to 1827.

have, correspondents all over France, and without some such association these elections certainly would not have taken the turn they did, especially as all the liberal newspapers were then tied up by the censorship. The success of the last elections was also in a great degree owing to the efforts of the society; & they were the first persons who gave the signal for the late revolution, in which the little concert & organisation which existed was wholly their work. They are in constant communication with Lafayette, & with a very small number of deputies, the few whom they believe to have a real wish for the establishment of a popular government in France, the purpose for which they now remain united, & in the pursuit of which they are willing, & believe themselves able, to overturn the present ministry if it refuses the concessions which they consider necessary. I have no doubt that when the exertions of these people become more visible than they have been hitherto, they will be called the republican party: but it certainly is not true that they wish to establish a republic. If it had depended upon them, they would have made the duke of Orleans king, but after making considerable alterations in the constitution: and they appear now to regret extremely that when they had arms in their hands, when the people looked to them as their leaders & would have obeyed them before the hommes du lendemain had made their appearance, they did not proceed to the Hotel de Ville with Lafayette and Audry de Puyraveau⁷ & declare Lafayette lieutenant general of the kingdom & themselves a provisional government, by a proclamation signed by Lafayette & countersigned by their president: who being in correspondence with every considerable town would have been followed by the leading liberals all over France, all of whom are in the habit of receiving L'Empulsion from the society. The society is not wholly composed of men of the same shade of opinion but the committee takes care to have a majority always on its side; the members of the committee are agreed on the following points: that as an ultimate end, universal suffrage should be aimed at: that however in the present stage of education among the people, not above one third of whom can write (M. Duchâtel told me that some members even of the departmental colleges could not write their names) they ought to be satisfied with a considerable extension of the suffrage; that the whole people might however either now, or in a very little time, be admitted to chuse a body of electors, that there should be no hereditary peerage, & no conditions of eligibility except the age of 25. They are extremely dissatisfied with the conduct of the ministry. They say, that the men who have profited by the revolution are afraid of the men who made the revolution, & for that very reason. In consequence, the ministers have no confidence in what the society, who know more about the state of the country than anyone else, tell them respecting the general dissatisfaction they are exciting in the departments by some of the appointments which they have made & by their efforts to keep down l'élan révolutionnaire all over the country. The situation of the ministers is certainly difficult, but they have the folly to be guided in their appointments not by the wishes of the district itself but by the recommendation of the deputy, who nine times out of ten is a man who dreads the popular feeling, & who is so little of the same mind with the public that he has not the slightest chance of being reelected. The members of the society appear to be apprehensive that in consequence of the pusillanimity of the ministry the royalists may be able to raise disturbances in some of the provinces: but from what I can learn, this appears to me very improbable. You may judge of the degree of influence which the society is supposed to have among the people, by the circumstance that Lafayette, a few days ago when there was some danger of violent proceedings on the part of some bodies of workmen, sent to request that the society would issue an address to the labouring classes. Lafayette is in constant communication with the society, & several of the leading members are on his staff. I am to be presented to him by the president of the society next Tuesday, which is the day on which he receives company. I find in all those people the most friendly inclinations towards England: which I am glad to know as I am convinced that I shall hear the contrary asserted in many quarters at home, in the progress of events. They also seem to have a much better comprehension of English politics than is common in France: they understand the vices of our government, they see through the Whigs, & at the same time they, or at least those of them who have been in England, know enough of the state of feeling in English society to be aware of the mischief that might arise from their fraternising with any party among us, and especially from their connecting themselves with the disreputable part of our radicals. I think that I have myself been of some use in putting them on their guard against Sir Thomas Beevor and Cobbett,⁸ against Bowring⁹ and people of that kind. If you see Mr.

7. Pierre François Audry de Puyraveau (1773–1852), industrialist and politician, who actively supported Lafayette in the Revolution. On July 28 he contributed muskets to the revolting workers.

8. Following a dinner on Aug. 16 at the London Tavern to honour the people of Paris for their part in the Revolution, Beevor and James Paul Cobbett (1803–1881), son of William Cobbett (1763–1835), the well-known radical writer and politician, were sent to Paris as “Ambassadors of the Reformers of England” to present an “Address to the brave people of Paris.” The presentation was made on Aug. 23 at the Hôtel de Ville with Lafayette and a deputation of the National Guard in attendance (see The Times, Aug. 27, 1830, p. 2). Beevor’s and James Cobbett’s speeches were later printed in Cobbett’s Weekly Political Register, Sept. 11, 1830, pp. 342–45. Cobbett radicals and Benthamite radicals were always scornful of each other.

9. John Bowring on Aug. 28 also made a presentation of English addresses to the people of Paris at the Hôtel de Ville in the presence of Lafayette and the Prefect of Paris. Bowring, however, represented a different group of English reformers from Cobbett’s followers. Bowring bore an address from a dinner on Aug. 17 (one night

Murray¹⁰ of The Times, pray tell him that his visit to Lafayette has evidently been of great use. It is probable that two or three members of the society will (as individuals) come to England shortly. If they do, we must exert ourselves to the utmost to make their stay there useful & agreeable and to make them as much our friends as we possibly can, since the occasions will be innumerable when they will need such information & such advice as we & our friends can alone give them among Englishmen advice which they are at present very well disposed to receive from us as they know how hearty we are in their cause.

Lanjuinais will probably come—I am very anxious that he should be acquainted with you.

J.S.M.

37. TO WILLIAM JACKSON HOOKER¹

East India House.
12th October
1830.

DEAR SIR,

Pray accept my most sincere thanks for the very interesting and handsome present of specimens which you have been so obliging as to confer upon me.

I will take an early opportunity of sending to you specimens of the few plants, which I was so fortunate as to find that I had had greater opportunities than yourself of observing. I shall also avail myself of your permission to communicate to you any observations which I may hereafter be able to make, that are likely to be at all interesting to you. I had not the slightest idea when I made the former ones, that they could be of any value to any one except myself.

I have gathered for you some specimens of what I imagine to be the Atriplex erecta; it is certainly the only Atriplex to be found in the station mentioned by Smith,² and it has not the characters of any other English after Cobbett's dinner) at the London Tavern, at which were present such men as Henry Warburton, MP, Joseph Hume, MP, George Grote, and James Silk Buckingham. The Times reported this dinner at length on Aug. 18, p. 5. Bowring, though an intimate of Jeremy Bentham, was never highly regarded by either James or John Mill.

10. James Murray (d. 1835), Foreign Director of The Times.

* * * *

1. MS at Kew.

2. Sir James Edward Smith (1759–1828), founder of the Linnean Society and author of English Botany (36 vols., 1790–1814), and English Flora (4 vols., 1824–28).

Atriplex. The valves of the calyx of the fruit are in many instances very thickly set with projecting sharp points, but these points do not amount to prickles, being composed of the same herbaceous substance with the calyx itself; and moreover the calyx has not unfrequently, though in a slight degree, the appearance of the leaves of the ice-plant, which must arise from a number of small shining glands, easily rubbed off by the touch. I do not know whether the specimens will preserve this character when dry, therefore I mention it now, having examined the plant more minutely than I ever did before. I have not Smith's work by me at this instant, else I would consult it to see whether his Atriplex erecta possesses the last mentioned character.

I will endeavour to collect Fungi for you, indeed I have already picked up some, but I am afraid I shall not be able to effect much this autumn.

Believe me
most sincerely yours

J. S. MILL

. . . 1831 . . .

38. TO WILLIAM JACKSON HOOKER¹

India House.
26th January 1831.

MY DEAR SIR,

I owe you many apologies for having so long delayed forwarding to you the small parcel of specimens which is all I have to offer in return for all those which you were so good as to send me. The fact is that I have been so completely engrossed by other occupations that I have not been able, till now, to perform the annual duty of looking over my herbarium.

The specimens I now send are, I regret to say, not in general very good ones, but they are the best I have; I will endeavour to procure better ones next summer. I began collecting fungi so late, & had so little time to hunt for them, that I am able to send only two or three I am afraid very common ones.

You will find however specimens such as they are of all the plants which you expressed a wish to see, except one, as to which I must plead guilty to having misinformed you, the Thalictrum majus. How I came to commit this blunder I cannot conceive, as the plant is entered both in my herbarium and in my catalogue as Thalictrum flavum. In compensation I send you a plant which, I believe I did not mention before: the Lilium martagon, a plant new to the British flora, but certainly wild, & as far as it is possible to judge, indigenous.

It fills, as I imagine, nearly the whole of an extremely thick & close coppice wood, near Headley in Surrey. I first saw it about four years ago, when the coppice or rather a part of it was cut down, & the ground was seen to be covered with this plant; but as it never flowered I did not know what it was, though I wondered at it a good deal; but in June this year (I believe shortly after I wrote the notes on your *Flora*² to which I owe the privilege of corresponding with you) I discovered in another corner of the wood, a considerable number of full grown plants all of them on the point of flowering, two of which I gathered & now send to you. They are badly preserved, but there is no doubt of the identity of the plant, & as little of its being completely wild: If it ever escaped from a garden, it must have been at a very remote period, for there is no garden near, & the immense abundance of the plant in this coppice proves that if not indigenous, it is as completely naturalized as a plant can possibly be.

1. MS at Kew.

2. See Letter 31.

If chance, or your zeal for science, should ever bring you into the neighbourhood of Dorking³ (the most beautiful probably in the S. of England) it would be a great pleasure to me to shew you this spot, as well as the habitats of various other rare plants in that neighbourhood.

I have not been able to learn anything more respecting the Verbascum ferrugineum in the vicinity of Hampton Court & the Moulseys [sic], as I am no longer residing in that neighbourhood, but I will endeavour to revisit the spot. It certainly is not indigenous there, but it appeared to me to be completely naturalized. From your sending me the Rhynchospora alba, I conclude that it may not be known to you that the boggy or rather the wet parts of Cobham common in Surrey are covered with it. Accept once more my best thanks for your letter & its accompaniments & believe me

Most truly yours

J. S. MILL.

P.S. I send but one specimen of the Lycopodium from Esher Common, having lost the other.

39. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

India House

March 1st

1831

MY DEAR GUSTAVE

I write to you merely a few lines to shew that I am not inclined to neglect my absent friends. Adolphe will tell you every thing which I could say in a letter, and much more.

3. JSM's acquaintance with this area dated back at least to the summer of 1822, when his father took a summer residence at Dorking, where, Bain notes (James Mill, p. 204), "the family stayed six months in the year; he remaining there throughout his six weeks' holiday, and going down from Friday to Monday, during the rest of the time. To the end of his life, he [James Mill] kept up this arrangement, shifting his quarters from year to year; but finally settling in the small rural village of Mickleham, on the Dorking road, not far from Leatherhead and Epsom."

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / Gustave d'Eichthal. Published in Cosmopolis, VI, 355-56, and in D'Eichthal Correspondence, pp. 147-48. MS at Arsenal.

Your two friends, M. Janski and M. Bontemps,² have not had more success in converting me to St Simonism than Duverryer [sic]³ and you; but if you are sufficiently catholic, in the original & correct sense of the word, to rejoice at any progress which does not bring any proselytes within your pale, I think you will be pleased with two or three articles of mine in the Examiner, headed "The Spirit of the Age",⁴ which Adolphe is so kind as to take charge of for you.

Your doctrine begins to be talked of, & to excite some curiosity here—I have been the means of making it known to some persons, at their request: & in short, although I am not a St Simonist nor at all likely to become one, je tiens bureau de St Simonisme chez moi.

Pray commend me to Duveyrier; and to your two chiefs,⁵ even; if their haute mission has not prevented them from retaining any trace of me in their remembrance.

tout à vous

J. S. MILL

Je vous félicite de l'acquisition de Globe.⁶

40. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

[Spring or summer 1831]

How I wish I were by your side, and could speak to you instead of writing. You may lay down your anxiety, my dear Mütterlein, I hope never to resume it.

In the first place, the shutting up the University for a year is a cock-

2. Members of the Saint-Simonian hierarchy of seventy-eight persons organized in Paris by Le Père Enfantin in 1831. They were listed in the division of labour "Sans fonctions." Cf. H. R. D'Allemagne, Les Saints-Simoniens, 1827-37 (Paris, 1930), p. 106.

3. Charles Duveyrier (1803-1866), one of the leading writers among the Saint-Simoniens. Early the following year he visited London with D'Eichthal to promote the Saint-Simonian cause in England. See Letter 47, n. 1.

4. Three of the series of five essays under this title had thus far appeared, in the Examiner for Jan. 9, Jan. 23, and Feb. 6. The whole series has been republished in The Spirit of the Age, ed. F. A. Hayek (Chicago, 1942).

5. Saint Amand Bazard (1791-1832) and Barthélemy Prosper Enfantin (1796-1864), at this time pères supérieurs of the Saint-Simonian order. Later this year Bazard resigned because of his violent disagreement with Enfantin's advanced views on the relation of the sexes.

6. Beginning on Jan. 18, 1831, its title had become Le Globe: Journal de la Doctrine de Saint-Simon.

* * * *

1. MS in the possession of Mr. Gordon Waterfield.

and-bull story.² Romilly³ tells me that it was talked of by one or two of the members of council among themselves, but never was proposed to the Council, & R. is firmly persuaded it never will be proposed, & would have no chance of being carried.

Romilly is in better spirits about the University than he has long been. He says that he and my father and Mr Wm Tooke⁴ met together yesterday & looked over papers &c. &c. to see what could be done to reduce the expense, & the result was such as to convince Romilly that by the end of next year the receipts will exceed the disbursements.

So much for the University. Then Romilly tells me that it is now certain or nearly certain that a Professorship of Jurisprudence will be endowed by subscription for three years.⁵ I do not know whether I ought to have told you this as long as there could be even the slightest doubt: but I do not think there can be the slightest, from the manner in which he spoke of it, and besides I could not help telling you. However let us keep our joy to ourselves for the present. I never could bring myself to believe that we should lose you, and now I am sure we shall not.

Now you must write me a joyful note to make amends for your sorrowful one.

Ihre Söhnchen,

J. S. M.

41. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

27 August 1831.

MY DEAR GUSTAVE

I suppose it is of no use writing to you about any thing except what relates to the doctrine of St Simon. With respect to the translating of the St Simonian books, I think the time has hardly come for it—indeed my

2. Financial difficulties and internal dissension had caused much trouble in the session of 1830–31 of the recently founded London University. On March 26, 1831, the Warden, Leonard Horner, had resigned as of the end of the term. For the best account of this period in the history of the University, see chap. vi of H. H. Bellot, University College, London, 1826–1926 (London, 1929).

3. Probably John, later first Baron Romilly (1802–1874), who, though not a member of the Council of the University, was appointed in April, 1831, member of a committee to consider the future management of the University. See ibid., p. 209.

4. James Mill and William Tooke (1777–1863), later president of the Society of Arts, were members of the first Council of the University.

5. This was a matter of some concern for John Austin, since his receipts from students' fees were small. See Letter 32. An endowment of his chair of £200 per annum for three years was raised later in 1831. Cf. Bellot, University College, p. 99, and Letter 43, the penultimate paragraph.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / Gustave d'Eichthal / à Paris. MS at Arsenal.

own opinion is that to have any chance of making converts in this country it would be advisable not to translate the existing books, but to write new ones better adapted to the state of the English mind. However I was told some time ago by M^r Owen, that some of his friends were translating your works.² Whether they understand them sufficiently to be able to translate them in the proper manner, I do not know—but I suspect not.

I do not know to what merits of my own, as respects the doctrine of St Simon, I am indebted for regularly receiving the Globe—but I beg you to make my acknowledgments to your chiefs, and to accept them yourself, for the great pleasure which it has afforded me. I read it regularly and have derived great advantage from it, and though there is as little chance as ever of my becoming one of you, I do not differ from you nearly so much as I did.

I am much obliged to you for introducing me to the acquaintance of M^r Silsey,³ and I hope you will confer on me a similar favour whenever any of your friends comes to this place.

Pray make my affectionate remembrances to Adolphe and all friends. Is there any chance that Lanjuinais will come here in the approaching vacation?

Yours most truly

J. S. MILL.

42. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

[Oct. 7, 1831]²

MY DEAR SIR

When I wrote to you this morning that I was about to dine with a Frenchman who was an intimate friend of mine I was not aware that both the brother and the uncle of that friend were known to you, the first (M.

2. Lindley, p. 195, points out that apparently only two contemporaneous translations of Saint-Simonian books into English were made: one a translation by Thomas Carlyle of Saint-Simon's Nouveau Christianisme which Carlyle never published; the other a translation of the same work by James E. Smith, a Universalist minister and Owenite, published in 1834 by B. D. Cousins with the title New Christianity.

3. Unidentified.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle / 4 Ampton St. / Mecklenburg Sq^e. By permission of the Harvard College Library.

2. The letter is undated, but JSM and Adolphe d'Eichthal called on Carlyle on Monday, Oct. 10, 1831. See Two Notebooks of Thomas Carlyle, ed. C. E. Norton (New York, 1898), p. 205. The National Library of Scotland has an unpublished letter by Carlyle, dated the previous Wednesday night (Oct. 5), inviting JSM to meet Mrs. Carlyle, recently arrived from Scotland, for coffee at half-past six on Friday evening. JSM had met Carlyle for the first time on Sept. 2, 1831.

Gustave d'Eichthal) in correspondence with you, and the uncle³ a friend of your brother. My friend is extremely desirous of making your acquaintance, and as he leaves town for Edinburgh on Tuesday, Monday next is the only day on which I could have an opportunity of introducing him to you. If it is quite convenient and agreeable to you, it would be a great pleasure both to me and to him if you would permit us to call upon you on that evening. I think I may promise that you will like him.

He is acquainted with no person at Edinburgh, and if when you see him you should be disposed to give him any introductions there, I am sure they will be well bestowed and properly appreciated.

Believe me
Yours most truly
J. S. MILL

Friday
evening.

43. TO JOHN STERLING¹

From the 20th of October to the 22^d. India House. 1831.

DEAR STERLING

You must have wondered at not hearing from me sooner; and not without good reason. It is true that I have not heard from you non plus, so that we seem to have been equally neglectful of one another. But, 1. very probably a letter from you is now on its way here. 2. Your silence ought only to be counted from your arrival,² and mine from your setting out. 3. I have had only my ordinary occupations, while you have had all the trouble of settling in a new place, of commencing an entirely new mode of life and kind of occupation, and when this was just done, you were turned out by a vile hurricane & obliged to begin the whole thing over again.³ 4. A letter from home is still more precious than even the most

3. The Baron d'Eichthal, with whom Dr. John Carlyle spent nearly a year in Munich, 1827-28.

* * * *

1. MS at King's. Published with minor variants in Elliot.

2. Sterling had arrived at St. Vincent in the West Indies in the early summer of 1831 to take up duties as superintendent of a sugar plantation, Colonarie, an estate belonging to the Coningham family, and the chief source of his mother's income. See Tuell, John Sterling, p. 111.

3. For an account of the hurricane of Aug. 11, 1831, see Sterling's letter to his mother of Aug. 28, 1831, printed in Thomas Carlyle, Life of John Sterling (London, 1851), chap. xii, pp. 102-10.

interesting letter from abroad. 5. Though you have not written to me, you have to others, & I have seen part of what you wrote: now when a man is a great way off, his letter to one of his friends may be taken mutatis mutandis as a letter to all, but that cannot be said of their letters to him.— You see I have stated the case against myself as strongly as I can, in order to leave you nothing to add to it. As I have no excuse to make which will not leave my case worse than it is already, I can only make you the best reparation in my power by writing you an exceedingly long letter this time. I suppose it is right to assume that you must desire en premier lieu to hear about public affairs, now when they are in so ticklish a state: but really I can tell you little more than you will learn from the newspapers. The rejection of the Reform Bill by the large majority of 41 in the House of Lords,⁴ has given an immense impulse to the mouvement in this country. All chance that the Bill when passed should prove a healing measure is at an end. The House of Lords is now as much detested as ever the House of Commons was. Nothing less than the creation of from 60 to 100 liberal Peers, to change the character of the House, can now give it any chance of remaining in existence. It is said that they flinch, and will pass the Bill without any new creation, but that will not now save them. They will come into collision with the Reformed House on some other point, & will certainly go to the wall. You may consider the fate of the Church as sealed. Only two Bishops voted for the Bill; about five more staid away, the rest voted against it.⁵ The hierarchy being thus, as a body, hostile to it, while the temporal Peers were almost equally divided, the first brunt of public indignation has fallen upon the Prelacy. Every voice is raised against allowing them to continue in the House of Lords, and if I do not express my conviction that they will be excluded from it before this day five years, it is only because I doubt whether the House itself will last so long. I cannot say I regret either the approaching downfall of the Peers or that of the Church. I certainly think it desirable that there should be a conservative branch of the legislature; and that there should be a national clergy or clerisy, like that of which Coleridge traces the outline, in his work on Church & State.⁶ If therefore I thought that the present Peerage & Clergy would ever consent to become the peerage of a government constituted on anti-jobbing principles, & the clergy of a non-sectarian church, I should

4. On the second reading, Oct. 8, 1831.

5. The Examiner for Oct. 9 (p. 650) reported: "About the Reverend Bench 'there can be no mistake.' Only one Bishop, Dr. Maltby, voted as present, with the proxy of the venerable Bishop of Norwich. Twelve Bishops present, and nine Proxies, were against the Bill."

6. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, On the Constitution of the Church and State, according to the idea of each; with aids towards a right judgment on the late Catholic Bill (London, 1830).

— pray for their continuance. But they never will. Can a Peerage so ignorant as ours is proved to be by its recent vote, of the spirit of the age, & the feelings of the people, ever be able to fulfil with judgment the ends of a checking body, which are, to yield to all steady impulses of opinion, which are likely to be permanent, & to resist those which are in their nature temporary & changeable? And as for the clergy, who does not see that they are mainly divisible into two great categories, the worldly-minded, & the sectarians? I know that you will not agree with me, but I think that Coleridge would, in thinking that a national clergy ought to be so constituted as to include all who are capable of producing a beneficial effect on their age & country as teachers of the knowledge which fits people to perform their duties & exercise their rights, and as exhorters to the right performance & exercise of them: now I contend that such persons are to be found among all denominations of Christians, nay even among those who are not Christians at all: provided (which I deem an essential condition in the present stage of human progressiveness) they abstain from either directly attacking, or indirectly undermining Christianity, & even adopt (as far as without hypocrisy they can) those means of addressing the feelings & the conscience, to which a connexion with Christianity has given potency. An infidel who attempts to subvert or weaken the belief of mankind in Christianity, ought not in my opinion to form a part of the national clerisy; not because he may not be performing a conscientious duty in so doing, but because it is to me a proof that he misunderstands the wants & tendencies of his age, & that the effect of his exertions would probably be to make men worse instead of better by shaking the only firm convictions & feelings of duty which they have, without having even a remote chance of furnishing them with any effectual substitute. Accordingly in France, where Christianity has lost its hold on men's minds, my reasoning would not apply. There, I believe that a Christian would be positively less fit than a St Simonian (for example), to form part of a national church. These then are my ideas of a church establishment; ideas which I shall promulgate to the public in some shape or other when I shall see a good opportunity for their being attended to. But I feel certain that no church, not founded on this comprehensive principle, can, or ought to stand. I believe that if any class of Christians, Socinians for example, or even Deists, or Atheists, were excluded you could not select your clergy from the remainder of mankind without including persons less fit in every respect than some whom you would exclude. Besides, you would then retain that encouragement to hypocrisy, that holding out of worldly motives first to the adoption & next to the obstinate retention of particular creeds, which has disgusted so many high-minded men with church establishments: which has made them to be considered as obstacles to improvement, as the creation of a class with an interest adverse to the progressiveness of the species. In the present age of transition, everything must be subordinate to freedom of inquiry: if your opinions, or mine, are right, they will in time be unanimously adopted by the instructed classes, and then it will be time to found the national creed upon the assumption of their truth.— But what chance is there that the Church as at present constituted, will consent to undergo, even by the most insensible steps, this transformation? and that, too, at a time when insensible steps will not suffice. If they would, the recent elevation of Whately to the archbishopric of Dublin & of Maltby⁷ to the bishopric of Chichester, would greatly encourage me; the former because I think him one of the fittest men in the country to hold a high station in a national church such as I conceive it should be; the latter for the very reason which makes others disapprove of it, his want of orthodoxy. But all this might do while the people were attached to the Church. At present they are hostile to it: hostile consequently, to all church establishments, because they know of none better than this: & they would be more likely to accept an entirely new one, than one which they considered to be a transformation of this. Why is it almost the natural course of things in politics, that destruction must precede renovation? It is because reform is delayed till the whole attachment of the public to the entire of the institution is gone, & then they feel a distrust of anything which looks like patching up the old edifice. So I believe it to be both with Church & State at this moment. You have no doubt seen in the English papers, the speeches at public meetings and the various Resolutions which have been agreed to. These are generally very strong; but they were, in every case, the weakest which there was the least chance that the people would have adopted. Almost everywhere, if any person came forward & proposed stronger Resolutions, they were carried by acclamation, much to the dissatisfaction of those who called the meeting & prepared the proceedings. I am convinced that we are indebted for the preservation of tranquillity solely to the organisation of the people in Political Unions. All the other Unions look to the Birmingham one, & that looks to its half dozen leaders, who consequently act under a most intense consciousness of moral responsibility & are very careful neither to do nor say anything without the most careful deliberation. I conversed the other day with a Warwickshire magistrate who told me that the meeting of 150,000 men a few days previous would have done any thing without exception which their leaders might have proposed. They would have passed any resolutions, marched to any place, or burnt any man's house. The agricultural people are as determined as the manufacturers. The West is as exalté as the North. Colonel Napier made a speech at the Devizes meeting the other day⁸ for the express purpose (as I hear) of letting the men in the North perceive, that the West is ready to join in any popular movement if necessary; & since that speech (which the leaders in vain attempted to prevent him from delivering) he has received numbers of letters from all parts of the country, saying that they all look to him as their leader, & are ready to place themselves under his command. If the ministers flinch or the Peers remain obstinate, I am firmly convinced that in six months a national convention chosen by universal suffrage, will be sitting in London. Should this happen, I have not made up my mind what would be best to do: I incline to think it would be best to lie by and let the tempest blow over, if one could but get a shilling a day to live upon meanwhile: for until the whole of the existing institutions of society are levelled with the ground, there will be nothing for a wise man to do which the most pig-headed fool cannot do much better than he. A Turgot,⁹ even, could not do in the present state of England what Turgot himself failed of doing in France—mend the old system. If it goes all at once, let us wait till it is gone: if it goes piece by piece, why, let the blockheads who will compose the first Parliament after the bill passes, do what a blockhead can do, viz. overthrow, & the ground will be cleared, & the passion of destruction sated, & a coalition prepared between the wisest radicals & the wisest anti-radicals, between all the wiser men who agree in their general views & differ only in their estimate of the present condition of this country.—You will perhaps think from this long prosing rambling talk about politics, that they occupy much of my attention: but in fact I am myself often surprised, how little I really care about them. The time is not yet come when a calm & impartial person can intermeddle with advantage in the questions & contests of the day. I never write in the Examiner now except on France, which nobody else that I know of seems to know any thing about; & now & then on some insulated question of political economy. The only thing which I can usefully do at present, & which I am doing more & more every day, is to work out principles: which are of use for all times, though to be applied cautiously & circumspectly to any: principles of morals, government, law, education, above all self-education. I am here much more in my element: the only thing that I believe I am really fit for, is the investigation of abstract truth, & the more abstract the better. If there is any science which I am capable of promoting, I think it is the science of science itself, the science of investigation—of method. I once heard Maurice¹⁰ say (& like many things which have dropped from him, its truth did not strike me at first but it has been a source of endless reflexions since) that almost all differences of opinion when analysed, were differences of method. But if so, he who can throw most light upon the subject of method, will do most to forward that alliance among the most advanced intellects & characters of the age, which is the only definite object I ever have in literature or philosophy so far as I have any general object at all. Argal, I have put down upon paper a great many of my ideas on logic, & shall in time bring forth a treatise: but whether it will see the light until the Treaty of Westphalia is signed at the close of another cycle of reformation & antagonism, no one can tell except Messrs. Drummond,¹¹ M'Niel,¹² Irving,¹³ & others, who possess the hidden key to the Interpretation of the Prophecies. I have just put the finishing hand to my part of a work on Political Economy, which Graham & I are writing jointly:¹⁴ our object is to clear up some points which have been left doubtful, to correct some which we consider to be wrong, & to shew what the science is & how it should be studied. I have written five essays; four on detached questions & one on the science itself. Graham is to write five more on the same subjects: we are then to compare notes, throw our ideas into a common stock, talk over all disputed points till we agree (which between us two, we know by experience to be by no means an indefinite postponement) & then one of us is to write a book out of the materials. Graham is to add a sixth essay on a very important part of the subject which is above my reach, & which I am only to criticize when it is done. I am now resting upon my oars. Yesterday I completed my task, & having reached a sort of landing-place (vide the Friend)¹⁵ I have asked

7. Edward Maltby (1770–1859), then Bishop of Chichester, later, 1836–56, Bishop of Durham, voted for the Reform Bill. See n. 5 above.

8. Sir William Francis Patrick Napier (1785–1860), later General, historian of the Peninsular War. The King on Oct. 9 in indignation at Napier's speech sent Earl Grey a copy of the Globe for Oct. 7 which contained a report of it. The King favoured dismissal of Napier from the army, but Grey dissuaded His Majesty from such a step. See Charles Grey, 2^d Earl Grey, The Reform Act, 1832; the Correspondence of the late Earl Grey with His Majesty King William IV . . ., ed. Henry Earl Grey (2 vols., London, 1867), I, 368.

9. Anne Robert Jacques Turgot, baron de l'Aulne (1727–1781), statesman and economist, Comptroller General (1774–76) under Louis XVI.

10. Frederick Denison Maurice (1805–1872), liberal divine; for JSM's assessment of him, see Autobiog., chap. v.

11. Henry Drummond (1786–1860), politician and joint founder of the Irvingite Church, built a church at Albury; in 1834 visited Scotland as an apostle and was ordained as angel for Scotland.

12. Rev. Hugh M'Neil (1795–1879), rector at Albury, closely associated with the Irvingites at this time; later (1868–75), Dean of Ripon.

13. Rev. Edward Irving (1792–1834), founder of the Irvingite or Catholic Apostolic Church, friend of Carlyle. He and his followers specialized in prophecy and the gift of tongues.

14. This project arose from the discussions of the study group that met at Grote's house in Threadneedle Street. (See JSM, Autobiog., pp. 83–86.) The plan for a joint publication with Graham did not materialize. JSM's essays appeared years later under the title Essays on Some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy (1844). See Letters 86, 424, 425, 427.

15. S. T. Coleridge, The Friend. A literary, moral, and political weekly paper, 28 nos. (Penrith, 1809–10); collected edition, with alterations and additions (3 vols., London, 1818). The preface to the latter edition, after describing the general introduction, concludes, "three several collections of essays, in some degree miscellaneous and called Landing-Places . . . complete the work."

myself what recreation I could offer myself by way of reward for past & encouragement to future exertions; & nothing better has yet occurred to me, than writing to you. The next thing I shall do will be to complete my speculations on Logic: very likely I shall not get to the end of the subject yet, viewed as I understand it; but I shall at least gather in another harvest of ideas, & then let the ground lie fallow a while longer.¹⁶ After this I shall probably put down upon paper a vast quantity of miscellaneous ideas which are wrought out to a certain extent in my head, but which it would be quite premature to publish for a long while to come. I have nothing in view for the public just now, except (when the Reform Bill shall have past) to resume my series of papers headed the Spirit of the Age;¹⁷ and to write an article or two for the Jurist (now about to be revived) on some abstract questions of general legislation.¹⁸ When I shall have completed all this, then if the East India Company is abolished and funded property confiscated, I shall perhaps scrape together the means of paying my passage to St Vincent's & see whether you will employ me to teach your niggers political economy. I take it for granted that if a Reformed Parliament should begin taking measures for the emancipation of the slaves, you will all join the United States, who being lovers of liberty, will I trust go to war with Republican England to restore you & the other colonists, to the inalienable rights of freemen.

I have done nothing in this letter but talk to you about the world in general and about myself. I must now talk to you about other people, and particularly about several new acquaintances of mine that I had not made or had only just begun to make when you left this white world. First of all, I went this summer to the Lakes,¹⁹ where I saw much splendid scenery, and also saw a great deal both of Wordsworth and Southey;²⁰ and I must tell you what I think of them both. In the case of Wordsworth, I was particularly struck by several things. One was, the extensive range of his

16. He did not publish his Logic until 1843.

17. See Letter 39, n. 4.

18. No article of his seems to have appeared in the Jurist until Feb., 1833: "Corporation and Church Property," reprinted in his Dissertations, I, 28-67, with the title "The Right and Wrong of State Interference with Corporation and Church Property."

19. His MS journal of this holiday, "Tour of the Lakes," extending from July 19 to Aug. 15, 1831, is in the Bodleian Library. Anna J. Mill has published excerpts: "John Stuart Mill's Visit to Wordsworth, 1831," Modern Language Rev., XLIV (1949), 341-50.

20. JSM had met Southey at a breakfast party given by Henry Taylor on Nov. 14, 1830. Others in the party included Edward Strutt, Charles Villiers, Thomas Frederick Elliot, and Charles Greville. See The Greville Memoirs, ed. Lytton Strachey and Roger Fulford (8 vols., London, 1938), II, 57-58. JSM had breakfast with Wordsworth and the same group on Feb. 27, 1831 (ibid., p. 122). Anna J. Mill, "JSM's Visit to Wordsworth," thinks that JSM may have met Wordsworth even earlier at Henry Taylor's.

thoughts and the largeness & expansiveness of his feelings. This does not appear in his writings, especially his poetry, where the contemplative part of his mind is the only part of it that appears: & one would be tempted to infer from the peculiar character of his poetry, that real life & the active pursuits of men (except of farmers & other country people) did not interest him. The fact however is that these very subjects occupy the greater part of his thoughts, & he talks on no subject more instructively than on states of society & forms of government. Those who best know him, seem to be most impressed with the catholic character of his ability. I have been told that Lockhart²¹ has said of him that he would have been an admirable country attorney. Now a man who could have been either Wordsworth or a country attorney, could certainly have been anything else which circumstances had led him to desire to be. The next thing that struck me was the extreme comprehensiveness and philosophic spirit which is in him. By these expressions I mean the direct antithesis of what the Germans most expressively call onesidedness. Wordsworth seems always to know the pros and the cons of every question; & when you think he strikes the balance wrong, it is only because you think he estimates erroneously some matter of fact. Hence all my differences with him, or with any other philosophic Tory, would be differences of matter-of-fact or detail, while my differences with the radicals & utilitarians are differences of principle: for these see generally only one side of the subject, & in order to convince them, you must put some entirely new idea into their heads, whereas Wordsworth has all the ideas there already, & you have only to discuss with him concerning the "how much," the more or less of weight which is to be attached to a certain cause or effect, as compared with others: thus the difference with him turns upon a question of varying or fluctuating quantities, where what is plus in one age or country is minus in another & the whole question is one of observation & testimony & of the value of particular articles of evidence. I need hardly say to you that if one's own conclusions & his were at variance on every question which a minister or a Parliament could to-morrow be called upon to solve, his is nevertheless the mind with which one would be really in communion: our principles would be the same, and we should be like two travellers pursuing the same course on the opposite banks of a river.—Then when you get Wordsworth on the subjects which are peculiarly his, such as the theory of his own art—if it be proper to call poetry an art, (that is, if art is to be defined the expression or embodying in words or forms, of the highest & most refined parts of nature) no one can converse with him without feeling that he has advanced that great subject beyond any other man, being probably the first person who ever combined, with such eminent success in the practice of the art, such high powers of generalization & habits of meditation on its principles. Besides all this, he seems to me the best talker I ever heard (& I have heard several first-rate ones); & there is a benignity & kindness about his whole demeanour which confirms what his poetry would lead one to expect, along with a perfect simplicity of character which is delightful in any one, but most of all in a person of first-rate intellect. You see I am somewhat enthusiastic on the subject of Wordsworth, having found him still more admirable & delightful a person on a nearer view than I had figured to myself from his writings; which is so seldom the case that it is impossible to see it without having one's faith in man greatly increased & being made greatly happier in consequence. I also was very much pleased with Wordsworth's family—at least the female part of it. I am convinced that the proper place to see him is in his own kingdom—I call the whole of that mountain region his kingdom, as it will certainly be as much thought of hereafter by the people of Natchitoches or of Swan River, as Mænalus and the Cephissus, or Baiae and Soracte by ourselves, and this from the fortuitous circumstance that he was born there & lived there. I believe it was not there that you were acquainted with him, & therefore I am not telling you an old story in talking about the little palace or pavilion which he occupies in this poetic region, & which is perhaps the most delightful residence in point of situation in the whole country. The different views from it are a sort of abstract or abridgment of the whole Westmoreland side of the mountains, & every spot visible from it has been immortalised in his poems. I was much pleased with the universality of his relish for all good poetry however dissimilar to his own: & with the freedom & unaffected simplicity with which every person about him seemed to be in the habit of discussing & attacking any passage or poem in his own works which did not please them.—I also saw a great deal of Southey, who is a very different kind of man, very inferior to Wordsworth in the higher powers of intellect, & entirely destitute of his philosophic spirit, but a remarkably pleasing & likeable man. I never could understand him till lately; that is, I never could reconcile the tone of such of his writings as I had read, with what his friends said of him: I could only get rid of the notion of his being insincere, by supposing him to be extremely fretful and irritable: but when I came to read his Colloquies,²² in which he has put forth much more than in any other work, of the natural man, as distinguished from the writer aiming at a particular effect, I found there a kind of connecting link between the two parts of his character, & formed very much the same notion of him which I now have after seeing & conversing with him. He seems to me to be a man of gentle feelings & bitter opinions. His opinions make him think a great many things abominable which are not so; against which accordingly he thinks it would be right, & suitable to the fitness of things, to express great indignation: but if he really feels this indignation, it is only by a voluntary act of the imagination that he conjures it up, by representing the thing to his own mind in colours suited to that passion: now, when he knows an individual & feels disposed to like him, although that individual may be placed in one of the condemned categories, he does not conjure up this phantom & feels therefore no principle of repugnance, nor excites any. No one can hold a greater number of the opinions & few have more of the qualities, which he condemns, than some whom he has known intimately & befriended for many years: at the same time he would discuss their faults & weaknesses or vices with the greatest possible freedom in talking about them. It seems to me that Southey is altogether out of place in the existing order of society: his attachment to old institutions & his condemnation of the practices of those who administer them, cut him off from sympathy & communion with both halves of mankind. Had he lived before radicalism & infidelity became prevalent, he would have been the steady advocate of the moral & physical improvement of the poorer classes & denouncer of the selfishness & supineness of those who ought to have considered the welfare of those classes as confided to their care. Possibly the essential one-sidedness of his mind might then have rendered him a democrat: but now the evils which he expects from increase of the power wielded by the democratic spirit such as it now is, have rendered him an aristocrat in principle without inducing him to make the slightest compromise with aristocratic vices and weaknesses. Consequently he is not liked by the Tories, while the Whigs and radicals abhor him. And after all, a man cannot complain of being misinterpreted, who always puts the worst interpretation upon the words and deeds of other people. As far as I have yet seen, speculative Toryism and practical Toryism are direct contraries. Practical Toryism simply means, being in, and availing yourself of your comfortable position inside the vehicle without minding the poor devils who are freezing outside. To be a Tory means either to be a place-hunter and jobber or else to think that (as Turgot expressed it) tout va bien, parce que tout va bien pour eux; to be one qui ayant leur lit bien fait, ne veulent pas qu'on le remue. Such Toryism is essentially incompatible with any large and generous aspirations; nor could any one who had such aspirations ever have any power of realizing them under our system, whatever might be his attachment to the forms of the Constitution, because the inert mass of our sluggish and enervated higher classes can be moved by nothing that does not come from without, & with a vengeance; they cannot be led, but must be driven: the clamours of the "fierce democracy" can alone stir their feeble and lazy minds, & awaken them from the sleep of indifference. What can you do when there is no faith in human improvement, & every glaring, disgusting evil which they cannot deny is set down as the inevitable price we pay for social order, & irremediable by human efforts? "It is all very true, but what can we do?" is the ready answer of everybody who can possibly avoid doing something; & you can say nothing in reply but this, "Then if you can do nothing for that society which has hitherto made nobody the happier unless it be yourselves, the rest of mankind must try what they can do to improve their own lot without your assistance, & then perhaps you may not like their manner of proceeding." If there were but a few dozens of persons safe (whom you & I could select) to be missionaries of the great truths in which alone there is any well-being for mankind individually or collectively, I should not care though a revolution were to exterminate every person in Great Britain & Ireland who has £500 a year. Many very amiable persons would perish, but what is the world the better for such amiable persons.²³ But among the missionaries whom I would reserve, a large proportion would consist of speculative Tories: for it is an ideal Toryism, an ideal King, Lords, & Commons, that they venerate; it is old England as opposed to the new, but it is old England as she might be, not as she is. It seems to me that the Toryism of Wordsworth, of Coleridge (if he can be called a Tory) of Southey even, & of many others whom I could mention, is tout bonnement a reverence for government in the abstract: it means, that they are duly sensible that it is good for man to be ruled; to submit both his body & mind to the guidance of a higher intelligence & virtue. It is therefore the direct antithesis of liberalism, which is for making every man his own guide & sovereign master, & letting him think for himself & do exactly as he judges best for himself, giving other men leave to persuade him if they can by evidence, but forbidding him to give way to authority; and still less allowing them to constrain him more than the existence & tolerable security of every man's person and property renders indispensably necessary. It is difficult to conceive a more thorough ignorance of man's nature, & of what is necessary for his happiness or what degree of happiness & virtue he is capable of attaining than this system implies. But I cannot help regretting that the men who are best capable of struggling against these narrow views & mischievous heresies should chain themselves, full of life & vigour as they are, to the inanimate corpses of dead political & religious systems, never more to be revived. The same ends require altered means; we have no new principles, but we want new machines constructed on the old principles; those we had before are worn out. Instead of cutting a safe channel for the stream of events, these people would dam it up till it breaks down every thing & spreads devastation over a whole region.

21. John Gibson Lockhart (1794–1854), son-in-law and biographer of Sir Walter Scott.

22. Robert Southey, Sir Thomas More; or, Colloquies on the Progress and Prospects of Society (2 vols., London, 1829).

23. The following sentence has been crossed out in the MS: "I should only regret the women, whose proper sphere is that of the private virtues."

Another acquaintance which I have recently made is that of Mr. Carlyle,²⁴ whom I believe you are also acquainted with.²⁵ I have long had a very keen relish for his articles in the Edinburgh & Foreign Reviews, which I formerly thought to be such consummate nonsense; and I think he improves upon a nearer acquaintance. He does not seem to me so entirely the reflexion or shadow of the great German writers as I was inclined to consider him; although undoubtedly his mind has derived from their inspiration whatever breath of life is in it. He seems to me as a man who has had his eyes unsealed, and who now looks round him & sees the aspects of things with his own eyes, but by the light supplied by others; not the pure light of day, but another light compounded of the same simple rays but in different proportions. He has by far the largest & widest liberality & tolerance (not in the sense which Coleridge justly disavows,²⁶ but in the good sense) that I have met with in any one; & he differs from most men who see as much as he does into the defects of the age, by a circumstance greatly to his advantage in my estimation, that he looks for a safe landing before and not behind: he sees that if we could replace things as they once were, we should only retard the final issue, as we should in all human probability go on just as we then did, & arrive again at the very place where we now stand. Carlyle intends staying in town all the winter: he has brought his wife to town (whom I have not seen enough of yet to be able to judge of her at all): his object was to treat with booksellers about a work which he wishes to publish,²⁷ but he has given up this for the present, finding that no bookseller will publish anything but a political pamphlet in the present state of excitement. In fact literature is suspended; men neither read nor write. Accordingly Carlyle means to employ his stay here in improving his knowledge of what is going on in the world, at least in this part of it, I mean in that part of the world of ideas and feelings which corresponds to London. He is a great hunter-out of acquaintances; he hunted me out, or rather hunted out the author of certain papers in the *Examiner*²⁸ (the first, as he said, which he had ever

24. See Letter 42, n. 2.

25. Carlyle in his Life of John Sterling, Part I, chap. xii, and Part II, chap. ii, says that though he had learned of Sterling from JSM and the Austins in 1831 he first met him in Feb., 1835.

26. Cf. Coleridge, The Friend (London, 1818), I, 158–63, and Aids to Reflection (London, 1825), pp. 101–3.

27. Sartor Resartus. Carlyle eventually had to "slit [it] up into strips, and send it forth in the Periodical way" (Letters of Thomas Carlyle, 1826–1836, ed. C. E. Norton [London, 1889], p. 368). It first appeared in Fraser's from Nov., 1833, to Aug., 1834.

28. The essays in JSM's "The Spirit of the Age" series.

seen in a newspaper, hinting that the age was not the best of all possible ages): & his acquaintance is the only substantial good I have yet derived from writing those papers, & a much greater one than I expected when I wrote them. He has also, through me, sought the acquaintance of Fonblanque²⁹ (of the Examiner) whom I found him to be an admirer of, and who though as little of a mystic as most men, reads his writings with pleasure. I expect great good from Fonblanque; he is fashioned for the work of the day, as befits one who works for the day, but he is one of those on whom one may most completely rely for being ready to turn over a new leaf when the old one is read through.

I have to add yet another new acquaintance to all these, and one who is by no means the least remarkable among them; I mean Stephen,³⁰ the Counsel to the Colonial Office, son of the Master in Chancery. I have only yet seen him two or three times, but I hope to see much more of him, especially as I have now gone to live in his immediate neighbourhood, at Kensington.³¹ I have hardly met with any person who seems to me to take such just views of the age and of futurity as he does; to be so free from any exaggeration or one-sidedness, and to combine the speculative & the practical in so just a proportion. He cannot fail hereafter to exercise a great influence over the destinies of his country, not so much perhaps by what he does, as by what he makes other persons do. He is at this moment the directing spirit not only of the Colonial Office but of several other departments of the government: under great restraints & disadvantages of course, from the unteachable quality of those placed over him & their dread of anything like a principle, arising from their consciousness of inability to comprehend in one view all that is involved in it & all the consequences to which it leads. Stephen is reputed a saint: I do not know in what sense he is one, though I know that he carries the observance of the Sabbath to the extent of puritanism. But if all the English evangelicals were like him, I think I should attend their Exeter Hall³² meetings myself, and subscribe to their societies. I will write to you at greater length about Stephen when I have seen more of him.

29. Albany Fonblanque (1793–1872), radical journalist, editor of the Examiner, 1830–47.

30. James (later Sir James) Stephen (1789–1859), Colonial Under-Secretary, father of Leslie and Fitzjames Stephen. In the last week of Sept., 1831, Stephen had accompanied JSM, Henry Taylor, and Frederick Elliot on a visit to Coleridge at Highgate (see Correspondence of Henry Taylor, ed. Edward Dowden [London, 1888], p. 39).

31. James Mill had moved his family from Queen Square to Vicarage Place, Church Street, Kensington, in the spring of 1831.

32. A large building erected in the Strand in the year of this letter for the activities of dissenting religious and charitable societies. With a hall seating five thousand, it was for many years the meeting place for various large dissenting religious groups.

As for our common friends and acquaintances here, I have but little to tell you concerning them. Mrs. Austin will of course write to you. I do not know whether the subscription for endowing the Jurisprudence chair is yet full,³³ but no doubt is entertained that it will be so. Mr. Austin is still engaged in bringing out his first eight lectures, which are soon to appear. He is in good health & spirits upon the whole. I have not seen or heard anything about Maurice; I hope our separation is not to be everlasting. Wilson³⁴ has very recently returned from Germany, where he has spent about a year. I have seen very little of Charles Buller;³⁵ you are probably aware that he is not in this Parliament, but he is sure of being returned for Liskeard when the Bill passes. The greatest change that has occurred in any one since I saw you is in Roebuck; he has pulled off his strait jacket, and now moves freely: his mental powers are no longer enslaved by fixed forms of words, and phrases strung together syllogistically with the false appearance of Euclidean demonstration. His intellect has greatly expanded, & the asperities of his character are much softened: and though there still remains, & possibly may always remain, much in his mental character which you and I would greatly object to, I have now no doubt of his being a useful, powerful, and constantly improving member of the only Church which has now any real existence, namely that of writers and orators.

The Colonization scheme³⁶ is going on prosperously. They have formed a plan for a new colony, to be settled on their principles on the coast of Southern Australia near the place where the newly discovered navigable river discharges itself into the sea. They are endeavouring to form a Land-Company to settle the country, & have the promise of an excellent Charter from Government when the company is formed. The Colonial Office I believe to be heartily with them at present. Our friend Graham has gone into the scheme with his usual vigour, & is now one of their leading minds: he wrote their last two pamphlets. Wakefield³⁷ now moves openly in the thing, though it is not declared publicly that he was the originator of it; but there is no reason now for keeping his connexion with it altogether a secret, as he has made himself very advantageously known to the public

33. See Letter 40, n. 5.

34. Probably John Wilson, a London friend of JSM, later an assistant factory commissioner and an editor of the Globe newspaper.

35. Charles Buller (1806–1848), liberal politician; pupil of Carlyle, 1822–25; MP for West Looe, Cornwall, 1830–31; MP for Liskeard, 1832–48; secretary to Governor General of Canada, 1838; Judge–Advocate General, 1846.

36. Both Sterling and Mill had associated themselves as early as 1830 with the Colonization Society, of which the moving spirit was Edward Gibbon Wakefield. The plan for the colonization of South Australia was an outgrowth of the Society's work.

37. Edward Gibbon Wakefield (1796–1862), colonial statesman. Wakefield had abducted an heiress in 1826; he was imprisoned from 1826 to 1829 and his marriage cancelled by Parliament.

by, really, a most remarkable book on the punishment of death, founded on the observations he made while in Newgate.³⁸ You are aware that our old enemy, Wilmot Horton,³⁹ has gone to Ceylon as governor, so that he no longer stands in the way of a rational scheme of colonization.—The St Simonists are making immense progress in France, & are doing great good there: France has nobody comparable to them on the whole. They talk of sending missionaries here; that will do them no good, I think.—This letter I hope will call forth an equally long one from you. I beg to be duly remembered to Mrs. John Sterling.

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL

44. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

30th November
1831

MY DEAR D'EICHTHAL

I know you too well to write to you on any subject except that of the great, and truly apostolic work in which you are engaged, and to which, though I am very far indeed from entirely agreeing with you, I have for some time been accustomed to look, as the greatest enterprise now in progress, for the regeneration of society.

I am greatly indebted to you and your associates, for being thought worthy to receive the Globe. If I did not sympathize with you in any other respect, it would still be a noble spectacle to see a body of men standing erect and fronting the world as you do. But the daily reading of the Globe, combined with various other causes, has brought me much nearer to many of your opinions than I was before; and I regard you as decidedly à la tête de la civilisation.

I am now inclined to think that your social organisation, under some modification or other, which experience, no doubt, will one day suggest to yourselves, is likely to be the final and permanent condition of the human race. I chiefly differ from you in thinking that it will require many, or at least several, ages, to bring mankind into a state in which they will

38. Facts relating to the Punishment of Death in the Metropolis (London, 1831).

39. Sir Robert John Wilmot-Horton. A controversy stirred up by him had resulted in the temporary dissolution of the Colonization Society. Two extant letters by Sterling to JSM relate to this controversy: see Tuell, John Sterling, pp. 95–97.

* * * *

1. MS at Arsenal. Published in Cosmopolis, VI, 356–58, and D'Eichthal Corresp., pp. 149–52. The slightly variant version of it published by Elliot, I, 19–21, is based upon a copy made by D'Eichthal on May 14, 1870, and sent to JSM; this copy is now at Johns Hopkins.

be capable of it; & that in the mean time they are only capable of approximating to it by that gradual series of changes which are so admirably indicated and discussed in the writings of your body, and every one of which independently of what it may afterwards lead to, has the advantage of being in itself a great positive good. Your system, therefore, even supposing it to be impracticable, differs from every other system which has ever proposed to itself an unattainable end, in this, that many, indeed almost all attainable good lies on the road to it.

You, I am aware, think that all who adopt your system, prove thereby that they are capable of performing all which it would require of them if it became universal. I think not. But since you think so, it was your duty to commence, as you have done, the experiment of realizing it on such a scale as is permitted to you. I watch the experiment; and watch it with all the solicitude and anxiety of one, all whose hopes of the very rapid and early improvement of human society are wrapt up in its success.

If men of such ardent and generous enthusiasm, such strong and penetrating intellects, and such extensive views, are found unable to act up to their own conceptions of duty, what hope is there for the rest of mankind? If the Saint-Simonian society holds together without schism & heresy, and continues to propagate its faith and extend its numbers, at the rate it has done for the last two years—if this shall continue for a few years more, then I shall see something like a gleam of light through the darkness. But if not—then what is done will not be of no avail; I shall not despair, nor ought you. But it will be a grievous downfall[1] to our hopes.

Write to me sometimes, my dear friend. Be not afraid that your labour will be lost. I have never yet read a single article in the Globe which has not wrought something within me; which I have not been in some measure the better for. And if the hour were yet come for England—if it were not as vain to seek a hearing for any “vues organiques” in England now, as it would have been for your master St Simon in the height of the revolution—I know not that I should not renounce every thing, and become, not one of you, but as you.

But our 10 août, our 20 juin, and perhaps our 18 Brumaire,² are yet to come and which of us will be left standing when the hurricane has blown over, Heaven only knows.

Yours ever

J. S. MILL.

2. Significant dates in the history of the French Revolution: Aug. 10, 1792, the uprising of the Jacobins which led to the establishment of the revolutionary Commune of Paris, the subsequent September massacres and the overthrow of the monarchy; June 20, 1789, the Oath of the Tennis Court, whereby the deputies of the new National Assembly swore that they would not separate until they had established a constitution for France; Nov. 9, 1799 (18 Brumaire), beginning of the coup d'état which placed Napoleon Bonaparte in power.

45. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

London

6th December 1831.

MY DEAR D'EICHTHAL,

Ever since your note was given to me by M. Arlès,² I have been turning over in my mind your ideas concerning the dissemination of your principles in this country, and considering to what persons the Globe might be sent with prospect of advantage. I should not recommend its being sent either to the leading newspapers or to the leading members of parliament. It would not be read, or it would be read just enough to be altogether misunderstood. I have however thought of a few persons to whom it would be useful. Some of these I know to be in some measure prepared to receive many of your opinions favorably. Others will make your doctrine known by attacking it. Now since you have been violently attacked already by Southey, in so widely circulated a work as the Quarterly Review,³ & mentioned in several newspapers of large circulation, as a set of dreamers and visionaries, it is desirable that you should be attacked a great deal more, & by a great variety of persons, in order that being attacked on all sides, your doctrine may have all its sides laid bare and divulged. Each person in pointing out the things which he dislikes, will shew to some other person that there are things which he would like. While you are only attacked as anarchists & levellers, you will excite no attention here, but when you come to be represented by A as anarchists; by B as absolutists; by C as levellers; by D as hierarchs; by E as infidels; by F as mystical religionists; by G as sentimentalists; by H as metaphysicians & political economists; & so forth; the public will see that an absurdity which has so many different faces, cannot be quite an absurdity; or at least, that it is an absurdity unlike others, & worth studying.

Among the young members of parliament (as for the old ones, they are hopeless) I only know two to whom there would be the least use in sending the Globe; & of them I am not sure. One is Mr T. Hyde Villiers,⁴ the same who originated in parliament the proposition for equalizing the duties on French & on other foreign wines. He has now a place in the govern-

1. MS at Arsenal. Published in Cosmopolis, VI, 358–61, and in D'Eichthal Corresp., pp. 153–59.

2. Presumably François Barthélemy Arlès-Du Four (1797–1872), a leader of the Saint-Simonians at Lyon, later a successful industrialist. Originally, his name was Arlès.

3. A review of Doctrines de Saint Simon, Exposition (2nd ed., Paris, 1830), QR, XLV (July, 1831), 407–50.

4. Thomas Hyde Villiers (1801–1832), politician and close friend of JSM, who wrote a brief eulogy of him upon his untimely death. See Letter 64, n. 18.

ment; he is secretary to the India Board, & his address is there. (N.B. Do not confound the India Board with the India House.) His brother⁵ is now at Paris as one of the commissioners to negotiate about free trade.

The other member of parliament to whom I allude is Mr Edward Lytton Bulwer⁶ (his address is 36, Hertford Street, May-fair.) He is the author of several literary productions which have been very successful; & he is now the editor of the New Monthly Magazine, a periodical publication of considerable sale, very frivolous until lately, but which under his management has become very much the reverse. If you ever see it, you will remark in it des vues d'avenir which are exceedingly rare in this country.

It is not worth while to send the Globe to any of our daily newspapers; but if you send it to Mr Sterling⁷ (South Place, Knightsbridge) who is one of the principal writers in the Times, there is some chance of its being of use. I know that he has read particular articles in the Globe, & has been much pleased with them. It may be of use to send it to two of our best provincial papers, if you can do so conveniently, the "Scotsman", an Edinburgh paper, and the "Brighton Guardian." The former, with some prejudices, is the most "progressif" of all our newspapers, scarcely excepting the Examiner. The Brighton paper is remarkable for a certain force and boldness of speculation, though the writer is sadly abroad.

You should certainly send the Globe to Colonel T. Perronet Thompson,⁸ the principal proprietor of the Westminster Review. He is partially acquainted with your doctrine, & likes some things in it, but dislikes others: I believe he has some notion of writing in his review about you. I am satisfied no one can do so without going egregiously wrong, unless he be a regular reader of the Globe. If your packets are sent to the Westminster Review office, Wellington Street, Strand, they will reach him.

If you like to send the Globe to Southey, his address is Robert Southey Esq. Keswick, Cumberland. Your brother will be able to advise you about sending it to Professor Wilson⁹ of Edinburgh, the principal writer in Blackwood's Magazine, the great organ of our Tories. If you do, he will be sure to write about you; he will compliment you, and attack you, and will say a great deal about you which the public will not hear from any

5. George William Frederick Villiers (1800–1870), later fourth Earl of Clarendon and fourth Baron Hyde, diplomat and foreign minister.

6. Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer, later Bulwer-Lytton, and subsequently first Baron Lytton (1803–1873), novelist and politician.

7. Edward Sterling, father of JSM's friend John Sterling.

8. Thomas Perronet Thompson (1783–1869), general, politician, and writer, especially on economics, and from 1829 to 1836 proprietor and editor of the Westminster Review. Some months after this letter, Thompson attacked the Saint-Simonians: "Saint-Simonism," WR, XVI (April, 1832), 279–321.

9. John Wilson (1785–1854), the "Christopher North" of Blackwood's Magazine and professor of moral philosophy at Edinburgh University.

one else, and which will excite their curiosity; he did all this for our utilitarian school of the old Westminster Review. But it will be matter of accident & humour whether he treats you as well-meaning men or impostors.

One of the most "progressif" men in this country is Dr Whately, lately appointed Archbishop of Dublin; which is in itself equivalent to a revolution in the Church. He is well entitled to receive the Globe. So is the Reverend J. Blanco White,¹⁰ (Oriel College, Oxford), a Spanish Catholic priest, of considerable abilities, now a clergyman of the Church of England. He is acquainted at least with Comte's book, & by this time (I have no doubt) with your subsequent publications, & is on the whole well disposed towards you. Any impression made upon these two men will spread far and wide.

You should send the Globe to Mr Stephen (James Stephen Esq. Kensington Gore) Council to the Colonial office; one of the ablest men connected with our Government, & a very important man in it, whoever happens to be minister. Although an Evangelical Christian, that is, a sort of Puritan and connected with Puritans, he is one of the most progressif men we have, & I have heard him speak of your master Saint Simon with considerable praise. I think it would be of great use to send him the Globe, & that it will interest him greatly if he has time to read it.

Mr Empson,¹¹ (Harcourt Buildings, Inner Temple) Law Professor at the East India College, and one of the principal writers in the Edinburgh Review, is a very proper person to receive the Globe.

I believe you already send it to the Rev. W. J. Fox,¹² the enlightened and eloquent Unitarian preacher. If you do not, you should commence doing so without delay.

Perhaps the Reverend Dr Arnold,¹³ Head Master of Rugby School near Birmingham, would be a proper person. He is one of the most enlightened and liberal of our clergy; but I am not sufficiently acquainted with his turn of mind to be able to judge in what manner your doctrines would affect him.

When I can think of any other fit persons, I will write to you again.

I will thank you not to shew this letter to any person except Adolphe, and M. Enfantin or such other of your associates as it may specially concern, as I should be sorry that any of the persons I have mentioned should know that I had written to you any particulars concerning them.

10. Joseph Blanco White (1775–1841), theological writer. For some of JSM's later correspondence with him see Letters 121, 122, and others.

11. William Empson (1791–1852), later editor of the Edinburgh Review, 1847–52.

12. See Letter 49, n. 1.

13. Thomas Arnold (1795–1842), educator and historian, father of Matthew Arnold.

From what M. Arlès has told me concerning the late change in your society, I am inclined to think that it is a beneficial one; but I regret exceedingly to learn that it has detached M. Bazard & several others altogether from your body. I suppose I shall learn from the Globe such particulars as I am not yet acquainted with. If not, I beg you to write to me, as there is nothing which I am more anxious to be apprised of, than the internal history of your society.

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

. . . 1832 . . .

46. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

Wednesday
25 Jan^r. [1832]

MY DEAR GUSTAVE

I will answer your questions one by one.

1. I do not think that M. Lemire² could at first support himself here by giving lessons in French. I think that in two or three months he might be able to do so, if his friends and yours exert themselves. I am sorry to say that my exertions are pre-engaged in behalf of another.

2. I shall have great pleasure in dining with you tomorrow to meet M^r Crellin.³ I will come to you straight from the India House.

3. I will endeavour to obtain for you or Duveyrier an admission to the London Institution.⁴

4. Most of those who receive the Globe in this country have received it only a short time, and several of them are likely to be prejudiced against you at first. Perronet Thompson, for instance, is thinking of writing against you, in the Westminster Review,⁵ of which he is one of the chief proprietors. Stephen, and Hyde Villiers, are men in office, whose whole time is occupied; and though you should, I think, throw yourself in their way if an opportunity offers, I do not think it would answer any good purpose to call upon them. Most men in this country have a strong prejudice against any attempt to talk them over as the vulgar say; to talk to them with the view of effecting any particular change in their general habits of thinking.

Of all whom you mention I think Bulwer and Empson are the only two with whom there would be any use in your having a personal interview

1. MS at Arsenal.

D'Eichthal and Duveyrier were in London at this time as missionaries for the Saint-Simonian cause.

2. Unidentified, except that he is listed as one who, along with JSM and others, made some corrections in a speech delivered by Duveyrier in London about this time. See H. R. D'Allemagne, Les Saint-Simoniens, 1827-37 (Paris, 1930), p. 155.

3. Unidentified.

4. The London Institution, for the advancement of literature and the diffusion of useful knowledge, founded in 1805. See A Catalogue of the Library of the London Institution (4 vols., London, 1835-43).

5. See preceding letter, n. 8.

for the present. I will give you an introduction to Bulwer whenever you please. Empson I should like to speak to on the subject before you make any attempt to see him; besides, he is seldom to be found at home except by appointment. But I could easily contrive that you should see him—and probably Perronet Thompson also.

Yours affectionately

J. S. MILL.

47. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

India House

Saturday

[Jan. 28, 1832]

MY DEAR GUSTAVE

M^r Grote desires me to say that he will have great pleasure in cashing any bill of yours, whether signed by yourself or Duveyrier. I am also desired by him & by M^{rs} Grote to say that they hope very much to see you, & when you return from your journey to Paris they will ask you to fix a day for visiting them at Dulwich & not returning till the next day. Grote & I had much conversation respecting the St Simonian doctrine during the evening: he has a tolerably accurate knowledge of its general features, & I think you would not lose your time in conversing with him.

Would it be inconvenient to you to take with you to Paris some numbers of the Examiner for Marchais² & for M. de Lasteyrie?³

1. Addressed: G. d'Eichthal Esq. / 38 Great Coram Street / Brunswick Square. Postmark: EVE / JA 28 [?] / 1832 [?] / Leadenhall St. MS at Arsenal. Published in part in Cosmopolis, VI, p. 355, and in D'Eichthal Corresp., p. 146, but dated in both as of Jan., 1831. The postmark is not easily decipherable but other evidence establishes Jan. 28, 1832, as the correct date for this letter and Jan. 30 for the next letter. There is no evidence that D'Eichthal and Duveyrier were in London in Jan., 1831; for evidence that they were there in Jan., 1832, however, see Two Notebooks of Thomas Carlyle, ed. C. E. Norton (New York, 1898), p. 248, and Lindley, p. 8, n. 11. Furthermore, the "tomorrow's Examiner" was clearly the number for Sunday, Jan. 29, 1832, in which JSM published (p. 73) a few paragraphs favourable to the Saint-Simonians.

2. André Louis Augustin Marchais (1800–1857), politician. He had been a founder of the Society Aide-toi, many of whose members JSM had met in Paris in Aug., 1830.

3. Either Ferdinand Charles Léon, comte de Lasteyrie-Dusaillant (1810–1879), politician and archaeologist, or his father, Charles Philibert, comte de Lasteyrie-Dusaillant (1759–1849), industrialist, philanthropist, publicist, and writer on agriculture.

I will give you a copy of tomorrow's Examiner (which contains some mention of St Simonism) for le père Michel Chevalier.⁴

The missing numbers of the Globe have not yet reached me, but I suppose I shall find them here on Monday morning.

You will oblige me by making my best acknowledgments to le père Enfantin, if he retains any recollection of me, for the great pleasure and profit which I have derived and am continually deriving from his words and deeds.

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

48. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

India House

Monday

[Jan. 30, 1832]²

MY DEAR GUSTAVE

I send you a copy of the Examiner which contains my notice of the St Simonians. It is very incorrectly printed. This copy is for Chevalier; if you wish for one for yourself in addition, I will procure it for you.

I would ask you to take with you a few numbers of the Examiner for Marchais & for M. de Lasteyrie, if I had any means of sending them to you soon enough.

A friend of mine whom I hope you will soon be acquainted with, has had some conversation with M^r Sterling respecting St Simonism, and represents him as so hostile to it, that I think there would be no use whatever in my mentioning the subject to him or in your attempting to see him. Indeed from all I hear of the opinions & feelings which your doctrine is exciting in those who have but recently received the Globe, I expect that for a considerable time much obloquy will fall not only upon the St Simonians, but even on all who venture to hint the possibility of their being other than madmen or rogues. My saying as much for them in the Examiner as I have done, est déjà un acte de courage.

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

4. Michel Chevalier (1806–1879), economist, editor of the Globe; later, author of Lettres sur l'Amérique du Nord (Paris, 1836). Strictly speaking, only Bazard and Enfantin were accorded the title Père in the Saint-Simonian hierarchy.

* * * *

1. MS at Arsenal.

2. See preceding letter, n. 1.

49. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

India House
April 3^d. 1832.

MY DEAR SIR,

I am sorry that you should think of apologizing for a proposal by which I ought to be, and am, very much flattered. There was no brusquerie on your side to be apologized for, but much dullness and incapacity of speaking intelligibly on mine: as is usual when I am taken unexpectedly and have anything to say on the spur of the moment. I learn every day by fresh instances, that only when I have a pen in my hand can I make language and manner the true image of my thoughts. This is not only a fault in itself, but an index to many other faults.

What I would say now, and would have said at the moment, but for my habitual unreadiness, is, that nothing would be more agreeable to me than to be allowed to insert in the Monthly Repository anything I might write which might be so fortunate as to be deemed fit for it; but that I would avoid, as I always do, any literary engagement, wishing to write nothing for its own sake, but always because I am led to write it by the course of my habitual pursuits, and in execution of the general purposes of my life. Most persons, if I were to say this to them, would set me down as a perfect monster of affectation and self-conceit; yet it is only putting into words what all persons ought at all times to have in their minds, as the guiding principle of their conduct. If it were my vocation, as it is probably yours, to instruct the general public, by preaching, public speaking, and popular writing, I should devote myself to it; and there is scarcely any person with whom I should be so proud to cooperate as with yourself. But this is not what I am fittest for; nor do I find that time renders me fitter for it, but rather the contrary. Times and circumstances may come in which I should probably think it my duty, however unfit, to buckle to the task, and make it, for the time, the principal aim of my life. But at present many things, far less conspicuously useful, but yet not unworthy that some one should make them his chief object of intellectual pursuit, must continue to hold the first place in my thoughts. And no one can do anything well, in this earthly pilgrimage of ours, in doing which he steps out of his way and delays his journey.

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / Upper Clapton. MS at King's. Published, with minor errors, in Garnett, pp. 100–101.

William Johnson Fox (1786–1864), preacher, writer, and politician. After serving for a time as co-editor of the Unitarian magazine, the Monthly Repository, Fox in 1831 purchased it and soon converted it into a liberal, secular periodical. For a study of JSM's relations with Fox and the Monthly Repository, see Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent, pp. 271–83. Before the time of this letter JSM through Fox had become acquainted with the latter's parishioner, Mrs. John Taylor (years later, JSM's wife), who also wrote for the Monthly Repository (see ibid., p. 423).

I will not, therefore, make any promise, nor should I feel justified in leading you to reckon upon my offering anything to the Monthly Repository. But what I do not undertake, it by no means follows that I shall not do; and I was even thinking at the very time when your note reached me, of writing something which might possibly suit the design of the Repository. At all events, whenever I do write anything of the kind, I can find no mode of disposing of it that would be more pleasing to me than by giving it to the world under your auspices.²

With many thanks for the extremely delicate and flattering tenour of your note

Believe me

Most truly yours

J. S. MILL

50. TO JOHN STERLING¹

London

24th May 1832.

MY DEAR STERLING The manner in which time passes over our heads without our perceiving it is quite frightful. It is now seven months since I wrote to you, and if I had not referred to a memorandum-book to learn the fact, I should not have thought it was three. Absence! All persons, some few excepted, are sufficiently prone to neglect the absent, not because they forget them, but because there is always something to be done for things or persons near at hand, which, it seems at the moment, will less bear to be put off. But I think this is peculiarly a fault of mine. I neglect almost every person whose daily life is not intermixed with my own. However this may be, accept my confession, and believe that, notwithstanding all appearances, you are as much and as often in my thoughts as when you were in England.—It seems to me that there is a very great significance in letter-writing, and that it differs from daily intercourse as the dramatic differs from the epic or narrative. It is the life of man, and above all the chief part of his life, his inner life, not gradually unfolded without break or sudden transition, those changes which take place insensibly being also manifested insensibly; but exhibited in a series of detached scenes, taken at considerable intervals from one another, shewing the completed change of position or feeling, without the process by which it was effected; affording a glimpse or partial view of the mighty river of life at some few points, and leaving the imagination to trace to itself such figure or scheme as it can of the course of the stream in that far larger portion of space where it winds its way through thickets or impenetrable forests and is invisible: this alone being known to us, that whatever may have been its course through the wilderness, it has had some course, & that a continuous one, & which might by human opportunity have been watched and discovered, though to us, too probably, destined to be for ever unknown. What wonder therefore if when seen at these distant intervals, the stream sometimes seems to run east, sometimes west, and its general direction remains as mysterious as that of the Niger? Yet if such glimpses are numerous, some general tendency shall predominate even in the few furlongs of water-way which they may chance to disclose, and it shall not remain doubtful towards what sea, in the long run, the waters tend to discharge themselves.

2. The first result of this carefully guarded promise of help appeared in the Oct. number (pp. 649–59) for 1832: an essay "On Genius," with the signature which JSM at first adopted in the Monthly Repository of "Antiquus," but afterwards discarded for "A." The only reprint of the essay is in Four Dialogues of Plato, trans. J. S. Mill, ed. Ruth Borchardt (London, 1946), pp. 28–40.

* * * *

1. Addressed: John Sterling Esq. / St Vincent's. Postmark: N / MY24 / 1832. MS at King's. Published, with minor variants, in Elliot, I, 21–26. In reply to an unpublished brief letter by Sterling of early 1832, received by JSM in early March; MS at King's.

I had no idea when I began this letter, that I should yield to the habit of moralizing and poetizing which has grown upon me. But I meant to say something very simple. When you wrote to me, you promised a longer letter, which was to give me some notion of a slave colony; and glad shall I be to receive it; but after all, that will be, in itself, no more valuable to me, than any other information on the same subject from any person with equal opportunities and deserving of equal reliance: but what I can have only from you, and what would be far more valuable to me, whether resulting from a letter respecting slave colonies or from anything else, would be a knowledge of you, namely of what has passed and is passing in your own mind, and how far your views of the world and feelings towards it, and all that constitutes your individuality as a human being, are or are not the same, are or are not changed. That is the knowledge which it is the most proper object of letters, between friends, to communicate; otherwise if their separation is prolonged, they cannot help becoming more or less strangers to one another.

As for myself, I doubt not but that I have much to tell you of this kind which you, and even myself eventually, might read with interest. For I know that there never pass seven months of my existence without change, and that not inconsiderable or unimportant: and I really do not recollect what my last letter to you² was about (except that part of it was about Wordsworth and Southey) or what was my state of mind when I wrote it; only I remember that I must have had much to say, since my epistle amounted to a quarto volume. It is not of much use to write to you about politics. You of course know from the newspapers and from your other friends through what a sea of troubles "the Bill"³ has at last been navigated in safety to within sight of land. You know the utter prostration or rather annihilation of the Tory party; how all the vitality has gone out of them; they having most unwisely chosen to make this the decisive, the final struggle; which accordingly it is. One unspeakable blessing I now believe that we shall owe to the events of the last ten days; to whatever consummation the spirit which is now in the ascendant, may conduct us, there is now a probability that we shall accomplish it through other means than anarchy & civil war. The irresistible strength of a unanimous people has been put forth, and has triumphed without bloodshed: it having therefore been proved, once for all, that the people can carry their point by pacific means, the natural and habitual reluctance of mankind to suffer and to inflict wounds and death, yet remains and may yet remain in its pristine strength, being no longer liable to be gradually worn away by the perpetual recurrence of the thought & feeling that these are the necessary though bitter means to some ardently desired end. What will come next it is quite vain to attempt to anticipate. Much grievous disappointment—some consequent moral and intellectual good, some evil;—some oversetting of evil and wrong; as yet little setting up of right; but above all a clear field to work in and a consequent duty on all whose vocation is not different, to address themselves to the work.

2. Letter 43.

With regard to our common acquaintances, most of what I have to tell is, I think, favorable; many, and some from whom it was scarcely to be expected, have become "sadder and wiser men."⁴ By sadder, I do not mean gloomier, or more desponding: nor even less susceptible of enjoyment, or even gaiety; but I mean that they look upon all things with far deeper and more serious feelings, and are far more alive to those points in human affairs, which excite an interest bordering on melancholy. Their earnestness, if not greater, is of a more solemn kind, and certainly far more unmixed with dreams of personal distinction or other reward. This is also, in a measure, the case with myself; except that, so far as respects the last point, the change had taken place long before. I have long since renounced any hankering for being happier than I am; and only since then have I enjoyed anything which can be called well-being. How few are they who have discovered the wisdom of the precept, Take no thought of the morrow;

3. On June 7 the Reform Bill became law.

4. Cf. Coleridge: "A sadder and a wiser man / He rose the morrow morn" (Rime of the Ancient Mariner).

when considered as all the sayings of Christ should be, not as laws laid down with strict logical precision for regulating the details of our conduct; since such must be, like all other maxims of prudence, variable: but as the bodying forth in words of the spirit of all morality, right self-culture, the principles of which cannot change, since man's nature changes not, though surrounding circumstances do. I do not mean by using the word self-culture, to prejudge any thing as to whether such culture can come from man himself, or must come directly from God: all I mean is that it is culture of the man's self, of his feelings and will, fitting him to look abroad and see how he is to act, not imposing upon him by express definition, a prescribed mode of action; which it is clear to me that many of the precepts of the Gospel, were never intended to do, being manifestly unsuited to that end: witness that which I have just cited; or the great one of doing to all men as you desire that they should do to you; or of turning the left cheek &c. which last the Quakers have made themselves ridiculous by attempting to act upon a very little more literally than other people. All these would be vicious as moral statutes, binding the tribunal, but they are excellent as instruction to the judge in the forum conscientiae, in what spirit he is to look at the evidence; what posture he must assume in order that he may see clearly the moral bearings of the thing which he is looking at.

I have not seen, nor scarcely heard, of Maurice, since you left England. Can you tell me anything of him? Trench⁵ I have seen, and had some correspondence with. He seems to me to take a most gloomy view of the prospects of mankind—gloomier even than yours, in your letter to M^{rs} Austin who (par parenthèse) has not been very well lately, but is recovering. Carlyle passed the whole of a long winter in London; & rose in my opinion, more than I know how to express, from a nearer acquaintance. I do not think that you estimate him half highly enough; but neither did I, when I last saw you.

It was worthy of your kindness to think not only of your friend, but of your friend's friends, and to pick up sea-shells for them on the other side of the globe because we had once done so together at Looe.⁶ It is one of the things which so few persons would have thought of besides yourself.

I hope and believe that I shall not again allow so long an interval to 5. Richard Chenevix Trench (1807–1886), later (1863) Archbishop of Dublin, had become acquainted with Sterling at Cambridge, where both were members of the "Apostles"; he had taken part in the expedition of Torrijos to Spain in 1830.

6. Sterling had written: "I have gathered some of the common little shells here for your young friends. Perhaps you remember our labours on their behalf along the shore at Looe." This must have occurred during their visit to Cornwall together in the summer of 1829, when they first became close friends (see Tuell, John Sterling, p. 70).

elapse without writing to you. I had great compunction in not writing to you when we learned the melancholy fate of poor Torrijos⁷—and I should have done so, but that I am little fitted for comforting the afflicted, and I knew not in that case, of any comfort to administer. It was chiefly with reference to you, and to Madame Torrijos, that it seemed to me there was ground for sorrow; though the extinction of such a man, even when there was little more for him to do or to enjoy, seemed like the violent blotting out of a star from heaven.

With many kind remembrances to M^{rs} Sterling, believe me, affectionately yours,

J. S. MILL

51. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House
29th May
1832.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

To be moderate, I will only thank you twice: once for writing, and once for being the first to write. The good-natured excuse which you make for my silence will not serve me: I always felt that I ought to write first, and not you; but it always seemed that there would be some better time for writing than the present one. In particular, I have had an unusual number of letters to write since I saw you: and to me it appears a very weighty matter to write a letter: there is scarcely anything that we do, which requires a more complete possession of our faculties, in their greatest freshness and vigour; and all the more so, because if it is elaborate it is good for little. Besides, I knew that I was corresponding with you, in some measure, through the Examiner.² All this is not intended as an excuse, but a confession; that you may see what paltry reasons sufficed with me for putting off the discharge of a duty. But it is very idle to complain of my own faults, instead of mending them; as every man can, if he will; and as I trust I yet shall, all the less slowly from having known you.

7. General José Maria Torrijos (1791–1831), Spanish patriot, was captured while attempting a liberating invasion of his native country, and was executed Dec. 11, 1831. Sterling's cousin, Robert Boyd, was among those who shared the fate of Torrijos. For Sterling's connections with the Torrijos affair, see Carlyle, Life of John Sterling, Part I, chaps. ix, x, xiii. Sterling's letter had been written immediately after receiving news of the death of Torrijos: "I thought I had made up my mind—but this horrible fate of such a man and one whom I have known as well as you and I know each other—has overpowered me completely."

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtock / Dumfries / N.B.[?]. Postmarks: FREE / 29MY29 / 1832; and DUMFRIES / 31 MAY 1832. Franked by E. Strutt. MS at NLS. Published, with minor errors and omissions, in Elliot, I, 26–32. Carlyle and his wife, after spending the winter of 1831–32 in London, had left London for Scotland on March 25. His first letter to JSM after the return to Craigenputtock, dated May 18, 1832, is published in A. Carlyle, pp. 4–7, as is his answer of June 16, pp. 8–11.

I believe I have fulfilled most of your parting injunctions; some of them, however, less soon than I might and ought. For several weeks after your departure, I waited for some time when it would be quite convenient to call upon poor Glen:³ till finding that no such moment arrived, I did at last what I might have done at first, disregarded convenience and did the thing out of hand: and the great joy which it seemed to give him, satisfied me not that I had done right, for I was thinking much more of you than of him; but that you had done right in instigating me to call upon him. Since that time we have seen each other frequently: and I have cultivated his acquaintance the more, because he has so few persons in London besides me who are at all able to help or encourage him. I have been much struck by the exact manner in which every opinion that you have ever expressed to me about him has been proved true by what I have since seen of him; Mrs Carlyle's opinion in so far as it differed from yours, was, I am satisfied, entirely groundless. I am somewhat doubtful however, how far he is capable of deriving much advantage of an intellectual kind from the intercourse of others: his mind seems to be always in his own thoughts and in them only; & these not matured but extemporaneous: it seems almost time thrown away to give out thoughts to him; he seems never to lay hold of them. But if any one could teach him to make a proper use of his own materials, it would be doing to him an unspeakable service, & to others much good through his means. I do not see my way clearly to being able to assist him in this respect, but I see that our intercourse affords some sort of satisfaction to him, and therefore, probably does him some kind of good: what, and how much, will doubtless in time be made manifest. He talks of writing to you, and I am sure that it would make him extremely happy to hear from you: what he saw of you has evidently made a very deep impression upon him.—I have also called upon Fraser:⁴ only once, however; but in his case there was not the same strong inducement: I have no doubt that we shall see more of each other.

2. From the autumn of 1830 through 1834 JSM contributed almost every week. See MacMinn, Bibliog., pp. 11–42. Most of his writings were unsigned but Carlyle was often able to recognize JSM's style.

3. William Glen (d. 1852), a native of the Craigenputtock region, had met Carlyle through Dr. John Carlyle. He had recently come to London to study law. Though gifted and well educated, he soon gave evidence of the mental disturbance which ended his career.

4. Probably William Fraser (ca. 1805–1852), editor of the short-lived Foreign Review (1828–30), rather than James Fraser (d. 1841), publisher of Fraser's Magazine.

Your parting gift, the paper on Biography and on Johnson,⁵ has been more precious to me than I well know how to state. I have read it over and over till I could almost repeat it by heart; and have derived from it more edification and more comfort, than from all else that I have read for years past. I have moreover lent it to various persons, whom I thought likely to reap the same benefit from it, and have in no instance been disappointed: among others, to some in whom it has created, or increased, a most earnest desire to see and know you, and who are most worthy that this desire should be gratified; as I trust it one day will be, if possible through my means, unless an iron Necessity, insuperable by the free will of man, should hereafter, as heretofore, prevent.

Thanks for what you tell me respecting your recent occupations. I look forward with very delightful anticipations to your review of the Corn Law Rhymer,⁶ and to your paper on Göthe:⁷ it was a disappointment to me that the former did not appear in the last Edinburgh, though I knew it was scarcely possible. Taylor⁸ tells me that Southey is writing an article⁹ on the same subject, & is in communication with the author, who is a real working man, named Reuben Elliott.¹⁰ I have seen no review of his poems as yet, except in the Monthly Repository, the Unitarian periodical, edited by Mr Fox, whom I conjecture to be the author of this particular paper.¹¹ The tone of it is very good, and there are very few persons who could have written it, but I think it misses the most striking aspect under which the poems can be looked at; viz. as works which will go down to posterity as one of the principal memorials of this age; from which a large portion of its character will be known, which is registered in little else of a permanent nature: being chiefly those melancholy features in the position of the working class towards the other classes and towards the world altogether, which have impressed upon so earnest and so loving a heart, a character of almost unrelieved gloom, bitterness, and resentment. The poet

5. Carlyle's review of J. W. Croker's edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson was published in two parts: "Biography," Fraser's, V (April, 1832), 253-60; and "Boswell's Life of Johnson," ibid. (May, 1832), 359-413.

6. "Corn Law Rhymes," ER, LV (July, 1832), 338-61. See n. 10 below.

7. "Goethe's Works," FQR, X (Aug., 1832), 1-44.

8. Henry Taylor (1800-1886), poet, dramatist, and member of the Colonial Office. Cf. Letter 43, n. 20 and 30.

9. No such article seems to have been published; in his review of the poetry of the servant-girl Mary Colling, however, Southey praised the genius of the Corn Law Rhymer but condemned his poetry "for the spirit of ferocious jacobinism which it breathes" (QR, XLVII [March, 1832], 92).

10. JSM was mistaken both as to the name and the occupation of the Corn Law Rhymer. He was Ebenezer Elliott (1781-1849), proprietor of his own business in the iron trade at Sheffield.

11. The article has been identified as by W. J. Fox: "The Poor and Their Poetry," MR, VI (1832), 189-201.

just shews enough of his natural character to render the portraiture of the artificial one which is superinduced upon it more deeply impressive. I am convinced that these poems, having, as they have, sufficient intrinsic merit to live, will hereafter be a text for annotations, explanations, and commentaries without end, & that future historians, (when such, worthy of the name, shall arise) will build largely upon it.

With respect to Göthe, there was a short obituary notice of him in the Examiner,¹² which you would not like. I could have kept it out if I would have undertaken to write something myself, at the instant; but as I knew my own ignorance, and would not write at haphazard, the matter was put into the hands of those who thought they knew, & in reality did know, more, but yet (as seems pretty obvious) not enough. The article was made up of two fragments written by two different persons. So rare in this country is any, even the most common-place, knowledge of Germany, that none of the other papers gave any observations at all on the extinction of the greatest man then living in Europe: and Bulwer in his next number, that is in the small print, drafted his notice almost entirely from that in the Examiner. How yours in the next number,¹³ will square with it, he probably cares as little, as I dare say you do.

As you see the Examiner, you are acquainted with the greater part of what I have been busy about, since you left us. To the papers signed A.B.¹⁴ you must add every thing which has been written about France, except the notices of the cholera, and a review of a trumpery pamphlet. If you should happen to see the second number of Tait's Magazine, you will see in it an article of mine,¹⁵ on a book which I have also reviewed in the *Examiner*¹⁶ by our acquaintance Cornewall Lewis. If you have not seen it and will let me know how I may best send you a copy, I will do so, though unless it interest you as being mine, it scarcely will otherwise. On the whole, the opinions I have put forth in these different articles are, I think, rather not inconsistent with yours, than exactly corresponding to them; & are expressed so coldly and unimpressively that I can scarcely bear to look back upon such poor stuff. I have not yet come up even with my friends the St Simonians; & it would be saying very little even if I had.

12. "Goethe," Examiner, April 8, 1832, p. 235.

13. "Death of Goethe," New Monthly Mag., XXXIV (June, 1832), 507-12.

14. A review article in two parts: "An Outline of Sematology, or An Essay toward Establishing a New Theory of Grammar, Logic, and Rhetoric," Examiner, March 25, 1832, pp. 194-95, and April 1, 1832, pp. 211-12.

15. "Use and Abuse of Political Terms," Tait's, I (May, 1832), 164-72. See also Letter 95. Tait's Edinburgh Magazine, a literary and politically radical monthly, continued publication until 1861.

16. "Remarks on the Use and Abuse of some Political Terms. By George Cornewall Lewis . . .," Examiner, April 22, 1832, pp. 259-60.

Lewis (1806-1863), statesman and author, later (1852-55) editor of the Edinburgh Review.

A propos of the St Simonians, they have been obliged to give up the Globe and everything else which they had in hand. The immediate causes of their stoppage are certain legal obstructions which have been thrown in their way by some of the seceding members, & a demand of 130000 francs by the Government (very insidiously allowed to reach that amount before it was brought forward) for arrears of stamps, & penalties for infraction of the stamp laws. In the later numbers of the Globe, there was, I think, on the whole some evidence of improvement in their views and feelings—Enfantin and about fifty more, among whom are our two friends d'Eichthal and Duveyrier, have now retired to a place called Ménilmontant at a short distance out of Paris, where they are all living together, and are employed, as they assert, in training themselves to preach to the world by their example, which, they are beginning to find out, is after all the most impressive and in every way profitable aspect of the life even of those whose vocation it is to be the Speakers of the Word. This is decidedly un progrès, as they would say; & if you believe them, their present state, like every thing else which has happened to them or to any son of Adam, is for the best; that is, for the greatest ultimate success of the St Simonian faith. It is difficult to conjecture how far this optimism of theirs is itself a faith, or a mere trick of self-deluding vanity, determined to put the best face upon every thing both to themselves and others. I do not know many of the particulars of their life at Ménilmontant; but it appears that one feature of it is to do without domestic servants, which they consider a vestige of slavery: & they take their turns to perform all menial offices for one another. I do not know how they reconcile this with their maxim, à chacun selon sa capacité, but I suppose they have some salve or other for it. Their adoration for Enfantin seems to be on the increase rather than on the wane; & it is well to reverence the best man they know, but I wish they had a better still.

With regard to politics, their aspect of things has somewhat changed since you wrote, and the momentary check sustained by radicalism has been converted into a triumph, far more complete than could have been achieved otherwise. The Tory party, at least the present Tory party, is now utterly annihilated. Peace be with it. All its elevated character had long gone out of it, and instead of a Falkland¹⁷ it had but a Croker,¹⁸ instead of a Johnson¹⁹ nothing better than a Philpotts.²⁰ Wellington himself found that if he meant to be minister he must be a Whig; and the rest of his

17. Lucius Cary, second Viscount Falkland (1610?–1643).

18. John Wilson Croker (1780–1857), politician and essayist, a leading contributor to the Quarterly Review.

19. Dr. Samuel Johnson.

20. Henry Philpotts (1778–1869), Bishop of Exeter, defender of the Peterloo massacre of 1819 and opponent of the Reform Bill.

party though in the main Whigs already, did not chuse that particular phasis of Whiggery & determined to be nothing at all; & truly they had no very great step to make into absolute non-entropy. There is now nothing definite and determinate in politics except radicalism; & we shall have nothing but radicals and whigs for a long time to come, until society shall have worked itself into some new shape, not to be exactly foreseen and described now.

Mrs. Austin has been very far from well of late, but is nearly recovered. She often talks of M^{rs} Carlyle and you. Austin began lecturing immediately after your departure, and part of my occupation since you went away has been in attending his lectures.²¹ Buller is now here and in good health: he has written a very pleasant article in the Foreign Quarterly Review on Prince Pückler's book,²² which I think you would like to read.

On the very day on which you went away, Taylor wrote to me to propose that we should call upon you together. He is very well, and as usual, very busy governing the West Indies: a difficult work, of which he more than all other persons is the workman.

I am in no immediate want of the three little volumes; therefore they may wait any convenient opportunity.

I do not think I have any more facts to tell you; and I have filled my letter with nothing else. Another time I shall not wait for such an accumulation of what, after all, is very secondary material for a letter—especially between you and me, so little of whose conversation used ever to turn upon mere incidents. Make my heartiest remembrances to Mrs Carlyle and believe me

Most truly yours (and hers)

J. S. MILL

52. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL AND CHARLES DUVEYRIER¹

30th May 1832

India House

MY DEAR D'EICHTHAL AND DUVEYRIER

Nothing but the pressure of a variety of occupations has hindered me for so long a period from writing to you; not to tell you anything, for I

21. See Letter 32, n. 2.

22. "Letters of a German Prince" [Pückler-Muskau], FQR, IX (May, 1832), 290–312.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Gustave d'Eichthal / Rue Monsigny / No. 6 / à Paris. Postmarks: 3/JUIN / 1832; [illegible] 32; and ANGLETERRE. Published in part in Cosmopolis, VI, 361–63, and in D'Eichthal Corresp., pp. 160–63. MS at Arsenal.

have nothing to tell; but to ask for news of you and all that you do, as I no longer have regular intelligence of you through the Globe.²

I am unable to be with you on the first of June, as I had previously engaged myself to pass the short vacation which this house allows me, in a different place and in a different manner.³ And I should prefer visiting Paris, and you, at any other time. To attend such a summons as that which was issued in the last number of the Globe, to those who have placed their avenir in St Simon, would be to associate and identify myself with the St Simonians: now this would be an act of religious dévouement, and highly meritorious, in any person who was completely associated with you par les sentiments; but in me, it would be nothing of the kind; and would even give a false idea of the feelings I entertain towards your society. I did not go to Weimar to attend the funeral of Göthe, nor to Birmingham to join the Political Union, nor to Warsaw to encourage the Poles; yet my sympathies were with all three, just as they are with you.

For the same & various other reasons, I did not, as Duveyrier suggested, write a series of letters on St Simonism for the Morning Chronicle. St Simonism is all in all to you, St Simonians; but to me it is only one among a variety of interesting and important features in the time we live in, & there are other subjects & other occupations which have as great a claim upon me as it has, in themselves, & a much greater from being, just now, more in season. St Simonism therefore must wait its time, & you may rely that it shall have justice done to it, as far as that is possible from my point of view, on the first favorable opportunity.

I have been extremely pleased with the later numbers of the Globe. The seceders from your society certainly had excellent remplaçans: Cavel, Delaporte, and Lagarmitte⁴ are anything but ordinary men. Now when I have mentioned names, I beg that when you write, you will send me the names of all the St Simonians who have retired to Ménilmontant or who remain in the Rue Monsigny. I shall treasure up their names, and should like much to be acquainted with them all. Tell me all you can about each of them in particular.

Tell me also what are your pursuits, your thoughts & projects, where you now are. I have some knowledge of the mere exterior of your lives from

2. The Globe had ceased publication with the number of April 20, 1832. See preceding letter.

3. JSM's journal of his walking tour with Henry Cole, July 19 to Aug. 6, 1832, through Hampshire, West Sussex, the Isle of Wight, and ending in the New Forest, is at Mount Holyoke College.

4. (Henri?) Cavel and (Michel?) Delaporte were assistant editors of the Globe. Henri Lagarmitte (1807-1834), journalist, was listed among the members of the third grade of Saint-Simonians (see D'Allemagne, Les Saint-Simoniens, pp. 118, 266, and 271).

Duveyrier's letter to M^{rs} Crellin, but I want to know what you are meditating, what are your studies, & travaux d'élaboration, now that you are not propagating your ideas among the public. This temporary secession might be for you the occasion of un grand progrès. I suppose that a St Simonian can learn only from his own thoughts or those of other St Simonians; but I who am not a St Simonian, though I greatly admire the St Simonians, & think that they are in many respects far ahead of all Europe, am yet firmly convinced that you have yet much to learn, in political economy from the English economists (inferior as they are to you in many points) and in the philosophy of history, literature and the arts, from the Germans. Certainly I think you have far surpassed all these people in some things, but have fallen far short of them in others: & that a more diligent study of them would change some of your opinions, and suggest to you many positive thoughts of great value, which would bring down some of your generalities & abstractions into detail.

I did as d'Eichthal wished in regard to Father Enfantin's parting address: after ascertaining that Black⁵ would print it, I translated it for him & it appeared in the *Morning Chronicle*⁶ (it was however very incorrectly printed). With regard to the delay in my letter which appeared in the Globe,⁷ you are, I suppose, aware that Desprat⁸ kept it for a fortnight or three weeks, in expectation of an opportunity. It was very well translated, though with some omissions & abbreviations which made it rather more St Simonian than I intended.

I wrote two letters to Adolphe d'Eichthal⁹ during our crise politique, which contained all I had to say on that subject. I shall write to him a longer letter very shortly, & request him to shew it to Gustave.

All your friends here, whom I know, are very well. I have seen M^{rs} Crellin twice; elle est très intéressante. Write soon & often, now you have leisure. Ever yours

J. S. MILL.

5. John Black (1783–1855), journalist, editor of the Morning Chronicle, 1817–43. For JSM's tribute to Black, see Autobiog., chap. iv.

6. "Saint Simonianism—Parting Address to the Public," signed Enfantin, Morning Chronicle, April 27, 1832, p. 1; reprinted in Pankhurst, pp. 84–87.

7. For April 18, 1832, p. 433. The letter was published in English as an article entitled "Comparison of the Tendencies of French and English Intellect," MR, NS VIII (Nov., 1833), 800–804. See Hill Shine, "JSM and an Open Letter on the Saint-Simonian Society in 1832," Journal of the History of Ideas, VI (Jan., 1945), 102–8.

8. Etienne Desprat, according to Pankhurst (p. 72), a former member of the Spanish Cortes, who had been delegated to represent the Saint-Simonians in England until the return of D'Eichthal and Duveyrier.

9. These letters have not been located.

53. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

June 29th
1832

MY DEAR GUSTAVE

The object of my present letter is not to tell you news, for I have none to tell; nor to discuss, for I have not time. It is merely to thank you for your letter; to say how glad I always am to hear from you, and how much I wish that the exalted destiny which you still believe to await you, may be realized; to send you two numbers of the Examiner in continuation of those which I hope you have already received through Desprat; & to beg you to ask of Duveyrier the two following questions;

1st. What he did with the ticket to the library of the London Institution:² William Prescott to whom it belongs, has asked me for it.

2^{dly}. Whether he has done with my Examiners for 1831 and the beginning of 1832.

The gentleman who takes this letter will bring any thing back. He will be at Paris for a week or two, and his address is, Mr Rowland Mackenzie,³ chez M. Roy, Route de Choisy, Barrière d'Italie.

Many remembrances to Duveyrier, and to all friends. In your letter you say that you send me the list of the inhabitants of your retreat at Ménilmontant, but it has not reached me.

Believe me
Most truly yours
J. S. MILL.

54. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

London, 17th July 1832

MY DEAR FRIEND

Many thanks for your little note.² I hope this letter will find all your perplexities at an end, and the paper on Göthe³ proceeding smoothly, or perhaps long since finished and sent off. I recognise in your account of

1. Addressed: M. Gustave d'Eichthal. MS at Arsenal.

2. See Letter 46, n. 4.

3. Unidentified.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtock / Dumfries. Postmarks: FREE / 19 JY 19 / 1832, and DUMFRIES / 21 JUL 1832. Franked by E. Strutt. MS at NLS. Published, with minor variants, in Elliot, I, 32-36. Answer by Carlyle is dated Aug. 28, 1832, published in A. Carlyle, pp. 11-16.

2. Of June 16, 1832. Published in A. Carlyle, pp. 8-11.

3. See Letter 51, n. 7.

what was passing in your mind, a very perfect picture of what I often experience in mine; especially if I attempt to give a general view of any great subject, when I feel bound not merely to say something true, but to omit nothing which is material to the truth. I also participate in what you call your superstition, about never turning back when one has begun. Were it not that imperfect and dim light is yet better than total darkness, there would be little encouragement to attempt enlightening either oneself or the world. But the real encouragement is, that he who does the best he can, always does some good, even when in his direct aim he totally fails. For although the task which we undertake is, to speak a certain portion of precious Truth, and instead of speaking any Truth at all, it is possible our light may be nothing but a feu follet, and we may leave ourselves and others no wiser than we found them; still, that any one sincere mind, doing all it can to gain insight into a thing, and endeavouring to declare truthfully all it sees, declares this (be it what it may), is itself a truth; no inconsiderable one; which at least it depends upon ourselves to be fully assured of, and which is often not less, sometimes perhaps more, profitable to the hearer or reader, than much sounder doctrine delivered without intensity of conviction. And this is one eternal and inestimable preeminence (even in the productions of pure Intellect) which the doings of an honest heart possess over those men of the strongest and most cultivated powers of mind when directed to any other end in preference to, or even in conjunction with, Truth. He who paints a thing as he actually saw it, though it were only by an optical illusion, teaches us, if nothing else, at least the nature of Sight, and of spectra and phantasms: but if somebody has not seen, or even believed that he saw, anything at all, but has merely thrown together objects and colours at random or to gain some point, it is all false and hollow, and nobody is the wiser or better, or ever can be so, from what has been done, but may be greatly the more ignorant, more confused, and worse.

I have read your little paper on Göthe in Bulwer's Magazine.⁴ There was little in it which I had not already heard from your lips, otherwise there are passages which would if they had been entirely new to me, have excited me to much thought, and may therefore do that service to any other mind which is prepared for them. I do not myself, as yet, sufficiently know Göthe, to feel certain that he is the great High Priest and Pontiff you describe him; I know him as yet only as one of the wisest men, and men of greatest genius, whom the world has yet produced; but if he be not all that you say he is, certainly no other man has arisen in our times, who can even for a moment be suspected of being so. In him alone, of all the celebrated men of this and the last age, does a more familiar knowledge, and the growth of our own faculties, discover more and more to be admired and less and less to be rejected or even doubted of. Who shall succeed him? or when shall he find even an unworthy successor. There is need that the "march of mind" should raise up new spiritual notabilities; for it seems as though all the old ones with one accord were departing out of the world together. In a few days or weeks the world has lost the three greatest men in it, in their several departments; Göthe, Bentham, and Cuvier;⁵ & during the same period what a mortality among those second-rate great men, who are generally in their own time much more celebrated than the first, because they take pains to be so; such men as Casimir Périer, or Mackintosh,⁶ or Sir William Grant,⁷ or General Lamarque,⁸ or the last of Scotch judges, John Clerk of Eldin,⁹ or even (to descend low indeed) Charles Butler.¹⁰ And here is Sir Walter Scott about to follow.¹¹ I sometimes think that instead of mountains and valleys, the domain of Intellect is about to become a dead flat, nothing greatly above the general level, nothing very far below it. It is curious that this particular time, in which there are fewer great intellects above ground and in their vigour, than can be remembered for many ages back, should be the precise time at which every body is cackling about the progress of intelligence and the spread of knowledge. I do believe that intelligence and knowledge are less valued just now, except for purposes of money-making, than at any other period since the Norman Conquest, or possibly since the invasion of the Romans. I mean, in our own country. But even in Germany, the great men seem to have died out, though much of their spirit remains after them, and is, we will hope, permanently fixed in the national character.

4. See Letter 51, n. 13.

I have not been idle since my last letter, but have rather read, than either meditated or written: all that I have written you must have seen in the Examiner; it consists of sundry papers on French politics and two long articles on Pledges,¹² which are in very bad odour with some of our

5. Goethe had died on March 22; baron Georges Cuvier, the celebrated French naturalist, on May 13; and Jeremy Bentham on June 6.

6. Sir James Mackintosh (1765–1832), philosopher and historian. In 1835 James Mill published his critical Fragment on Mackintosh.

7. Sir William Grant (1752–1832), Master of the Rolls, advocate of reform of criminal law.

8. Maximilien Lamarque (1770–1832), French general and orator.

9. John Clerk, Lord Eldin (1757–1832).

10. Charles Butler (1750–1832), prominent Roman Catholic lawyer and writer.

11. Sir Walter Scott died Sept. 21, 1832.

12. For a list of Mill's contributions to the Examiner in this period, see MacMinn, Bibliog., pp. 18, 21–22. The two articles entitled "Pledges" appeared in the numbers of July 1 and 15, pp. 417–18, 449–51. JSM years later confessed that the articles had been ill-timed and that they had cost the Examiner two hundred subscribers (The Early Draft of John Stuart Mill's Autobiography, ed. Jack Stillinger [Urbana, 1961], p. 144, n. 424).

radicals. It is a proof of the honest and brave character of Fonblanque, that he wished to have these articles: every thing he ever prints that does not chime in with common-place radicalism, costs him money; his paper is in a perpetual alternation of slowly working its way upwards by its liveliness and ability and then tumbling plump down all at once by some act of honesty. I do not know that this has happened in the present case, but I have little doubt of it.

I am about to make a short ramble in the country just now,¹³ after which I shall return to work, and I hope with more solid and valuable results than I have hitherto done: that so I may produce something worthy of the title you give me, and in which I rejoice, that of one of your scholars. You also call me one of your teachers; but if I am this, it is as yet only in the sense in which a schoolmaster might speak of his teachers, meaning those who teach under him. I certainly could not now write, and perhaps shall never be able to write, any thing from which any person can derive so much edification as I, and several others, have derived in particular from your paper on Johnson.¹⁴ My vocation, as far as I yet see, lies in a humbler sphere; I am rather fitted to be a logical expounder than an artist. You I look upon as an artist, and perhaps the only genuine one now living in this country: the highest destiny of all, lies in that direction; for it is the artist alone in whose hands Truth becomes impressive, and a living principle of action. Yet it is something not inconsiderable (in an age in which the understanding is more cultivated and developed than any of the other faculties, & is the only faculty which men do not habitually distrust) if one could address them through the understanding, & ostensibly with little besides mere logical apparatus, yet in a spirit higher than was ever inspired by mere logic, and in such sort that their understandings shall at least have to be reconciled to those truths, which even then will not be felt until they shall have been breathed upon by the breath of the artist. For, as far as I have observed, the majority even of those who are capable of receiving Truth into their minds, must have the logical side of it turned first towards them; then it must be quite turned round before them, that they may see it to be the same Truth in its poetic that it is in its metaphysical aspect. Now this is what I seem to myself qualified for, if for any thing, or at least capable of qualifying myself for; and it is thus that I may be, and therefore ought to be, not useless as an auxiliary even to you, though I am sensible that I can never give back to you the value of what I receive from you.

I have no news worth telling you; scarcely any news of any kind. Mrs.

13. See Letter 52, n. 3.

14. See Letter 51, n. 5.

Austin is quite recovered. Charles Buller is now in Cornwall; he was a little indisposed when he set out, but is now I trust in good health. Pray make my most friendly remembrances to Mrs. Carlyle, and let me hear from you in due season.

Yours ever faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

Glen bids me tell you that he has heard from your brother,¹⁵ who is at Naples, very well, and comfortable. I told Glen that you had made affectionate mention of him in your letter, at which he seemed much gratified.¹⁶

55. TO HARRIET TAYLOR¹

[Aug., 1832?]

Benie soit la main qui a tracé ces caractères! Elle m'a écrit—il suffit; bien que je ne me dissimule pas que c'est pour me dire un éternel adieu.

Cette adieu, qu'elle ne croie pas que je l'accepte jamais. Sa route et la mienne sont séparées, elle l'a dit: mais elles peuvent, elles doivent, se rencontrer. A quelqu'époque, dans quelque'endroit, que ce puisse être, elle me trouvera toujours ce que j'ai été, ce que je suis encore.

Elle sera obéie: mes lettres n'iront plus troubler sa tranquillité, ou verser une goutte de plus dans la coupe de ses chagrins. Elle sera obéie, par les motifs qu'elle donne,—elle le serait quand même elle se serait bornée à me communiquer ses volontés. Lui obéir est pour moi une nécessité.

Elle ne refusera pas, j'espère, l'offrande de ces petites fleurs, que j'ai apportées pour elle du fond de la Nouvelle-Forêt. Donnez-les lui s'il le faut, de votre part.

15. Dr. John Carlyle (1801–1879), physician, and translator of Dante.

16. This postscript appears in the margin of the last page.

* * * *

1. MS at LSE. No salutation or signature. Published in Hayek, p. 38, and, translated, in Packe, p. 139, but dated as of late July, 1832. The approximate date has been inferred from the reference to the New Forest in the last paragraph. Since the walking tour of JSM had begun on July 19 and concluded in the New Forest on Aug. 6 (see Letter 52, n. 3), the Aug. date seems more likely.

JSM's acquaintance with Mrs. John Taylor had begun in 1830, probably in July, in the Taylor home at a dinner party at which W. J. Fox, J. A. Roebuck, and Harriet Martineau were also present. Friendship between JSM and Mrs. Taylor developed into love, but at the time of this letter she had evidently tried to break off the relationship, telling him that they must not meet again.

56. TO JOHN TAYLOR¹Saturday [Sept. 1, 1832]
I.H.

MY DEAR SIR

Two acquaintances of mine, MM. Jules Bastide² and Hippolyte Dussard,³ distinguished members of the republican party in France, have been compelled to fly their country for a time in consequence of the affair of the fifth & sixth of June. They were not conspirators, for there was no conspiracy, but when they found the troops and the people at blows, they took the side of the people. Now I am extremely desirous to render their stay here as little disagreeable as possible, and to enable them to profit by it, and to return with a knowledge of England and with those favourable sentiments towards our English hommes du mouvement which it is of so much importance that they and their friends should entertain. I am particularly desirous of bringing them in contact with the better members of the Political Union, that they may not suppose our men of action to be all of them like the Revells and the Murphys whom they saw and heard on Wednesday last.⁴ Yourself and Mr. Fox are [the]⁵ persons I should most wish them to see. But I do not like to give them a letter of introduction to you without first ascertaining whether it would be agreeable to yourself. Will you therefore oblige me with a line to say, if possible, that you will allow me to tell them to call upon you, or otherwise to say that you would rather not. I have not mentioned the matter to them, nor shall I do so until I have the pleasure of hearing from you.

Ever truly yours

J. S. MILL

1. Addressed: John Taylor Esq. / 4 Christopher Street / Finsbury Square. Postmark: SP 1 1832. MS at Yale. Published in Hayek, pp. 38–39.

John Taylor (1796–1849), wholesale druggist, husband of Harriet Taylor, with whom JSM had fallen in love. Taylor was actively interested in the Radical cause.

2. Jules Bastide (1800–1879), publicist and politician, had fled to England after being condemned to death for the part he had taken in riots in Paris on June 5 at the time of the funeral of General Lamarque. He was in exile in England for two years.

3. Hippolyte Dussard (1798–1876), economist. As Hayek points out, JSM had probably met him and Bastide in Paris in 1830.

4. The Examiner for Sept. 2, 1832, p. 568, reports the meeting of Wednesday, Aug. 29, of the National Political Union, to discuss the condition of Ireland. Major Revell presided, a Mr. Murphy made a fiery attack on Henry Brougham for the government's Irish policy, and the meeting passed a resolution of sympathy "with the People of Ireland in their efforts to throw off the galling and oppressive imposts of Tithes and Church-cess."

5. Part covered by seal.

57. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

13th September, 1832

MY DEAR MUTTERLEIN

How could you so far misunderstand me as to suppose that it could be a question with me whether I would sacrifice two days to you? I thought that it would be sacrificing two days of you. That was one reason among others why I wished you to be consulted.

The letter I have received this morning from Polvellen, & which informs me of the cause which will unfortunately keep you there for some time longer,² decides the question, & I shall not set out from this place till Thursday next. I do not expect to be at Devonport before Saturday, as I shall probably take Bath in my way & bring on Roebuck along with me.

But remember that whatever may happen, I stay at Polvellen no longer than you do. So you must either stay there to the end of my time or be punished for suspecting me by knowing that you carry me off prematurely.

The letters which accompany this have been here (one of them at least) some time in expectation of some opportunity for conveying them. But I believe there was no urgency. I have sent to Tait's Magazine (for the number which will appear on the 1st of next month) a notice of Mr. Austin's book,³ which though it is but short you will I think be pleased with—and what I value much more, you will be pleased with me for writing it.

Affectionately yours

J. S. MILL

58. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House

17th September 1832

MY DEAR CARLYLE

You did me but justice in supposing that I had for some time been in hopes of a letter from you before I received your last.² When it arrived, it found me in a state of as impatient expectation as one should be in

1. MS in the possession of Mr. Gordon Waterfield.

2. Evidently the illness of John Austin; see next letter.

3. "Austin's Lectures on Jurisprudence," Tait's, II (Dec., 1832), 343–48. A review of John Austin's The Province of Jurisprudence Determined (London, 1832).

* * * *

1. Addressed (in another hand): Thos. Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtock / Dumfries. Postmarks: FREE / 17 SE 17 / 1832, and DUMFRIES / 19 SEP 1832. Franked by T. Hyde Villiers. MS at NLS. Carlyle's answer of Oct. 16 is in A. Carlyle, pp. 16–23.

2. Of Aug. 28. Published in A. Carlyle, pp. 11–16.

for an event which does not depend upon oneself. I plead guilty to having neglected the biographical department, having nothing to relate which seemed important to myself, and forgetting that all news is important to those who can see nothing and have few opportunities even of hearing. To begin therefore with myself, not only as the person whom I see oftenest and with whom I am most intimate, but as almost the only person (known to you) whom I have seen for the last two months, all others having long been absent from this Babylon, or at least Babel, of ours.—Your letter found me still in London, where I still am, but where I hope to be no longer after Thursday next. I had not promised to pass more than a fortnight of my holidays with the Bullers, & not wishing to lose entirely the benefit of the long summer days, I made a walking tour for a previous fortnight about the end of July, & then returned to allow others to be absent; and have been kept in town ever since. During this interval of from five to six weeks, I have worked if not harder, yet with more obvious fruits than I have done during any period of equal length for years past, having begun and finished three several papers on subjects extremely various. The first & longest is a political and moral dissertation on the rights and duties of the state with regard to endowments for public purposes,³ or what you call in Scotland mortifications, including the estates of ecclesiastical & other corporations, universities, &c. This will appear in the Jurist, a quarterly journal or review of Legislation & Jurisprudence, carried on by several friends of mine, radical-utilitarians of a better than the ordinary sort, of whom I think sufficiently well to be able to cooperate with them in their own field of usefulness, though perhaps they would not always join me in mine. The second & shortest of my three articles, I have sent to Tait; it is a short review of Mr Austin's book on Jurisprudence,⁴ & was chiefly intended as a recommendation of that work, though there is besides, some "doctrinal matter" as Napier⁵ I suppose would call it, & a good deal of critical matter. Finally, I have written a rambling kind of article,⁶ in which many, I will not say great, but big things are said on a small occasion, namely in the form of strictures on a well-meaning but flimsy article which recently appeared in the Monthly Repository. Touching this *Monthly Repository*⁷ let me here say two or three words, as you probably do not know what it is. Till lately it was conducted by a Committee of Unitarian ministers & was a sectarian publication, the "Evangelical Magazine" of

3. See Letter 43, n. 18.

4. See preceding letter, n. 3.

5. Macvey Napier (1776–1847), editor of the Edinburgh Review, 1829–47; earlier, editor of the supplement to the sixth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica (to which James Mill contributed).

6. "On Genius," MR, VI (Oct., 1832), 649–59.

7. See Letter 49, n. 1.

the Unitarians. Not long since, it was placed under the editorship, & soon after became the property of Mr. Fox, the same who has figured in the Political Union in London, and who, though no Göthe or Jean-Paul, is fit for better things than to be either a Unitarian preacher or a radical orator. Since the M.R. has been under his management, it has gradually divested itself of its sectarian character, and is much improved in all respects, though the editor & his writers are very far from seeing to the bottom of things yet. They are but Unitarians & liberals, unsectarianized, & with a larger & more tolerant spirit than common. Into my first parcel of books I will put some numbers of this periodical, which will, I think, like Bulwer's,⁸ acquaint you with a new phasis of mind: at least I know nothing that is exactly like it, & among the persons whom Mr Fox most frequents I have met with several men & women who are decidedly characters, realizing an idea of their own & free from halfness of all sorts. I am not sure, indeed that much of this individuality appears in the Monthly Repository. When you next come to town I think you would like to know some of these people, as they also would to know you, for they are mostly great admirers of your writings, which however I am very doubtful whether they would find so much to their liking if they understood them thoroughly. As for this article of mine, those who best know me will see more character in it than in anything I have ever published; other people will never guess it to be mine. You, I hope, will find all the three articles true, the only praise I covet, & certainly rarer than any other in our times. But in this last you will find many things which I never saw, or never saw clearly till they were shewn to me by you, nor even for some time after. I think that the M.R. is read by persons with open improvable minds, & that ideas thrown among them will find soil in which to germinate; especially as they read their own magazines for doctrine, & others only for amusement. You see I adhere to my system, which is to be as particular in the choice of my vehicles, as you are indiscriminate, & I think we are both right. Do not buy any of these things; I will send them to you, with the exception perhaps of the no. of Tait, which in order to send I must first buy, & which would be a sorry half-crown's worth either to you or me; and which moreover will not like claret improve by travelling, nor be taken in gratis as ballast.

Every man's work is the chief part of his life, and since my return to town it has been the whole of mine, except some little reading, which is also in some sort work. Among things read "during the period under review," as we at this house say in our despatches, are to be numbered your two articles on the Corn Law Rhymer and on Göthe.⁹ The former I found true: the latter I believe to be so, rather on your authority & from such knowledge as I myself have of Göthe than from what is said of him in the article: it does not, I think, carry so much of its own evidence with it as might have been wished: whether more might have been done is a question on which I can only express a doubt. In the meantime, I think I can perceive that your writings are making some way; awakening, though but partially, some minds. At least I find more people than before, or certainly more than I knew of, who do not dismiss them at once as "mysticism", "raving", &c. &c. &c.

8. The New Monthly Magazine.

9. See Letter 51, notes 6 and 7.

The Austins are still at Polvellen, where Mr. Austin has had two successive attacks of illness, from the last of which he had not completely recovered when I last heard. Mrs Austin was busy translating Falk's memoir of Göthe;¹⁰ & Charles Buller was writing an article for the Foreign Quarterly, on I know not what subject, which he had delayed beginning till they were obliged to shut him up for some hours a day for the express purpose: so at least says Mrs Buller. I have seen Glen but twice since I came to town, once for a moment only. He did not, it seems, write anything about Fanny Kemble. The paper therefore to which you allude must be the work of Diabolus.¹¹ I think he (Glennus not Diabolus) seemed less uneasy in mind than formerly; this might be accidental: in other respects he is much the same. It always seems to please him much when he hears that you continue to take interest in him.

You will have learnt from an article of mine in the Examiner,¹² the only one I have written for the last two months, that our friends the St Simonians have been tried. Enfantin, Chevalier & Duveyrier have been sentenced to a year's imprisonment & a fine: Barrault¹³ & Rodrigues¹⁴ only to a trifling fine. They were convicted on the charge of forming a society for the discussion of political & religious subjects without leave of the government, & also on a charge of preaching immoral doctrines, a charge founded on the theory of la femme libre.¹⁵ There were other charges on which they were

10. Characteristics of Goethe, From the German of Falk, von Müller, . . . (London, 1833).

11. Carlyle in his letter of Aug. 28, indirectly quoting his brother: "Did he [Glen] not write something about Fanny Kemble? I said: Aut Glennus aut Diabolus." Frances Anne Kemble (1809–1893) was then at the height of her fame as an actress.

12. An untitled article, Examiner, Sept. 9, 1832, p. 585.

13. Emile Barrault (1799–1868), publicist, travelled in the East, 1833–35, to propagate the new faith.

14. Olinde Rodrigues (1794–1851), economist and financier, early follower of Saint-Simon, remained a faithful Saint-Simonian until, like Bazard, he quarrelled with Enfantin over Enfantin's dogma on women.

15. Even after the breakup of the Saint-Simonian establishment at Ménilmontant, a group of disciples travelled to Constantinople and the East pour chercher la femme-Messie.

acquitted. Duveyrier is said to have made a very striking defence: Enfantin's seems to have made little impression except that of the ludicrous. There was much in the conduct of them all, which really one cannot help suspecting of quackery. In the witness-box, none of them would take the oath without Enfantin's permission: this he refused, on the ground that the name of God is not mentioned in the form of the oath. In defending himself, he several times made a long pause pour attendre des inspirations, & he gave strange looks at various people, to shew as he said the power of a look. The St Simonians all wear beards, and a peculiar costume, & marched to the place of trial in a body, singing if I recollect right, a succession of hymns, written and set to music by themselves. Enfantin claimed to have two women as his counsel, one of whom was Cecile Fournel,¹⁶ who you may remember protested so vehemently against the immorality of his doctrines, but who has since, with her husband,¹⁷ returned into the bosom of his church. When one remembers Irving, one believes that all this may be sincere. Yet surely there is an admixture of charlatanerie in it, I mean on the part of the Supreme Father.

Adolphe d'Eichthal has been here; I saw him for a few minutes only: he has had the cholera, & looked in very indifferent health.

Now as to books. I have not either Dumont or Babbage,¹⁸ but I expect to have the former very soon; when I do I will send it. My own collection of books is a very strange one: it consists partly of books collected when I was writing on some particular subject; these are chiefly on the French Revolution, & French political history from Louis 14th downwards: & partly of books which I bought because they were not to be found in my father's library: which accounts for my having scarcely any standard English or French prose books. I am richest in the minor & the very recent French writers. I have most of the standard German & Italian books; the former you do not want, nor probably the latter. I have various classics, chiefly the poets, as my father cares less about them. For the same reason, I have many of the later English poets, whom my father despises. I am rich in no other department nor can I give any general idea of my other books.

16. In the Saint-Simonian hierarchy, in the "Degré des femmes," she had held the position of "Chef de service," and was in charge of the department for the conversion of women. Her testimony in the trial—a letter to the court—is in D'Alle-magne, Les Saint-Simoniens, p. 300.

17. Marie Jérôme Henri Fournel (1799–1876), engineer, had given up his position as director of the works at Le Creusot to join the movement. He later wrote a biography of Saint-Simon.

18. Carlyle had requested "Dumont's Mirabeau and Babbage's two Books." The first of these would have been Etienne Dumont, Recollections of Mirabeau (London, 1832). One of the two books by Charles Babbage must have been his On the Economy of Machinery and Manufactures, which reached three editions in the year of its publication, 1832. The other book was probably Babbage's Reflections on the Decline of Science in England and on Some of its Causes (London, 1830).

I have not yet received the books you took with you, but as I have not particularly wanted them I have not enquired at Longman's,¹⁹ & I will give them a fortnight's grace till I return. I have not yet hit upon any arrangement that would do, for sending you the Examiner, but I hope to find the means when I return to town. The only copy I have of my own, I keep for reference, and cannot well do without: the only inconvenience of sending it, would be that it must be sent back, but that is a sufficiently considerable one to induce me to seek for some other expedient before I resort to this, which may remain in reserve, as a last resort.

Fonblanque is better, but not yet strong or well. He is at present in the country. He goes on writing with his usual fertility, but I think he feels himself a little at fault in the altered situation of politics, & it is creditable to him that he is conscious of it. If coincidence were proof of causation, I should say that the pledge-mania had been abated by the tone which his paper has taken respecting it. What may be true is, that the Examiner has furnished arguments to those who were not disposed to give pledges, & has shewn that a person may refuse them without being a Tory & all that is wicked, a tax-eater & what not. I finish this letter in the presence of my friend John Wilson, who offers to be the bearer of it as far as Edinburgh, but as he is not going nearer to you I prefer availing myself of a Government frank which I can generally have for the asking. With best remembrances to Mrs Carlyle, believe me

Yours ever faithfully

J. S. MILL.

59. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

India House
18 October
1832.

MY DEAR SIR

My friend André Marchais, who pays me the compliment of making me the depository and instrument of all the plans he forms for bringing about a good understanding between the patriotic party in France and the best of the English radicals, has suggested something which appears to me

19. The bookseller's, who arranged for transportation of packages of books.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmarks: 7 NIGHT 7 / OC 18 / 1832, and 8 MORN 8 / OC 19 / 1832. The MS for the portion of the letter published by Garnett, pp. 101-2, is now at King's; the MS of the hitherto unpublished portion is at Yale.

highly important and to which, if you think well of it, you have it in your power to be mainly instrumental.

You are aware of the virulent and unceasing persecution which Louis-Philippe keeps up against the liberal press, insomuch that the Tribune has been prosecuted between sixty & seventy times. Out of the first sixty prosecutions, resulted even against this violent paper only five verdicts: but though the prosecutors succeed only in one case out of twelve, the Court imposes such heavy fines that the liberal press cannot long exist under such oppression and the editors are almost always in prison. An association has therefore been formed at Paris, of which my excellent friend Marchais is the secretary, for the purpose generally of promoting the liberty of the press, and specially of raising subscriptions to pay the fines. You will find the prospectus of the Association in the third page of the enclosed Courrier Français.

Now those among the French patriots who know enough of the English radicals to desire their cooperation & sympathy are anxious to obtain subscribers in England for this association, and above all they wish that the Political Unions should bear some public testimony of sympathy and fraternity on this important occasion. No one can do more than you can to bring both these things about, and no one can judge more soundly what would be the best mode of doing it.

The more you see & converse with French people, the more importance you will attach to things of this kind. Every such mark of sympathy produces a great momentary effect; but they require to be, again & again, repeated: for so few Frenchmen ever come here, that they do not learn, except from such public occurrences, that the English people, all but the Tories,² esteem, and wish well to, the French. Bastide, for example, came over as he confesses, full of prejudice against the English, but is already quite an altered man & is most eager to convince those of his countrymen who have never been here, that the English are not as many Frenchmen think, aristocrats at heart even to a man, & full of jealousy & selfish animosity against France.

I am anxious to say many things to you about this & other matters connected with it, & particularly to engage most earnestly your good offices in favour of Dussard & Bastide; to give the one all the consolations possible in his exile, & the other every means of knowing England, as he has begun a most interesting correspondence with the French journals which from his high standing in the republican party will carry weight. But of this hereafter as of much else which ought to be in common between us two.

Ever faithfully yours

J. S. MILL

60. TO [WILLIAM BRIDGES ADAMS]¹

India House

20th October 1832

MY DEAR FRIEND

I should have returned the Preface² immediately after receiving your note; but I had it not at this house, & all yesterday I was too much engaged to be able to write to you. Now, however, I send the MS. with the very few pencil marks which you will find on it. I am glad that you want it, as I suppose I may conclude that the work itself is nearly or quite finished.

I am as desirous as you can possibly be, that we should meet & converse frequently at some length, and I had declined a very pressing & agreeable invitation for Friday³ rather than put you off again—do not be angry with me—it was not from “punctilious ceremony” which I should never think of observing with a friend; but because I feared that you would think I was indifferent to your repeated invitation, & that I did not feel the value of friendship like yours. However the obstacle this time came from your side & I consequently was able to accept the other invitation, therefore do not regret that you happened to be engaged.

What you say respecting myself in your note I know you feel, and it is therefore very precious to me. We two possess what, next to community of purpose, is the greatest source of friendship between minds of any capacity; this is, not equality, for nothing can be so little interesting to a man as his own double; but, reciprocal superiority. Each of us knows many things which the other knows not, & can do many things which the other values but cannot himself do, or not so well. There is also just that difference of character between us which renders us highly valuable to

1. By permission of the Harvard College Library. The letter bears no identification of the recipient. The identification seems warranted, however, by internal evidence, even though Letter 67 seems to indicate that by Feb., 1833, JSM had still not met Adams.

William Bridges Adams (1797–1872), at this time under the pseudonym Junius Redivivus a prolific Radical writer and from 1832 to 1836 one of the chief contributors to W. J. Fox's Monthly Repository. (See Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent.) His first wife was Elizabeth Place, daughter of Francis Place (see n. 7 below); his second, Sarah Flower, whom he married in 1834, was the ward of W. J. Fox and also a contributor to the Repository. In later life Adams was a successful inventor, known especially for the invention of the fish joint for railway rails.

2. A Preface to The Producing Man's Companion; An Essay on the Present State of Society, Moral, Political, and Physical, in England, published in 1833. This was a revised, second edition of The Rights of Morality [with same subtitle], 1832. JSM reviewed Junius Redivivus' writings in both MR (April, 1833), pp. 262–70, and Tail's (June, 1833), pp. 347–54.

3. Oct. 20, the date of this letter, fell on a Saturday.

each other in another way for I require to be warmed, you perhaps occasionally to be calmed. We are almost as much the natural complement of one another as man and woman are: we are far stronger together than separately, & whatever both of us agree in, has a very good chance, I think, of being true. We are therefore made to encourage and assist one another. Our intimacy is its own reward, & we have only to consider in what way it may be made most useful to both of us.

Never express any regret at taking up my time with any of your productions. I will not, (because I know you would not wish it) postpone to them, anything which is really of more immediate urgency: I say more immediate, because no employment of my time can be in itself better or more useful. I know of no one man now living who, take him for all in all, has a larger share of the qualifications (opportunity being included) for effecting unspeakable good, than you have; at the same time I feel that this good may be unboundedly increased by association & collision with other minds, & that for this advantage you are thrown principally on me, because your incognito⁴ cuts you off from so many others from whom you might derive much of the same benefit. Although I agree with you in thinking that on the whole the reasons predominate in favor of your remaining unknown, I often regret that you are cut off by it from any certain knowledge how many more persons there are than you are aware of, who are qualified morally & intellectually to think, act, and feel with you. In your loathing of the very idea of being patronized I can fully sympathize—but you are in no danger of that; because you are not a littérateur who administers to people's amusement, but a thinker & writer whose doings affect their substantial interests, & who therefore when you are not valued & esteemed, will be disliked & feared, but at least always treated de puissance en puissance. Moore⁵ or Campbell⁶ might be patronized, but Place⁷ or Cobbett never could, because nobody ever gives himself airs with persons who have power of their own, independent of, & for some purposes paramount to his.

Believe me

Yours ever faithfully

J. S. MILL

4. All his writings were signed Junius Redivivus.

5. Thomas Moore (1779–1852), the poet, and biographer of Byron.

6. Thomas Campbell (1777–1844), poet best known for his The Pleasures of Hope (1799) and Gertrude of Wyoming (1809).

7. Francis Place (1771–1854), London tailor, friend of Bentham and James Mill, was behind the scenes a very important leader in reform movements for at least a quarter of a century. For the best account of his activities see Graham Wallas, The Life of Francis Place (London, 1918).

61. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹22^d October 1832

MY DEAR CARLYLE

When I received your last,² I was on the point of writing to you, for the special purpose (in addition to all general ones) of giving you intimation of the existence of a person who is willing to undertake for the punctual transmission of the Examiner by Monday's post on the condition on which such things are frequently done, namely that he and you shall each pay half the subscription. You have therefore this resource in case of need, and though I have no experience by which to judge of the punctuality of the person in question, I will undertake to rebuke him for every breach of it which may be notified to me from you. As you surmise, I have written nothing in the Examiner lately, except a little article relating among other things to the trial of the St Simonians.³ I write nothing regularly for the Examiner except the articles on French affairs: everything else is the exception, not the rule; and even of those little notices of France in the middle of the paper, there has been a suspension since July last, owing partly to my two absences from town, & partly to the uninteresting nature of all the passing events in that country. The same post however which brings you this letter, will bring an article of mine on the Doctrinaires & the new French Ministry,⁴ & from this time you may expect to see these notices resumed. As for other newspaper-writing, it has been suspended by the more serious work mentioned in my last letter to you, which being over, other things will now have once more their turn.

What you say of Fonblanque is partly true,⁵ or rather it is all true, but not the whole truth. It is only accident that makes him attach himself to Politics, but the bent & character of his mind renders war against the False his vocation instead of effort towards the True. He is essentially a com-

1. Addressed: Thos. Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtock / Dumfries. Postmarks: FREE / 23OC23 / 1832, and DUMFRIES / 2[?]OC1832. Franked by T. Hyde Villiers. MS at NLS. Carlyle's answer of Nov. 19 is in A. Carlyle, pp. 23-30.

2. Of Oct. 16. Published in A. Carlyle, pp. 16-23.

3. See Letter 58, n. 12. Of the Saint-Simonians, JSM remarks: "Of their doctrines we still think . . . that there is, out of all reckoning, more truth and substance in them than in any other of the numerous Utopian systems which are afloat. We agree in but few of their conclusions, yet we see an undeniable and permanent value in many of their premises. . . ."

4. Untitled article, Examiner, Oct. 21, 1832, pp. 680-81. MacMinn, Bibliog., pp. 22-23, lists the succeeding notices of French affairs.

5. Of Fonblanque, editor of the Examiner, Carlyle had said in his previous letter (A. Carlyle, p. 18) that it was remarkable that "a man of his sharp faculties [and] keen genial nature" could bear to continue as editor of a political paper, and asked: "Is it your prediction that he will abide to the last by Politics?"

mentator on sophistry, hypocrisy, and folly. Under other circumstances he might have been a writer on manners or morals, not politics, but it would always have been in the same way: he used to write such things in the London Magazine & other periodicals formerly. He has no systematic or solid acquirements, & now unfortunately has no leisure to supply that want. To no one would it be more important to "have leave to sit wholly silent for some three years from this date, till he shall have got to the bottom of many things."⁶ But, as you too truly say, jacta est alea; he must toil day and night to gain a subsistence by giving out what is in him, never stopping to take in more; even that problem is a hard enough one, determined as he is to have nothing to do with Lying in any form, and having other mouths to feed besides his own, with, I greatly fear, little prudence in pecuniary matters to keep his course which is impeded by so many unavoidable obstacles, clear of any avoidable ones.

I will immediately send you Thiers's History of the French Revolution⁷ with perhaps some other French books, and some numbers of the Fox periodical.⁸ What you say of Unitarians⁹ is true of them as a class, but not of every individual among them. They seem to me to be a conceited sect, who think that God has given them a book for their guidance and that yet they are so wise that they can set the book itself right when it tells them anything different from what they could have found out of themselves. Fox, however, is not a half-man, but three quarters of a man at least: I do not know him sufficiently to be able to affirm more, but what I do know, makes me feel sure that a time will come when he will part company with Unitarianism and Unitarian preaching. I am satisfied that he would have done it long ago but that a Unitarian preacher may preach almost anything he pleases. It is the sort of necessity he is under of addressing himself to a set of Pharisaical formalists and word-mongers twice every Sunday when he could find fitter audience elsewhere, that will ultimately disgust him with his present ostensible calling. As for his political speeches, I only know them as you do by bad reports, very bad indeed, for they make the speeches feeble, when all who ever heard them concur in saying that they are very powerful & effective. But his politics are but a small part of himself, & few people so well qualified to have influence over others in that walk, overvalue its importance so little. Him among others you should know personally, &

6. A quotation from Carlyle's previous letter of his wish for himself (A. Carlyle, p. 22).

7. Histoire de la Révolution française (10 vols., Paris, 1823-27).

8. The Monthly Repository.

9. "I never could make much of Unitarians; from the great Channing downwards there is a certain mechanical metallic deadness at the heart of all of them; rhetorical clangour enough, but no fruit for me. Unluckily too they seem a sort of Half-men. . . ." (A. Carlyle, p. 20.)

the first time you are in London this among many other good works of the same sort do I reserve for myself to bring about. I do not think he writes much in his own Magazine. One paper "An Autumn in London"¹⁰ I know to be his; it is very unlike his usual manner, but shews greater powers of a certain sort than I think he commonly evinces. The articles on Goethe are by Crabbe Robinson,¹¹ you therefore know all that is in them. A curious sort of man, Talfourd¹² the barrister, who wrote the paper on Hazlitt in the Examiner¹³ (interesting but hollow & unsatisfactory) told me the other day that Goethe must be an impostor because Robinson praises him so highly. N.B. Talfourd admires Schiller exceedingly in Coleridge's translation.¹⁴

The Westminster Reviewer whom you are curious about is Lieutenant-Colonel T. Perronet Thompson, author of various pamphlets on Political Economy, part proprietor & now almost sole writer of the Westminster Review. He is a man of very extensive acquirements, besides having seen much of the world. Among other things he is a considerable mathematician, & has written what I believe to be the only good systematic book ever written on the physical principles of Music.¹⁵ That book is the only work of his I ever saw which shews him to be capable of looking at more than one single aspect of each individual thing. He has an understanding like a pin, going very far into a thing, but never covering a larger portion of it than the area of a pin's point. He is a singular man, very clever in his way, & possessed of a rare faculty of familiarly illustrating & pushing into every corner of a large & complicated subject the one idea which is all he ever has thereon. From his writings you would judge him to be much of a coxcomb, from his conversation & demeanour one of the most modest of men. He is the most unalloyed of Radicals past, present, & to come, in every acceptation of that title whether among men or gods.

Tait, I am inclined to think, will succeed: narrow as it is, there is more heartiness and resolvedness about that magazine than about Bulwer's,¹⁶ or any other so-called Liberal periodical now going. Then it is radical, which

10. MR, VI (1832), 660-67.

11. Henry Crabb Robinson (1775-1867), diarist and enthusiast for German literature, contributed a series of nine articles on Goethe to the Monthly Repository in 1832-33.

12. Thomas Noon Talfourd (1795-1854), later dramatist and biographer of Charles Lamb.

13. "The Late William Hazlitt," Oct. 14, pp. 661-62; Oct. 21, p. 678; and Nov. 2, pp. 708-9. The final instalment, not published at the time of this letter, was signed T.N.T.

14. Wallenstein, A Drama in Two Parts (London, 1800).

15. Instructions to my Daughter for playing on the Enharmonic Guitar (London, 1829). Thompson reviewed his own book in WR, XVI (April, 1832), 429-79. See L. G. Johnson, General T. Perronet Thompson (London, 1957), p. 158.

16. See Letter 58, n. 8.

the others are not, & so far better adapted to the inclinations of the mass. There is besides I think, a possibility of improvement in those writers: they have nothing or but little to give up, only to take in a wider range. I know none of them personally except one, that one however has written most of their best articles; he is an early & valued friend of mine, whom I once thought incurably narrow, but who has made such advances within the last eighteen months that I have the greatest hopes of him: Roebuck, who has lately made so much noise at Bath.¹⁷ If No 3 of Tait, & the number for this month (October) should fall in your way, it may be interesting to you to run through his two articles on Rousseau.¹⁸ Though you will desiderate much that is not there, yet if you know our Benthamic Utilitarians, you will acknowledge that it requires much vigour of intellect in one trained in that school, to be capable of writing those articles they are so unlike all that he can have learned from his instructors. I shall be much surprised if he do not turn out to be one of the very few men whom we have any chance of seeing in politics for an indefinite period. He has a strength of will which has had no parallel in that field since Napoleon. Would not a Napoleon-idéologue be an odd combination?

On the whole there are scarcely any left of the old narrow school of Utilitarians; what now distinguishes those who were so, (besides that as you say they were the reoriginators of any belief among us) is that they are decidedly less narrow than almost any other persons who aspire to the character of Thinkers in this country. The character of the school if such it could be termed, was to see clearly what they did see, though it was but little. This quality I have hopes that they will retain, as their views expand. You say that young minds do not end as they began; but besides this, the young minds have already far larger views than the old. Among those whom I know, the older a man is, the more of his belief is negative, & the less he thinks it worth while for him to throw his mind into that of any other man, or look at Truth from any other man's position. None however of them all has become so unlike what he once was as I myself, who originally was the narrowest of them all, having been brought up more exclusively under the influence of a peculiar kind of impressions than any other person ever was. Fortunately however I was not crammed; my own thinking faculties were called into strong though but partial play; & by their means I have been enabled to remake all my opinions.

Charles Buller is not only sure of Liskeard,¹⁹ but is at this time one of the most popular and important men in the Eastern Division of Cornwall;

17. In his campaign to become MP for Bath; he was elected in Dec.

18. "Jean Jacques Rousseau," Tait's, I (June, 1832), 338-56, and II (Oct., 1832), 39-49.

19. Elected to Parliament for Liskeard that autumn, Buller held the seat until his death in 1848.

he speaks at all the meetings where the radical candidates face their constituents, & always makes the best speech of the day. Unhappily his health continues delicate & uncertain; & he has not acquired what was chiefly deficient in him, the power of continued & persevering application to business. I almost despair of his ever doing anything considerable, for want of this one quality. All the members for the Eastern Division of Cornwall, both county & towns, will be radicals, with perhaps one exception. It is a good genial kind of radicalism, that of the Cornish people, not mere hunger speaking out its cravings in maxims of politics. The rest of the Buller family are in their usual condition of mind, & body, & estate.

Austin was very ill for a time in Cornwall but recovered, & was completely set up in health & spirits by a little tour to the Land's End in which I accompanied him & M^{rs} Austin.²⁰ Her silence therefore cannot be occasioned by any untoward circumstance, but probably by her translation of Falk, about which she is very busy. I go there tonight to help resolve some doubts about a metaphysical chapter. I must resolve them in my own head first for it is a chapter which I was able to make nothing of when I tried it at Polvellen. I doubt not that she will speedily write; you & M^{rs} Carlyle are perpetually in her thoughts & frequently on her lips. I have not seen Glen since my return, but will very speedily call on him if he does not on me. I will also call on Fraser²¹ whom I have not seen at all this summer.—Tell me when you go to Edinburgh, & where to address you there. We must as you say, see Edinburgh together one day, & (I will add) soon. If it be in summer, that will be a more convenient mode to me of passing a vacation in your company than visiting you at Craigenputtoch. There are several reasons for this.

Ever yours affectionately

J. S. MILL.

I understand from Napier's son that the books were sent, the neglect therefore is at Longman's & the remedy is in my own hands.—The St Simonians are not yet in prison, having appealed to the Court of Cassation: more of them hereafter. They have in the press (or by this time out of it) a full account of their trial: They will doubtless send it to me, & so will I to you. The article on them in the Westminster Review²² is as you surmise by the man I told you of, Col. Thompson. I look forward with great interest to your paper on Diderot:²³ I have long wished for such a 20. Part of MS of JSM's "Journal of Cornwall Trip, Oct. 3–9, 1832" was in the possession of the late Isaac Foot, Pencrebar, Callington, Cornwall. A photostat of this and the rest of the MS are at LSE.

21. See Letter 51, n. 4.

22. See Letter 45, n. 8.

23. FQR, XI (April, 1833), 261–315.

paper from you. Buller has written a paper for the same review (it is out by this time) on the reign of Louis 18th.²⁴ I have not yet seen "The Tale."²⁵ Assure M^{rs} Carlyle of my best regards.²⁶

62. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

India House
7th November
1832

MY DEAR SIR

I am highly gratified by what you say of my paper on Currency,² and no less so at the notes you propose to add as from yourself, as I agree with you so decidedly and so warmly on both points that if we could have known each other's minds before I wrote the article, I would gladly have touched upon those collateral questions in the text.

As to the excellence of the Scottish system of banking I have no doubt of it, nor that the issue of notes down to £1, where the solvency of the issues is as well provided for as it is under that system, should be subject to no restriction except convertibility, into cash or into the notes of some Government Bank. I rejoice much at the view your Magazine has taken of this question, because many of our most enlightened radicals and political economists in this part of the world are of a contrary, and therefore in my view a wrong, opinion upon this point.

Then as to the National Debt, I agree with you and with Jefferson in thinking that no generation is entitled to mortgage the fruits of the labours of posterity: on us who have only our earnings (I mean myself for example) the National Debt is not, I admit, a sacred obligation: but it is so, on all who have inherited property from the generation which borrowed the money, for no one has a moral right to take his father's property and leave his father's debts unpaid. But we cannot distinguish between inherited and acquired property after so many years, and therefore, agreeing with you that it is a question of choice between one injustice and another, I hold 24. It did not appear until the Jan., 1833, FQR, XI, 89–127.

25. "The Tale" by Goethe (trans. and commentary by Carlyle), Fraser's, VI (Oct., 1832), 257–78.

This postscript is written at the top of the first page of the letter.

26. This sentence is written in the margin of the last page.

* * * *

1. Addressed: William Tait Esq. / Bookseller / Edinburgh. Postmarks: A / NO 7 / 1832, and NOV / ???9A / 1832. MS at LSE.

William Tait (1793–1864) had begun earlier that year the publication of the magazine bearing his name.

2. "The Currency Juggle," Tait's, II (Jan., 1833), 461–67, reprinted in Dissertations, I, 68–81.

that the least injustice would be done by paying off the debt at once by a tax on all actually acquired and accumulated property; viz. the funds themselves, the land, and all capital, but not laying any part of the burthen upon income not derived from property.

If [it]³ was possible to leave the debt unpaid and throw the interest of it upon property exclusively, I should consider that still better; but it would not do, since it would be a penalty on future accumulation, taxing those who save, and letting the prodigal go free.

I shall be happy to hear whether you agree with me in these opinions. At all events you have a right to add any notes you please, as from yourself. Believe me, my dear Sir

Very truly yours

J. S. MILL

I will write to Mr Nichol very soon;⁴ in the mean while, accept my thanks for the introduction.⁵

63. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

India House

29th November 1832

MY DEAR SIR,

Finding it impossible to recast the article,² or find any place at which the matter you require could be inserted without breaking the thread of the argument, I have thrown the whole into a note, which may be annexed at the end, or may, if you prefer it, form a Supplement to the article. But on the whole, I think it should rather be a note, as that will excuse the very general and summary mode in which the questions are disposed of.

I think the hints I have thrown out respecting the National Debt will at least afford a subject of reflexion to thinking men—I should like much to learn from you what is thought of them by any of the persons whom you consider as authorities on this class of subjects.

I am much gratified by what you say of the success of the Magazine; which deserves it so well that I am not surprised it should obtain it.

Believe me

My dear Sir

Most truly yours

J. S. MILL.

3. Page torn.

4. See Letter 65.

5. This postscript appears at the top of the first page.

* * * *

1. MS in New York Public Library.

2. See preceding letter, n. 2.

64. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House, 27th December 1832

MY DEAR CARLYLE

In your last letter,² received now upwards of a month, you said, "you will write soon again"—ill have I responded to this call; having been hindered therefrom by various occupations and thoughts, some of a pleasant, but more of a disagreeable kind, whereof the last alone are entitled to be received as any even the poorest excuse for this negligence. My conscience, however, now speaks to me in so reproachful a voice that I can no longer resist its commands.

During the interval you will have received my packet of books; of each and all of them save one I have spoken to you: that one is "The English in France"³ a sketchy kind of book, composed of essays & tales, all intended to throw light upon France, painting it & all it contains en beau, a view of the matter which is entitled to be attended to, were it only because of its rarity: there is also much truth in the book, though not much depth, and on the whole it is as worth your reading as any other book in that parcel. A propos of writings about France, that article in the last number of the Foreign Quarterly was not Buller's; his was on the reign of Louis 18th & has not yet appeared, it will doubtless appear in the next number along with your Diderot⁴ which I am very anxious to see. Cochrane⁵ seems to me much what you describe him; a man he seems too who has a great love of fairness, and is above all an enemy of extremes—and who proves himself an impartial arbitrator between conflicting opinions by letting each in its turn speak through his pages, in as softened a voice as may be, whereby in truth his Review the better fulfils its mission, by representing the more correctly the attitude which English minds of all parties and sorts have taken up towards foreign nations. All reviews are hotch-potches with no definite object or presiding principle—but this kind of review can perhaps be so with less incongruity and absurdity than any of the others: so that if you & the Right Hon. T. P. Courtenay⁶ appear side by side in it, we must not be shocked at the proximity.—As for myself, I have not written much

1. Addressed: Thos Carlyle Esq / care of Mess^{rs} Bell & Bradfute / Edinburgh. Postmarks: FREE / 27 DEC 27 / 1832, and DEC / 29 / 1832. Franked by J. A. Roebuck. MS at NLS. Carlyle's answer of Jan. 12, 1833, is in A. Carlyle, pp. 30–36.

2. Dated Nov. 19. Published in A. Carlyle, pp. 23–30.

3. The English in France. By the Author of "The English in Italy" [C. H. Phipps, Marquis of Normanby] (London, 1828).

4. See Letter 61, n. 23, 24.

5. John George Cochrane (1781–1852), editor of the Foreign Quarterly Review, 1827–38. v

6. Thomas Peregrine Courtenay (1782–1841), politician and pamphleteer. For identification of his contributions, see Eileen M. Curran, "The Foreign Quarterly Review, 1827–1846" (unpublished dissertation, Cornell University, 1958), p. 373.

since you last heard from me: except one or two articles in the Examiner, among which may be mentioned one on the French & English newspapers⁷ & one last Sunday on Corn Laws & Tithes,⁸ besides one not yet published, on Taxation:⁹ also an article which will appear in Tait's January number, on Currency & the National Debt,¹⁰ & a paper for Fox's January number.¹¹ This last attempts something much higher, and intrinsically more valuable, than all these writings on politics, but with far less success: it is not nearly so good of its kind, because I am not so well versed in the subject. It embodies some loose thoughts, which had long been floating in my mind, about Poetry and Art, but the result is not satisfactory to me and will probably be far less so to you—but you will tell me to what extent you think me wrong, or shallow. I wrote the paper from conviction (else it had never been written) but not from that strong conviction which forces to write: rather because I wished to write something for Fox, and thought there was a clearer field open for him in that direction than in the political one. This number of Fox shall be sent to you in the next parcel. The periodicals which I send you are given, you will recollect; not to be returned. I have also to send you, when I have done reading it, a printed copy which I have received of the trial of the St Simonians.¹² Of the speeches I have read Duveyrier's alone appears to me to have any other merit than that of a strong conviction. I have heard, but not from themselves, that Duveyrier and Eichthal have given up St Simonism. This as the newspapers say "needs confirmation," & if true, will excite in you as in me, great curiosity to know how it took place and what they are to be henceforth. I have been reading with considerable interest some numbers of the Revue Encyclopédique, which is conducted by a body of seceded St Simonians: I am on the whole much pleased with them: they have retained almost all the good which ever was in St Simonism, & are not become sceptics but rather prophets of a religion to come—they see that St Simon though a man far beyond his generation, was but a false Christ, and they appear to be expecting the true. Jules Lechevalier¹³ and Abel Transon¹⁴ have taken up with the system of M. Charles Fourier,¹⁵ a man who has been writing for many years large and obscure books shewing how the

7. "French and English Journals," Examiner, Dec. 2, 1832, pp. 772–73.

8. "On the Necessity of Uniting the Question of Corn Laws with that of Tithes," Examiner, Dec. 23, 1832, pp. 817–18.

9. "Necessity of Revising the Present System of Taxation," ibid., Jan. 13, 1833, pp. 19–20.

10. See Letter 62, n. 2.

11. "What is Poetry?" MR, VII (Jan., 1833), 60–70.

12. Probably Le Procès en Cours d'Assises, 27 et 28 août 1832 (Paris, 1832).

13. Jules Lechevalier (1800–1850), economist and journalist.

14. Abel Louis Etienne Transon (1805–1876), engineer and a leading Saint-Simonian.

15. François Marie Charles Fourier (1772–1837), founder of the socialist system which bears his name.

world is to be saved. From an account of part of his system given by Transon in an article in the Revue Encyclopédique,¹⁶ I gather that the moving force which is to change the world is to be "l'attraction passionnée," mankind are to be made to Love le travail by various contrivances, which are to end in making them masters and controllers of physical nature: the sea I believe is ultimately to consist not of salt water but lemonade; I understand this is no joke, but the serious persuasion of M. Fourier.—Tell me if you have yet seen Dumont's Mirabeau or Babbage's books;¹⁷ if not I will endeavour to put them also into the next parcel.—The books you sent were never received at Longman's; they were sent by Mr Napier to Black's: so that the fault lies either with the last-named bookseller or with the carriers of whatever description. Napier's son, who is here, has written to his father about it, & traced the matter thus far: if it can be traced further, it will be, so give yourself no trouble about it.

So the Elections are over. Almost all the candidates in whose success I took any personal interest, have succeeded. Among them are three men who, I expect, will do something: these are, Grote, Roebuck, & John Romilly: to these, if his inapplication will let him, we shall both be happy to add Charles Buller. All the rest will talk, & not do: nor will anything worth doing be really done for a while to come. One of the most likely doers among the young men, the only one among the official young men, has departed from us: poor Hyde Villiers.¹⁸ He was an earnest workman, who would have plied his trade of politics honestly, and if not with first rate talents, yet with such as well used had been sufficient to do much. Take him for all in all we shall not soon find his equal among that class of men.—I suspect that I shall have to dip my pen in politics oftener and deeper than in proportion to the value I attach to it compared with other things; for it is the only subject to which, just at present, anybody will listen; and now that my friends have buckled to that work I must not desert them, but give such help as lies in me. Fonblanque still labours on, in his unsatisfactory, yet not wholly unprofitable vocation. You will have seen that he has gained an accession of power, that is of circulation, by the purchase of a rival radical paper.¹⁹—Austin is in tolerably good spirits, lecturing to a very small but really select class, and getting daily a clearer insight into his subject, as well as into other subjects still more important. But of him you will have heard at full length, for two days ago I saw at his 16. "Doctrine d'Association de M. Charles Fourier," Revue encyclopédique, LIII (Feb., 1832), 271–300. See Letter 91. JSM's later and better-informed opinion of Fourier (see Principles of Political Economy, II, i, 4) was much more favourable.

17. See Letter 58, n. 18.

18. JSM published a brief eulogy of him in the Examiner, Dec. 9, 1832, p. 792.

19. The Ballot was incorporated with the Examiner, beginning with the number of Dec. 2, 1832.

house a letter to Mrs Carlyle from Mrs Austin, ready tolded up and sealed.—For various reasons I did not make use of your note to Leigh Hunt²⁰ as an introduction to him, though hereafter I shall be very happy to have another such opportunity: the note, however, went to him; the address (as I learnt at Moxon's)²¹ was correct. Does the Examiner now reach you regularly? You will see in it very soon a paper of Charles Buller's on certain Election matters²²—it will be either a letter or an article. His health I am sorry to say is still precarious—very slight causes are enough to derange it. I called on Glen a short time after my return from Cornwall, but found he had left his lodgings and gone into Scotland, where I suppose you have seen him. He must be back by this time, but whether to the same place I have not yet enquired, for which I have no excuse to make but the poor one I made for my delay in writing to you. I have seen, I believe, no one else in whom you take an interest. I shall send this letter to Messrs Bell & Bradfute,²³ as it is probable you will be at Edinburgh or on your way thither before this reaches you: do not punish my sins of omission by delaying to write to me, but write soon and at length. I trust you will soon hear from me again—I say I trust when if I really trusted in myself, I should say I am sure.

Yours ever faithfully

J. S. MILL

Kindest remembrances to Mrs Carlyle, who I hope still thinks of me sometimes.²⁴

20. James Henry Leigh Hunt (1784–1859), essayist and poet, friend of Keats, Shelley, and Byron.

21. Edward Moxon (1801–1858), publisher of some of the greatest nineteenth-century poets, including Wordsworth, Tennyson, and Browning.

22. "The Working of the Reform Act," Examiner, Jan. 6, 1833, pp. 4–5.

23. Well-known Edinburgh firm of booksellers.

24. Written in the margin of the last page.

65. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

India House,
16th January, 1833.

MY DEAR SIR,

I had fully resolved that of us two, you should not be the first to write; and here have I allowed a fortnight to elapse since receiving your letter before I have ever acknowledged the reception of it. This you would I am sure excuse if I could tell you in what manner my time and thoughts have been engrossed. From the time when I first saw your papers² in Tait's Magazine, I have been ambitious of the honour of your acquaintance, and now that I am privileged to communicate with you I am not disposed to let the privilege lapse from disuse. It has often struck me that one of the many causes which prevent those who cultivate moral and political truth from occupying the place and possessing the influence which properly belong to them as the instructors and leaders of mankind, is that they never consider themselves as other labourers do, to constitute a guild or fraternity, combining their exertions for certain common ends, and freely communicating to each other everything they possess which can be used to promote these ends. As to the particular subject which has made us two known to each other—political economy—there are so many talkers about it, and so few (you will I am sure agree with me), even among professed economists, who study it scientifically, that all who do, ought to know each other.

[. . .]³

I long to see the article which it was my luck to anticipate—that we should agree on such a point was to be expected, as it is evident we look at these subjects from the same station or Standpunkt, as the Germans call it.

Is there any chance of your coming to town? I fear there is little of my soon visiting your part of the world—though my father's birthplace is

1. Addressed: Rev. J. P. Nichol, Academy, Montrose. Published in part in Knight. The originals of these letters have not been located.

John Pringle Nichol (1804–1859), astronomer, as a young man was deeply interested in political economy; in 1833 James Mill and Nassau Senior thought well enough of his work therein to recommend him for the chair of political economy vacated by the death of J. B. Say at the Collège de France, Paris. See Letter 71.

2. These cannot now be identified with certainty.

3. Presumably a deletion by Knight.

very near Montrose,⁴ at the foot of the Grampians. I fear there are not many persons in your neighbourhood with whom you can profitably discuss these subjects, or who even take any interest in them. On selfish principles I ought to be glad of this, as it gives me a chance of oftener hearing from you. Pray write soon, if you have time, and believe me,

Most sincerely yours,

J. S. MILL.

66. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

[Jan. 23, 1833]

I shall probably send you, in time for your March number, a short review of an excellent book, the Producing Man's Companion, by Junius Redivivus²—whom I think the very best popular writer whom the enlightened radicals count in their ranks—though I like his personal articles in the Examiner less than the many admirable papers he has written in the True Sun, Mechanics Magazine & various other periodicals.

Believe me

Yours ever truly

J. S. MILL

67. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House
2d February 1833

MY DEAR CARLYLE

First let me dispatch the matters of business. Cochrane is apprised of your present residence: That Holcroft² is so you will have learnt before this by receiving the Examiner direct. Holcroft's address is 13 Bartlett's

4. At Northwater Bridge, where James Mill's father was a shoemaker.

* * * *

1. Addressed: William Tait Esq / Bookseller / Edinburgh. Franked by G. Grote. Postmarks: [???], 23 JA 23, 1833 and JAN / 25 / 1833. MS at NLS. No salutation or date; perhaps a fragment.

2. JSM's review did not appear until the June number. See Letter 60, n. 2.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq / Carlton Street / Stockbridge / Edinburgh. Postmarks: FREE / 4FE4 / 1833, and FEB / 6 / 1833. Franked by J. A. Roebuck. MS at NLS. In reply to Carlyle's letter of Jan. 12, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 30–36; answered by Carlyle, Feb. 22, ibid., pp. 37–41.

2. Carlyle had identified him as Thomas Holcroft, "A Son of the Dramatist [Thomas] Holcroft's, brother-in-law to a Mr. Badams a very old friend of mine." Thomas Holcroft, Jr. (d. 1852) was a London journalist (see Gentleman's Magazine, NS, XXXVII [April, 1852], 425).

Buildings, Holborn: as the people at the Adelphi, he says, well knew: Mr Badams's³ address is 8, Old Church Street, Paddington. Holcroft writes, speaking of you "I am sure he must have given me up as a careless & negligent person & unworthy of having any thought bestowed upon him, for to my shame be it said that I have written but once to him since he left London. I earnestly respect & love him and could have wished for more frequent interchange of ideas, but I really dread to expose myself to his critical lash as an unauthorized correspondent. When you write, ask him if he will let me know under his own hand and seal how he and his wife are, and also whether I may venture to send him a frank."—I ought to have apprised you sooner of his address and Mr Badams's; however, you know them now—the fault is not repaired but it is stopped.—You shall very soon receive another packet of books. Let me hear from you first, however, whether you have access to the books I am going to mention. There exists a very voluminous collection of Memoirs of the French Revolution.⁴ A considerable part of this I have, & among others two volumes of Mémoires sur les Prisons,⁵ chiefly the "personal narratives" of people who were in confinement during the epoch of "Terror": I never have read those two volumes, strange as it may seem, & know not exactly the worth of the contents—but I should think they could not fail to be interesting, and to answer your purpose in some degree. If you have not access to these two volumes where you are, I will send them. Next—have you the means of getting the Memoirs of Levasseur?⁶ He was one of the less noted members of the montagne party, & wrote his life or rather got it written very recently in order to justify that party—he is evidently a highly conscientious, well meaning man, with something of the spirit of an old Roman, and his book lets one into the aspect of that period as it presented itself to the honester minds among the actors, in a manner which has interested me deeply. Your friend Fraser lent it to me, and would, I am sure, allow me to forward it to you if you cannot get it at Edinburgh. You would learn more about Danton from this book than from any other I know—it is astonishing how little is known of such a man. Then, I have in the collection already mentioned the "Vieux Cordelier"⁷ of Camille Desmoulins, which I think would interest you. The Memoirs of Mme

3. Dr. John Badams (d. 1833), a Birmingham manufacturer who had been trained as a doctor. Carlyle had met him through Edward Irving in 1824 and had spent six weeks at his home in Birmingham that summer.

4. St. A. Berville and J. F. Barrière, Collection des mémoires relatifs à la révolution française (68 vols., Paris, 1820–28).

5. Paris, 1823.

6. Mémoires de René Levasseur (de la Sarthe) ex-conventionnel . . . (4 vols., Paris, 1829–31).

7. Le Vieux Cordelier, journal politique, rédigé en l'an II, par Camille Desmoulins . . . 1825. In Berville-Barrière Collection.

Roland⁸ you have, of course, read. I have several other memoirs of girondists but they are little more than long elegies.—Mirabeau, Danton, and Bonaparte are the only men who appear other than common in Thiers' pages:⁹ but there were other remarkable men besides those three: Robespierre especially, who strangely enough, has been spoken of by all parties as a mediocre man, & Thiers thinks him so: it was always a puzzle to me how a mediocre man could remain master of the field among so many competitors, until I read some of his speeches and then saw that he was by far the most skilful of the combatants in every sense of the word.—On the whole, however, it is wonderful how little can be traced of the private and social life of that period. There is positively much more of it in Thiers than in any other of the innumerable books on the revolution which I have read. There is more of it (as is often the case) in their professed fictions than in their histories: a novel by Picard which I have, entitled "Le Gil Blas de la Revolution"¹⁰ is worthy of some account in this respect, & I have been told that there are novels of Pigault Lebrun¹¹ which paint several periods of the revolution very vividly.—You have characterized Thiers' system of ethics most accurately.¹² I am afraid it is too just a specimen of the young French littérateurs, and that this is all they have made, ethically speaking, of their attempt to imitate the Germans in identifying themselves with the past. By dint of shifting their point of view to make it accord with that of whomsoever they are affecting to judge, coupled with their historical fatalism, they have arrived at the annihilation of all moral distinctions except success and not success.—The "Soirées de Neuilly"¹³ mentioned by that "English in France" man,¹⁴ I have, & admire it much as a literary work; it also paints, as I believe correctly, some of the aspects of French life under the restoration. But above all, to have a notion of French life as it is, you should get hold of the "Livre des cent et un".¹⁵ It professes to be a description of Paris under all its aspects; & as all the French writers of the day who are deemed fit to write in it, do so, it must be instructive even if the 101 have painted nothing but the state of their own minds. Then I have various St Simonian docu-

8. An edition was included in the Berville-Barrière Collection.

9. See Letter 61, n. 7.

10. L. B. Picard, Le Gil Blas de la révolution (5 vols., Paris, 1824).

11. G. C. A. Pigault-Le Brun (1753–1835), novelist and playwright.

12. Carlyle had commented on Thiers' ethics: "He will prove to you that the power to have done a thing almost (if not altogether) gave you the right to do it: every hero of his turns out to be perfectly justified in doing whatsoever—he has succeeded in doing" (A. Carlyle, p. 34).

13. [H. A. Cavé and A. Dittmer], Les Soirées de Neuilly, esquisses dramatiques et historiques, publiées par M. de Fongerey (Paris, 1827).

14. See Letter 64, n. 3.

15. Paris; ou le livre des cent-et-un (15 vols., Paris, 1831–34).

ments to send to you. The society is broken up, & a large portion including Duveyrier and d'Eichthal is at Naples: Duveyrier and Stéphane [Flachat?]¹⁶ are now editing a daily paper. I will send you Duveyr[ier's]¹⁷ letter to me on the subject, which is a very odd one. He professes not to have changed a single opinion, and yet he admits that his whole line of conduct is changed. Those of the St Simonians who retain their connexion with the Pere Suprême and with each other, have made themselves prolétaires and gone off in a body to Lyons to work on the canals and railroads. Enfantin & Michel Chevalier are in prison. Bazard, I think I told you, is dead. The writers in the Revue Encyclopédique have retained all or nearly all that was good in the doctrines of the St Simonians, & now content themselves with prophesying a new religion. Latterly some of them seem to be looking out for it in a strange enough quarter—the East—they think that as the East only partially known, has given us something so good as the Bible, when we know it perfectly it will give us something infinitely better. This seems to me a stranger delusion than even Fourier's.—Do you know anything of the writings of somebody who writes everywhere & on all subjects and signs Junius Redivivus?¹⁸ probably you only know what he has written in the Examiner, which are chiefly radical personalities and good for very little; but the man has great worth in him, & I should like to send to you various productions of his. He takes so much pains to conceal his name and properties, that he is probably some obscure person who thinks that the disclosure of his obscurity would diminish, not increase, the attention paid to his writings. You should know him however, as far as he can be known from his writings, for I am sure he would interest you more than most people would.—I know something of Miss Martineau¹⁹ personally: her books, some of them at least, deserve I think all the praise they have received: I suspect all the good in her, comes out in them. She is about thirty, bred a "Socinian liberal," and I believe substantially so still: narrow, and matter-of-fact I should say, in the bad sense; the best about her, being indefatigable industry and a ravenous thirst for knowledge & acquisition of all kinds, at least all intellectual kinds. Brougham²⁰ has been taking pains to attach her to his car, and has paid so many attentions to her that for the present he has spoiled her: she will, however I think, end by finding him out. She has, I find, the faculty of making herself

16. Writing barely legible. Probably Stéphane Mony [until 1832, Mony-Flachat] (1810–1884), engineer and politician.

17. Covered by seal.

18. See Letter 60.

19. Harriet Martineau (1802–1876), had leaped into instant fame in Feb., 1832, with the publication of the first tale of her Illustrations of Political Economy.

20. Henry Brougham, Baron Brougham and Vaux (1778–1868), then Lord Chancellor.

personally disliked, by means it would seem of inattention to Christ's percept "judge not, that ye be not judged."

I hoped to have found your Diderot in the pre[sent]²¹ Foreign Quarterly, but was disappointed. I myself have written little, published nothing except some matters on a property tax, which you will have seen in the Examiner.²² Meanwhile my time, though I can scarcely say it has been employed, has not been wasted; something either good or bad will come of it—let us hope the best.

I have not received those books yet—at all events the loss must be mine, not yours, as it could in no way have been averted by you—perhaps, though that is little to the purpose, it might by me, had I not delayed so long making any enquiry at Longman's. I have little news of anybody. The Austins are in their usual state—Austin lecturing to six or seven persons only, but those of a kind he likes. This strange Wittenagemote calling itself a reformed parliament is just meeting, & we are to see what it is to do: all that seems certain is, that it is to reform the Church—heaven bless the mark! where, I wonder, will they find a Church to reform.—Buller is by this time in town, but I have not seen him: did you recognize a letter of his in The Examiner respecting election petitions?²³ there will be another tomorrow on the private business of the House²⁴—good symptoms—he can work if he chuses, well, & I will hope that he will.

Write again soon, in spite of the slackness of my correspondence—I do not want any of those books²⁵ and shall not, for a long time to come—keep them therefore as long as you like or till a convenient opportunity offers for sending them. Commend me to Mrs Carlyle, and believe me

Ever faithfully yours,

J. S. MILL

I have been reading Bourrienne²⁶—it gives one a much more distinct idea of Napoleon than I had before: but I still cannot, with you, allow the one excellence strength of will, to outweigh the entire want of any virtuous purpose, and the willingness to employ any even the most paltry means.²⁷

21. Page torn.

22. "Necessity of Revising the Present System of Taxation," Examiner, Jan. 13, 1833, pp. 19–20; and "Errors and Truths on a Property Tax," ibid., Jan. 27, 1833, pp. 51–52.

23. See Letter 64, n. 22.

24. "Internal Reforms in the Commons," Examiner, Feb. 3, 1833, pp. 67–68.

25. See Letter 64, par. 2, and Carlyle's reply of Jan 12, 1833.

26. L. A. Fauvelet de Bourrienne, Mémoire . . . sur Napoléon (10 vols., Paris, 1829).

27. This paragraph is written at the side of the letter.

68. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

India House
28 February 1833

MY DEAR SIR

I send you a paper on Junius Redivivus,² for your Magazine, in case you think it worthy of insertion.

By the same opportunity I send a copy of a tract of mine on a topic of great immediate interest³—I add another copy which I will thank you to forward to Mr Nichol when you have an opportunity.

Many thanks for the trouble you took about the Professorship.⁴ Nobody in this country has been heard of whose claims are at all equal to those of Mr Nichol. When I have anything definite to communicate—I will write to that gentleman direct.

Believe me

My dear Sir

Ever sincerely yours

J. S. MILL

69. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

India House
Friday [March 1, 1833]

DEAR MR FOX

I will write a short paper for the next M.R. on Junius Redivivus.²

That article on Mehetabel Wesley³ is very painful—as it ought to be—but beautiful and valuable, beyond anything that I have read either in the M.R. or elsewhere for many, many months. It is a good number, altogether, though the first article⁴ is, I think, the weakest. You seem to me to over-

1. MS at LSE.

2. See Letter 60, n. 2.

3. His article, "Corporation and Church Property," Jurist, IV (Feb., 1833), 1–26, which was reprinted as a separate pamphlet by S. Sweet, Stevens and Son, and A. Maxwell, Oxford. A copy is in the library of Somerville College, Oxford.

4. See Letter 65, n. 1.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmarks: [???]4 / MR 1 / 1833 /, and Leadenhall St. MS at King's. Excerpts published in Garnett, pp. 104 and 114.

2. "Writings of Junius Redivivus," MR, VII (April, 1833), 262–70.

3. [W. J. Fox], "A Victim" [John Wesley's sister], MR, VII (March, 1833), 164–77.

4. "On the Factory System," MR, VII (March, 1833), 145–53. Of uncertain authorship, but possibly by Fox.

praise Leigh Hunt⁵—I say you, that is, I assume that you are the writer, partly for that reason—I think you often overpraise, & the cause is, the keen sense of enjoyment which all things give you, that have anything of good or beautiful in them. I have fallen under the same accusation but for an opposite reason—the best gave me so little enjoyment compared with what it should give, that I could not afford not to like, even things which were very imperfect indeed.

That at least is over—I have grown excessively fastidious now.

I got home by one o'clock the other night—thanks to an accidental meeting with a cab at the beginning of Islington.

Ever yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

70. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House, 9th March 1833.

MY DEAR CARLYLE

I ought to write oftener; though not exactly for the reason you jocularly give. I ought; and I would, if my letters were, or could be, better worth having: yet, even such as they are, not being altogether valueless to you, they shall become more frequent. Truly I do not wonder that you should desiderate more “heartiness” in my letters,² and should complain of being told my thoughts only, not my feelings; especially when, as is evident from your last letter, you stand more than usually in need of the consolation and encouragement of sympathy. But alas! when I give my thoughts, I give the best I have. You wonder at “the boundless capacity Man has of loving”—boundless indeed it is in some natures, immeasurable and inexhaustible: but I also wonder, judging from myself, at the limitedness and even narrowness of that capacity in others. That seems to me the only really insuperable calamity in life; the only one which is not conquerable by the power of a strong will. It seems the eternal barrier between man and man; the natural and impassable limit both to the happiness and to the

5. [W. J. Fox], “The Poetical Works of Leigh Hunt,” MR, VII (March, 1833), 178–84.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq. / 18 Carlton Street / Stockbridge / Edinburgh. Postmarks: FREE / 11 [??] 11 / 183[3], and MAR / H 13 A / 1833. Franked by E. Strutt. MS at NLS. Published, with minor errors, in Elliot, I, 37–42. In reply to Carlyle’s letter of Feb. 22, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 37–41; answered by Carlyle, March 21, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 42–45.

2. “Write to me, I pray you, with more and more heartiness; show me your feelings as well as your thoughts; and let us in all ways, while so much is permitted us, help one another as we can” (A. Carlyle, p. 37).

spiritual perfection of (I fear) a large majority of our race. But few, whose power of either giving or receiving good in any form through that channel, is so scanty as mine, are so painfully conscious of that scantiness as a want and an imperfection: and being thus conscious I am in a higher, though a less happy, state, than the self-satisfied many who have my wants without my power of appreciation. You speak of obstacles which exist for others, but not for me. There are many of Earth's noblest beings, with boundless capacity of love, whom the falseness and halfness which you speak of, have so hemmed round and so filled with distrust and fear that "they dare not love". But mine is a trustful nature, and I have an unshakeable faith in others though not in myself. So my case must be left to Nature, I fear: there is no mind-physician who can prescribe for me, not even you, who could help whosoever is helpable: I can do nothing for myself, and others can do nothing for me; all the advice which can be given, (and that is not easily taken) is, not to beat against the bars of my iron cage; it is hard to have no aspiration and no reverence but for an Ideal towards which striving is of no use: is there not something very pitiful in idle Hoping? but to be without Hope were worse?

You see it is cold comfort which I can give to any who need the greatest of comforts, sympathy in moments of dejection; I, who am so far from being in better mental health than yourself, that I need sympathy quite as much, with the added misfortune that if I had it, it could do me no good. When you knew me in London I was in circumstances favourable to your mistaking my character, and judging of it far too advantageously: it was a period of fallacious calm; grounded in an extravagant over-estimate of what I had succeeded in accomplishing for myself, and an unconscious self-flattery and self-worship. All that is at an end; which is a "progress" surely. I would not now take the greatest human felicity on such terms.

But this is enough for the present, in this strain; perhaps I may say more another time. Let me rather think of you, and what can be done to improve your environment. Your picture of Edinburgh is triste enough, and might serve, I fear, a fortiori, for all other provincial towns: there is an odour of literature and intellect about Edinburgh; at Glasgow, Liverpool, & the like, there is little else than the stench of Trade. London is better; far better; bad though even it be. There are here, in infinitesimal proportion indeed, but in absolute number more than a very few, actual believers some, whom I and even you could call true believers; to a very great extent, or entirely: among whom your thoughts would not fall like hand-grenades and put them to flight, but would at least be caught up and cherished, probably planted and reared into fruit. If you determine to leave Craigenputtock, there is surely no place so good as this; at least in the most important of all good things which locality can bring—kindred companionship. But you will have more things to consider, doubtless, that even that greatest of all, and you will not give that less than its proper weight.

I have no news to tell—the Reformed Parliament has not disappointed me any more than you; it is (as Miss Martineau, I understand, says of Brougham) so ridiculously like what I expected: but some of our Utilitarian Radicals are downcast enough, having deemed that the nation had in it more of wisdom and virtue than they now see it has, and that the vicious state of the representation kept this wisdom & virtue out of parliament. At least this good will come out of their disappointment, that they will no longer rely upon the infallibility of Constitution-mongering: they admit that we have as good a House of Commons as any mode of election would have given us, in the present state of cultivation of our people. They are digging a little nearer to the root of the evil now, though they have not got to the tap-root: read Roebuck's paper on National Education in Tait's last number;³ while you have the number in your hand, look at the first article⁴ in it, which is his also. He is narrow, still, but the other parliamentary radicals are narrower; all but our friend Charles [Buller], who has the finest understanding of the set, but wants strength of will. For myself, - I have well-nigh ceased to feel interested in politics. The time is not yet come for renovation, and the work of destruction goes on of itself without the aid of hands. If any man of clear Insight were in parliament just now, I hardly know what he could hope or aim at, unless to sow in some few of the more impressible minds, the seeds of a renovation which will not be yet, nor soon. The Bad, God wot, is tumbling down quite as fast as is safe where there is nothing of Good ready to be put into its place: what need of help in rolling the ball down hill? I was wont to think that the benches of the House of Commons might be as a pulpit, from whence a voice might make itself heard further and more widely than even from your pulpit and mine, the Periodical Press. But what sort of a voice must it be which could be heard through all this din: what were a single nightingale amidst the cawing and chattering of 657 rooks and magpies and jackdaws? Truly if there were not in the world two or three persons who seem placed here only to shew that all is not hollow and empty and insufficient, one would despair utterly. It is only the knowledge that such persons have an actual existence on the sa[me globe]⁵ with us, which keeps alive any interest in anything besides oneself, or even could I but believe that the good I see in a few comes note from any peculiarity of nature, but from the more perfect developement of capacities and powers common

3. "National Education," Tait's, II (March, 1833), 755–65.

4. "The Reformed Parliament," ibid., pp. 685–88.

5. Page torn. This is Elliot's reading.

to us all—and that the whole race were destined, at however remote a period either of individual or collective existence, to resemble the best specimen of it whom I have myself known—I verily believe, with that faith, I could be content to remain to eternity the solitary exception—

As for work, I have written perhaps of late not less than usual: but (except what has been already mentioned to you) nothing noteworthy that is likely to be soon published, except a notice⁶ for Tait of that book of Junius Redivivus, which same book you will soon receive in a parcel through Fraser; along with two articles of mine which I have formerly written to you about; sundry Memoirs of the French Revolution; the Trial of the St Simonians; & two letters which contain all I know of their subsequent proceedings & present state. (Those former books which mis-carried have been traced to this house, though I have not been able to recover them.) My parcel for you at present waits only for William Fraser's permission to send you his copy of Levasseur's Memoirs:⁷ a permission too late applied for, & which has not yet reached me.—Junius Redivivus will interest you, were it only for this, that he too is evidently a believer: a true believer I think it may be said, so far as his faith has yet reached. There is vigour, & a capacity of Insight in him; & if we may judge from the quantity he writes (the quality being never positively bad, & often very good), an altogether indomitable power of work.—I have seen nothing of your writing for a long time: Cochrane, I see, has not yet printed your paper on Diderot; when shall we see it? deeply interesting it is sure to be.—You know something of Fraser's Magazine: do you know, or can you guess, the authorship of a recent paper on Byron?⁸ it looks like the production of some half-fledged pupil of yours.

I have asked an instructed and clever Frenchman now here (one of the editors of the National) about the authenticity of those revolutionary portraits;⁹ to which I also am no stranger. He tells me that the genuineness of many of them is very doubtful, and without any hint from me he at once instanced Danton; some of whose relations he knows, and has seen an authentic portrait. Danton he says was ugly, but not ignoble, either in mind or feature, and the portrait in the Collection wrongs him grievously.

As you conjectured, I have lost sight of poor Glen: only because I am

6. See Letters 60, n. 2, and 66, n. 2.

7. See Letter 67, n. 6.

8. "Critical Illustrations of Lord Byron's Poetry," Fraser's, VII (March, 1833), 303–17. Carlyle subsequently guessed that it was by John A. Heraud (1799–1887), poet and dramatist. Miriam M. H. Thrall in Rebellious Fraser's (New York, 1934), p. 267, attributes the article to Heraud and comments on its Carlylian tone and ideas.

9. Carlyle had written: "A series of Revolution Portraits (engravings) which I dug out lately, gave me great satisfaction: under each head stands, in a miniature compartment, the main scene he figured in: it is a valuable work, if genuine" (A. Carlyle, p. 40).

utterly ignorant of his place of abode: at his old lodgings they believe him to be still in Scotland, with his brother and such other relatives as he may have. I therefore know not what to do with your letter: poor fellow, it would have gladdened him to the very bottom of his soul to have received it, or but to have known that you had written to him: you probably have better means of discovering his whereabouts in Scotland than I have.—Of our common friends or acquaintances I have little to tell. Austin is lecturing to fit audience though few, & will, I think, very probably go to live either at Berlin or at Bonn. He is still subject to his fits of illness, but they are I think less frequent. M^{rs} Austin is very much as usual: Falk is not yet through the press. The Bullers are all in London. I fear they have lost money by failures in India, not enough to impoverish them, but any loss falls heavily on people who live up to their income.

Yours ever faithfully,

J. S. MILL

I have heard nothing of Detrosier¹⁰ for a long time: I believe he has returned to Manchester with the intention of setting up a school, or else of continuing to go about lecturing on physical subjects as he did formerly with some success.¹¹

Make my best remembrances to Mrs Carlyle—I sometimes hear of her through Mrs. Austin. I do not say, “write soon” but I know you will.¹²

71. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

India House
30th March 1833

MY DEAR SIR

I will immediately write to Mr Nichol² myself. The appointment of the Professor³ is still, I understand, quite undetermined—Mr Nichol’s letter to you went to France, with the recommendation of my father and Mr Senior.⁴ I think he should decidedly make himself known in any way to Talleyrand,⁵ whose opinion would have very great weight.

10. Rowland Detrosier (1800?–1834), who had been secretary to the London Political Union, had been introduced to Carlyle by JSM the previous year.

11. This is written at the top of the first page.

12. Written in the margin of the last page.

* * * *

1. Addressed: William Tait Esq / Bookseller / Edinburgh. Postmarks: SUN / MR 31 / 1833, and FREE / A 2 / 1833. Franked by G. Grote. MS at NLS.

2. John Pringle Nichol.

3. See Letter 65. n. 1.

4. Nassau William Senior (1790–1864), economist.

5. Charles Maurice de Talleyrand-Périgord, Prince de Bénévent (1754–1838), French statesman, at this time ambassador to England.

With respect to the article on Junius Redivivus,⁶ I myself have not made up my mind on the question whether the situation of the working classes is on the whole better or worse than it was: I worded the article so as if possible not to commit the Magazine to a decided opinion, but I thought the testimony of a writer who evidently knows much of the working people, an article of evidence very fit to be received, though not sufficient to decide the question. Could not you let the article stand as it is, and express your dissent from the opinion of J.R. in an editorial note? If not, I should like to see the article again before it is printed; not from any fear that you should "spoil" the article, but because when anything is to be left out, a writer almost always thinks it necessary that something else should be put in.

As to the matter of fact in dispute I feel convinced from the great diversity of opinion among equally good observers, & from the result of the enquiries of the Poor Law Commission, that the truth varies very much in different parts of the kingdom & among different classes of workmen.

Are there any other parts of the article which you object to?

I am so little master of my own time, and so little capable moreover of writing with spirit on any subject in which I do not happen to be feeling an interest at the moment, that I do not ven[ture]⁷ to promise to write at any given time on a given subject. As for Currency, I think it is blowing over—with regard to France I am so thoroughly sick of the wretched aspect of affairs there that I have written little about them in the Examiner for a long time.

Believe me

Most truly yours

J. S. MILL.

72. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House 11th & 12th April 1833

MY DEAR CARLYLE

I write to you again a letter which I could wish were better worth having—really an apology for a letter: Your last, which you called so, deserved a better name. I would write, if it were only to thank you for having a better opinion of me than I have of myself. It is useless discussing which

6. See Letters 60, n. 2, and 66.

7. Page torn.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq / 4 Great King St / Edinburgh. Postmarks: FREE / 13 AP 13 / 1833, and APR / C 15 A / 1833. Franked by G. Grote. MS at NLS. Published in part in Elliot, I, 42–46. In reply to Carlyle's letter of March 21, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 42–45; answered by Carlyle, April 18, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 45–52.

is right; time will disclose that; though I do not think that my nature is one of the many things into which you see "some ten years farther" than I do. At all events I will not if I can help it give way to gloom and morbid despondency, of which I have had a large share in my short life, and to which I have been indebted for all the most valuable of such insight as I have into the most important matters, neither will this return of it be without similar fruits, as I hope and almost believe; nevertheless I will and must, though it leaves me little enough of energy, master it, or it will surely master me. Whenever it has come to me it has always lasted many months, and has gone off in most cases very gradually.

I have allowed myself to be paralysed more than I should, during the last month or two by these gloomy feelings, though I have had intervals of comparative brightness but they were short. I have therefore a poor account to render of work done. Tait has not yet published that paper on Junius Redivivus, but in the meantime I have written another on the same subject for Fox, (a much better one as I think), which has appeared in the April number,² and should have been sent if I had got it in time for Fraser's parcel: you shall have it by the first opportunity. With this exception I have written little, and read less: but this shall have an end.

You will have received long before this time by Fraser, two tracts of mine, of very different kinds, a political or rather ethico-political one on Church & Corporation Property,³ and the one I told you of, long ago, in Fox's periodical, on Poetry and Art.⁴ That last you promised me a careful examination and criticism of: I need it much; for I have a growing feeling that I have not got quite into the heart of that mystery, and I want you to shew me how. If you do not teach me you will do what is better, put me in the way of finding out. But I begin to see a not very far distant boundary to all I am qualified to accomplish in this particular line of speculation. I have sent you fewer books than I thought I should have had to send: three volumes of Levasseur, the fourth I have read but Fraser has not yet got it: I shall put it into some future parcel. Of the proportion in which this book is the work of Levasseur himself, and the proportion in which it is got up by Achille Roche⁵ the editor, one of the clever young political journalists of the day, I know no more than the book itself indicates, which does not seem to aim at concealing anything. The *Soirées de Neuilly*⁶ I have lent to somebody and omitted to take the precaution of making a memorandum, so I have not been able to get it for this parcel. I have sent two volumes of Memoirs on the Prisons which

2. See Letter 60, n. 2.

3. See Letter 68, n. 3.

4. See Letter 64, n. 11.

5. Achille Roche (1801-1834), revolutionary journalist. Roche was fined and jailed in 1830 for writing Vol. II by himself. See Letter 67, n. 6.

6. This and the next two titles are identified in the notes to Letter 67.

I have not read; & another volume in which the only thing of value is the Vieux Cordelier by Camille Desmoulins. The account of Robespierre & the others by Villatte⁷ is, I believe, worthy of no regard: he was one of the instruments of their tyranny, wrote this book after their fall in hopes of getting himself off, and I believe was guillotined after all. I have also sent the Trial of the St Simonians, a letter from d'Eichthal, & one from Duveyrier. I have lately heard again, both from, and of, the latter. He is now writing, in the Revue des deux Mondes, which he says is the first in France in the department of literature and art, & to which a number of their most celebrated writers, so far as any of their writers can be called celebrated, contribute. He writes to me "je me lance décidément dans le drame et le théâtre. Je fais une grande pièce, mais comme cela ne fait pas vivre pour le moment je cherche à gagner mon pain courant par quelques articles de journaux. J'ai quelque espoir d'avoir à la revue des deux mondes où j'ai beaucoup d'amis, la fonction de rédiger la chronique de quinzaine politique et théâtrale. En attendant je n'entends plus parler de d'Eichthal, qui est toujours en Italie." What I have heard of Duveyrier is, that being condemned to a year's imprisonment along with Enfantin & Chevalier, he applied through his relations for a pardon from the government, & obtained it, I suppose by declaring his intention of quitting the Father of Humanity. This I heard from a friend of his.—Such part of the St Simonians as remain faithful, or at least a large body of them headed by Barrault,⁸ have as I find from the French newspapers, set out for the East (Constantinople I was told was their first destination) pour chercher la femme libre. This seems greater madness than I had imputed to them. It is among the inmates of a harem that they expect to find a woman capable of laying down or as they say revealing the new moral law which is to regulate the relations between the sexes! it will be lucky for them if the search is attended with no disagreeable personal consequences to them except only that of not finding. These St Simonians have done so much good, that one regrets they were not capable of doing more. One of the seceding members writes of them in the Revue Encyclopédique that the St Simonian society is the only spiritual fruit of the Revolution of 1830: it is literally so: the excessive avidity & barrenness of the French mind has never been so strikingly displayed: there are such numbers of talkers & writers so full of noise and fury, keeping it up for years and years, and not one new thought, new to them I mean, has been struck out by all the collision since I first began attending to these matters, except only those which the St Simonians have set afloat among them. It is no wonder that minds so little productive

7. [Joachim Vilate], Causes secrètes de la révolution du 9 au 10 thermidor an II . . . (Paris, [2 vols., 1795]). Also in Berville-Barrière Collection, in Le Vieux Cordelier volume.

8. Emile Barrault.

as the French should run wild with an interesting truth when they have had it impressed upon them. St Simon really for a Frenchman was a great man. Enfantin likewise pourrait bien être aussi une espèce de grand homme as Voltaire said: the others were probably mere redactors and amplifiers of their thoughts, a talent as common in France, as the power of original thinking seems to be rare.—If you can get hold of it at Edinburgh, read a novel called Arthur Coningsby,⁹ by John Sterling: he is one of the men who would most interest you among those here; and his book will interest you; I should much like to know what it looks like when seen from your point of view.

Though I am sick of politics myself, I do not despair of improvement that way; you hear the cackle of the noisy geese who surround the building, I see a little of what is going on inside. I can perfectly sympathize in Bonaparte's contempt of the government of bavards: talking is one thing and doing another: but while every corner of the land has sent forth its noisy blockhead to talk, over head I am near enough to see the real men of work, and of head for work, who are quietly getting the working part of the machine into their hands, and will be masters of it as far as anybody can be with that meddling and ignorant assembly lawfully empowered to be their masters. After that let even one man come, who with honesty, & intellect to appreciate these working men, has the power of leading a mob, —no rare combination formerly, though a very rare one now; and there will be as good a government as there can be until there shall be a better people. It is a real satisfaction to me to know, & in some cases to have even been able somewhat to help on, several men who are now gaining by dint of real honesty & capacity a considerable and increasing influence though not an externally visible one, over the underworkings of our government. Some of them are as I am convinced, among the very fittest persons in the country to have that influence, fit or not as they may be in a greater or less degree for still higher purposes. A chacun selon sa capacité is far enough from being realised, to be sure, but the real deviation great as it is, falls far short of the apparent. It is much more in their apparent than in their real power that such men as Brougham and Althorp¹⁰ are exalted above their proper station.

Fonblanque you see goes on hammering at the politics of the day, for better for worse: I have seen less than usual of him lately. The public mind is coming round to him: the popularity of the Reform Ministry will soon be at as low an ebb as that of the poor Patriot King. How long is this dreary work to last, before a man appears? Mrs. Austin is at present laid up with the prevalent influenza, a sort of cold accompanied with fever: she and her husband seem to have almost resolved to emigrate into Germany this autumn. The Bullers are here: Charles has gone the Western Circuit this spring, and got some briefs: I have increasing hopes of his steadiness and power of work. I have little to tell of any one else whom you know here. Is De Quincey still in Edinburgh? do you ever see him? and what do you think of him?¹¹ Your criticism on Miss Martineau is, I think, just: she reduces the laissez faire system to absurdity as far as the principle goes, by merely carrying it out to all its consequences. In the meantime that principle like other negative ones has work to do yet, work, namely, of a destroying kind, & I am glad to think it has strength left to finish that, after which it must soon expire: peace be with its ashes when it does expire, for I doubt much if it will reach the resurrection. I wish you could see something I have written lately about Bentham & Benthamism¹²—but you can't.

9. Published anonymously (3 vols., London, 1833).

10. John Charles Spencer, Viscount Althorp and later third Earl Spencer (1782–1845), Whig political leader.

My best thanks to Mr^s Carlyle for the few words of kindness she added to your last letter—I keep so little note of time that I know not whether I have redeemed my promise of writing after a less interval than usual—but you will write soon.—

Yours ever faithfully

J. S. MILL

I should have availed myself of the opportunity you afforded me to make acquaintance with Leigh Hunt, did I not find it absolutely necessary, if I mean either to work or to enjoy society, to restrict rather than to extend the number of my acquaintance. He is worth knowing, and a time may come for that among other things.—Have you seen Archibald Alison's History of the French Revolution?¹³ If you have, just tell me whether it is worth reading, or reviewing—I suppose it is wrong, when one has taken the trouble to accumulate knowledge on a subject, not to work it up if one can into some shape useful to others—and if I am to write about the F.R. it may as well be while my recollections of the original authorities are fresh.¹⁴

J.S.M.

11. Thomas De Quincey (1785–1859), author of The Confessions of an English Opium Eater. In his reply of April 18 Carlyle described De Quincey as “bankrupt in purse, and as nearly as possible in mind. . . . one of the most irreclaimable Tories now extant” (in A. Carlyle, p. 48). Years later JSM reviewed favourably De Quincey's Logic of Political Economy in WR, XLIII (June, 1845), 318–31.

12. “Remarks on Bentham's Philosophy,” published anonymously as an Appendix in E. L. Bulwer's England and the English (Paris, 1833), pp. 468–89. See Letter 82.

13. Sir Archibald Alison, History of Europe during the French Revolution (10 vols., Edinburgh, 1833–42). JSM criticized the first two volumes severely in MR, VII (July–Aug., 1833) 507–11, 513–16. The second instalment of the review he reprinted in Dissertations, I, 82–88.

14. This postscript is written at the top of the first page.

73. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹India House 18th May 1833

MY DEAR CARLYLE

By this time you are again in your wilds,² and have had time to feel yourselves at home and settled there, and you are expecting a letter from me—and I have two to acknowledge and if so might be to repay. I have many things to say, too; at least they seem many before I begin to say them; they will seem few before I have done.—First, then, I have read your paper on Diderot.³ Of the man, and of his works and of his cotemporaries, so far as I think at all, I think very much as you do: yet I have found more to differ from in that article of yours than in anything of your writing I commonly do. The subject seems to have carried you, and me as your reader, over a range of topics on which there has always been a considerable extent of undiscussed and unsifted divergence of opinion (pardon this galimatias of mixed metaphors) between us two; on some of which too I sometimes think that the distance has rather widened than narrowed of late. That may be my loss, and my fault; at all events it seems to me that there has been on my part something like a want of courage in avoiding, or touching only perfunctorily, with you, points on which I thought it likely that we should differ. That was a kind of reaction from the dogmatic disputatiousness of my former narrow and mechanical state. I have not any great notion of the advantage of what the “free discussion” men, call the “collision of opinions,” it being my creed that Truth is sown and germinates in the mind itself, and is not to be struck out suddenly like fire from a flint by knocking another hard body against it: so I accustomed myself to learn by inducing others to deliver their thoughts, and to teach by scattering my own, and I eschewed occasions of controversy (except occasionally with some of my old Utilitarian associates). I still think I was right in the main, but I have carried both my doctrine and my practice much too far: and this I know by one of its consequences which I suppose would be an agreeable one to most men, viz. that most of those whom I at all esteem and respect, though they may know that I do not agree with them wholly, yet, I am afraid, think, each in their several ways, that I am considerably nearer to agreeing with them than I actually am. In short, I know that I have been wrong, by finding myself seated in the Gig⁴ much more firmly than I have any business as an honest man to be. So you see, I am only about to have in all its fullness, that sincerity of speech for which you give me credit. I only had it thus far hitherto, that all I have ever spoken, by word of mouth or in writing, I have firmly believed, and have spoken it solely because it was my belief. Yet even that, in these days, was much, but not enough, seeing that it depends upon my own will to make it more. —The result of all which is that with you as well as with several others very unlike you, there will probably be a more frequent and free communication of dissent than has hitherto been, even though the consequence should be to be lowered in your opinion; that indeed if it were to be the result would be conclusive proof that I have been acting wrong hitherto, because it would shew that for being thought so highly of I had been partly indebted to not being thoroughly known—which I am sure is the case oftener than I like to think of.

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtock / Dumfries / N.B. Postmarks: FREE / 18 MY 18 / 1833, and DUMFRIES / 20 MAY 1833. Franked by G. Grote. MS at NLS. Published, with minor errors and omissions, in Elliot, I, 47–51. In reply to Carlyle's letters of April 18 and May 1, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 45–54; answered by Carlyle, June 13, 1833, A. Carlyle, 54–60.

2. The Carlyles had returned from Edinburgh to Craigenputtock in early May.

3. See Letter 61, n. 23.

You see there will be so much the more to talk over when we meet: and that will be this summer, unless, which is always possible, I should not be in a state of mind in which meeting with any one is profitable or delightful to me. I believe I am the least helpable of mortals—I have always found that when I am in any difficulty or perplexity of a spiritual kind I must struggle out of it by myself. I believe, if I could, whenever anything is spiritually wrong with me I should shut myself up from the human race, and not see face of man until I had got firm footing again on some solid basis of conviction, and could turn what comes into me from others into wholesome nutriment. I am often in a state almost of scepticism, and have no theory of Human Life at all, or seem to have conflicting theories, or a theory which does not amount to a Belief. This is only a recent state, and as I well know, a passing one, and my convictions will be firmer and the result of a larger experience when I emerge from this state, than before: but I have never found any advantage in communion with others while my own mind was unsettled at its foundations, and if I am not much mended when my vacation-time comes round, I will rather postpone a meeting with you until I am.

I have neither written nor read much since I last wrote to you, except one or two trifling things in the Examiner: including however one of a somewhat more weighty kind (though not much) which you will see in a week or two probably in that paper, under my old signature A.B.⁵ I think I shall write more now, because I begin to see some things a little clearer, though many things which I once thought I understood—I now believe cannot be known with true Insight but by means of faculties which cannot be acquired and which to me have not been given, save in most scanty measure. Alison's book which I asked you about, I have procured and read: the man is quite inconceivably stupid and twaddling, I think beyond anybody who has attempted to write elaborately on the subject. He has no research; the references with which he loads his margin are chiefly to compilations. I could write something about him or rather about his subject; but I could employ myself better unless there were some widely-circulated periodical that would publish it:⁶ the Edinburgh Review perhaps would, were it not that I should wish to shew up Macaulay's ignorance of the subject and assumption of knowledge, as shewn in that very review.⁷

4. One of Carlyle's favourite symbols for conventional respectability. At the trial of John Thurtell in 1824 a witness testified that he had thought the accused murderer respectable because he kept a gig.

5. No such article seems to have appeared in the Examiner from May to July.

The long-missing parcel of books has at length turned up, and I have received intimation that the second is at Longman's. I did not mean you to return those Repositories, but they are not, to you, worth my sending back again. Keep all I send you henceforth. On learning that my parcel was not in time for Fraser's monthly packet, (which I thought I had taken care that it should be) I sent two more numbers of the Repository to be added to it, in one of which is the article I told you of, concerning Junius Redivivus. The passage you saw quoted about Books and Men, was from that; so there is not evidence therein of "another mystic"; so much the worse.⁸ I was much interested by learning that your recent thoughts have been so nearly of the same kind; tell me what you have thought since, especially since you have thought of the question practically, as altering your own future choice of a mode of activity. The difficulty of comparing two magnitudes and distinguishing which is greatest, is as we all know, vastly enhanced when the magnitudes themselves are of almost infinitesimal smallness, and that unhappily seems to be the case at present with the portion of good, that one can see clearly a prospect of achieving in any course that one can chuse. Yet it seems to me that if one had a proper stage and proper tools, more is to be accomplished just now by the doer of the deed than by the sayer of the word—words are so little listened to now but when they are the prelude or the accompaniment to some deed; my word again is partly intelligible to many more persons than yours is, because mine is presented in the logical and mechanical form which partakes most of this age and country, yours in the artistical and poetical (at least in one sense of those words though not the sense I have been recently giving them) which finds least entrance into any minds now, except when it comes before them as mere dilettantism and pretends not to make any serious call upon them

6. See preceding letter, n. 13.

7. Macaulay's review of Dumont's Recollections of Mirabeau in ER, LV (July, 1832), 552–76.

8. Carlyle had written: "Yesterday in some newspaper I saw a sentence quoted from the Monthly Repository about Books and Men, which was curiously emblematic of my own late thoughts. If it was not you that wrote it (which I fear) then there must be another Mystic in England, whose acquaintance I should gladly make." (A. Carlyle, p. 53.)

to change their lives. But then, what career is open to the doer, if either in your position or in mine? write to me what has been passing in you on this matter, whether of a general kind or as affecting yourself individually.

I am sure I have twenty other things to say, but cannot think of them at this instant; I shall write again the sooner. Let me ask you this one question; Have you seen the book published by the Poor Law Commissioners?⁹ If you have not, let me send it to you—often you have complained how little of the state of a people is to be learnt from books; much is to be learned of it from that book, both as to their physical and their spiritual state. The result is altogether appalling to the dilettanti, and the giggers, and the ignorant and timid in high stations; to me it has been, & will be I think to you, rather consoling, because we knew the thing to be unspeakably bad, but this I think shews that it may be considerably mended with a considerably less amount of intellect, courage, and virtue in the higher classes, than had hitherto appeared to me to be necessary. Any way the book cannot fail to interest you, because any authentic information as to any human thing is interesting to you. I regard this enquiry with satisfaction under another aspect too; that it has been more honestly and more ably performed than anything which has been done under the authority of Govt. since I remember: and has, in consequence, been the means of getting some of the best men I know, for such purposes, put into other work of the same kind, and decidedly embarked in the same career. You will find among them my friend John Wilson whom you have seen; he is now Secretary to the Factory Commission. Chadwick also, the ablest of them all, may be said to be at the head of that Commission.

I know not of any news to tell. I have seen little of Fonblanque lately. The Austins are still bent upon going to live in Germany after the conclusion of his present course of Lectures. At the Literary Union I can learn no more of Glen than I knew before. Kindest remembrances to Mrs. Carlyle.¹⁰

Charles Buller is well, and in spirits, and increasingly disposed to work; he will not be lost, it were pity he should: his career will be politics I think, not the best career, far from that, but he will I now think, demean himself therein like a true man: his superiority to all those people is even now, little as he has yet done, beginning to be felt, and he is gaining influence which will enable him to utter such truth as is in him with some certainty of being listened to—he is pure-minded and not a self-seeker, I am sure of that.¹¹

9. Extracts from the Information Received by His Majesty's Commissioners as to the Administration and Operation of the Poor Laws (London, 1833).

10. JSM's signature is not to be seen on this letter.

11. This paragraph is written at the top of the first page.

74. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

India House
[18] May 1833

DEAR MR FOX

If there are any rumours that I was writing anything for the M.R. of this month, I am sorry I cannot confirm them. I have abundance of vague intentions of writing for you, but I have been very idle of late, and in fact never have been in a state more unfit for work; from various causes, the chief of which is, I think, a growing want of interest in all the subjects which I understand, and a growing sense of incapacity ever to have real knowledge of or insight into the subjects in which alone I shall ever again feel a strong interest. I have written nothing lately but a short article on that "Pauline",² which will not, I believe, be too long for the Examiner, and if so, will probably appear there.³ That I have written chiefly because you wished it.⁴ I fear there would scarcely be time to write anything which you would care for, now, this month, but if there is any subject within my range, on which you wish to have two or three pages only, tell me so and I will try what I can do.

I feel so unequal to any of the higher moral and aesthetic subjects, that because I would rather write something than nothing, I have had thoughts of offering you a few pages on a stupid book lately published by a man named Alison,⁵ and pretending to be a history of the French Revolution. I am sick of that subject, but I could write something on it which perhaps would be of more use to the M.R. than something better would be—your having got over the "Unitarian storm"⁶ with so little damage to the vessel is a real victory.

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Dated 19 May but postmarked 7 NIGHT 7 / MY 18, and CORNHILL. MS at King's. Largely published in Garnett, pp. 103–4, 110.

2. [Robert Browning], Pauline; a Fragment of a Confession (London, 1833).

3. The Examiner would have none of it, and an enlarged version of it for Tait's was forestalled by a contemptuous brief notice (see Letter 83). JSM's liberally annotated review copy with a summary criticism written in the flyleaves, which Browning read on Oct. 30, 1833, is now in the Forster Collection of the Victoria and Albert Museum. Hayek, pp. 43–44, prints the criticism. It is commonly thought to have had crucial influence in turning Browning away from "confessional" to dramatic poetry. See W. C. DeVane, A Browning Handbook (2nd ed., New York, 1955), pp. 45–47.

4. Fox had become interested in Browning through his protégés Eliza and Sarah Flower, friends of the young poet from childhood. He reviewed both of Browning's first two publications enthusiastically. See Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent, pp. 191–92, 308–13.

5. Archibald (later Sir Archibald) Alison (1792–1867), Tory historian. See Letters 72 and 73.

6. Evidently referring to the protest of orthodox Unitarians over the changes Fox was making in the Monthly Repository, until 1832 the official Unitarian organ. In

I knew not that you were to be in K.T.⁷ on Wednesday, and I seldom go there without some special reasons on that day of the week, for as it cannot be right in present circumstances to be there every evening, none costs so little to give up as that in which there is a much shorter time and only in the presence of others. Had I known of your going I would have gone—as it is, I must take my compensation at Clapton—as I will very soon.

I did know the neighbourhood of Limpsfield—part of it at least—in my childhood, and have walked to it and about it since, but am not familiar with it. I do not know the particular walk you allude to, though your description enables me to conceive it almost as if I knew it. I mean to renew my acquaintance with Limpsfield, and cultivate it, and perfect it—that seems to me the only place on earth where it is possible to be happy—although it is you who have been there, and not I.—should I say although? and not rather because?

Does the Political Cyclopædia⁸ plan go on thrivingly? where in heaven and earth are you to find writers? It is very easy to find people who can write ill, but very difficult to collect together even one or two who can write well, especially when the purpose is didactic, not controversial.

Ever yours

J. S. MILL.

75. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

India House
Monday
[May 20, 1833]

DEAR MR FOX

I am obliged to write in great haste, so I will only say this that I will write something on Alison² but that will be too late for this number—and that I will be with you at Clapton as soon as I am allowed by being off duty at

April, 1833. the Rev. Lant Carpenter of Bristol wrote to Fox protesting against the changes, but chiefly against the unorthodox views being advanced in the magazine on marriage and divorce. See Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent, pp. 255–57.

7. Kent Terrace, home of Mrs. John Taylor, with whom by this time JSM was deeply involved.

8. No such work was published. This may have been a project of the unsuccessful Society for the Diffusion of Moral and Political Knowledge with which Fox was associated (see Letter 79, n. 7).

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmark: 7 NIGHT / MY 20 / 1833. MS at LSE.

2. See Letter 72, n. 13.

Kensington where my father whose sight is disabled for the present by inflammation, has need of me to read to him. He may have recovered by Wednesday, but at any rate I cannot dine with you for I shall not get away from this place early enough for that. Au reste I will come to you in a day or two whether he has recovered or not.

Yours ever

J. S. MILL

76. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

I.H. [India House]

Wednesday

[June, 1833]

MY DEAR MR FOX

It is really not my fault that the French Revolution² is not yet completed; you shall have it, I think I may say, in two days at most. It will be a poor thing though—

As for me, I am going to K.T. [Kent Terrace] today, despite its being Wednesday. However meet we must, and soon too.

W.A.³ is wrong, as Fonblanque was. I thought so from the first, & as soon as I found others thought differently, I made the matter sure by enquiry at the Colonial Office, from the highest authority (nearly) namely the head of the West Indies Department there.⁴ He tells me (as I expected) that the slave is to pay nothing directly or indirectly towards his ransom. He is to be free $\frac{1}{4}$ th now, & entirely in twelve years; & is not to be required to work for his master (or to work at all) during the $\frac{1}{4}$ th nor is his master to be required to give him employment nor to pay him any rate of wages. So all commentary on the manifold absurdities & impossibilities of that part of the plan is useless now when it is abandoned.

I wrote a notice of "Pauline" for the Examiner which could not be inserted, & I am to alter & enlarge it for Tait.⁵

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / Upper Clapton. MS at King's. The date is established by the reference to JSM's review of Alison.

2. See Letter 72, n. 13.

3. Probably William Bridges Adams ("Junius Redivivus"), whose article "On the Ministerial Plan for the Abolition of Negro Slavery," appeared in MR, VII (July, 1833), 453–74.

4. Probably Henry Taylor (see Letter 51), though JSM also knew James Stephen, then counsel to the Colonial Office, later Under-Secretary for Colonies, who prepared the bill for abolishing the slave trade, 1833. See also Letter 80, n. 2.

5. See Letter 74, n. 2 and 3.

77. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

India House

July 4, 1833

MY DEAR MR FOX

I am afraid I shall altogether forfeit all character with you for knowing my own mind or for telling it, by so constantly talking about going to see you, and never doing it. So I will not talk about it any more, but will do it all the sooner; & in the mean time I write to say how happy I shall be to bear my testimony to the Cause,² by maintaining it in the M.R. in the manner you propose, against the threatened attack. Of all propositions which could have been made to me for writing anything either in the M.R. or elsewhere, that is what I should like best—because it is the subject I am most interested in, and to be treated in the manner in which I think myself most equal to treating it. I have always done more justice to a subject when I have treated it controversially than when I have attempted a systematic exposition. I should not do for the pulpit, for I am always cold when I “have all the palaver to myself”: and besides I always find most to say when I do not feel under an obligation to say all that can be said.

Pray let me know when I am to begin, that is, let me have the paper I am to reply to, as early as may be.

Yours ever faithfully

J. S. MILL

I think I have found out Pel Verjuice,³ but I do not want to be told who he is—I like the new number of the M.R. very much, except the article on the education of women⁴—

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmarks: 8 MORN [??] / JY [??], and 7 NIGHT 7 / JY [??] / 1833. MS at King's. Published in part in Garnett, pp. 104–5.

2. “Cause” against the existing system of taxation. An article, “Complaints & Proposals regarding Taxation,” in the Edinburgh Review, complained of the gross injustice of having progressive house and window taxes. JSM rejected the claim of injustice in his “On the Defence of the House and Window Tax in the Edinburgh Review,” MR, VII (Aug., 1833), 575–82.

3. The pseudonym of Charles Reece Pemberton (1790–1840), a frequent contributor to the Monthly Repository, which was at this time running serially his Autobiography of Pel. Verjuice. See Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent, pp. 345–48, 420–21.

4. “On Female Education & Occupations,” MR, VII (July, 1833), 489–98. The author has not been identified.

78. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹[London,] 5th July 1833.

MY DEAR CARLYLE

I wrote a short letter to you intending to send it by your brother² when he went to Craigenputtoch; but he did not find time to call on me again and I having very foolishly mislaid his address, did not find out his place of abode till some hours after he had left town. As the letter was very short and had little in it, I cancelled it and determined to write a longer and better; which however I have not set about till now. In the meantime I have received your letter, which was welcome on many accounts: on none more than because it recognises in express words, what has always been tacitly recognised but seldom spoken or written about by either of us, the negative part of the relation between us—the fact that we still differ in many of our opinions, perhaps as you say (though of this I am not sure) throughout the range of a “half-universe.” I certainly shall not hesitate to shew you “the length and breadth of my dissent.” But the truth is, I had persuaded myself for a long time that the difference was next to nothing; was such as counted for little in my estimation at least, being rather in some few of our speculative premises than in any of our practical conclusions. When I came to review my opinions and ask myself after a considerable period of fresh thought and fresh experience, the deliberate question, which at some periods assumes a more serious and solemn aspect than at others, what I believed? what were my convictions? I found that they were, and for the present could not but be, more materially divergent from yours than I had for a time believed. As soon as I felt quite sure of this, I told you so; and though I wrote as if in a sceptical and unsettled state of mind, the very fact that I wrote at all about it proved that I had come into a more settled state. I think that I have obtained something like a firm footing, and additional rather than new light; I can hardly say that I have changed any of my opinions, but I seem to myself to know more, from increased observation of other people, and increased experience of my own feelings. All which is thus acquired must be clear gain; it is increased knowledge of the only valuable kind, knowledge of Realities; and it must be for want of intellect or for want of will if with additional ground to build upon, I cannot raise my edifice of Thought to a greater height and so look round and see more of Truth than I could see before. But of all these things we shall both write and speak hereafter. Concerning my journey to Craigenputtoch all I can at present say is that if I go not thither I shall go nowhere else. However it will not, at all events be in August, for in that month my father will be absent, and it is inconvenient for both of us to be away from the India House at the same time. It cannot be till he return.—I had the pleasure of an hour's conversation with Dr. Carlyle on his passing through London, and was glad to learn that he is to be an inmate of Craigenputtoch all this summer and autumn.—My occupations for some time back have been rather internal than external; I have not been working much, but much has been working in me. I have written little, partly because I was better employed in obtaining whereof to write, than in writing, partly also because of press of business at the India House, and of certain temporary domestic occupations in my father's house. I have completed scarcely anything but a poor, flimsy, short paper on that book of Alison's, which I undertook in an evil hour, when the subject was as remote as possible from those which were occupying my thoughts and feelings at the time; and which I accordingly performed exceedingly ill, and was obliged to cancel the part which had cost me most labour. What is left, (it is not worth your perusal) will appear in the Monthly Repository: short as the whole is, it has been divided into two parts, of which one has appeared: it had been better to reserve the whole for another number. I shall in future never write on any subject which my mind is not full of when I begin to write; unless the occasion is such that it is better the thing were ill done than not at all, that being the alternative.—What you say of that paper of mine on Poetry and Art³ is exactly what I think respecting it myself. I do not think it contains anything erroneous, but I feel that it is far from going to the bottom of the subject, or even very deep into it; I think I see somewhat further into it now, and shall perhaps understand it in time. I think I mentioned to you that I have carried the investigation (rightly or wrongly as it may be) one step farther in a paper (being a review of a new poem) which I wrote for the Examiner: it proved too long for Fonblanque, and it is to appear in Tait,⁴ after such additions and alterations as I see it absolutely requires, and which I have not yet found time to give it. You say, you wish that you could help me in this matter; you can, and do, help me in all such matters, not by logical definition, which as I think I have said or written before, I agree with you in thinking not to be your peculiar walk of usefulness; but in suggesting deep and pregnant thoughts which might never have occurred to me, but which I am quite able when I have them to subject to all needful logical manipulation. This brings to my mind that I have never explained what I meant when writing once before in this strain I called you a Poet

1. Addressed: Tho^s. Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtoch / Dumfries. Postmarks: FREE / 6 JY 6 / 1833, and DUMFRIES / 8 JL 1833. Franked by G. Grote. MS at NLS. Published, with some omissions, in Elliot, I, 52–56. In reply to Carlyle's of June 13, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 54–60; answered by Carlyle, July 18, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 60–64.

2. Dr. John Carlyle.

3. See Letter 64, n. 11.

4. The ill-fated review of Browning's Pauline. See Letter 74.

and Artist. I conceive that most of the highest truths, are, to persons endowed by nature in certain ways which I think I could state, intuitive; that is, they need neither explanation nor proof, but if not known before, are assented to as soon as stated. Now it appears to me that the poet or artist is conversant chiefly with such truths and that his office in respect to truth is to declare them, and to make them impressive. This, however, supposes that the reader, hearer, or spectator is a person of the kind to whom those truths are intuitive. Such will of course receive them at once, and will lay them to heart in proportion to the impressiveness with which the artist delivers and embodies them. But the other and more numerous kind of people will consider them as nothing but dreaming or madness: and the more so, certainly, the more powerful the artist, as an artist: because the means which are good for rendering the truth impressive to those who know it, are not the same and are often absolutely incompatible with those which render it intelligible to those who know it not. Now this last I think is the proper office of the logician or I might say the metaphysician, in truth he must be both. The same person may be poet and logician, but he cannot be both in the same composition: and as heroes have been frustrated of glory "carent quia vate sacro," so I think the vates himself has often been misunderstood and successfully cried down for want of a Logician in Ordinary, to supply a logical commentary on his intuitive truths. The artist's is the highest part, for by him alone is real knowledge of such truths conveyed: but it is possible to convince him who never could know the intuitive truths, that they are not inconsistent with anything he does know; that they are even very probable, and that he may have faith in them when higher natures than his own affirm that they are truths. He may then build on them and act on them, or at least act nothing contradictory to them. Now this humbler part is, I think, that which is most suitable to my faculties, as a man of speculation. I am not in the least a poet, in any sense; but I can do homage to poetry. I can to a very considerable extent feel it and understand it, and can make others who are my inferiors understand it in proportion to the measure of their capacity. I believe that such a person is more wanted than even the poet himself; that there are more persons living who approximate to the latter character than to the former. I do not think myself at all fit for the one; I do for the other; your walk I conceive to be the higher. Now one thing not useless to do would be to exemplify this difference by enlarging in my logical fashion upon the difference itself: to make those who are not poets, understand that poetry is higher than Logic, and that the union of the two is Philosophy—I shall write out my thoughts more at length somewhere, and somewhen, probably soon. Yours faithfully,

J. S. MILL

I am so far from seeing any intolerance in your dislike of Speculation, unless it be either of the highest kind, or interesting for the sake of its interesting author, that I am exactly in the same case. I shall attend to this in making up my parcels for you hereafter. I have Madame Roland's memoirs and will send them with the Poor-Law book and what else of interesting I can get together.—What I said about “infinitesimal smallness” did not refer to the work itself but to the effect—no doubt in another sense, all who do all they can, do equally, and that infinitely. But when we are to chuse what we shall do, we must compare the results, and the difficulty is how to compare things infinitely small.⁵ Tell me what you think about this, for it will perhaps lead to the root of some of the chief differences of opinion between us—⁶

79. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

India House,
10th July, 1833.

MY DEAR SIR,

Every letter I write to you begins with apologies for not writing sooner, and certainly not before they are due; though if “good intentions” might suffice (which they never can), I have been intending to write any time for the last four or five weeks. The first thing I have to say is that I fear there is no chance of the French Professorship.² Bowring has returned, I have seen him, and he says that the choice of a professor has been retarded by the impossibility of an agreement between the body who chuse and the ministry who confirm. “De Broglie and Guizot,” he says in a note to me, “won’t appoint Comte”³ (he married one of Say’s daughters, you may know him as the author of the Censeur Européen and a work on Legislation), “and the professors and members of the Institute won’t appoint anybody else, and the matter rests there. Rossi”⁴ (the friend of Dumont,⁵ professor of droit public or something of the kind at Geneva) “has been sent for to Paris and is arrived; but it is doubtful whether he will be put forward by the Ministry. Comte seems determined not to give way.” I do

5. See Letter 73 and Carlyle’s reply (in A. Carlyle, p. 60).

6. This postscript is written at the top of the first page.

* * * *

1. Published by Knight, pp. 663–65. MS not located.

2. See Letter 65, n. 1.

3. Charles Comte.

4. Comte Pellegrino Rossi (1787–1848), economist and statesman. He was elected to the chair of political economy at the Collège de France in Aug., 1833.

5. Pierre Etienne Dumont (1759–1829), Swiss publicist and jurist, translator and editor of Bentham.

not think Comte the fit man—the most that can be said is that he will not do harm or discredit the science; but he is not profound in it. He is an excellent man, however, and the new Academy of Moral and Political Science in the Institute have recently shown some spirit by choosing him their perpetual secretary, contrary to the wishes of the Government, who oppose him because he is against them in politics. Their first idea of appointing an English economist was much better, but, perhaps, they would have found it difficult where the candidate had not established a high European reputation, to make out such a case as would justify in the eyes of Frenchmen the preference of a foreigner, however highly qualified, over “native talent,” for it is not with us in political economy as it has long been with Italy in music—there is not a prejudice in our favour—therefore there must be a natural prejudice against us.

What you say in your last on the extreme desirableness of banding together the English Gironde is perfectly just and has been often thought of by almost all the leading philosophic reformers here, never more than lately; but it never was brought to any practical result nor, I fear, will it until the crisis becomes considerably more imminent than at present. The lamentable truth is that our Gironde, like the other Gironde, are a rope of sand; what our friend Tait (or rather the author of his first article for May)⁶ said of them is not much, if at all, exaggerated. There are no leaders, and without leaders there can never be organization. There is no man or men of commanding talents among the Radicals in public life, or those whose position in respect of pecuniary independence enables them to put themselves forward personally. If there were but two or three men with your energy, what you propose might be done, and much else.

About a twelvemonth ago steps were actually taken for the formation of a Society for the Diffusion of Moral and Political Knowledge.⁷ Hume had consented to be chairman, Warburton⁸ vice-chairman, Grote treasurer, J. Romilly secretary, and there was a very creditable list of names for the Committee; they were to cause works to be written, and they were also to sanction others which were not written for them. No arrangements had been made, however, for the commencement of any work but one, which was only to be sanctioned, a Political Penny Magazine, of which Roebuck was to be the editor, and the appearance of which was to depend

6. “The Budget,” Tait's, III (May, 1833), 137–40.

7. Francis Place, J. A. Roebuck, and Joseph Hume led the movement late in 1831 to establish such a society to publish tracts. A year later the plan was altered to project a “Penny Political and Moral Magazine,” but the project collapsed when the ministry refused to repeal the stamp taxes on newspapers (see R. K. Webb, The British Working Class Reader [London, 1955], pp. 93–94). In 1834 Henry Brougham and Charles Knight (1791–1873) founded a short-lived Society for the Diffusion of Political Knowledge.

8. Henry Warburton (1784?–1858), radical MP 1826–41, 1843–57.

on alterations in the law, or on the chances of being able to evade it. The Ministry made private intimations to the parties concerned in this Penny Magazine Scheme, that the taxes on knowledge were to be taken off; fully believing this, they suspended their proceedings until that event. The Ministry broke faith with them, and in the meantime Roebuck got into Parliament, everybody's mind became otherwise occupied, and nothing was done.

I have little hope of any of the present race of parliamentary radicals. Some of them are full of crotchets, others fastidious and overloaded with petty scrupulosity; none have energy, except Roebuck and Buller; Roebuck has no judgment, Buller no patient persevering industry. Those two, however, will improve, and we shall hear more of them every year; all the others will remain, I think, very much the same men they are now. There is really more to be hoped from new converts like Clay⁹ and Gisborne,¹⁰ who are in the habit of uttering their sentiments boldly, than from the men who were Radicals in Tory times, and got the habit of prudence and temporizing which they cannot break themselves of even now.

What are we driving to? I do not expect a Revolution, because I think any unanimous demand of the people of this country will always be yielded to, as it was last year; but it is difficult to conjecture what acts of injustice they might, under circumstances of excitement, be provoked to demand. I expect a series of such Parliaments as this, with a step gained at every election. The cause of the evil is one which I foresaw and predicted long before—the anomaly of a democratic constitution in a plutocratically constituted society. Till changes take place which can only be remotely promoted by any Reform Bill, the people will continue from necessity to select their representatives from the same class as before, avoiding only those who are committed to principles which the people abhor. The consequence is they must take the feeblés. All the marked and energetic men in the higher classes, a few excepted, were committed against Reform; that was the natural consequence of their education and the circumstances of those times. The people, therefore, threw them aside, and selected men from the second or third rank, who were not committed because it had never been thought worth while to ask their opinion, such men as would say they were for the Reform Bill, and the Whig Ministers. But further than this, they were not at all better than their class in opinions or feelings, and inferior to their predecessors in talent and judgment. They have acted as such men were sure to do: what will happen? There will be a fresh purgation; these being now disgraced will be thrown aside, and there will be a third levy from the self-same class, consisting of the same sort of men or still feebler ones, but who will say they are for the particular measure then most called for at the particular time by the people, and most recently resisted by the present house. That particular measure will then be carried, and all other things will go as badly as they do now. The same next time, and so on till the real waking minds of the country renounce money-getting, and till they are paid for devoting their time to legislation.

9. Sir William Clay (1791–1869), liberal Whig MP 1832–57.

10. Thomas Gisborne (1794–1852), Whig MP 1830–31, 1832–37, 1839–41, 1843–52, vigorous supporter of free trade.

Have you considered the effect of the proposed Commutation of Tithe? The compulsory part of it is I perceive to be postponed till another year. As it will stop the increase of tithe at least in corn—as no new land, or new improvements will pay any tithe—it strikes me that the commuted tithe will continue wholly, or partially, a tax on the consumer, until the least productive land or capital shall, by the extension of cultivation and population, yield a rent equal to the commuted tithe, and after that it will become wholly a rent-charge. Do you think I am right? You continue I see to write with great spirit and excellent effect in Tait. I am much gratified by your favourable opinion of my tract on endowments.¹¹ You have, I dare say, recognized me in The Examiner on the Bank Question;¹² the article was superficial, and could not consistently with its purpose be otherwise. Nobody, except you and me, seems to write on that side of the question. My father quite agrees with us. Pray do not imitate my neglect in not writing soon, and believe me,

Yours very faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

You promised me a letter on the Property Tax—I never was more in need of it.¹³

80. TO JOHN STERLING¹

12 July 1833

MY DEAR STERLING

I have been very long in writing to you and have only time to write a few words now—Taylor's answer to your question² is briefly this—"I have not heard of any plans of the Gov^t for the education of the negroes, nor do

11. See Letter 68, n. 3.

12. "The Ministerial Measure Respecting the Bank," Examiner, July 7, 1833, pp. 417-18.

13. See Letter 77.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. John Sterling / chez Madame Barton / 4 Cölnthor / Bonn. MS at King's. Published in part in Elliot, I, 56-57.

2. Henry Taylor was in the Colonial Office. On June 10, 1833, Sterling wrote to JSM: "If you can learn anything as to the Gov^t. plans for the education of the slaves & will let me know you will do me a great service. I think I might be of some use in that matter & if you should see Taylor—whom I do not like to trouble with a letter on the subject—I wish you would ask him whether there is any probability of a

I expect to hear of any. Certainly if there were to be any Commission of enquiry on the subject, Sterling could not employ his time more serviceably to the ends which he has at heart than by getting himself placed upon it—nor would the Gov^t be likely to meet with any person half so well qualified to conduct such an enquiry.” So much for these statesmen of ours—they always remind me of what Southey said to me at Keswick—pointing in a little Bible-book for children in size and shape an inch cube, to a wood-cut of Samson with a gate on his back about twenty times his own size, he said “that is like Lord John Russell³ carrying away the British constitution” & sure enough that is about the proportion between the men & the work they have in hand.

I suppose you have by this time returned from your journey up the Rhine. I shall be much interested by the impression German literature and philosophy make upon you on a nearer acquaintance. That question between Schelling’s view and Schleiermacher’s is the one great question on the subject of religion. My own views as far as I have any fixed ones are much nearer to Schleiermacher’s than to Schelling’s and Coleridge’s.⁴ With them I do not at all see as my mind is at present constituted any chance of my ultimately agreeing. I think I am even further from them than I was. I suspect that your mind and mine have passed that point in their respective orbits where they approximate most—and that our premisses are now more nearly the same than our conclusions are likely to be. I think I am becoming more a Movement-man than I was, instead of less—I do not mean merely in politics, but in all things—and that you are becoming more and more inclined to look backward for good. However I am talking without book, for who in these times knows what he shall think rightest & best six months hence? Yours faithfully Commission to enquire on the subject—and if he thinks I should stand any chance of being appointed to it—for if so I would certainly apply immediately. England seems to be going as an American would say ‘all to immortal smash.’” (Unpublished letter, MS at King’s.)

J. S. MILL

3. Lord John Russell (1792–1878), one of the Whig leaders in the struggle for the Reform Bill.

4. Sterling had written from Bonn in his letter of June 10: “If circumstances permitted which they do not, I should like after reading Kant to spend some time at Munich near Schelling who since the death of Hegel of Berlin is I believe the only philosopher of marked & original genius in Germany. His views if I may rely on what I hear present a very remarkable conformity to those of Coleridge, for he too maintains that the Christian Mysteries are the highest Truths of Reason & that it is either necessary to assume or possible to prove every one of them a priori. Schleiermacher is I believe the head of a different school—and one I believe very popular among the learned here—They say he considers Philosophy and Religion altogether apart from each other & makes the latter an affair of sentiment and moral expediency. I incline strongly to Schelling’s view—but unhappily he has published nothing important for many years & his earlier doctrines were very different from the present ones.”

81. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

[Late July, 1833]

MY DEAR CARLYLE

This note will be given to you by Mr. R. W. Emerson² of Boston (United States) who having been long a reader of your writings, is desirous to take the first opportunity of making your acquaintance. Mr. Emerson met with our friend Gustave d'Eichthal at Rome, and was by him referred to me as one who could give him the introduction to you which he wished for—I have great pleasure in doing so—Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

82. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House, 2nd August 1833.

MY DEAR CARLYLE

This letter will be as you desire, extremely biographical: I was conscious myself of a deficiency in that department, in my last: which however was wholly autobiographic; for what is my life made up of, in the main, but my thoughts and feelings? I have no actions to relate except occasionally the promulgation of some thoughts and feelings. But I am now to speak of others rather than of myself. And first, of those in whom you are most interested. You have probably heard that the Austins do not quit England. The Chancellor is to appoint or has actually appointed a Commission to digest the Criminal Law and Austin is to be one of the members. This is work for him of the kind which he most likes, and for which he is best fitted: it is also a provision for him: he is to have £500 a year while it lasts, and it will doubtless lead to other employment in the same line. All his good fortune comes to him at the same time: the four Inns of Court, chiefly at the instigation of Bickersteth² (the most valuable man in the profession of the law—do you know about him?), have resolved to found

1. MS at NLS. Published in Elliot, I, 57.

2. JSM's first impressions of Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882) were not especially favourable (see Letters 82 and 87). The introduction led to the lifelong friendship and correspondence of Emerson and Carlyle.

* * * *

1. No address, since included in Buller's letter. MS at NLS. Published, with minor errors and omissions, in Elliot, I, 57–62. In reply to Carlyle's of July 18, 1833, in A. Carlyle, pp. 60–64; answered by Carlyle, Sept. 10, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 65–68.

2. Henry Bickersteth, later Baron Langdale (1783–1851), Master of the Rolls; close friend of Bentham and James Mill.

two Lectureships, one of English Law, the other of Civil Law and Jurisprudence: this last it is not impossible that Austin may be appointed to: it is compatible with his other employment and will add £450 to his income. So he is likely to be placed in the best circumstances possible for him, whether we consider his usefulness or his own happiness. There are no fears now but for his health: I have always thought that anxiety was the chief cause of his frequent illnesses; they have been, however of late, considerably more frequent than formerly though less severe—he is ill now; as soon as he is fit to travel they are going out of town, probably to some place on the north coast of Devonshire, where they will remain till October, when he returns to commence his new duties. Mrs. Austin is now overloaded with proposals for translating; her fame as a translator has been, very deservedly, raised much higher by this “Falk.”³ As she will not now be at all dependent on the profits (McCulloch⁴ would take me to task—I should say wages) of her literary undertakings, she will now be at liberty to consult only her own judgment of what will do most good: she will persevere, I have no doubt, and be useful.—You ask me about Grote: I happen to be able to tell you more about him than almost any one, having been intimate with him almost from my boyhood, though less so than formerly in proportion as I have diverged from his opinions: he is a Utilitarian; in one sense I am so too, but he is so in rather a narrow sense; has therefore a belief, a firm one, in him most deep and conscientious, for which chiefly he lives and for which he would die. He is a highly instructed man; an excellent scholar; has made great progress in writing a History of Greece,⁵ some of the manuscript of which I have seen; it will be a work of great, though not of consummate merit: he was one of the first of his rank and station to proclaim strong Benthamic-Radical opinions; he published a pamphlet⁶ of merit, in defence thereof against the Edinburgh Review, as long ago as 1820, when not so old as I am now, and another⁷ two years ago just before the Reform Bill. He is a man of good, but not first-rate intellect: hard and mechanical; not at all quick; with less subtlety than any able and instructed man I ever knew: with much logical and but little aesthetic culture; narrow therefore; even narrower than most other Utilitarians of reading and education: more a disciple of my father than of any one else: industrious, brave, not very active or spirited; universally beloved for his extreme goodness, his simplicity, uprightness, and gentleness;

3. See Letter 58, n. 10.

4. John Ramsay McCulloch.

5. A History of Greece (12 vols., London, 1846–56).

6. Statement of the Question of Parliamentary Reform: With a Reply to the Objections of the Edinburgh Review No. 61 (London, 1821).

7. Essentials of Parliamentary Reform (London, 1831).

resembling Ricardo in that particular, though a far inferior man to him in powers of intellect. He is by far the most considered of the radicals in the H. of C. [House of Commons] is more nearly their leader than any one else, & would be so altogether but that he has not the kind of talents which fit a man for a parliamentary leader; he has not sufficient readiness, decision, & presence of mind. After all I have said of him you will be surprised to learn that he reads German. He will be a man of considerable weight in politics soon. As I am on politics, I will ask you if you have seen, except in the abridgment which the Examiner will give,⁸ Roebuck's speech on proposing a resolution for the establishment of a national education of the whole people: I should like you to see it, for it is a better exhibition of him than I think you have seen: it has raised him considerably, I think, in most people's estimation, which is seldom matter of praise but is really so in this instance. It was beginning to be supposed that he could do nothing: he has shewn now that he can; and we must add him to Grote and Buller to make up the only three among the radical members who have not disappointed the expectations of their friends. Of these three, and of all the rest, Buller is as you once said the only one who possesses any the smallest genius. But several of them may be and will be valuable as 'honest Artisans.' —I can tell you something of Detrosier.⁹ He is again in London, and has some prospect of picking up a living as a lecturer on experimental physics: he is, it seems, accustomed to the craft, and qualified for it; he has made the attempt even here with success, and the only doubt about his having several profitable engagements arises from the freshness of his fame as Secretary to the Political Union. Assuredly Radicalism is not yet the road to wealth and honours, though its turn I think is coming. In the meantime Detrosier, poor fellow, with a foolish wife and two or three children, has some difficulty in making the two ends meet; however he has friends here, who will not let him be in want.—I had a short note from Gustave d'Eichthal the other day, dated from Rome, merely to introduce an American named Emerson, who had sought an introduction to me as a means of obtaining one to you: this I of course gave him;¹⁰ he is going into Scotland and may possibly seek you out: he appears to be a reader and professes to be an admirer of your writings; therefore you might possibly do him some good: but from one or two conversations I have had with him, I do not think him a very hopeful subject. Of Fonblanque I have not seen very much lately; except (as you have) through the Examiner: in which I myself have written very little of late: almost the only paper I

8. Aug. 4, 1833, p. 488. Roebuck's speech had been delivered on July 30 in the House of Commons.

9. Rowland Detrosier.

10. Letter 81.

have sent to him for some time you will see in the next or the next but one:¹¹ I will let you find it out if you can; there is not much in it; it is all political. I have indeed written less of late than for a long time before; no longer for the reason I formerly mentioned, but literally from the pressure of comparatively trivial occupations, yet which in the particular circumstances were not such. The little remainder of my little paper on Alison's book¹² has just appeared: the two numbers of the M.R. containing it, shall reach you somehow soon. I have sent you no books this month, because I really could not get together enough to make it worth while: I had only the Poor Laws book. I have a promise of a copy of the Factory Commissioners Report:¹³ when it comes, shall I send it? Madame Roland I had lent, and it did not return to me till a day or two too late. I have now a copy (borrowed) of one of Babbage's two books:¹⁴ you once expressed a wish to see them: have you still that wish? or has it been satisfied! Now I have also (if you would care to see it) a book of Bulwer's, entitled "England & the English." I have not yet looked into it: but a Frenchman who is now in London said of it to Mrs. Austin, that though he had been here only a month that book did not tell him any one thing that was new to him: it must therefore be a very poor book. I told you in one of my letters¹⁵ that I had been writing something about Bentham & his philosophy; it was for Bulwer, at his request, for the purposes of this book: contrary to my expectation at that time, he has printed part of this paper ipsissimis verbis as an appendix to his book: so you will see it; but I do not acknowledge it, nor mean to do so. I furnished him also at his request with a few yet rougher notes concerning my father, which he has not dealt so fairly by, but has cut and mangled and coxcombified the whole thing till its mother would not know it: there are a few sentences of mine in it, something like what they were when I wrote them; for the sake of artistic congruity I wish there were not. This I still less own, because it is not mine, in any sense. About my going to Craigenputtoch there will be some uncertainty till the very time, because the only contingency which would prevent it may happen at any time, and will remain possible to the very last. You will not hear positively that I am coming till the post immediately preceding my arrival—yes you will though, for I shall travel rather slowly. I am sorry that your brother's speedy return to Italy will prevent me from meeting him at Craigenputtoch: but I shall at all events see him on his passage through

11. "Municipal Institutions," Examiner, Aug. 11, 1833, pp. 497-98.

12. See Letter 72, n. 13.

13. Report of the Central Board of H.M. Commissioners Appointed to Collect Information as to the Employment of Children in Factories, Parliamentary Papers, 1833, XX.

14. See Letter 58, n. 18.

15. Letter 72, n. 12.

London?—I have read the first part of your Cagliostro;¹⁶ not yet the second: I know not why you should call it “half mad”; it is merely like much of your writing, half ironical, half earnest; it may be of use to some people: If human beings would but do thoroughly all they do, I believe with you that Good would be much more forwarded than Evil: halfness is the great enemy of spiritual worth: whatever shames any human being out of that, is of unspeakable value. I have left little room for any of the many things I could willingly say on your last letter; neither is the letter before me, which however frequently happens to be the case when I am answering your letters. Do not mistake what I meant when I talked of logic; I did not mean it in the sense in which your answers to Sir William Hamilton¹⁷ (who I suppose is the “schoolman” you allude to) would apply to it. Of logic, as the theory of the processes of intellect, I think not wholly as you, yet nearly: he who has legs can walk without knowledge of anatomy, yet you will allow that such knowledge may be made substantially available for the cure of lameness. By logic however I meant the antithesis of Poetry or Art: in which distinction I am learning to perceive a twofold contrast: the literal as opposed to the symbolical, and reasoning as opposed to intuition. Not the theory of reasoning but the practice. In reasoning I include all processes of thought which are processes at all, that is, which proceed by a series of steps or links. What I would say is that my vocation is, I think, chiefly for this last; a more extended & higher one than for any branch of mere “Philosophy of Mind” though far inferior to that of the artist.—We shall talk doubtless of these things, and also of many others, not excepting the one you mention, Paris—My notion of it is chiefly taken from its recent literature, which is exactly what Goethe called it, the literature of Despair—die Litteratur der Verzweiflung. You will not wonder at that—nor do I.

Buller who is about to write to you will put this letter under his cover—
Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

Thanks to Mrs. Carlyle for her two lines, and best remembrances to her and to Dr. Carlyle.

16. “Count Cagliostro,” Fraser's, VIII (July-Aug., 1833), 19–28, 132–55.

17. Sir William Hamilton (1788–1856), philosopher, whose position JSM years later attacked in An Examination of Sir W. Hamilton's Philosophy (London, 1865). The reference is to Carlyle's letter of July 18 (A. Carlyle, p. 61); in reply, Carlyle says, Oct. 28: “Sir William was not the ‘old schoolman’ I once spoke of; that Redivivus was another considerably inferior character . . . a ganz ausgestorbener Mann. He lectured on Logic, and thought Logic was to be the salvation of the world.” (A. Carlyle, p. 78.)

83. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

India House
6th August
1833

MY DEAR SIR

You must have been a good deal surprised at hearing nothing from me respecting the literary article which was to be transferred from the Examiner to your Magazine.² The fact is that for some weeks past the pressure of other occupations had left me no time to take the article in hand and fit it for your use: and now at length when I had begun to rewrite it for you, I find that the work it is a review of (a poem named Pauline) has been disposed of in your last number by a passing notice,³ in terms of contempt which though I think the poem was overpraised in the Monthly Repository, I cannot consider it to deserve. So I hope you will receive this as my apology for not fulfilling my engagement.

Believe me

Most truly yours

J. S. MILL

84. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House, 5th September 1833.

MY DEAR CARLYLE

You have probably heard from D^r Carlyle before this reaches you, that I shall not, after all, see you this autumn. There were about twenty chances to one that I should, but it is the twenty-first which has taken effect in Reality. I was mistaken, too, when I said that if I went not to Craigenputtoch I should go nowhere: I am going to Paris: the same cause which I then thought, if it operated at all, would operate to keep me here, now sends me there.² It is a journey entirely of duty; nothing else, you will do me the justice to believe, would have kept me from Craigenputtoch after

1. Addressed: William Tait Esq. / care of Messrs Simpkin & Marshall. MS at NLS.

2. Review of Browning's Pauline. See Letter 74.

3. "Besides the above poems . . . we have Paulina [sic], A Fragment of a Confession; a piece of pure bewilderment" (Tait's, III [Aug., 1833], 668).

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtoch / Dumfries / N.B. Postmarks: [??] / 5 SE / 1833, and [??] MFRIES / [??] SEP 1833. MS at NLS. Published in part in Elliot, I, 62-65. Carlyle's answer of Sept. 24, 1833, is in A. Carlyle, pp. 68-75.

2. The cause was the crisis that had been reached in the relationship of JSM with Mrs. John Taylor. Taylor agreed to an experimental separation for six months from his wife, who left for Paris in Sept. JSM followed on Oct. 10 and stayed until about Nov. 20. See Hayek, p. 49. See also Letter 89.

what I have said & written so often: it is duty, and duty connected with a person to whom of all persons alive I am under the greatest obligations. If I had not so short a vacation the two journeys would not be incompatible, but alas for him who must abide eleven months of the year at a desk in Leadenhall Street! All the compensation I can make to you will be to write often and fully, and tell you all I see and hear at Paris that will interest you. You said something in one of your letters about a projected residence of some time at Paris for yourself—it would not, I think, be pleasant to you, but extremely melancholy; everywhere however there is food enough for that—and I do believe that for observation of realities, at least human spiritual realities, there is no place in the world like Paris in the present age, for the reason you mentioned, that individualities of character are there unchained, not being kept down and fashioned to a model by a common overruling Belief—but again, nowhere in Europe, if I am not greatly mistaken, are there so few individualities of character as at Paris. I suspect Prussia is the only country pleasant to live in for one who loves mankind—but for that very reason not the fit place for one who is capable of being their spiritual benefactor in any however small a degree unless he was born there.

D^r Carlyle has been so good as to take charge of some books for you: viz. two Reports of the Factory Commission, full of the biography of history; the works of Madame Roland, the noblest character by far of the French Revolution, perhaps of France itself; though far from the most brilliant; & the two numbers of the Repository which contain my flimsy paper on Alison. That last was hardly worth sending; keep it however. I meant you to keep Junius Redivivus; I have other copies: it is not, however, worth sending back, to you. That and all the other books, came safe. What did you think of the Vieux Cordelier?³ Villate's book,⁴ which pretends to let one into the secrets of the Terreur I believe to be a mere tissue of lies and exaggerations: he was a juré of the revolutionary tribunal, deeply implicated in all the horrors of the time, and anxious by making great disclosures to save his own neck from the reaction, to which unless my memory fail me he nevertheless fell a sacrifice.—The Poor-Laws book, D^r Carlyle tells me you have: indeed I thought you would, for it has been very widely circulated: write me word what you think of it. Write to me also about your brother: he stays here so short a time that I shall not know him, only lay the foundation for future knowledge; but I have already seen enough to respect and like him and to hope for his future friendship.—I forgot to ask whether you have seen that "Arthur Coningsby"—it is scarcely worth sending,—though decidedly worth reading: perhaps it may go with other books:—also Bulwer's book.

3. See Letter 67, n. 7.

4. See Letter 72, n. 7.

I have read the latter half of Cagliostro with very great pleasure; greater than the first half: and I look forward to the appearance of *Teufelsdröck*⁵ with great satisfaction: by the impression it makes upon me now, as compared with that which it made on the first reading, I shall have a kind of measure of the space which I have franchi (as the French say) in the interval; whether forwards, backwards, or to one side. I have certainly changed much since you knew me; in some things I have become, I think, more like yourself, in others more unlike; I am partly reconciled to not seeing you this year by the thought that next year I shall probably be firmer on my legs, spiritually speaking, and shall have a clearer and more fixed insight into what I am to be and to do, than I have at present, and that the relation between us will then be (much more than now) what you once called it, "a relation between two Somethings" and not between a Something & a Nothing.

—About that Cagliostro and that Teufelsdröck, by the way, it has frequently occurred to me of late to ask of myself and also of you, whether that mode of writing between sarcasm or irony and earnest, be really deserving of so much honour as you give to it by making use of it so frequently. I do not say that it is not good: all modes of writing, in the hands of a sincere man, are good, provided they are intelligible. But are there many things, worth saying, and capable of being said in that manner which cannot be as well or better said in a more direct way? The same doubt has occasionally occurred to me respecting much of your phraseology, which fails to bring home your meaning to the comprehension of most readers so well as would perhaps be done by commoner and more familiar phrases: however this last I say with the most perfect submission, because I am sure that every one speaks and writes best in his own mother tongue, the language in which he thinks.—I have just received a copy of some Evidence taken by the Poor Law Commissioners on the subject of Education, affording some striking instances of the good effect produced upon the very rabble of London by even such imperfect schooling as they now sometimes receive: shall I send it in my next parcel?

I am now reading, very sedulously, Voltaire's Correspondence: I have never read it before. It throws much light upon the spiritual character of that time, and especially of its literary men. How strangely Voltaire's own character has been mistaken; and how little does he seem to have been conscious of what he was about, to have had even any settled purpose in it. He certainly had no intention of being the Patriarch of any sect of Destructives, & if the priests would have let him alone, he would have let them alone. In the greater part of his lifetime he seems to have been timid excessively, and would have abstained from almost anything in order to remain quiet at Paris. But after he had found the quiet he sought, at a distance, it was the revival of persecution as evinced by the suppression of the Encyclopédie, the condemnation of Helvetius's book, the speech of Le Franc de Pompignan at the Academy denouncing Voltaire himself personally, the success of Palissot's comedy of Les Philosophes, the abuse of the Philosophes by Fréron & others, &c., &c.⁶ it was these things which erected Voltaire after the age of sixty-five into the leader of a crusade against Christianity; & it was then, too, that he seems to have found out that wit and ridicule were capable of being powerful weapons in his hands. He always seems to have despised the French, & thought them incapable of philosophy, or even of science; and he continually lamented that they insisted upon taking to speculation, which they were unfit for, and neglected the beaux-arts (what beaux-arts!) which had been the glory of the siècle de Louis 14.

5. Sartor Resartus, which Carlyle, despairing of securing a publisher, had offered to James Fraser for serial publication. It appeared in Fraser's Magazine from Nov., 1833, to Aug., 1834. JSM had evidently read it in manuscript.

I have no more room—mit Glück und Heil

J. S. MILL.

I shall remain here till the middle of October probably, so that your letters will reach me as usual. I cannot get a frank this time; all Parliament is out of town. My kindest remembrances to Mrs. Carlyle.⁷

85. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

India House
Saturday [Sept. 7, 1833]

MY DEAR MR FOX

I am ashamed to say I can give no hope that Blakey² will be ready on Monday—though I think part of him will be. But I have nearly made up my mind to transfer to you the paper on Poetry³ which I thought of putting

6. Œuvres complètes de Voltaire (66 vols., Paris, 1819–25), Vol. L, pp. 135, 141, 321, 337, 359, 362, 363, 389, 393, 533–38.

7. This postscript is written at the top of the first page.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmark: T. P. / Cornhill; To be Delivered by 10 Sund Mor / 7 NIGHT / SP. 7 / 1883. MS at King's. Excerpts published in Garnett, pp. 105, 106.

2. Robert Blakey, History of Moral Science (2 vols., London, 1833). JSM's review in MR, VII (Oct., 1833), 661–69.

3. "The Two Kinds of Poetry," MR, VII (Oct., 1833), 714–24, reprinted with his "What is Poetry?" (MR, VII [Jan., 1833], 60–70) in Dissertations under title "Thoughts on Poetry and its Varieties." JSM did not publish a review of Tennyson until nearly two years later, London Review, I (July, 1835), 402–24.

at the head of a review of Tennyson somewhere. I think I could make a better review of Tennyson, and with the same ideas too, in another way.

If you like the idea, and if you see *her*⁴ before Monday, will you mention it to her—you know it is hers—if she approves, it shall be yours. I shall see her on Monday myself, and then I will speak of the matter to her. [Ye]s—she is like hers[elf]—if she is ever ou[t]⁵ of spirits it is always something amiss in me that is the cause—it is so now—it is because she sees that what ought to be so much easier to me than to her, is in reality more difficult—costs a harder struggle—to part company with the opinion of the world, and with my former modes of doing good in it; however, thank heaven, she does not doubt that I can do it—

Yes—I shall see you often, I hope, at Clapton when she is gone—⁶

yours ever

J. S. MILL

86. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

India House
24 September 1833

MY DEAR SIR

You have not heard from me as a contributor to your Magazine for some time past. I am now about to make up for my neglect by making a proposal to you which if accepted would furnish you with a “stock in hand” but which it is very probable may not suit you.

I have had by me for some time, five Political Economy essays,² ready for publication; four of them on particular points, containing views which I am desirous to submit to the judgment of the scientific students of the science,—in continuation and completion of Ricardo’s doctrines. The fifth is a dissertation on the science itself,³ and on the proper mode of studying

4. Mrs. Taylor.

5. Page torn where square brackets appear in this sentence.

6. She was soon to go to Paris to begin the trial separation from her husband. See preceding letter, n. 2.

* * * *

1. Addressed: W. Tait Esq. / Prince’s Street / Edinbro’. Postmarks: FREE / SE 25 / 1833, and SEP / C 27A / 1833. Franked by J. A. Roebuck. MS at LSE.

2. These were eventually published in 1844 as Essays on Some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy. For the origin of these essays, see Letter 43, n. 14.

3. This essay was later published, LWR, XXVI (Oct., 1836), 1–29, under the title “On the Definition of Political Economy; and on the Method of Philosophical Investigation in that Science,” and was later reprinted in the Essays cited above it. The last may be considered as comparatively popular; the other four are, as from their nature and object they cannot but be, somewhat abstract; not more so however than De Quincey's "Templar's Dialogues" in the London Magazine.⁴ There is no use in publishing these tracts as a separate volume, for few would read them and nobody would buy them. They must therefore remain in my desk unless they will suit you. In length they would average I think about the dimensions of an article on such subjects in the Edinburgh Review. They would not be attractive to the bulk of Magazine-readers, and the only chance of their suiting you lies in the extremely miscellaneous character of such a Magazine as yours, which should and does contain matter for almost all classes of readers. The high character which your work is establishing for itself in Political Economy would also make any elaborate paper on that subject less out of place in your pages than in those of any other periodical.

If you do not think the proposition quite inadmissible, be so good as to write to me, and I will send you one or two of them for your inspection—I should also be much obliged to our friend Mr Nichol if he would favour me with his remarks on them before anything is determined upon.

If you should finally resolve to publish them in the Magazine, I shall further request of you to have 100 copies of each, struck off for me & at my expense, to give away to the few persons who can be expected to take any considerable interest in such speculations.

I have not seen much in the Magazine lately which I could ascribe to Mr Nichol—nor have I heard from him—I hope he is not ill?

The French Professorship I fear is out of the question—the choice lies between Comte & Rossi.⁵

Most truly yours

J. S. MILL

I have not given up the idea of those "Essays on the Ambiguities of the Moral Sciences"⁶ but for the present I see no chance of my having time for it—⁷

J.S.M.

with the title "On the Definition of Political Economy; and On the Method of Investigation Proper to It."

4. "Dialogues of Three Templars on Political Economy," London Mag., IX (April–May, 1824), 341–55, 427–28, 547–66.

5. See Letter 79.

6. A never-completed project possibly arising from his review of George Cornewall Lewis' Use and Abuse of Political Terms; see Letter 51, n. 15.

7. This postscript is written at the top of the page.

87. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

Mickleham, near Dorking, Surrey,

5th October 1833

(don't direct hither, though.)

MY DEAR CARLYLE

Two of your letters, both well deserving a better answer than this will be, have been waiting a long time for it: such as it is you shall have it now: You ask me to write with abandonment—it is pleasant in many ways to be asked that, and by you—doubt not but that I shall do so, more and more—I have not, and have never had, any voluntary or rather intentional reserve with any one whom I value, certainly not with you—but that is not enough—I am sensible in myself of a want of spontaneousness, a self-consciousness even in the act of confiding, which is perhaps natural enough in a born metaphysician as I am in the very worst sense, but which I dislike extremely both in myself and wherever else I see it, and which I believe I am getting rid of. There will I think be perfect spontaneous confidence, the abandonment you speak of, in the fullest sense, between us two, some time; I think as soon as we are completely intimate; I was going to say completely know each other, but that is an impossibility, as you well know. In the meantime it is very grateful to me to find that everything which brings me nearer to you, brings you also nearer to me, and that every approach to a closer intimacy is responded to as soon as made. Our friendship is a strong healthy young plant, which being in a good soil may be left to itself to grow. So no more of that at present—Now I will say that I am going to Paris probably at the end of this week. If I could have another letter from you before I go, well: if not, write when you are moved thereto, and a friend at the India House will forward your letter to Paris, for I do not wish to be five weeks without it. What you wish to be ascertained for you at Paris, shall be so; I shall be able to obtain the fullest and exactest information. Touching French dictionaries I am fully as ignorant as yourself: I learnt the language in the country itself, and acquired the colloquial part of it in greater perfection than most English do, so had never occasion for the sort of dictionary you want: I believe there is none good, none but such as you probably have; but I will inquire about that, too. Before I go I will send a parcel to Fraser's for you, containing Bulwer, Coningsby, and more French Memoirs if I can find any more worth sending. I am afraid you have already had the best of them.

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtock / Dumfries. Postmarks: FREE / 7 OC 7 / 1833, and DUMFRIES / 9 OCT 1833. Franked by G. Grote. MS at NLS. Published, with minor errors and omissions, in Elliot, I, pp. 65–71. Reply to Carlyle's of Sept. 10 and Sept. 24, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 65–75; answered by Carlyle, Oct. 28, 1833, A. Carlyle, 75–82.

With them shall go the October number of the Monthly Repository: containing two articles of mine: one, a review of a foolish book by a man named Blakey, of Morpeth, called a History of Moral Science;² for writing which he is utterly unfit, being a man who as you would say, has no eyes, only a pair of glasses and I will add, almost opaque ones. The other article³ is the little paper I told you I was writing in further prosecution of, or rather improvement on, the thoughts I published before on Poetry and Art. You will not find much in the first to please you; perhaps rather more in the second, but I fear you will think both of them too much infected by mechanical theories of the mind: yet you will probably in this as in many other cases be glad to see that out of my mechanical premisses I elicit dynamical conclusions—and I have a paragraph at the end of the article on Blakey's book by way of manifesto, to tell people that I don't care one straw about premisses except for the sake of conclusions. I have been very busy and active in writing lately; even on politics; did you detect me in those long-winded answers (in the Examiner) to the ministerial pamphlet?⁴ but I tell it not to the profane. Your approval of the Alison paper was very gratifying; I also am conscious that I write with a greater appearance of sureness and strong belief than I did for a year or two before, in that period of recovery after the petrification of a narrow philosophy, in which one feels quite sure of scarcely anything respecting Truth, except that she is many-sided. Did you ever read Schleiermacher's paper on Socrates? I have been reading it in a number of Connop Thirlwall's "Philological Museum,"⁵ a Cambridge classical periodical of merit: Schleiermacher's theory of Socrates is that besides knowing "that he knew nothing," he however knew also what knowledge was, and how it was to be come at: that was exactly my case and was the faith I also professed and taught for some years unconscious all the while that I had nothing else to teach: I have now got at some few things more: all of which, as they become clearer to myself, will be shewn to you either in what I publish, or in letters, or personal communication. You suggest to me, what I have many times thought of, the advisableness of my writing something more elaborate than I have yet written on the French Revolution: it is highly probable I shall do it sometime if you do not; but besides the difficulty of

2. See Letter 85, n. 2.

3. Ibid., n. 3.

4. For titles and pagination of the seven articles in the series see MacMinn, Bibliog., pp. 34–35.

5. Connop Thirlwall (1797–1875), historian and clergyman, published three papers in this volume on Schleiermacher and Socrates, all signed C.T.: "Schleiermacher on the Worth of Socrates as a Philosopher (From the Berlin Transactions of 1815)," Philological Museum, II (1833), 538–55; "Schleiermacher's Introduction to his Translation of Plato's Apology of Socrates," ibid., pp. 556–61; and "Socrates, Schleiermacher and Delbrueck," ibid., pp. 562–87.

doing it tolerably, there is a far greater difficulty of doing it so as to be read in England, until the time comes when one can speak of Christianity as it may be spoken of in France; as by far the greatest and best thing which has existed on this globe, but which is gone, never to return, only what was best in it to reappear in another and still higher form, some time (heaven knows when). One could not, now, say this openly in England, and be read—at least by the many; yet it is perhaps worth trying. Without saying out one's whole belief on that point, it is impossible to write about the French Revolution in any way professing to tell the whole truth. A propos I have been reading the New Testament; properly I can never be said to have read it before. I am the fitter to read it now; perhaps there is nobody within the four seas so utterly unprejudiced on the subject. I have never believed Christianity as a religion, consequently have no habitual associations of reverence, nor on the other hand any of contempt like so many who have become sceptics after having been taught to believe; nor have I, like so many, been bored or disgusted with it in my youth. As far as I know your impressions about Christ, mine from this reading are exactly the same. How strikingly just for instance is your contrast in your last letter, between the Christ of the Gospels, & the namby-pamby Christ of the poor modern Christians.⁶ Many things have struck me in reading this book. One is that nearly all the good of the four Gospels is in St Matthew alone; & we could almost spare the other three. Mark and Luke however do no harm; but John has I think been the cause of almost all bad theology: the Christ of that Gospel also strikes me as quite unlike the Christ of the other three; a sort of Edward Irving, one might say. How clearly one can trace in all of them the gradual rise of his conviction that he was the Messiah: and how much loftier & more self-devoted a tone his whole language & conduct assumed as soon as he felt convinced of that. Reading his history has done me along with much other good, this in particular, that it has completed my hatred of the Gig: I can hardly feel easy now under the thought that I have one foot in it still: I shall probably dismount altogether from it in time.—It was more than I hoped for that your brother should form any favourable judgment of me from the very little he can have seen, and that not of the best kind. I am persuaded that I owe his good opinion chiefly to your testimony. He appeared to me very like you: though I cannot doubt but that there are differences enough: it was the likeness too of a scholar to his master.

6. Carlyle had written in his letter of Sept. 24, 1833: "How different, above all, is that honey-mouthed, tear-stained, soup-kitchen Jesus Christ of our poor shovel-hatted modern Christians from the stern-visaged Christ of the Gospels, proclaiming aloud in the market-place (with such a total contempt of the social respectabilities): 'Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!' Descend from your gigs, ye wretched scoundrels, for the hour is come!" (A. Carlyle, p. 70.)

Of your friends or acquaintance here I have little to relate: most of them are away from London & have not written to me. Only Rowland Detrosier is doing exceedingly well as a lecturer on physics—picking up also some money by writing—and he will do something and be of use: a man of clearer or quicker understanding I never saw: only he has had no help, and no materials for his understanding to work on: the most abstract truths when they are presented to him he seizes almost at a glance, & possesses himself of their spirit, not their letter merely. He will thrive best under my teaching just now; he is not yet ripe for yours. He is eager, ardent, and indefatigably laborious; and to the extent of his faculties, most serious in his purpose of knowing and teaching the Truth.—If I had known you as well when you were in London as I do now, how many more persons should I have brought to see you! I now know that any human being is interesting to you, all who have self-subsistence eminently so: now even of those I could have made you acquainted with not a few. Since you were so much pleased with Emerson⁷ I feel encouraged to try you with almost any person whatever who has any sort of good in him: I should have thought he was about the last person who would have interested you so much as he seems to have done. But you, yourself, are doubtless in many things, changed, and as you have several times intimated, changing: I greatly desire to know in what, and how much; should be still more gratified if I could in any way aid you, paying back thereby some small part of the good, of that and so many other kinds, which I have received from you. I have done little for you yet; perhaps am incapable of doing much: but it was part of my former character, the character I am throwing off, that I seldom wished or ventured to argue with my teachers: I do not mean mere logic-fence, but that I was content to receive without giving, & rather avoided occasions for expressing difference of opinion. In that however as in much else “I will mend” as you said of something far less important—The Austins are at Boulogne—but I have not heard from them. Falk I am sorry to hear sells but indifferently. I find both from enquiry and observation that the puffing system has worn itself out, even more rapidly than seemed likely: & a united chorus of praise from all the press will scarcely now sell fifty copies of any work: Effingham Wilson⁸ the bookseller is so sensible of this that he has resolved to cease advertising the praises of periodicals and to sell his wares by samples, advertising passages of the works themselves. Thus does all lying contain the seeds of its own destruction: when all human speech has ceased to be believed, it seems as if men must recommence speaking the truth: yet who knows? for how many centuries has the whole East persevered in lying, although the fact that "all men are liars" there forms part of all men's knowledge of the world. Bulwer's book⁹ is considerably better than I expected; the "tenuity" does not amount to more than semitransparency. There was one thing in what you said of Madame Roland which I did not quite like—it was, that she was almost rather a man than a woman: I believe that I quite agree in all that you really meant, but is there really any distinction between the highest masculine & the highest feminine character? I do not mean the mechanical acquirements; those, of course, will very commonly be different. But the women, of all I have known, who possessed the highest measure of what are considered feminine qualities, have combined with them more of the highest masculine qualities than I have ever seen in any but one or two men, & those one or two men were also in many respects almost women. I suspect it is the second-rate people of the two sexes that are unlike—the first-rate are alike in both—except—no, I do not think I can except anything—but then, in this respect, my position has been and is, what you say every human being's is in many respects "a peculiar one."—

7. Emerson had presented JSM's letter of introduction on Aug. 25 and had stayed twenty-four hours at Craigenputtock. See Carlyle's letter of Sept. 10, A. Carlyle, p. 66.

8. Effingham Wilson (1783–1868), best known as the publisher of Tennyson's first volume and of Browning's Paracelsus.

I shall write from Paris—probably more than once.

Yours faithfully,

J. S. MILL

Make my kindest respects to M^{rs} Carlyle and crave her forgiveness (though as it was a matter of moral necessity, not choice, that is hardly the right word) for the postponement of my visit.¹⁰

88. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

I.H.

Friday

[Oct. 10, 1833]

DEAR MR FOX

I go off this evening & therefore shall not see you which I am sorry for.

Thanks for your kind offer of doing anything for me during my absence²—The only thing which occurs to me, that you could do, would be to

9. England and the English.

10. This postscript is written at the top of the first page.

* * * *

1. MS at King's. One excerpt is published in Garnett, p. 110, but dated June, 1833. The dating of Oct. 10 is drawn from the reference to the impending departure for Paris "probably at the end of this week" in his Oct. 5 letter to Carlyle (the preceding letter).

2. He remained in Paris until about Nov. 20.

send us a copy of the Repository for next month. You might send it to Dussard, whose address is 9 Great Castle Street Cavendish Square[;] he has opportunities for Paris once or twice a week.

I send "Pauline"³ having done all I could—which was, to annotate copiously in the margin, and sum up on the flyleaf—on the whole the observations are not flattering to the author—perhaps too strong in the expression to be shewn to him.⁴

I also send three numbers of the Plato⁵ for your inspection and judgment. They cannot in any case be used until I return for it is necessary they should be carefully looked over, some passages altered, and some preliminary matter written—Let us hope that the arrival of Elliott's drama⁶ will relieve you from any difficulty in filling the present number—if not, you must write it all yourself—I do not think the remainder of those scraps will help you much. A propos I had them actually in my pocket at Clapton but neglected to give them to you—I am sorry your brother⁷ has had the trouble of calling for them.

You shall hear from me very soon—as I hope I shall from you

Farewell—

J.S.M.

89. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

[Paris, Nov. 5 or 6, 1833]

I could have filled a long letter to you with the occurrences and feelings and thoughts of any one day since I have been here—this fortnight seems an age in mere duration, and is an age in what it has done for us two.²

3. This is the copy now in the Forster Collection of the Victoria and Albert Museum.

4. But Browning did see the copy. See Letter 74, n. 3.

5. Eventually published in the Monthly Repository under the title "Notes on Some of the More Popular Dialogues of Plato": 1. "The Protagoras," VIII (1834), 89–99, 203–11; 2. "The Phaedrus," VIII, 404–20, 633–46; 3. "The Gorgias," VIII, 691–710, 802–15, 829–42; 4. "The Apology of Socrates," IX (1835), 112–21, 169–78. Reprinted in Four Dialogues of Plato, trans. JSM, ed. Ruth Borchardt (London, 1946). Never published were five further translations with notes (the Charmides, Euthyphron, Laches, Lysis, and Parmenides), the MSS of which are in the New York Public Library.

6. Ebenezer Elliott, the Corn Law Rhymers, did contribute to the Monthly Repository, but not any drama.

7. Charles Fox, publisher of the Monthly Repository.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton / London / Angleterre. Postmarks: FPO / NO 7 / 1833, and 10.F. Noon [??] / NO 7 / 1833. MS at Yale. Published, with minor errors, in Hayek, pp. 49–54.

2. JSM and Mrs. Taylor. See Letter 84, n. 2.

It has brought years of experience to us—good and happy experience most of it. We never could have been so near, so perfectly intimate, in any former circumstances—we never could have been together as we have been in innumerable smaller relations and concerns—we never should have spoken of all things, and in all frames of mind, with so much freedom and unreserve. I am astonished when I think how much has been restrained, how much untold, unshewn, uncommunicated till now—how much which by the new fact of its being spoken, has disappeared—so many real unlikenesses, so many more false impressions of unlikeness, most of which have only been revealed to me since they have ceased to exist or these which still exist have ceased to be felt painfully. Not a day has passed without removing some real & serious obstacle to happiness. I never thought so humbly of myself compared with her, never thought or felt myself so little worthy of her, never more keenly regretted that I am not, in some things, very different, for her sake—yet it is much to know as I do now; that almost all which has ever caused her any misgivings with regard to our fitness for each other was mistaken in point of fact—that the mistakes no longer exist—& that she is now (as she is) quite convinced that we are perfectly suited to pass our lives together—better suited indeed for that perfect than for this imperfect companionship. There will never again I believe be any obstacle to our being together entirely, from the slightest doubt that the experiment would succeed with respect to ourselves—not, as she used to say, for a short time, but for our natural lives. And yet—all the other obstacles or rather the one obstacle being as great as ever—our futurity is still perfectly uncertain. She has decided nothing except what has always been decided—not to renounce the liberty of sight—and it does not seem likely that anything will be decided until the end of the six months, if even then finally. For me, I am certain that whatever she decides will be wisest and rightest, even if she decide what was so repugnant to me at first—to remain here alone—it is repugnant to me still—but I can now see that perhaps it will be best—the future will decide that.

When will you write again—she shewed me your letter—it is beautiful in you to write so to any one, but who could write otherwise to her?

I am happy, but not so happy as when the future appeared surer.

I had written thus far before receiving your letter, and I am glad of it. I have now taken a larger sheet and copied the above into it.

Your letter does indeed shew that you do not at all “understand her state” and never have understood it—this I have only lately begun to suspect, & never was quite sure of it till now—and I see that under the presumption that you were more aware than I perceive you are of the real state of her feelings, I myself have said & written things which have confirmed you in the wrong impression.

You seem to think that she was decided, and is now undecided—that the state of feeling which led to the separation has been as you say “interrupted” and is to be “recommenced.” Now this is an incorrect and so far a lower idea of her than the true one—she never had decided upon anything except not to give up either the feeling, or the power of communication with me—unless she did so, it was Mr. Taylor’s wish, and seemed to be necessary to his comfort that she should live apart from him. When the separation had actually taken place, the result did as you say seem certain—not because we had willed to make it so, but because it seemed the necessary consequence of the new circumstances if the feelings of all continued the same. This was the sole cause & I think cause enough for the hopefulness and happiness which I felt almost all that month and which must have made a false impression on you. I never felt sure of what was to be after the six months, but I felt an immense increase of the chances in my favour. When I came here, I expected to find her no more decided than she had always been about what would be best for all, but not to find her as for the first time I did, doubtful of what would be best for our own happiness—under the influence of that fact and of the painful feelings it excited, I wrote to you. That doubt, thank heaven, lasted but a short time—if I had delayed my letter two days longer I should never have sent it.

If Mr. Taylor feels as you believe he does, he has been very far from telling her “all he feels”; for his last letter to her, which came by the same post as this of yours (the first she ever shewed to me) is in quite another tone. He is most entirely mistaken in all the facts. Her affection for him, which originated in gratitude for his affection & kindness, instead of being weakened by this stronger feeling, has been greatly strengthened, by so many new proofs of his affection for her, & by the unexpected & (his nature considered) really admirable generosity & nobleness which he has shewn under so severe a trial. Instead of reviving in absence, her affection for him has been steady throughout; it is of quite another character from this feeling, & therefore does not in the least conflict with it naturally, & now when circumstances have thrown the two into opposition she can no more overcome, or wish to overcome the one, than the other. The difference is, that the one, being only affection, not passion, would be satisfied with knowing him to be happy though away from her—but if the choice were absolutely between giving up the stronger feeling, & making him (what he says he should be) durably wretched, I am quite convinced that either would be [more?]³ than she could bear. I know it is the common notion of passionate love that it sweeps away all other affections—but surely the justification of passion, & one of its greatest beauties & glories, is that in an otherwise fine character it weakens no feeling which deserves to subsist, but would naturally strengthen them all. Because her letters to Mr. Taylor express the strong affection she has always felt, and he is no longer seeing, every day, proofs of her far stronger feeling for another, he thinks the affection has come back—he might have seen it quite as plainly before, only he refused to believe it. I have seen it, and felt its immense power over her, in moments of intense excitement with which I am sure he would believe it to be utterly incompatible.

Her affection for him, which has always been the principal, is now the sole obstacle to our being together—for the present there seems absolutely no prospect of that obstacle's being got over. She believes—and she knows him better than any of us can—that it would be the breaking-up of his whole future life—that she is determined never to be the cause of, & I am as determined never to urge her to it, as convinced that if I did I should fail. Nothing could justify it but “the most distinct perception” that it is not only “necessary to the happiness of both”, but the only means of saving both or either from insupportable unhappiness. That can never be unless the alternative were entire giving up. I believe he is quite right in his impression that the worst for him which is to be expected at the end of the six months is her remaining permanently here. She will if it is in human power to do so, make him understand the exact state of her feelings, and will as at present minded, give him the choice of every possible arrangement except entire giving-up, with a strong wish that her remaining here may be his choice; with a full understanding however that the agreement whatever it be, is to be no longer binding than while it is found endurable. This seems but a poor result to come of so much suffering & so much effort, but for us even so the gain is great.

She has seen and approved all that precedes, therefore it is as much her letter as mine. So now you know the whole state of the case.

She is on the whole far happier than I have ever known her, and quite well physically though far from strong—I have many anxious thoughts of how she is to bear the being again alone with so little of hope to sustain her. I am so convinced of all I have written above, that if the final decision were already made (whatever it might be) I am certain that the fact of Mr. Taylor's being to be here so soon after I am gone would be a real & great good to her—but now, I am afraid unless she sees her way clearly to some tolerably satisfactory arrangement in the first few days of his visit she will only be made more unhappy by being made to feel still more keenly the impossibility of avoiding great unhappiness to him.

You know, perhaps, that her brother⁴ has been here—nothing could have been better or sweeter than all he said & did—he was even friendly.

Can I do anything for you here—see any one, or bring over anything for you—I shall leave Paris probably Friday week.

4. Edward Hardy.

It is idle, almost, to say any thanks for all you are saying and doing for our good & for such part of the interest you feel in it, as regards me personally—I may be able some time or other to make some return to you for it all, more than by invoking as I do, all the blessings earth is heir to upon you and yours.

J.S.M.

90. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

[Nov. 22, 1833]

In our conversation the other evening the more important matters of which we were thinking and talking made me forget to say that if you will send to me those Plato papers,² I will try to make them fit for the M.R.

You are I suppose provided for the next number—otherwise in a day or two I could finish one of those things.

I have the strongest wish, and some hope, that there will some day arrive a sketch of Paris, in the manner of some of your local sketches—if there does, it will be the most beautiful thing ever written—she has spoken quite enough to me at different times, to shew what it would be.

Have you seen Mr. Taylor? he has received a letter by this time, part of which she has sent to me, and which if he was still in the state in which you last saw him, will certainly put him completely out of it. Ed. Hardy³ while he confirms all you told me of the impression her precious letter made upon him when it came, bringing back his old hopes and theories, affirms positively that all this had quite gone off before he received any other letter, & that his acquiescence in her return to him is not given under the influence of those hopes and theories but of a real intention of being with her as a friend and companion. His conduct & feelings now, will shew whether this is correct. I shall be anxious to know your impression when you shall have seen him in his present state.

It seems he had written to her again since I left Paris—she writes “I had yesterday one of those letters from Mr. Taylor which make us admire & love him. He says that this plan & my letters have given him delight—that he has been selfish—but in future will think more for others & less for himself—but still he talks of this plan being good for all, by which he means me, as he says he is sure it will ‘prevent after misery’ & again he wishes for complete confidence. I have written exactly what I think without reserve.”

I have not time to write another word.

J.S.M.

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmark: [???] / [???] 22[?] / 1833. MS at Yale. Published in part in Hayek, pp. 54–55.

2. See Letter 88, n. 5.

3. Brother of Mrs. Taylor.

91. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹India House 25th November 1833

MY DEAR CARLYLE

As might have been anticipated I found no time while at Paris to write to you, and though I have now been in London a week, I have not been able till now to collect my thoughts for the sort of letter which my conscience tells me I ought to write. Let me dispose of business matters first. I have made the various inquiries you wanted made. First about the mode of living at Paris. M. Comte,² whom you may have heard of as a writer, & who is now Secrétaire Perpetuel to the new Academy of Moral and Political Science, a man who has tried both countries & who lived in a very simple stile in both, who has lived in both as a man ever in narrow circumstances—married and having two or three children—he is my first witness, & he says that Paris & London are much on a par: that you may live luxuriously in Paris for less money than in London, but that for any stile of living not luxuriously, the expense is nearly the same in both cities, with perhaps a slight advantage in favour of Paris. Tanneguy Duchâtel,³ who is an economist & statistician & I should think accurate in his facts, says that un député may if he chuse live at Paris during a six months session of the chamber for 300 francs (£12) a month if alone, for at most 500 francs (£20) if he have a wife and no children. The chief article of necessary consumption which is dearer at Paris than en province or in England, seems to be dress: that, if you stay only six months or so you can carry out a supply of for the whole time I suppose. You can have in the best quarters of Paris, lodgings which I think would perfectly suit you for 200 francs a month. This would include accommodation for a maid servant. Your food would be decidedly cheaper than in London. As to other matters, there is the most ample & ready access to many excellent libraries; some difficulty, but not I believe impossibility, in having permission to take books home with you. All persons of all sorts are accessible with the greatest ease to any one who had such introductions as you would have. A little way out of Paris the expenses are decidedly less, viz. house-rent less, food of all sorts cheaper by the cost of conveyance and the very high octroi. In executing your smaller commissions at Paris I have had great assistance from Adolphe d'Eichthal who is much pleased

1. Addressed: Thos. Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtoch / Dumfries / N.B. Postmarks: 26NO26 / 1833, and DUMFRIES / 28 NOV 1833. Franked by Chas. Buller, Jr. MS at Carlyle House, London. Published, with errors and omissions, in Elliot, I, 71–81. In reply to Carlyle's of Oct. 28, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 75–82; answer by Carlyle, Dec. 17, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 82–88. On Aug. 8, 1837, JSM wrote Carlyle to ask for the return of this letter, for the purpose indicated below in n. 18.

2. Charles Comte.

3. Charles Tanneguy, comte Duchâtel.

at the prospect of your going there. The books which I ordered were not ready when I left Paris & I do not even know what the bookseller whom Adolphe employed had & had not been able to get. I fear there is no Dictionnaire Neologique but that appended to the Dict. de l'Academie. The Hénault⁴ I expect to receive immediately, together with a map of the province "Île de France" & I have hopes of several tracts on the collier affair.⁵ Adolphe has sent your questions to several people whom he thought likely to be able to give you information, of whom one only has yet given him any answers; a certain Baron Darnay,⁶ who was then (viz. during the procès) a conseiller au parlement: his responses, which do not give much information, I inclose. Apropos I find that the parcel I destined for you did not go, last month; the cause being that Fraser promised to send for it, and faithlessly neglected to do so. I have ordered no very great number of books, & of those I doubt whether many would interest you much: the works of Ballanche,⁷ a sort of palingenetic philosopher now in some repute; Beranger's⁸ poems; the Proverbes of Leclerc;⁹ no memoirs except those of the Abbé Morellet¹⁰ which I had read before, & know to contain several revolutionary scenes which would interest you. But it seems to me that the writing, buying, and reading of books has come to an end in France as well as here; in France it may perhaps revive sooner than here, having been extremely rife only five years ago & perhaps only temporarily interrupted by the débordement de la politique et des petits écrits. Here it has perished by a gradual decay, and the causes of its melancholy fate are I fear permanent.

But now to attempt to tell you anything about France and Paris! I cannot; one or two personal portraits I think I could give you, & that is the sum of all my personal knowledge—I can only say, go and look; look & you will certainly see: there is abundance to be seen, known, & judged of in six months or a year, little or nothing in one month, especially when the object of one's visit is not exclusively to see. Except of some few individuals, I have brought back no impressions but very general ones, & of these scarcely one of which I am quite certain, except this one that there is an infinity of things to see, & that it requires a less piercing eye-

4. C. J. F. Hénault, Abrégé chronologique de l'histoire de France (Paris. 1744; and many later editions).

5. The famous "affair of the diamond necklace"; Carlyle's article, "The Diamond Necklace," was not published until 1837.

6. Probably Baron Antoine Darnay (d. 1837), who had served under Prince Eugène Beauharnais in Italy and had been "directeur général du royaume d'Italie."

7. Pierre Simon Ballanche (1776–1847), mystical philosopher. His Œuvres complètes (6 vols., Paris, 1830–32).

8. Pierre Jean de Béranger (1780–1857).

9. Michel Théodore Leclercq, Proverbes dramatiques (4 vols., Paris, 1823–26, and various later editions).

10. Mémoires inédites de l'Abbé Morellet . . . (2 vols., Paris, 1821).

sight to see them, than here, because the natural signs and expressions of feeling & character are in a much less degree repressed by the ponderous dull atmosphere of custom & respectability which weighs upon them here. It really does seem to me that people care infinitely less in Paris about keeping in the gig: or what comes to the same thing when we are speaking of a people, the gig is lower, far nearer to the ground, does not so easily break down with you, & it is easy stepping in as well as out. It does appear to me that it needs little or no courage at Paris, to make the openest profession of any kind of opinions or feelings whatever. It is the very place which a speculative man should desire for promulgating his opinions, for you startle nobody, you are sure of an audience; sure of being supported, & what is perhaps still better, sure of being attacked. How different here. Littérateurs and artists there are I fancy next to none—those who pass for such I had not time to go amongst, but you easily might. I could, had I stayed longer. I suspect we have been too much impressed, you and I and others, by the Literature of Despair.¹¹ I was in hopes that despair was the necessary consequence of having no Belief, in a nation at least, though not always in an individual: but I fear that is only in the nobler spirits, or at least the young persons of strong feelings and artistical capabilities. In France I see every reason to believe that the mass of the well-to-do classes can make themselves comfortable without either God or Devil, either literal or constructive, and are well satisfied to eat their pudding in quiet—those I mean who have enough pudding to eat, which is an infinitely larger proportion than in this country. Most of the educated people have enough to make them comfortable, and there is very little of the artificial demand for more money which the striving & straining for respectability occasions here; respectability there does not depend upon money. All agree that any man who can dress decently may dine with or go to the soirées of anybody, & mix on terms of perfect equality with all whom he meets. Then the peasantry commonly have their bit of land, & consider themselves also as lords of the soil: except, therefore, the ambitious spirits & the working population of Paris and the great towns, people seem to be tolerably content with their lot. The government has for the last year or two made great efforts to fix the attention of the people on les intérêts matériels, on schemes of commercial improvement, railroads & the like; & they are half mad, many of them, about railroads, in mere unreasoning imitation of England & England's "prosperity." The trades of Paris, like the manufacturers of Lyons have formed unions & are all striking for wages, i.e. the skilled labourers, those who are highly paid already: & impartial people, such as Adolphe d'Eichthal, say that their object is not so much, more money, as to elevate their rank in society, since at present the gentlemen will not keep

11. See Letter 82.

company with them & they will not keep company with the common labourers. The revolutionary part of the republicans have opened a connexion with these Trade Societies, and attempt to turn them to purposes of revolution, with what success I know not: they themselves say "the greatest," the other republicans say "not so great," the non-republicans say "none at all," from all which I infer that nothing can be known about it. If I had stayed I should have managed to attend some of the meetings of these workmen: though it seems they are jealous of the presence of gentlemen, even gentlemen-republicans. On the whole, politics are for the present very much out of vogue: nor do I know what is in vogue, except railroads: not the theatres, for people are ceasing to go there: not literature, for nothing is written or read except the usual succession of novels which went on even during the Reign of Terror. The newspapers, even, are little read compared with two years ago; & even la propagande républicaine has taken refuge in little penny papers which are hawked every Sunday in the streets & on the boulevards. One must be at Paris to know how profoundly irreligious the French are: the higher kind of books and newspapers have got beyond the irreligious state and are mostly prophesying a religion or regretting the impossibility of one—or have at least learnt to recognise a historical value in the religions of the Past or at most think it an old joke, too stale to be revived now: but the little feuilles which one buys as one goes into a theatre, are the representatives of the Voltairian philosophy at present: the summits of the national intellect have emerged above it, and it has descended to envelop & overshadow the lower regions. Our friends the St. Simonians now St. Simonians no longer, have done much good, & are still doing some. The Père,¹² as you may have seen in the newspapers, having been let out of prison before his sentence was expired, has gone, with Fournel & some others of the set who were engineers, to persuade the Pacha of Egypt to let them cut a canal across the Isthmus of Suez—whereby the deux mondes, the Orient & the Occident, are still to be réunis by means of them. What has become of those who went to Constantinople in search of la femme libre I do not know. One or two, especially Jules Lechevalier & Abel Transon, have become disciples of Fourier, a sort of Robert Owen who is to accomplish all things by means of cooperation & of rendering labour agreeable, & under whose system man is to acquire absolute power over the laws of physical nature; among other happy results, the sea is to be changed into lemonade. Some have become Catholics; but among these are none of the considerable men of the set. The great majority have retained of St Simonianism about as much as is good and true, dropping the rest. The Bazard portion have mostly become republicans, the Enfantin portion, who were rich, strong partisans of les moyens pacifiques, have become

12. Prosper Enfantin.

juste milieu men in politics, endeavouring to work out improvement with the existing machinery. The government, acting I suppose on the judicious maxim that a Utopian désenchanté is very manageable, has restored to most of them who were engineers miners or the like, their rank in the service. Michel Chevalier was scarcely out of prison when they selected him to be sent to the United States to study their canals & railways. Flachet is now one of the three editors of the Constitutionnel, where he writes good articles on free trade & such like matters: he seems a sensible man, without much enthusiasm left in him; he stuck to them to the last, & had by his own account a fièvre cérébrale from the suffering & anxiety it caused him; after which he was very near becoming a Christian: now he seems to be left with a vague presentiment that there will be a religion some time or other. Leroux,¹³ & Reynaud,¹⁴ whom you remember as the protester against Enfantin, (both of whom I saw) go on prophesying a religion in the Revue Encyclopédique; their notions are somewhat singular, Reynaud's especially who thinks that the future religion will not be revealed, nor brought to light at once, but will be evolved gradually by le progrès de la raison publique, like a science. They have all sorts of vagaries too about the "Orient" & are grubbing into Sanscrit and Chinese literature in hopes of finding something which may help towards raising up this religion which is to be built up, brick after brick. I recollect in a number of the Revue Encyclopédique one of them says in express terms that since we know hardly anything of the East except the Bible, & since that is so good, doubtless if we knew more we should find something still better.—Among the individuals of another kind whom I saw & formed an acquaintance with, two made a particular impression upon me; two perfectly self-subsistent men in the best sense, or I am greatly mistaken in them; & in that, honorably distinguished from Frenchmen in general. Both these are republican leaders; leaders however of two very different sorts of republicans; or rather, not leaders, but men who follow no other person's lead, and whom every one is glad to follow. These are, Carrel,¹⁵ the editor of the National, & Cavaignac,¹⁶ whose speech when on trial for a conspiracy two years ago I translated & inserted in the Examiner,¹⁷ where you may have seen it.¹⁸ I knew Carrel as the most powerful journalist in France, sole

13. Pierre Leroux (1798–1871), philosopher, journalist, and politician.

14. Jean Reynaud (1806–1863), philosopher.

15. Armand Carrel (1800–1836), journalist.

16. Godefroi Cavaignac (1801–1845), politician.

17. In the column headed "Foreign Intelligence: France," Examiner, April 24, 1831, pp. 266–67. Not listed in JSM's bibliography of his writings.

18. Most of what follows was reproduced by JSM in his essay on Armand Carrel, LWR, XXVIII (Oct., 1837), 66–111, reprinted in Dissertations, I, 237–308. The article also includes a tribute to Cavaignac.

manager of a paper which while it keeps aloof from all coterie influence & from the actively revolutionary part of the republican body, has for some time been avowedly republican; & I knew that he was considered a vigorous, energetic man of action, who would always have courage & conduct in an emergency. Knowing thus much of him, I was ushered into the National office where I found six or seven of the innumerable rédacteurs who belong to a French paper, all dark-haired men with formidable moustaches (which many of the republicans have taken to wearing) & looking fiercely republican. Carrel was not there, & after waiting some time I was introduced to a slight elegant young man with extremely polished manners, no moustaches at all, and apparently fitter for a drawing-room than a camp; this was the commander-in-chief of those formidable looking champions. But it was impossible to be five minutes in his company without perceiving that he was accustomed to ascendancy, & so accustomed as not to feel it; instead of that eagerness & impetuosity which one finds in most Frenchmen, his manner is extremely deliberate; without any affectation he speaks in a sort of measured cadence, & in a manner of which your words "quiet emphasis" are more characteristic than of any man I know: there is the same quiet emphasis in his writings: a man singularly free, if we may trust appearances, from self-consciousness; simple, graceful, almost infantinely playful as they all say when he is among his intimates, & indeed I could see that myself; & combining perfect self-reliance with the most unaffected modesty; in opinions, & political position, the Fonblanque of France; like Fonblanque, too, standing quite alone (je n'aime pas, said he to me one day, à marcher en troupeau) occupying a midway position, facing one way towards the supporters of monarchy & an aristocratic limitation of the suffrage, with whom he will have no compromise, on the other towards the extreme republicans who have anti-property doctrines, and instead of his United-States republic, want a republic de la façon de la Convention, with something like a dictatorship in their own hands: he calls himself a Conservative Republican (l'opinion républicaine conservatrice); not but that he sees plainly that the present constitution of property admits of many improvements but he thinks they can only take place gradually or at least that philosophy has not yet matured them: & he would rather hold back than accelerate the revolution which he thinks inevitable, in order to leave time for ripening those great questions, chiefly affecting the constitution of property & the condition of the working classes, which would press for a solution if a revolution were to take place. As for himself he says that he is not un homme spécial, that his métier de journaliste engrosses him too much to enable him to study, and that he is profoundly ignorant of much upon which he would have to decide if he were in power; & could do nothing but bring together a body generally representative of the people, & assist in carrying into execution the dictates of their united wisdom. This is modest enough in the man who would certainly be President of the Republic if there were a republic within five years & the extreme party did not get the upper hand. He seems to know well what he does know: I have met with no such views of the French Revolution in any book, as those I have heard from him.—A very different man from Carrel is Cavaignac; he is president of the Société des Droits de l'Homme, who are the active stirring revolutionary party, who look up to Robespierre, and aim at l'égalité absolue: he is for taking the first opportunity for overthrowing the government by force, & thinks the opportunity must come in six months, or a year at farthest: a man whose name is energy; who cannot ask you the commonest question but in so decided a manner that he makes you start: a man who impresses you with a sense of irresistible power & indomitable will; you might fancy him an incarnation of Satan, if he were your enemy or the enemy of your party, & if you had not associated with him & seen how full of sweetness and amiableness & gentleness he is: intense in everything, he is the intensest of atheists, & says, “je n'aime pas ceux qui croient en Dieu” because “it is generally a reason for doing nothing for Man”: but his notion of Duty is that of a Stoic; he conceives it as something quite infinite, & having nothing whatever to do with Happiness, something immeasurably above it: a kind of half Manichean in his views of the universe: according to him man's Life consists of one perennial & intense struggle against the principle of Evil, which but for that struggle would wholly overwhelm him: generation after generation carries on this battle, with little success as yet: he believes in perfectibility, & progressiveness, but thinks that hitherto progress has consisted only in removing some of the impediments to good, not in realising the good itself; that nevertheless the only satisfaction which man can realise for himself is in battling with this evil principle & overpowering it; that after evils have accumulated for centuries, there sometimes comes one great clearing-off on one day of reckoning called a revolution; that it is only on such rare occasions, very rarely indeed on any others, that good men get into power, & then they ought to seize the opportunity for doing all they can; that any government which is boldly attacked, by ever so small a minority, may be overthrown, & that is his hope with regard to the present government. His notion of égalité absolue is rather speculative than practical: he says he does not know whether it should be by an equal division of the means of production (land and capital) or by an equal division of the produce: when I stated to him the difficulties of both he felt & acknowledged them; all he had to propose were but a variety of measures tending towards an equalisation of property: & he seems to have a strange reliance on events, thinking that when the end is clearly conceived, the circumstances of the case would when power is in the right hands, suggest the most appropriate means. Cavaignac is the son of a Conventionalist and regicide. He is a much more accomplished man than most of the political men I saw there; has a wider range of ideas, converses on Art, & most subjects of general interest: always throwing all he has to say into a few brief energetic sentences, as if it was contrary to his nature to expend one superfluous word. Just as I was coming away he gave me the first two numbers of a periodical work¹⁹ which a set of republicans have just set up. All of it seems to be rubbish except the introductory discourse, which is by Cavaignac, and which is an exposition of his philosophy, his idea of "the significance of man's life": it contains all that I have just written to you & much of the same sort, but my impressions were not derived from it, but from his conversation; and the essay appeared to me a complete résumé of the man: such as it is, it made no sensation whatever; it flew over the heads of Carrel & the rest, they all voted it vague, abstract, metaphysical, & the like: you will be struck with it; I send it in Fraser's parcel. I am to correspond with Cavaignac and Carrel & various others and shall know much more of them I hope: with Carrel I am to establish an exchange of articles; Carrel is to send some to the Examiner and I am to send some to the National, with liberty to publish them here. I could tell you much more of these men & other men, but this is enough for one letter—let me hear your remarks & questions, and they will remind me of a hundred things which I have omitted. I have other things to write, too, not about Paris: but they must wait. On the whole, I think you will go to Paris next summer, and I probably shall pay my visit to you there instead of Craigenputtoch. You will find several persons there eager to be friendly, among others, Cousin.²⁰ His name reminds me of a hundred things to tell you in my next.—Let me hear from you soon. My best remembrances to Mrs Carlyle.—Vale mei memor.

J. S. MILL

Read Buller on Mirabeau in the Cochrane Review²¹—did you detect me in the Ex^r reviewing Miss Martineau, & Col. Napier?²²

19. Paris révolutionnaire, 4 vols., 1833–34 (reprinted, 1848). The introduction by Cavaignac was entitled "La Force révolutionnaire."

20. Victor Cousin (1792–1867), philosopher and educational reformer.

21. FQR, XII (Oct., 1833), 455–95.

22. Reviews of Harriet Martineau's A Tale of the Tyne in Examiner, Oct. 27, 1833, pp. 676–78; and of Col. Charles Napier's The Colonies in ibid., Nov. 24, 1833, pp. 740–41.

This postscript is written at the top of the first page.

92. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

26th November, 1833

Roebuck, Strutt,² Buller, and other radical members of Parliament have a scheme to start a radical review as their organ,³ with individual signatures like J.R., in which we should all of us write—the thing looks possible, and everybody seems so eager about it that I really think it will come to pass.

If so, it will train up both readers and writers for The Monthly Repository, The Examiner, Tait, and all. Strength is multiplied by division when it is growing strength. [. . .]

The Examiner has hoisted a flag of distress. Fonblanque cannot go on, and the paper may stop any week. He can retrench so as to cover the weekly loss if he had £1000 in hand. This he proposes raising by inducing 100 persons to pay £10 each, for which they are to receive his paper for ten years, and for which (without counting on any increase of sale) he can carry it on on the chance of reduction of the stamp duties within that time. What think you of the scheme? And if you think well of it, would you—not subscribe yourself—but mention the proposition to any persons you know who would?

A much better plan selon moi would be that someone who has £1000 should put it down himself to become the proprietor, keeping Fonblanque as editor only, and the other persons interested remaining creditors of the paper. If I were not in the India House and were going to remain in England I would do so immediately, that is, I would propose it to Fonblanque, who I think must consent—and I would have him as political editor and take the literary and art department myself. But that it seems cannot be—and I fear nobody else will—though it would at worst be only an advance without interest, at best an extremely profitable investment.

93. TO VICTOR COUSIN¹

India House, 30 novembre 1833

MON CHER MONSIEUR,

Parmi les documents que vous avez désiré avoir au sujet de ce qui ce fait ici sur l'éducation considérée comme affaire d'Etat, je n'ai pu encore me procurer que le discours de mon ami Roebuck,² qui m'a chargé de

1. Excerpts published in Garnett, pp. 151–52. MS not located.

2. Edward Strutt, later Baron Belper (1801–1880), then MP for Derby.

3. This was an early stage in the plans for the London Review, which was first published in 1835 with JSM as the real though not official editor.

* * * *

1. Published in J. Barthélemy-Saint-Hilaire, M. Victor Cousin, Sa Vie et Sa Correspondance (3 vols., Paris, 1895), I, 394–95. MS not located.

2. See Letter 82, n. 8. Roebuck frequently quoted Cousin in his speech.

vous en faire hommage en son nom. Vous verrez qu'il donne à l'élection populaire le choix des instituteurs primaires. Vous mettrez peut-être cela sur le compte du radicalisme; mais radicalisme ou non, je crois que, dans notre pays, où la centralisation n'est nullement dans les mœurs, c'est la le seul moyen de faire accepter par la nation l'éducation forcée.

Quant au commencement d'exécution que reçoit aujourd'hui ce principe introduit, pour ainsi dire, par supercherie, dans nos lois, mon ami Chadwick, qui en est l'auteur principal, m'a promis des renseignements que j'aurai l'honneur de vous faire parvenir par la première occasion. C'est alors que je prendrai la liberté de vous écrire plus au long.

Je n'ai pas encore vu Madame Austin, à qui cependant j'ai envoyé depuis longtemps les petits ouvrages que vous m'avez confiés pour elle. Un léger mal aux yeux qui m'a forcé de rester chez moi le soir, ne m'empêchera sans doute pas beaucoup plus longtemps d'aller la voir. Je ne sais pas si elle vous a écrit. Son adresse est, 5 Orme Square, Bayswater.

Agréez, mon cher Monsieur, l'hommage de mon profond respect.

J. S. MILL

Si vous vouliez me donner des nouvelles de votre santé, vous me feriez un très grand plaisir.

94. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

Kensington

22^d December 1833.

MY DEAR CARLYLE

Your letter had been hoped for and expected & in one sense waited for, a considerable time—for I had various matters of interest to write to you about, but as I hoped for a letter so soon I delayed writing till I could make my letter answer yours.

One of those matters is, the affair of the Examiner, of which you have heard somewhat from Hayward.² It is in difficulties, and those of so serious a kind, that if something had not been done or attempted immediately to save it, there was danger of its stopping altogether. The cause is melancholy enough, being less the circumstances of the paper, though it is not prosperous, than those of Fonblanque himself, who, like his father before him, has wanted firmness to restrain his expenses within his means. Since he

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle / Craigenputtoch / Dumfries / N.B. Postmarks: FREE / 24 DE 24 / 1833, and DUMFRIES / 26 DEC 1833. Franked by J. A. Roebuck. MS at NLS. Published, with omissions, in Elliot, I, 81–86. In reply to Carlyle's of Dec. 17, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 82–88; answered by Carlyle, Jan. 20, 1834, A. Carlyle, pp. 90–96.

2. Abraham Hayward (1801–1884), miscellaneous writer; strongly Tory in his views and in later life a bitter critic of JSM.

enlarged the paper in January 1831, it has yielded him little; it allows him nominally £500 a year; reckoning that in addition to its other expenses it has during these three years lost on the average £6 a week; which coming out of his £500 reduced it to below £200. He, meantime, has been living at a rate most needlessly expensive, and is at last so completely drained, & his credit I should think so completely exhausted, that he can go on no longer. Strange that a man who writes so feelingly and powerfully on this same weakness should so act—but not at all strange, only melancholy, that one who so acts, possessing intellect, should so write. If his difficulties do not ruin the paper, it is in no danger; for means of retrenchment present themselves to the extent of £8 or £9 a week, by discharging Chadwick,³ whose work Fonblanque takes upon himself in addition to his own; and by cheaper arrangements for printing and paper; which however depend upon first paying off an arrear to his printer & stationer. £1000 would do all this, & start him fair with £500 a year & an improving property; for advertisements, the great source of profit to a paper, have as you must have observed with pleasure, multiplied exceedingly in the Ex^r since the reduction of the duty. The £1000 it were to be wished that some one person of the right disposition should have advanced, becoming thereby proprietor, in the place of F. whose personal circumstances would then have ceased to compromise the paper, & who would of course have been retained as editor. This I would myself have proposed to do, were not my position with regard to the India House, which hampers my freedom of action in a thousand ways but which shall not hamper it always, in this case an insuperable obstacle. What has been attempted is, to raise the money in subscriptions of £10 each from 100 persons, each of whom is to receive the paper gratis for ten years. Sixty promises have been obtained, the remaining forty are still to seek: as many as twenty more are I think as good as certain—but less than the whole hundred will not do, for the debts on the paper amount to £780 & money to the extent of the remainder will then be wanted to start it fair, or perhaps (for I know not) to keep poor Fonblanque out of the King's Bench. I am doing all I can to interest people in the matter—and should have written to you among the first, had I not known that you could do little (if anything) in the way either of subscribing or procuring subscriptions. I think we shall succeed, but it will require a vigorous effort.—The sale of the Examiner does not much exceed 3000 copies. This is as you say a scandalous symptom, yet there are many causes that contribute to it besides the scandalous ones that first suggest themselves. Of course it can only expect buyers (readers are quite another matter) from radicals: now of these the more vulgar sort find as much radicalism in other papers, of a more direct and palpable kind, with greater breadth, as the painters say: for Fonblanque's genius, fine as it is, goes all into the details—not into the general mode of treating a subject: he does not go straight to the main point, despising all little side views, dwell upon that & make that tell—like the Times, which with materials of no intrinsic value whatever writes powerfully for popular effect, as Fonblanque might do with his powers, though scarcely with his turn of mind. Then F.'s allusions, expressions, stile, all the garb of his thoughts is intelligible, or at least impressive, only to persons of literary, one might say almost classical education, & most of them are not radicals.—Not to mention that such as do not take a daily paper, require in a weekly one a better abstract of news—that I hope will now in some degree be mended. Then the more moderate radicals are revolted by the tone of hatred in which the paper is written. This feeling extends to many who would have no objection to, but would applaud, the utterance of the bitterest truths, but do not like a perpetual carping at little things, honestly indeed, yet often unfairly & making no personal allowances, sometimes misstating altogether the kind of blame which is deserved, & meting it out in unequal measures to different people, so as to give an appearance of spleen & personal antipathy to individuals—especially to some of the Ministers, & among them, most perhaps to some of those who deserve it rather less than the others. In all this there is much truth; on the other hand much also is to be said for Fonblanque, but on the whole not enough to acquit him entirely. So he has really no partisans at all, & loses by almost all his excellencies and by his faults too. At the very time when he was offending the moderate radicals by the nature of his attacks on the ministry, he was losing at the rate of 100 subscribers every week for some time by resisting the anti-police furor. Still, the position of the paper will be a good one if this money can be raised, & raised I hope it will be.

3. Edwin Chadwick had been serving as sub-editor since 1830.

I have another piece of news to tell you: the principal radicals in parliament & many of those out of it have a scheme for starting a new quarterly review, & are exerting themselves so much for it that they will probably succeed in setting it going.⁴ The first promoters of it were Roebuck, Buller, & I; & we shall probably be the surest & most regular contributors, though there will be abundance of others—All the educated radicals to whom the thing has been mentioned enter into it with a degree of warmth unusual with them & offer both pecuniary & literary assistance. There is but one exception—and that one I lament to say is Grote—who has gradually sunk into a state always too congenial to him, of thinking that no good is to be done & who therefore will certainly never do any—at most no harm, & scarcely that, for it is harm to discourage others. A bookseller is willing to take the risk for two years provided editorship & writers are found for that period—in order to do so, the rich radicals,

4. These discussions led to the founding of the London Review the following year. See Letters 96 and 104.

Strutt, Warburton, Sir. W. Molesworth,⁵ the Marshalls⁶ of Leeds, & others, are going to raise money of the necessary amount among themselves & their friends, in shares of £25 or £50 the same person being allowed to take any number. The plan (Roebuck's & mine, to which all have at once assented) is, to drop altogether every kind of lying; the lie of pretending that all the articles are reviews, when more than half of them are not; and the lie of pretending that all the articles proceed from a corps, who jointly entertain all the opinions expressed. There is to be no we; but each writer is to have a signature, which he may avow or not as he pleases, but which (unless there be special reasons to constitute an exception) is to be the same for all his articles, thus making him individually responsible & allowing his opinions to derive what light they can from one another. The editor answers only for adequate literary merit, & a general tendency not in contradiction to the objects of the publication. They would I believe make me editor if I would take it—but I cannot; hampered again! but this time it is of little consequence, for I hope they will have Mr. Fox, who will be quite as fit: if they will not have him, there are other candidates not unfit though not so fit. If this scheme goes on, I hope you will write for the review or at least in it. As an organ of utterance it will be at least more congenial to you than Fraser's Magazine. It is true the prejudices of our Utilitarians are at least as strong against some of your writings as those of any other persons whatever, & though the individual signature would smooth many difficulties, even that would hardly, with them, have covered your "Characteristics" or "Teufelsdröckh" (were you afraid of the word Dreck?) but such an article as that on Johnson they would have delighted in; that on Ebenezer Elliott & various others of yours would have suited them perfectly. In fact, I hardly know one of your opinions, as often as you do not feel yourself called upon to make a direct attack upon themselves, which they would have any difficulty in getting on with: and I expect no difficulty in getting a passport for any of mine, which except in mere metaphysics, are quite as unlike theirs as yours are: what revolts them is the combination of opinions new & often strange to them, with a manner (to them) equally new & still more strange, & which prevents them not only from understanding your meaning but from desiring to understand it. I have never found one of them who, after taking the trouble to read enough of your writings to understand any thing of your drift, did not recognise in them much more of what he deemed good than of what he deemed bad; it is true I have found few who would take that trouble, & some of those few

5. Sir William Molesworth (1810–1855), politician, who in the following year supplied the money to establish the London Review.

6. A wealthy mill-owning family of Leeds, active in Reform politics, including: John Marshall (b. 1765), MP for York 1826–30; John Marshall (1797–1836), MP for Leeds 1832–35; and William Marshall (1796–1872), MP for various constituencies 1826–68.

would not have done so if they had not had faith (derived from my testimony) that it was worth while. I tell you this, to let you know how the land lies. There is nothing in what I have said that needs be any obstacle to your writing for this review—it simply shews under what conditions either of subject or else of manner your writings will be acceptable to it. To me your manner being the natural clothing or rather skin of your thoughts, is (whenever I understand those) all that it should be: so however is Plato's: whom however I would not counsel to preach at St Paul's in good Attic Greek: of course I am exaggerating, for the purpose of illustration. Here is a letter neither menschlich nor geistlich but wholly dinglich: you will be I think not more than a week without another letter; there is so much of the two former kinds to be said. I have not answered your letter, as you see. As for your letters, they are never, I think, more menschlich than when they are geistlich, nor more geistlich than when menschlich. Yours affectionately

J. S. MILL

I long to see your *Collier*⁷ book, yet could wish for the sake of it that you had received long since what you will receive soon, unless the diligence to which Adolphe d'Eichthal has entrusted it, prove unfaithful. This is, (if I rightly recollect, for I have not his letter by me) a collection, in two volumes 8^{vo}, of all the pièces du procès; a book without which, he says, everybody says there is no getting any conception of what it was. This book is to come, along with the Hénault,⁸ & shall go by Fraser's next, if it come in time. I know not why my parcel had not yet reached you. Do you still desire Babbage's book on Manufactures?⁹ I have at length borrowed it, & can lend. The Roland is mine, and I do not want it: your books have never returned after, generally much before they were needed. Beaumarchais¹⁰ works since you have not read them will be of the greatest value & interest to you—they throw light on a great deal, had immense effect at the time, & are works of real genius. I have them not; but will endeavour to borrow them—it is quite a new idea to me that you have need of them.—Fraser's address is or was lately, 22 Wilton Crescent. I see little of him. my kind regards to Mrs Carlyle.¹¹

Of the St Simonians next time; vide also a forthcoming Examiner.¹² Roebuck, & much else, postponed.¹³

7. See Letter 91, n. 5. For Carlyle's description of the two volumes JSM refers to, see footnote to chap. II of "The Diamond Necklace."

8. See Letter 91, n. 4.

9. See Letter 58, n. 18.

10. P. A. C. de Beaumarchais (1732–1799), the celebrated dramatist.

11. This postscript is written at the top of the first page.

12. Probably JSM's review in Examiner, Feb. 2, 1834, pp. 68–69. of St. Simonism in London (London, 1833), by Fontana and Prati.

13. This second postscript is written (upside down) at the very top of the first page.

95. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

Kensington
12th January 1834.

MY DEAR CARLYLE

Your little note dated the 24th was evidently written before you received my letter written I forget when, but which I fear lost the first week's post. I am therefore still expecting an answer to that letter, but shall not wait for it, mindful that I still owe you an answer to your last long letter,²—and a fuller answer too than can be given in any moderate space. I feel that letter a kind of call upon me to a more complete unfolding to you of my opinions and ways of thinking than I have ever yet made; which however cannot be all accomplished at once, but must be gradual. In the very fact that there has not been that full explanation, and that I feel moved to it now, you may see that there has taken place a great change in my character and one of which you will wholly approve—a change, not from any kind of insincerity, but to a far higher kind of sincerity than belonged to me before. This change has been progressive, and had barely begun to take place when you were in London two years ago. I was then, and had been for some years, in an intermediate state—a state of reaction from logical-utilitarian narrowness of the very narrowest kind, out of which after much unhappiness and inward struggling I had emerged, and had taken temporary refuge in its extreme opposite. My first state had been one of intense philosophic intolerance; not arising from the scornfulness of the heart but from the onesidedness of the understanding: seeing nothing myself but the distorted image, thrown back from many most oblique and twisted reflectors, of one side only of the truth. I felt towards all who saw any other side, not indeed a feeling of disdain, for that never was in my character but the very utmost excess of intellectual vilipending. At that time I was thought to outr the doctrines of utilitarianism, even by those who

1. Addressed: Tho^s. Carlyle Esq. / Craigenputtoch / Dumfries. Postmarks: EX / 14 JA 14 / 1834; C+ / 14 JA 14 / 1834; and DUMFRIES / 16 JAN 1834. Franked by Charles Buller. MS at NLS. Published, with omissions, in Elliot, I, 87–93. In reply to Carlyle's of Dec. 17 and 24, 1833, A. Carlyle, pp. 82–90; answered by Carlyle, Jan. 20, 1834, A. Carlyle, pp. 90–96.

2. Of Dec. 17, 1833.

now consider me a lost sheep who has strayed from the flock and been laid hold of by the wolves. That was not wonderful; because even in the narrowest of my then associates, they being older men, their ratiocinative and nicely concatenated dreams were at some point or other, & in some degree or other, corrected and limited by their experience of actual realities, while I, a school-boy fresh from the logic-school, had never conversed with a reality; never seen one; knew not what manner of thing it was; had only spun, first other people's & then my own deductions from assumed premisses. Now when I had got out of this state, and saw that my premisses were mere generalizations of one of the innumerable aspects of Reality, & that far from being the most important one; and when I had tried to go all round every object which I surveyed, and to place myself at all points of view, so to have the best chance of seeing all sides; I think it is scarcely surprising that for a time I became catholic and tolerant in an extreme degree, & thought one-sidedness almost the one great evil in human affairs, seeing it was the evil which had been the bane of my own teachers, & was also that of those who were warring against my teachers. I never indeed was tolerant of aught but earnest Belief; but I saw, or seemed to see, so much of good & of truth in the positive part of the most opposite opinions & practices, could they but be divested of their exclusive pretensions, that I scarcely felt myself called upon to deny anything but Denial itself. I never made strongly prominent my differences with any sincere, truth-loving person; but held communion with him through our points of agreement, endeavoured in the first place to appropriate to myself whatever was positive in him, & if he gave me any encouragement, brought before him also whatever of positive might be in me, which he till then had not. A character most unlike yours; of a quite lower kind, & which if I had not outgrown, & speedily too, there could have been little worth in me.—Do you remember a paper I wrote in an early number of Tait,³ reviewing a book by a Mr. Lewis (a man of considerable worth, of whom I shall have something more to say yet). That paper paints exactly the state of my mind & feelings at that time. It was the truest paper I had ever written, for it was the most completely an outgrowth of my own mind & character: not that what is there taught, was the best I even then had to teach; nor perhaps did I even think it so; but it contained what was uppermost in me at that time; and differed from most else that I knew in having emanated from me, not, with more or less perfect assimilation, merely worked itself into me.—Now from this my intellectual history, in relating which I have faith that I have not presumed too much upon your interest in me, you will easily see why it is that we two have so rarely canvassed together, or even mentioned to each other our differences. I never or rarely felt myself called upon to come into collision with any one, except those to whom I felt myself altogether superior, & with whom if I had any intellectual communion it was not for the sake of learning but of teaching. I have not, till lately, and very gradually, found out that this is not honest; that although I have not positively, I have negatively, done much to give to you and to others, a false opinion of me: though the deliberation with which you form your opinions, always waiting for sufficient grounds, has I think protected you from forming an actually false opinion of me, & I have only to accuse myself of not having afforded you sufficient means of forming the true. Whether if you knew me thoroughly I should stand higher, or lower, either in your esteem or in your affection, I know not; in some things you seem to think me further from you than I am, in others perhaps I am further from you than you know. On the whole I think if all were told I should stand lower; but there cannot fail, any way, to be much which we shall mutually not only respect but greatly prize in each other; and after all, this, as you & I both know, is altogether of secondary importance; the first being, that we, and all persons and all things, should be seen truly—and as they are.

3. See Letter 51, n. 15.

Our differences are indeed of the first importance, and to you must appear of infinite importance; though for reasons which you will feel the force of, they do not, in my feeling, throw me to so great a distance from you as they perhaps will in yours. The first and principal of these differences is, that I have only, what appears to you much the same thing as, or even worse than, no God at all; namely, a merely probable God. By probable I do not mean as you sometimes do, in the sense of the Jesuits, “that which has weighty authorities in its favour”. I mean that the existence of a Creator is not to me a matter of faith, or of intuition; & as a proposition to be proved by evidence, it is but a hypothesis, the proofs of which as you I know agree with me, do not amount to absolute certainty. As this is my condition in spite of the strongest wish to believe, I fear it is hopeless; the unspeakable good it would be to me to have a faith like yours, I mean as firm as yours, on that, to you, fundamental point, I am as strongly conscious of when life is a happiness to me, as when it is, what it has been for long periods now past by, a burthen. But I know that neither you nor any one else can be of any use to me in this, & I content myself with doing no ill, by never propagating my uncertainties. The reason why I think I shall never alter on this matter is, that none of the ordinary difficulties as they are called, as the origin of evil, & such like, are any serious obstacles to me; it is not that the logical understanding, invading the province of another faculty, will not let that other higher faculty do its office; there is wanting something positive in me, which exists in others; whether that something be, as sceptics say, an acquired association, or as you say, a natural faculty. So you see I am nearly as proper an object of your pity as Cavaignac; nevertheless I do not feel myself so, having, as I have, other supports, which the want of that one cannot take away. With respect to the immortality of the soul I see no reason to believe that it perishes; nor sufficient ground for complete assurance that it survives; but if it does, there is every reason to think that it continues in another state such as it has made itself here, & no further affected by the change than it would be by any equally great event during its sojourn on earth, were such possible. Consequently in all we do here we are working for our "here-after" as well as our "now."—Now, were you aware that I was in such a state of uncertainty on these main points? I am almost sure that you were not much mistaken in the matter, but yet were not quite certain that you knew.

Another of our differences is, that I am still, & am likely to remain, a utilitarian; though not one of "the people called utilitarians"; indeed, having scarcely one of my secondary premisses in common with them; nor a utilitarian at all, unless in quite another sense from what perhaps any one except myself understands by the word. It would take a whole letter to make it quite clear to you what I mean; & I feel perfectly that I have stated the difference between us in a manner & in terms which give no just idea of what it really is, & that every explanation I shall hereafter make will show that difference to be less than the words I have used seem to import. One of the explanations I have to give, I partly indicate by saying, as I do most fully, that I entirely recognise with you the "infinite nature of Duty".⁴ Yet by this too, if unexplained, I should convey an idea of as much greater an agreement with you than the truth warrants, as I do in the other case of a less agreement. This also must wait till another time for a fuller developement. You will see, partly, with what an immense number & variety of explanations my utilitarianism must be taken, & that those explanations affect its essence, not merely its accidental forms, when I tell you that on the very point on which you express your belief so kindly & with so much ménagement and appeal to my future self, & promise not to be angry if I differ from you "even with vehemence", I agree & have long agreed with you, even in the most decided and vehement manner. I have never, at least since I had any convictions of my own, belonged to the benevolent-ary, soup-kitchen school. Though I hold the good of the species (or rather of its several units) to be the ultimate end, (which is the alpha & omega of my utilitarianism) I believe with the fullest Belief that this end can in no other way be forwarded but by the means you speak of, namely by each taking for his exclusive aim the developement of what is best in himself.⁵ I qualify or explain this doctrine no otherwise than as you yourself do, since you hold that every human creature has an appointed task to perform which task he is to know & find out for himself; this can only be by discovering in what manner such faculties as he possesses or can acquire may produce most good in the world: meaning by the world a larger or a smaller part of it as may happen. Thus you think it a part of your duty, of your work, to address yourself, through the press, to the "species" at large. Further than that I do not go; perhaps even less far. And when once I have written down my Belief & sent it forth in such manner as happens or seems to be the most effectual within my reach, I harass myself as little as you do with any thought about the consequences; being like yourself perfectly satisfied that what I have done, if done in the spirit of my own creed, will "prove in reality all & the utmost that I was capable of doing" for mankind.

4. From Carlyle's letter (see A. Carlyle, p. 84); cf. also Sartor Resartus, Bk. II, chap. 9.

And now do not "take it ill" if I say how much it surprised me that you should think it necessary to say you would not "take it ill" if I differed from you. I never for an instant suspected that you would take ill any difference of opinion while you continue fully assured that the dissentient is sincere, earnest, & truth-loving: and you never allow me to be under a moment's fear that you are unassured of that in my case. Grieved you might be at what you might deem my errors, but that feeling you could not mean to disavow; nor would it be any pleasure to me, but the contrary, if you could.—In your recent letters you have several times expressed surprise at opinions & feelings of mine which you did not expect, & which you have said proved to you how little you yet know me; & which in truth did shew, how small a part of my character I had yet shewn to you; so much smaller a part than I was aware of: truly I begin to think that instead of being as I once thought I was, the most self-conscious person living, I am much less self-conscious now, (whatever I was once) than almost anybody. But what most shews how little I had afforded you an insight into, is that the fact of my having recently read the New Testament, & what I wrote to you of the impressions it had made upon me,⁶ should have formed as it seems to have done, an era in your opinion & feeling concerning me. In my own history it is no era; it has made no new impression, only strengthened the best of the old: I have for years had the very same idea of Christ, & the same unbounded reverence for him as now; it was because of this reverence that I sought a more perfect acquaintance with the records of his life, that indeed gave new life to the reverence, which in any case was becoming or was closely allied with all that was becoming a living principle in my character.

5. "The good of the species . . . I leave, with the most perfect trust, to God Almighty, the All-governing who does comprehend it; believing withal . . . that no good thing I can perform, or make myself capable of performing, can be lost to my Brothers, but will prove in reality all and the utmost that I was capable of doing for them." Carlyle's letter of Dec. 17, 1833, A. Carlyle, p. 85.

6. In Letter 87.

Here is a very long letter; yet how little it says of all that is to be said! However you see that you are likely to know much more of me hereafter than you have known hitherto. I must expend this remaining space on matters of fact. The two volumes on the collier, together with Henault⁷, came from Adolphe d'Eichthal & went off immediately, I hope in time to go by Fraser's last parcel. I wonder at your not having received the other books. The Examiner subscribers amount now to 80 of the required 100, & others are known to be coming.—The review proceeds hopefully, but assurance is needed of a greater number of acceptable writers. The paper on the Repository was mine, also that in last Examiner on the new number,⁸ & I have recommenced my French articles. The paper on Miss Martineau⁹ was really a paper on Impressment. D'Eichthal says you will find much on the collier in the history by the Abbé Montgaillard,¹⁰ and in the Mémoires secrets de Bachaumont:¹¹ this last person wrote down the doings & talkings of every successive day. The 2 vols I have sent, contain the mémoires of the different parties in the cause. How find you the Goesman Memoires?¹² Make my kind remembrances to Mrs Carlyle and believe me Faithfully yours

J. S. MILL.

96. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

Kensington,
17th January, [1834]²

MY DEAR SIR,

Your letter gave me the pleasure your letters always do, and that is a constantly increasing pleasure, for every fresh communication discloses new points of agreement and sympathy. Whoever else may have difficulty

7. See Letter 91, n. 4 and 5.

8. "The Monthly Repository for December," Examiner, Dec. 15, 1833, pp. 788–89; "The Monthly Repository for January," ibid., Jan. 12, 1834, p. 21.

9. See Letter 91, n. 22.

10. Abbé G. H. R. de Montgaillard, Histoire de France . . . (9 vols., Paris, 1827).

11. L. P. de Bachaumont, Mémoires secrets . . . (36 vols., London, 1777–89).

12. Since Carlyle had inquired (Dec. 17, 1833) whether JSM had "his [Beaumarchais'] Mémoires," probably a reference to the section of that work which deals with L. V. Goetzman (1730–1794).

* * * *

1. Published by Knight, pp. 661–63. MS not located. The indicated deletion in the letter is by Knight.

2. Knight dates this letter as 1833, but internal evidence, notably the discussion of the projected Review, clearly points to 1834 as the correct year. See also n. 3.

in co-operating, we two shall find it easy; for wherever we turn our minds separately to the same subject, we seem always to arrive at the same, or at the lowest, perfectly harmonious conclusions. . . . About the Review—though I felt almost sure that you would approve of it, and enter into it with the warmth which I wish were as characteristic of all our friends as of you, it is no less a satisfaction to me to find that I was not mistaken. The project advances, and if we had a sufficient list of good writers on whom we could rely so as to be independent of chance contributions, we could start almost immediately; but, unhappily, “the harvest is great, and the labourers are few”—there are scarcely any first-rate minds forming—indè origo mali—we want such an organ quite as much to train up public instructors, to erect a Normal School of Literature as for any temporary or party purposes. Though I do not say so to any one whose zeal I am afraid of damping, I do not think we shall be ready before the 1st of January next year. We can do little till Parliament meets, and our friends come to town; and our arrangements will not be made in time to publish the first number before the end of the session, which is so bad a time for a new literary undertaking that it will be better to postpone, and employ the delay in accumulating a stock of good articles to start with. Meantime, we shall increase our corps, and shall ascertain the result of several experiments, especially Tait’s reduction of price (Roebuck, who has just come from Bath, says the reduction will tenfold the sale in that city, but then Tait’s magazine means Roebuck’s magazine, at Bath, where his popularity is boundless. I say boundless, because he is able to get over everything though constantly meeting with rubs. Two public meetings have been necessary to obliterate the impression produced by his having, in Tait, termed Watts’ hymns a “wretched farrago”).³ About an editor—the fittest who has presented himself, and also the least objected to hitherto, is Mr. Fox, whom you know probably most as a writer in The Westminster Review, and leader of the Political Union in London. His principles, opinions, talents, and attainments, render him, I think, eminently fit; the objection is his being a Unitarian minister, and that objection is only as to the appearance, not the fact, as you well know if you ever read The Monthly Repository, of which he is editor and proprietor, and has divested it of its sectarian character so completely as to have lost the support of almost all the Unitarians. His religion, of the most unobtrusive kind, is what the religion of all denominations would be, if we were in a healthy state—a religion of spirit, not of dogma, and catholic in the best sense. For writers, those we most rely on for regular support are my father, who, if he continues to be satisfied with the conduct of the Review, will, I have no doubt, write frequently; Roebuck, Buller, and myself (the originators of the scheme), Fonblanque, John Wilson, secretary to the Factory Commission, a most valuable man; Fox himself, to whom we have now the pleasure of adding you. Strutt and Hawkins⁴ will write occasionally. Many others, some of them most valuable, have promised assistance, but we cannot count upon them to the same extent. With some of the very best it is on the cards whether they will be able to give us much of their time or none; for instance, Chadwick, the poor Law Commissioner, one of the most remarkable men of our time in the practical art of Government, Dr. Southwood Smith,⁵ and a variety of others. Can you help us to swell the list? Since I have mentioned The Monthly Repository, I will exhort you if it falls in your way to read it, and I should be happy, if it does not, to send you a number now and then as I am anxious both for Mr. Fox's sake and for its merit, to spread it abroad in every way—it has an uphill fight for success, having lost almost all its old circulation and gained an entirely new one—and it has little or no bibliopolic support. It is highly gratifying to me to find my views on the definition and method of Political Economy⁶ coinciding with those of so competent a judge as yourself—it is by the approbation of such persons as you (and how few they are) that the fate of such speculations must be decided—but I hope for more from you than simple approbation, you who will enter perfectly into the spirit of all I have written so far as it is true, will also be able to add much to it and to suggest all manner of further developments, clearer explanations and apter illustrations, and I most earnestly beg you to do so—as I am ambitious that the essay, even if for that end it should remain unpublished for twenty years, should become classical and of authority; and as I am persuaded that the foundation of the truth is here, I do not despair by the help of the very few whose help is worth having in such a case, of gradually perfecting the execution until it may deserve more than an ephemeral existence. I was prepared for our agreeing in the main, as I think we always shall on questions of philosophic method, because we always have hitherto, and because we have both of us laid the foundation in the study of physics. Though my acquaintance with either mathematical or experimental science is not profound as yours is, but extremely superficial, it is sufficient to have enabled me to lay hold of the methods and appropriate to myself fully as much as any metaphysician has ever done, the logic of physical science—yet I feel great imperfections still in that department, and look forward to soliciting much of your aid not only for little things like this but for a much more elaborate work on Logic which

3. Roebuck’s phrase did not specifically refer to Isaac Watts’ hymns but to a work called “The Second Catechism, without Proofs,” published by the Sunday School Union. See “Children’s Books,” Tait’s, IV (Dec., 1833), 285–86.

4. Probably John Heywood Hawkins (1803–1877), MP for Newport, Isle of Wight, 1832–41.

5. Dr. Thomas Southwood Smith (1788–1861), sanitary reformer, active Benthamite and Unitarian.

6. See Letters 86 and 102.

I have made some progress in. I am extremely glad that you are writing for the F.Q.⁷ an article which I have long wished written, and look forward to its perusal with great expectation both of pleasure and of valuable suggestions for the guidance of my own mind. It is a great honour to my MS. that you should wish to quote anything from it in your article; I most readily delegate to you absolute powers over it for that purpose; only the very flattering expressions which you are kind enough to apply to it in your letter induce me to request that if you mention my name (which I leave to your option) the quotation may be left to speak for itself. The passport of your recommendation is given by the fact of its insertion, and the public have seen so much of coteries of men puffing one another into a fictitious reputation that one is anxious to avoid any such appearance—but you do not need that I should say to you these things—though if I were writing of you perhaps I should. My habit and inclination is to simplicity in all things, and I can as little conceive that a man of any dignity of character can feel hurt by praise as by blame—but one is obliged to defer to appearances and avoid vulgarising oneself by being confounded with the herd of those who quack for a reputation. Tait has shown his usual want of delicacy (he has the least nicety of perception of all men I know) in laying praise with a trowel on his own contributors as he does—if I had not been past blushing I should have blushed the other day both for him and those of us whom he bedaubed in a recent number.⁸

Yours ever,

J. S. MILL.

97. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

India House
13th February
1834

MY DEAR SIR

A few weeks ago I cashed the accompanying draft for our friend Roebuck and I now send it, but am in no hurry for payment.

The first number of your new series is I think better than any of the old—and I like the getting up & the outward & inward appearance of the new much more than of the old.

7. No such article seems to have appeared in the Foreign Quarterly Review.

8. Probably a reference to this sentence: "We [Tait's Magazine] had the most gifted political writers of the day with us, and a publisher who, for activity and industry, has not been surpassed . . ." (Tait's, IV [Jan., 1834], 494).

* * * *

1. MS at LSE.

Is the "English Opium-Eater" the author of the clever gossiping paper on Hannah More?² and is it permitted to ask who he is? & also who is the writer on "the Decline & Fall of the Empire of Fashion"?³

The paper I like least is that on the "Streets of London."⁴

I shall expect with some anxiety the result of the experiment of lowering the price. Roebuck says that it will increase tenfold the sale at Bath—but Bath is not a fair specimen, for Tait to the Bath people means Roebuck, & all his party who can afford it are sure to buy it—

Ever yours

J. S. MILL.

98. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

Friday [Feb. 14?, 1834]

I send the first of the notes²—I have two short ones besides, which I do not send yet, because something may occur in the remaining days of the month to change them.

You will tell me when I must close the series & send them to press?

On looking again at those two articles in the last M. R. I wonder how I could ever have said what I did say to their disadvantage—but I suppose first impressions, in a question of manner, are most likely to be right.

Thibaudeau³ is so dilatory that I fear I shall scarcely have my French paper for this month.

I like the Coriolanus⁴ better on a second reference to it.

I hope we shall meet oftener—we four or rather five⁵—as we did on Tuesday—I do not see half enough of you—and I do not, half enough,

2. [Thomas De Quincey], "Mrs. Hannah More," Tait's, IV (Dec., 1833), 293–321.

3. Tait's, NS I (Feb., 1834), 54–59. Author not identified.

4. "London Sights—The Streets," Tait's, pp. 38–44.

* * * *

1. MS at King's. Excerpt published by Hayek, pp. 92–93, but dated as of "about April 1834."

2. For his series, "Notes on the Newspapers," in MR, VIII, March–Sept., 1834. The first four of the notes are dated Feb. 5, 6, 7, and 12. For paging, see MacMinn, Bibliog., p. 38.

3. Comte Adolphe Narcisse Thibaudeau (1795–1856), administrator, friend of Lafayette, Carrel, and Cavaignac, writer of English correspondence signed O. in the National.

4. [W. B. Adams], "Coriolanus No Aristocrat," MR, VIII (Jan.–April, 1834), 41–54, 129–39, 190–202, 292–99.

5. The group probably included Eliza and Sarah Flower, Mrs. Taylor, Fox, and JSM.

see anybody along with her⁶—that I think is chiefly what is wanting now—that, and other things like it—

J. S. M.

99. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

Saturday [Feb. 22, 1834]

On second thoughts I do not find so much to say as I expected about tithes—a few lines will do their business.² If it would not be troublesome & expensive to add & subtract when the article is in type, we might see how much it prints to, & then judge. I go on at all events, writing the notes, so if it be found worth while to introduce a half sheet in the manner you mention, there is sure to be matter enough to fill it up.

On the subject of attendance³ I agree with you, & will subjoin the sentence you suggest—respecting libel⁴ I adhere to the full extent of my opinion, and should be glad if you differ from me to make the M.R. the scene of an amicable controversy on the subject. I think “tolerance, freedom, and sincerity” would not be generated; to suppose they would, is to suppose that the revelations in question would ultimately lead to this, that true statements would be believed & false ones disbelieved: now my whole argument rests upon this as its foundation that truth, in any rational sense of the term, cannot in such cases be got at by the public; that true charges cannot be distinguished from false ones by such a tribunal. I should expect one of two results; that the lives of all but the independent in fortune & brave in heart, would be thoroughly artificialized, by becoming one continued struggle to save appearances & escape misinterpretation, or else that freedom would work itself out by what seems to have taken place in America, calumny & scandal carried to such a length that nobody believes anything which appears in print, & as none can escape such imputations, nobody regards them.

J.S.M.

6. Mrs. Taylor.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmarks: T. P / Leadenhall St, and 7 NIGHT 7 / FE. 22 / 1834. MS at King's. Published in part in Garnett, pp. 153–54.

2. The note on “The Ministerial Resolutions on the Irish Tithe,” dated Feb. 21, did not appear in the March Repository but headed the “Notes on the Newspapers” in the April number (VIII, 233–34).

3. “Attendance in the House,” MR, VIII (March, 1834), 167–69.

4. “Mr. O’Connell’s Bill for the Liberty of the Press,” ibid., pp. 173–76. Daniel O’Connell (1775–1847), the famous Irish politician, had proposed that in cases of private libel, truth should be a justification. JSM saw “insuperable objections” to permitting the details of private conduct to be subjected to judicial investigation whenever any accuser wished. See Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent, p. 274 n.

[Postscript probably intended for Eliza Flower]

The three beautiful children⁵ shall have justice done them on the appearance of the third⁶—The birth of the eldest was announced,⁷ and a good word spoken for the expected family—

February⁸ is a beauty—but March⁹ is grand—

I wish I could give him¹⁰ half of my health and take half of some of his other endowments.

J.S.M.

Now I hope you will get this in time—

100. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

[Feb. 24, 1834]

Let it be so by all means. You will have received today from her,² the note on Tithes.³ As the subject will have got on into another stage by next month, this might if there be room & if it is worth while, be added at the end of the N^o. as a separate short article.

I know all about the Saturday scheme, & in any way if it takes effect I hope to have a share in it. How could it give pain, or anything but extreme pleasure to me? but all the pros and cons have been discussed yestereven and she will have told you all that we think about it.

On the truth question she completely agrees with me.⁴

Health and peace and blessing and love to both—and continue to give some love to me as I do to you—

J.S.M.

It was sweet of you to write those last words.⁵

5. A feature of the Repository for 1834 was the publication each month of a "Song of the Month," music by Eliza Flower.

6. JSM praised the songs in his notice "Songs of the Months, Nos. I, II, III, IV," Examiner, April 20, 1834, p. 244.

7. In his notice, "The Monthly Repository for January," Examiner, Jan. 12, 1834, p. 21.

8. Charles Reece Pemberton's "St. Valentine's Day," MR, VIII (Feb., 1834), 99.

9. Sarah Flower's "Winds and Clouds," MR (March, 1834), 203.

10. Evidently Fox.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmarks: T. P. / Leadenhall St. / 7 NIGHT 7 / FE 24 / 1834, and 8 MORN 8 / FE 25 / 1834. MS at King's. Published in part in Garnett, p. 154.

2. Mrs. Taylor.

3. See preceding letter, n. 2.

4. Ibid., n. 4.

5. The postscript was probably intended for Eliza Flower.

101. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

Kensington

2d March 1834

MY DEAR CARLYLE

This is going to be a strange miscellaneous kind of a letter. I have a long arrear of little things to bring up, and for the present few great ones to say—and am in a mood in which it is impossible for me to say them if I had, for nothing but the most dogged determination not to lose another post could induce me to overcome the extreme aversion which I feel to writing a letter this morning. I must take your two letters as an index of the subjects to be written about. First, to answer your questions as to the projected Periodical. On a rough classification of periodicals into Tory, Whig, & Radical, there are as you truly say, various radical reviews & magazines already; even radical-utilitarian ones; but the radical-utilitarians who promote this new project, do not recognise in any of the existing works what they want; they wish to throw the combined strength of the most thoughtful & fertile-minded of the radicals into one publication, of a more weighty & elaborate character than any magazine can be; allowing itself to treat subjects at greater length than the Repository, or Tait; excluding all things which compromise the radical cause by platitude, or mediocrity, or ignorance, or subservience to any popular delusion; & on the whole representing as favourably as the materials admit, the radical intellect, which certainly is not, & never has been, fairly represented. Tait and the Westminster give an altogether exaggerated notion of its poverty and bareness. The “philosophical radicals” are narrow enough, it is true, though few of them are so narrow as Col. Thompson, the presiding spirit of the Westminster Review. But many of them are far from being empty; and they are generally much offended by the emptiness of the radical publications. I have no doubt that this review if it be started, will be one with which it will be pleasant to be associated; one will have not only more freedom, but far better companionship than in any publication which has yet existed. I have no doubt of its being established, except that which arises from my abundant experience of the incapacity of the radicals to cooperate. Those of them who have money, & station, are mostly impracticably fastidious; men of small objections; men to whom small difficulties appear great ones. They mostly surprised me by taking up this scheme with warmth.—Your papers on Knox, & on Authors,² would both, I think, be extremely suitable to such a work: suitable both in respect to the subjects, & to the light in which you are likely to place them—You have time before you however, for as it will not be possible to start the work until the dead time of the year, we think it better to wait for the beginning of the next. Before the time therefore when it will be necessary to set about one or other of your articles, you will have heard more; I hope, seen: for if you come to London you can judge for yourself.

1. Addressed: Tho^s Carlyle Esq / Craigenputtoch / Dumfries / N.B. Postmarks: FREE / 3 MR 3 / 1834; O / MR 3 / 1834; and DUMFRIES / 5 MAR 1834. Franked by Chas. Buller. MS at NLS. Published in part in Elliot, I, 93–97. In reply to Carlyle's of Jan. 20 and Feb. 22, 1834, A. Carlyle, pp. 90–99; answered by Carlyle, April 18, 1834, A. Carlyle, 99–102.

I greatly commend your project of establishing yourself here; which I have long thought would, as far as all circumstances are concerned of which I could judge, be the best thing you could do. I have thought so, this much more than ever, lately, in proportion as I have seen that you are capable of deriving much pleasure & support from communion with persons who are even a little superior to the herd in any of the elements of spiritual worth. I can now promise you, what I had not ventured to promise a year ago, that you will find many more persons than you expect who will be more or less in sympathy with you, & interesting to you. Any way, you will find many more here than anywhere else. Meantime you may reckon upon my doing all I can to smooth the way to your coming, & when you are come, to your finding all that you do or may seek.

The parcel of books came through Tait, a considerable time before they were announced; & came safe, but, by what misadventure I know not, saturated with whiskey: from the odour of which it will require considerable airing to free them, so thoroughly are they impregnated. You have not told me whether you will have Babbage. I have not much else to send you, except Repositories. I would send Montgaillard & Bachaumont³ if I had them or knew how to obtain them but by ordering them from a bookseller. Of the former I once read the first two volumes, & found much in them which at that time interested me; you will find the title in the review I wrote for the W.R. of Scott's Napoleon⁴ if you still have the copy I gave you (if you have not I will send you another). Of Bachaumont, a work in innumerable volumes, I know nothing but what I may have read of it in the spurious Memoirs of Louis 18th,⁵ which they say were almost wholly

2. Carlyle in his letter of Jan. 20, 1834, suggested that he might write for the proposed review two articles he had long had in mind, an "Essay on Authors" and another on John Knox. The first he seems never to have written, and one on Knox not until 1875. He did deal with Knox, however, in his lecture on "The Hero as Priest" (1840).

3. See Letter 95, n. 10 and 11.

4. "Scott's Life of Napoleon," WR, IX (April, 1828), 251-313. See Letters 19 and 22.

5. Mémoires de Louis XVIII, recueillis et mis en ordre par M. le Duc de D [or rather, written by E. L. de La Mothe Houdancourt, pseudonym of Baron de La Mothe-Langon] (12 vols., Paris, 1832-33).

made up from it, & which were certainly most amusing & most like an authentic picture of what one may suppose to have been going on then. By the way, have you ever read the Memoirs of St Simon?⁸ (the Duc de St Simon in the time of Louis 14th.) From what I read of it formerly (an abridged or rather mutilated edition) & from all I have heard of it since the complete edition appeared, I should think that no more complete setting before one's eyes of a set of human creatures, had ever been achieved: the creatures themselves it is true were as little worth it, as any who have really existed can well be. Adolphe has repeated his recommendation of Montgaillard & Bachaumont, which therefore I suppose would be of real & great use to you.

What of work I have been doing lately has been chiefly for the day, until something of a more durable kind ripen itself within me. You will have recognised in the Examiner the resumption of my papers on French politics.⁷ Besides these I have written in the last Repository & mean to continue during the session "notes on the newspapers"⁸ so as to present for once at least a picture of our "statesmen" & of their doings, taken from the point of view of a radical to whom yet radicalism in itself is but a small thing. This was worth doing I think, & I have not been capable of doing much else lately. The Repository is also publishing some notes of mine upon Plato,⁹ mostly written long ago, which I thought might be of some interest & perhaps use, chiefly because they do not speculate and talk about Plato, but shew to the reader Plato himself. Copies of these I will speedily send to you through Simpkin & Marshall.—I am not at all "amazed" at your reading Homer, & should like very much to hear all you will have to say about him.—I entirely agree in what you say about Beaumarchais; of Morellet¹⁰ I have no very accurate recollection.

I have scarcely heard at all from any of my acquaintances (correspondents I cannot call them) at Paris; except a note from Cousin asking me to do some things for him, & the least, or shortest word of salutation from Cavaignac. His preface to "Paris Revolutionnaire"¹¹ impressed me, much as it did you. It was to me, also, a résumé and piecing together of many scattered and fragmentitious notions gathered from his conversation. I have no doubt of the perfect sincerity of the paper; that is, of its containing the genuine views of life and human nature, which have possessed themselves of his convictions, & by which he steers his own course. He is

6. The complete edition referred to below was: Mémoires complets et authentiques du Duc de Saint-Simon (21 vols., Paris, 1829–30). Prior to this, from 1788 on, various incomplete editions had appeared.

7. The summary of French news in the Examiner each week from Dec. 29, 1833, to Feb. 16, 1834.

8. See Letter 98, n. 2.

9. See Letter 88, n. 5.

10. See Letter 91, n. 10.

11. See ibid., n. 19.

accused however, of being much influenced by vanity, & the love of popularity: I should have thought, without ground, had not the most keen-sighted & penetrating discernor of character I ever knew, drawn from opportunities of observation at least equal to mine, that very inference.—I am not much surprised at not hearing from Carrel, as he is in such a state of persecution & harassing from the French government. This you will have learnt from the Examiner.

Fonblanque's business goes well. Thanks for your mention of it to Tait; who has subscribed, & promised to speak to others. There is no necessity however for any further exertions, as the money is now all obtained or as good as obtained.

I would say something in acknowledgment of your so kind answer to my letter of "revelations" but I really cannot, just now, say anything of what I would say. I would rather ask of you, to speak more & more freely to me on those subjects & unfold to me more & more your whole mind in regard to them. I will also ask one or two questions more: Is not the distinction between Mysticism, the mysticism which is of Truth, & mere dreaming, or the substitution of imaginations for realities, exactly this, that mysticism may be "translated into logic?" I mean in the only sense in which I ever endeavour so to translate it. You will understand what I mean. Logic proves nothing, yet points out clearly whether and how all things are proved. This being my creed, of course none of my mysticism, if mysticism it be, rests on logic as its basis; yet I require to see how it looks in the logical dialect before I feel sure of it. And if I have any vocation I think it is exactly this, to translate the mysticism of others into the language of Argument. Have not all things two aspects, an Artistic and a Scientific; to the former of which the language of mysticism is the most appropriate, to the latter that of Logic? The mechanical people, whether theorists or men of the world, find the former unintelligible, & despise it. Through the latter one has a chance of forcing them to respect even what they cannot understand—and that once done, they may be made to believe what to many of them must always be in the utmost extent of the term "things unseen." This is the service I should not despair of assisting to render, & I think it is even more needed now than works of art, because it is their most useful precursor, & one might, almost say, in these days their necessary condition.

Expand to me also more & more the meaning of "Humility" and "Entsagen."

I had almost forgotten to mention the cost of those books. The Mémoires Adolphe was obliged to pay 24 francs for; if they be not worth that to you, they will (when you have done with them) to me, who am a sort of collector of books on French history. The Hénault cost (I think) 12 francs.

There were I believe no others. Adolphe said he knew of no Dictionnaire Néologique, and we tried together to get a map of the "Ile de France" but could not find one. A map of the department of Seine et Oise might be got of course, & I expected that Adolphe would have sent it if he still found it impossible to procure the other. It can be got immediately if it would still be of use.

I am thinking of ordering from Paris a series which is in the course of publication & which from notices in the National I see to be very interesting, "Histoire parlementaire de la révolution française"¹² being by far the completest collection ever made of original documents; including debates in the Clubs, & so forth. There are likewise memoirs concerning & papers of Mirabeau,¹³ published by a relation of his & undoubtedly authentic, but I fear having but little in them. These I shall attempt to borrow & look through before I buy them.

Thiers completely verifies the impression his history makes. Even among French ministers he stands out, conspicuously unprincipled.

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

102. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

India House,
15th April, 1834.

MY DEAR SIR,

The inclosed statement is all that I have been able to think of that can at all promote your purpose. It is taken from the annual statistical volume now published by the Board of Trade, and prepared by Mr. Porter,² of that department; a most valuable collection, which you ought to have, as it will not only save you hundreds of troublesome references, but also afford much information, the very existence of which you would not otherwise know of. This account, like many others in the volume, was prepared from returns furnished by the Inspector General of Exports and Imports

12. P. J. B. Buchez and P. C. Roux, Histoire parlementaire de la révolution française . . . (40 vols., Paris, 1833–38). Carlyle later reviewed the first twenty-three volumes for the LWR, V (April, 1837), 233–47.

13. Mémoires biographiques, littéraires et politiques de Mirabeau, écrits par lui-même, par son père, son oncle et son fils adoptif [ed. by the latter, J. M. N. Lucas de Motigny] (8 vols., Paris, 1834–35). The work was later reviewed unfavourably by Carlyle in LWR, IV (Jan., 1837), 382–439.

* * * * *

1. Published by Knight, pp. 665–67. MS not located.

2. George R. Porter (1792–1852), statistician.

expressly for that work. The table of protections annexed to Sir Henry Parnell's book³ is classified by himself; at least, he gives a separate list of those which he considers to be inoperative; and I, judging only by conjecture, am unable to correct it in any point. But for your purpose, which does not require minute accuracy, the enclosed paper may perhaps afford sufficient materials. I suppose you have Sir Henry's book.

I had been a letter in your debt for a most unreasonable time before I received your last, and I know not how to excuse myself for being so, for such a letter as yours was most assuredly deserved better treatment. Every letter I receive from you discovers, I will not say more and more points of agreement between us, for that would be little, but more and more traces of a general conformity in our views and in our methods; and this strikes me more whenever we travel on new ground. For instance, I was wondering whether you were a reader of Coleridge, and should certainly have asked you the question very soon, when you unexpectedly wrote to me about him exactly what I think of him myself—except, by the way, when you say, “as a politician he seems unprincipled.” I think he is not unprincipled but principled—his views on politics are, I have reason to believe, systematic. Did you ever read his little work on Church and State?⁴ If not, read it; if you have, tell me whether you agree with it in the main (I mean the Church part of it) as I do. Few persons have exercised more influence over my thoughts and character than Coleridge has; not much by personal knowledge of him, though I have seen and conversed with him several times, but by his works, and by the fact that several persons with whom I have been very intimate were completely trained in his school. Through them, too, I have had opportunities of reading various unpublished manuscripts of his; and, on the whole, I can trace through what I know of his works, pieced together by what I have otherwise learned of his opinions, a most distinct thread of connection. I consider him the most systematic thinker of our time, without excepting even Bentham, whose edifice is as well bound together, but is constructed on so much simpler a plan, and covers so much less ground. On the whole, there is more food for thought—and the best kind of thought—in Coleridge than in all other contemporary writers; and it is in many respects a great good that almost all the most accomplished and zealous of the rising defenders of the Church of England are pupils of his. They are mischievous only in this, that they will be effectual in keeping up, for a time, what they will not be effectual in shaping to their ideal of what it ought to be.

3. Sir Henry Brooke Parnell, later first Baron Congleton (1776–1842), liberal Whig politician and highly reputed political economist and writer on finance.

The “table of protections” is in App. III of On Financial Reform (3rd ed., London, 1831).

4. See Letter 43, n. 6.

I am expecting with great anticipations of pleasure, your paper⁵ in the Foreign Quarterly—on a subject I have long wished to see treated as you will treat it—and also your tract on the Corn Law⁶ controversy. You should have a Bread-eaters' Union to counteract the Bread-taxers' Union. That *Fife Herald*⁷ interested me exceedingly; one so seldom has the pleasure of seeing a fallacy torn up by the roots, instead of being merely lopped, or at most levelled with the ground. What an immense superiority the scientific study of any detached point, by which I mean the habit of viewing it in its relations to all the rest of the field of which it forms a part, gives one over the mere dealers in εἰκότα καὶ σημεῖα !⁸ I was forcibly struck with this when, soon after reading your Fife Herald, I read Lord Milton's address to the landowners on the corn laws⁹—well meant, but as feeble and shallow as may be expected from those who, as Plato says, "study pottery in the pot itself;"¹⁰ or, as Bacon says, "Naturam rei in ipsâ re perscrutantur."¹¹ It is a primitive fallacy to imagine that assurance of truth can be had by looking at the subject-matter in the concrete, without that process of analysis which men term abstraction. But that is the wise, practical way; and, for want of disciplined minds, you cannot make people understand that no conclusion obtained in that way ever rises above a more or less strong presumption, requiring to be philosophically verified—brought to the test of analytic investigation.

As for those Essays,¹² not only I do not want them but I beg you to keep them by you a while longer, and to annotate them copiously—they have much need of it. By-the-bye, I believe almost all that I have written in the fourth essay¹³ concerning Interest is erroneous but it may lead you to think on the subject, if you have not already.

The Review scheme has been slumbering temporarily for want of assurance of a sufficient number of writers. O for ten men with your ardour

5. "Comparative Mortality of Different Populations," FQR, XIII (May, 1834), 272–82.

6. Unidentified.

7. Published in the town of Cupar. It was described in Tait's (NS III [March, 1836], 195) as "a Radical paper of distinguished ability, and extensively circulated among the numerous small towns of Fife, where reading and Radicalism are nearly universal." Nichol's contributions have not been identified.

8. "probabilities and signs."

9. Lord Milton's "Address to the Landowners of Great Britain on the Corn Laws," dated Feb., 1831, appeared in various editions, 1832–35.

10. JSM's own translation of Plato's Gorgias, 514E (see Four Dialogues of Plato, trans. JSM, ed. Ruth Borchardt [London, 1946]; p. 159), slightly alters the meaning of the passage, which might more literally be translated: "Isn't it foolish, as the proverb goes, to begin with the big jar when you're learning the potter's art?"

11. Adapted from Francis Bacon's Novum Organum, Aphorism LXX.

12. See Letters 86 and 96.

13. Early draft of "On Profits, and Interest," published in Essays on Some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy.

of character, and rectitude of intellect! I am not meaning it as praise, but as the expression of a lamentable fact that I know not any three except you, me, and Mr. Fox, who I feel sure will always be moving and could always move together—and I could name perhaps fifty who have every requisite except some one. There is always some fatal want. Now, by way of a beginning, will you say how much you think you could undertake to write regularly? I mean on the average, not to tie you to a particular time. We want sixteen sheets a quarter or thereabouts—if you will undertake for one sheet in every number, I will do the same, and I will see what others will do—but our poor Radicals! what a miserable figure they make in Parliament!

Yours ever faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

The “Philosophy of Taxation” is an excellent subject, and you will do it ample justice.

I have not yet sent the St. Simonians,¹⁴ but I will send them almost immediately, and some numbers of the Monthly Repository with them.

J.S.M.

103. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House

28th April 1834.

MY DEAR CARLYLE

I received, a week ago, your little note²—it had not escaped me that for an unusual length of time I had not heard from you—but I had ascribed it to the very cause you mention³—which is also the cause of my not having written for so long a period. The same reason will make this letter an empty one; nor should I write it did I not know that the most intrinsically worthless communication between us two is valuable to both. All that either cares about is so much better spoken than written of. You will find me too “altered & altering”; perhaps more so than you expect; more, 14. Perhaps “the earlier of the St. Simonian tracts,” including Comte’s Système de politique positive, the return of which Mill requested on Dec. 21, 1837. See Letter 228.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq. / Craigenputtoch / Dumfries / N.B. Postmarks: L.S / 28 AP 28 / 1834, and DUMFRIES / AP 30 / 1834. MS at NLS. Published, with omissions, in Elliot, I, 97–99.

2. Of April 18, 1834, in A. Carlyle, pp. 99–102.

3. The Carlyles’ impending move to London would make correspondence unnecessary; they arrived early in May and henceforth made their home there.

too, than will probably be quite intelligible to you, without my opening up to you many incidents in my spiritual history, which, on a principle which I have heard you also profess, I like not to speak fully and freely of, until I myself have a sufficiently clear perception of the meaning and bearing of them. But I too have what for a considerable time was quite suspended in me, the "feeling of growth." I feel myself much more knowing, more seeing, having a far greater experience, of realities, not abstractions, than ever before; nor do I doubt that this superior knowledge and insight will one day make itself available in the form of greater power, for accomplishing whatever work I may be called to, shall I say also for chusing the work which I may most worthily perform? Every increase of insight carries with it the uncomfortable feeling of being separated more & more widely from almost all other human beings; this one would the less care for, did it not also damp all those feelings which prompt one to exertion through the hope of success, I mean any other success than is constituted by the struggle itself. One feels more & more that one is drifting so far out of the course of other men's navigation as to be altogether below their horizon; not only they will not go with us, but they cannot see whither we are steering, & they believe if they ever catch a glimpse of us, that we are letting ourselves go blindly whither we may. However this must be, & may be, borne with, when one's own path is clear—and mine is always becoming clearer.—On every account which I can judge of, I am convinced that you do wisely in coming to London. Nowhere else, at least nowhere in this country are there so many realities to be known & communed with; whereof not a few in the shape of true-hearted men and women, who to the extent of their intellect or experience, believe aright & act according to their belief. There are very few of them in whom there is not wanting something of the very first importance, but still there is in many enough & more than enough of good to give you a stronger interest in them than merely that which you have in all Actualities. Some of these I shall have opportunities of making known to you, & you to them, to the mutual advantage and pleasure of both.—I should send to you various books, if you were not so soon to be here; among others several numbers of the Repository, with writings of mine in them: but a much more remarkable production than anything of mine is a novel which has lately appeared, entitled "Eustace Conway" written by a far superior man,⁴ evidently, to the author of "Arthur Coningsby" but the tone of thinking is much the same. You will read it with great interest I am sure, though you will probably differ from many of the author's opinions as widely as I do—but you will perhaps agree in a greater number of them. I thought I had told you that the author of Arthur Coningsby is John Sterling, who at that time was in the ferment & effervescence of the process of forming his opinions & his character—now he has become as you say “compacted and adjusted” & like all Coleridge’s disciples has become a sort of conservative & churchman—he is going into orders—but will not keep upon terms with any lie notwithstanding—he is able, which it is happy for him that he is, still to believe Christianity without doing violence to his understanding, and that therefore not being, to his mind, false in the smallest particle, he can & does denounce all which he recognises as false, in the speculation or practice of those among whom he is about to find himself.⁵ I believe there are not a few such persons, & that many of the most earnest and most genially-natured of the youth of the English Universities are gone or going into the clerical profession with similar views. If the Church conformed to their ideal of what it should be, I could say to them, Ite fausto pede; but they will not regenerate it from within so soon as it will be pulled down from without.—I long to hear all you could say about Homer—I hope you will, some time, write & publish it. Mr Austin is better: Buller, poor fellow, is but indifferently in health. Have you yet seen Mr Austin’s Cousin?⁶ Her preface is the truest & best piece of printed writing I have read for many months. Yours faithfully

4. Frederick Denison Maurice.

J. S. MILL.

104. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

[June 17, 1834]

I have some news for you. Molesworth, without any suggestion or solicitation, has spontaneously offered to establish, at his own expense, the review² we were talking of—making but one condition viz. that substantially it shall be under my direction—he knows that I cannot on account of my position in the India House, be myself the editor, or be ostensibly connected with the review in any way, except as an occasional writer—but he will appoint his editor under the complete understanding that he is to be guided altogether by me.

5. Sterling was ordained deacon in the Anglican Church on June 22, 1834, and for the next eight months served as curate at Herstmonceux. He resigned in Feb., 1835, partly because of ill health, but also because of religious difficulties. Though he continued his study of theological questions for some years, he never resumed clerical duties.

6. Her translation (London, 1834) of Victor Cousin’s Report on the State of Public Instruction in Prussia, which JSM reviewed favourably in MR, VIII (July, 1834), 502–13.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmarks: T. P / Leadenhall St; EVEN 4 / JU 17 / 1834. MS at King’s. Published in Garnett, pp. 149–50.

2. The London Review.

This is a much more feasible scheme than the former one³—because there will be but one person to satisfy, and he a man of decided movement principles, docile, and who will certainly be pleased with the thing if it is such as will please us. At the same time we must not allow him to throw away his money—we must see our way clearly to being able to carry it on before we announce it—a failure would be disastrous to the cause.

I am anxious to talk over the matter with you and let us lay our heads together to see what can be done—a great part of the chance of success will depend upon the degree in which you can cooperate.

We can speak of it as Molesworth's review—none out of our own circle should be told that I have more to do with it than any of the rest of us.

Do think about it—& if you do not come to me in a day or two, we will come to you.

J.S.M.

105. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

[June 26, 1834]

I have sent to P.R.² I think about as much matter as we agreed upon. I have no subjects remaining, except the Beer Bill,³ on which I shall send (today) a single paragraph; the debate on education & crime; & the admission of Dissenters to the Universities:⁴ on these last subjects I shall write something & send it, but if necessary it can stand over to next month, with an announcement to that effect.

I should like to have a proof—

The following are the titles:

Abolition of Patronage in the Church of Scotland

Mr Rawlinson & the man of no religion

Business of the House of Commons

The Tom-foolery at Oxford

Parliamentary Monstrosities

The Ministry.

3. See Letter 94.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmarks: 4 / JU 26 / 1834 / EVEN / T P / Leadenhall St, and 2 EVEN 2 / JU 26 / 1834. MS at King's.

2. Paternoster Row, where the Monthly Repository was printed.

3. The paragraph on "The Beer Bill," dated June 20, concludes the "Notes on the Newspapers" in MR, VIII (July, 1834), 521–28. All but one ("Mr Rawlinson & the man of no religion") of the notes listed below appeared in the July issue.

4. Notes on "The Alleged Increase of Crime" and "Debate on the Universities Admission Bill" appeared in the Aug. number, pp. 589–90.

William Adams will like my notes this time—at least the first five. There is much of “the devil” in them.

How are you? do, one of you, write & let me know.

Our affairs have been gradually getting into a more & more unsatisfactory state—and are now in a state which, a very short time ago, would have made me quite miserab[le]⁵ but now I am altogether in a higher state than I was & better able to conquer evil & to bear it. I will tell you all about it some day—perhaps the first time we meet—but by that time perhaps the atmosphere will be clearer—adieu—

I have not spoken much to you about our affairs lately, as I did while she⁶ was away; partly because I did not so much need to give confidence & ask support when she was with me, partly because I know you disapprove & cannot enter with the present relation between her & me & him.⁷ but a time perhaps is coming when I shall need your kindness more than ever—if so, I know I shall always have it—⁸

106. TO HARRIET TAYLOR¹

[Summer, 1834?]

I have been made most uncomfortable all day by your dear letter sweet & loving as it was dearest one—because of your having had that pain—& because of my having given you pain. You cannot imagine dearest how very much it grieves me now when even a small thing goes wrong now that thank heaven it does not often happen so, & therefore always happens unexpectedly. As for my saying “do not let us talk of that now” I have not the remotest recollection of my having said so, or what it was that I did not want to talk about—but I am sure that it was something which I considered to be settled & done with long ago, & therefore not worth talking any more about, a reason which you yourself so continually express for not explaining to me or telling me about impressions of yours, uncertainty about the nature of which is tormenting me—and I have latterly learnt sufficient selfsacrifice, sometimes to yield to that feeling, & leave off asking you questions which you tell me it is unpleasant to you to answer. But whatever it was that we were talking about on the common I am sure if I had thought that anything remained to be said about it, much more if I had thought that such a matter as whether we can or cannot be in complete sympathy, had

5. Page torn.

6. Mrs. Taylor.

7. John Taylor.

8. This postscript is written at the top of the verso.

* * * *

1. MS at Yale. No salutation or signature. Published, with minor variations, in Hayek, pp. 93–94, with facsimile of the original. At the end is written, in Mrs. Taylor's hand: “my own adored one!”

depended on what remained unsaid, I should have been a great deal more anxious to have everything said, than you would have been to say it. O my own love, if you were beginning to say something which you had been thinking of for days or weeks, why did you not tell me so? why did you not make me feel that you were saying what was important to you, & what had not been said or had not been exhausted before? I am writing you know in complete ignorance about what it was—but I am sure I have tormented you enough & long enough by refusing to acquiesce in your seemingly determined resolution that there should be radical differences of some sort in some of our feelings, and now having found, & convinced you, that there are none that need make us unhappy, I have learnt from you to be able to bear that there should be some—consisting chiefly in the want of some feelings in me which you have. But I thought we perfectly knew & understood what those were, & that neither of us saw any good in discussing them further—and when I ask you questions which you do not like to answer, it is only to know what is paining you at the time—not meaning to discuss feelings any more if it is feelings and not facts that are annoying you.

I know darling it is very doubtful if you will get this before I see you—but I cannot help writing it & perhaps I shall feel easier afterwards. at present I feel utterly unnerved & quite unfit for thinking or writing or any business—but I shall get better, & don't let it make you uncomfortable mine own—o you dear one.

107. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

Monday

[July 14, 1834]

We had a great deal more discussion after we left you, and we all (three) most decidedly think that since the crisis in the congregation² appears to have been brought on principally by the belief³ that a fact, which would be of the greatest importance in their eyes, though of none at all in yours,

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 1 Stamford Grove / Upper Clapton. Postmarks: T. P. / Leadenhall St /, and 4 EVEN 4 / JY. 14 / 1834. MS at King's. Published in part in Garnett, pp. 164–65.

2. The crisis in Fox's church, South Place Chapel, had arisen from his domestic difficulties. As early as 1832 because of his growing affection for his ward, Eliza Flower, Fox and his wife had agreed to consider themselves separated although they (and Eliza) continued to live under the same roof. In the summer of 1834 Mrs. Fox confided her troubles to some of her husband's congregation; the resultant scandal led to some demands that he resign. Fox had taken the position that he could not sacrifice his personal dignity by denying specific charges. On Aug. 15, he offered his resignation but in Sept. he was acquitted of the charges (in effect, of adultery) and was asked to withdraw his resignation. See Garnett, pp. 155–68, and Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent, pp. 188–97.

3. Their belief that he and Eliza Flower had been lovers.

is true—it would be very foolish that you should not have the full advantage of its not being true. Even supposing that your separation from the chapel were inevitable in every case, the effect on your future prospects will entirely depend upon that fact being denied or not—and whether you feel it consistent, or not, with your personal dignity to deny it, we are quite convinced that we, and all your friends, ought. While that fact is denied and deniable, all who are otherwise favourably disposed to you will not be afraid to stand by you, & there will be at least a strong diversion in your favour against the tide which will set in against you. But if it were made impossible for any one to defend you except those who were willing to encounter the odium of justifying all which is now alleged against you, I am afraid you will be worse situated than if no defence were made at all, since people will make it a matter of conscience to discountenance what they consider the open profession & vindication of immorality.

This being the case, I should not, if I were in your situation, think myself bound to court attention to the fact that expediency only & not principle was the cause of your not having gone to the full length of what they assert. If they put that very question to you, no doubt you ought to say so—but I think not otherwise. It seems to me quite enough if you appeal to those articles in the *Repos*⁴ as containing your principles on the subject. You might say that you have acted no otherwise than in consistency with those principles; and if they ask you whether the particular fact is true, you might deny altogether their concern with it or right to enquire into it, but nevertheless profess your willingness voluntarily to give the information sought, by denying the assertion. We all think it of great importance that every public mention of the charge should be accompanied by mention of your denying it—and also that the effect of this denial should not, unless it be absolutely necessary to your integrity, be injured by the public profession of the extent to which your principles go in that one matter. She⁵ went to Walworth yesterday to endeavour to induce Mr Hardy⁶ to move in the matter—I know not yet with what success. But it is of importance that the steps they take should be in a better spirit & taste than if the affair is left to its original promoters it probably would happen.

all quite well

let me hear from you

J.S.M.

4. Fox had expressed advanced views in the Monthly Repository on the emancipation of women and on divorce. See "The Dissenting Marriage Question," MR, VII (Feb., 1833), 136–42. For a discussion of his views, see Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent, pp. 284–96.

5. Mrs. Taylor.

6. Dr. Thomas Hardy (ca. 1775–1849), father of Mrs. Taylor, and member of Fox's congregation.

108. TO [ADOLPHE NARCISSE THIBAUDEAU]¹

London

August 20, 1834.

I have great pleasure in introducing to you M^r Thomas Holcroft, whose father is doubtless known to you by his dramatic writings, if not by his other works, and whose mother was the daughter of Mercier,² your father's³ colleague in the Convention.

M^r Holcroft is desirous of learning & observing as much as can be learned in a few weeks about French affairs, especially politics, and with your knowledge both of France & England he will learn more from you in two or three conversations than from any one else in as many months.

I am anxious to hear from you about the Globe. Did you receive my letter, and will the proposal suit you?

109. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

India House,

30th August, 1834.

MY DEAR SIR,

I need not say with how much pleasure I have read your letter, and how gladly I close with your proposal about a series of Political Economy papers for the Review.² I anticipate that you will have a far less formidable idea of the said Review by the time a number or two have appeared; I should think better of our times than I do if I thought it were possible to bring together a corps of writers who would contribute only articles of "a very exalted cast." If there are one or two such articles in every number my utmost hopes will be satisfied. However, there is no immediate necessity for an article on the state of the science generally, and we need not, therefore, discuss the sufficiency of the modest reason you give for not writing one. The article you offer for the first number is one I have long been desirous to see written, especially since (which is only lately) I became acquainted

1. Printed, without identification of recipient, in Morrison, 253. MS not located.

The reference in the first paragraph to the recipient's father makes the identification highly probable.

2. Louis Sébastien Mercier (1740–1814), writer, member of the Convention during the Revolution.

3. Comte Antoine Claire Thibaudeau (1765–1854), politician and historian.

* * * *

1. Published by Knight, pp. 667–68. MS not located.

2. No such series appeared in the London Review.

with Chalmers's book,³ which I have just finished a very careful perusal of. I have derived many new ideas from it, and it has even suggested an entirely new view of the order in which the truths of the science ought to be arranged. What he understands, he explains very clearly and forcibly. It is unfortunate that he is so profoundly ignorant of some branches of the subject.

About publishing my concluding essay⁴ in the Review; I think with you, but am afraid it would take up too much room. The essay on gluts⁵ must be entirely remodelled; there is much new speculation to be added to it. I think I shall, some time or other, write a Treatise on the whole Science. I am fearful that the Essay on Wages and Profits,⁶ which you say you do not quite understand, is little better than elaborate trifling, and that the doctrine that profits depend on wages, though scientifically correct, does not present the more important aspect of the law of profits, perhaps not the ultimate law at all, and is, therefore, of little use in philosophy. The whole of the speculation on productive and unproductive⁷ I must revise, or rather reconsider ab initio. I am impatient for your remarks on the commercial essay.⁸ There is no hurry about the MSS. nor about the St. Simonian books.

Those scraps on Poetry in the *Repository*⁹ I believe to be true as far as they go, but that is not far. There is much more ready to be written in the Review on that matter. I am much obliged to you for the little paper you sent me. I do not see any traces of the thoughtlessness or want of information you speak of, nor of presumption, unless you allude to the sarcastic sentence on Bentham. I think I agree in your view of the character of Hamlet, though you appear to go farther or to have gone farther at that time with the Coleridgian and German metaphysics than I do. But it is a great pleasure to meet you as I do in all regions of speculation. I believe, contrary to the vulgar opinion, that there never was a first-rate mind which was not universal, I mean in its studies, reflections, and feelings, although almost everyone must limit himself to a comparatively narrow sphere in his actual contributions to science, or art, or the business of life, for want of time to acquire the requisite practical skill in many different lines of activity.

3. Thomas Chalmers, On Political Economy in Connexion with the Moral State and Moral Prospects of Society (Glasgow, 1832). Chalmers (1780–1847), theologian, was professor of divinity at Edinburgh University for many years.

4. See Letters 86, 96, and 102.

5. Probably the early version of the essay "Of the Influence of Consumption on Production," which appeared as the second of his Essays on Some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy.

6. Probably the early version of "On Profits, and Interest," ibid.

7. "On the Words Productive and Unproductive," ibid.

8. "Of the Laws of Interchange between Nations; and the Distribution of the Gains of Commerce among the Countries of the Commercial World," ibid.

9. See Letter 85.

I have a strong wish, of a higher kind than curiosity, to see anything which you ever write on any subject. I should like particularly to see your paper for The F.Q. as soon as it is in a state in which you would like to let it out of your hands.

Your plan, in The Fife Herald, for the adjustment of the corn laws, is good, under certain conditions, but I doubt it will be with that question as with the Catholic—it will not be carried at all until it be carried out and out.

I will write to the Australian people¹⁰ about your suggestion. They intend, I know, to have agents in various parts of the country; and Scotch labourers, both agriculturists and mechanics, are of the very kind they will most value. They will, I doubt not, grant free passage from the outset.

Brougham is only showing his true character, which is much public spirit and little honesty, with extreme excitability and a tongue ungovernable either by good feeling or discretion.¹¹ It is quite false, I believe, that he drinks, but there is madness in the family; and his flightiness is only the temperament of madness, without the actual disease.¹² Our friend Tait appears to sell well, but his writers are mostly naught. Let me hear from you soon again, and believe me,

Yours ever faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

110. TO VICTOR COUSIN¹

India House, 4 septembre 1834

MON CHER MONSIEUR,

Il y a déjà bien longtemps que je me reproche tous les jours de n'avoir pas répondu à votre aimable lettre. Je ne veux pas retarder davantage ma réponse.

10. The South Australian Association, formed earlier in 1834, included among its directorate such friends of JSM as Buller, Grote, and Molesworth. The Association had succeeded earlier in Aug. in getting through Parliament the South Australian Act establishing a Crown colony. See Richard Garnett, Edward Gibbon Wakefield (New York, 1898), pp. 98–104.

11. For an account of Brougham's strange behaviour in the political crisis of the summer of 1834, see Arthur Aspinall, Lord Brougham and the Whig Party (Manchester, 1927), pp. 193–201.

12. Gossip was rife that Brougham was mad. The Times, which had now turned against him, on Aug. 19, 1834, p. 2, remarked: "For some months Lord Brougham has been under a morbid excitement, seldom evinced by those of His Majesty's subjects who are suffered to remain masters of their own actions" (quoted in Aspinall, Lord Brougham and the Whig Party, p. 209).

* * * *

1. Published by J. Barthélemy-Saint-Hilaire in M. Victor Cousin, Sa Vie et Sa Correspondance (3 vols., Paris, 1895), I, 396–98. MS not located.

Je savais que les séries des Rapports des deux Sociétés n'étaient pas complètes. Ceux qui manquaient aux envois, manquaient aux Sociétés elles-mêmes. J'ai pourtant renouvelé ma demande à l'une et à l'autre Société, en y ajoutant celle de vous envoyer tous les ans le rapport annuel. J'ai reçu de M. Dunn,² secrétaire de la British and Foreign School Society, une réponse des plus promptes, dans laquelle il disait qu'il tâcherait d'obtenir pour vous, de quelque membre de la Société, le Rapport de 1832, et qu'il se préparait de vous écrire incessamment. Le Secrétaire de la National Society, le Révérend J. C. Wigram,³ ne m'a point répondu. Peut-être serait-il en correspondance avec vous. Si non, une lettre de vous pourrait bien avoir un meilleur résultat. L'adresse est Central national schools, Westminster.

Quant aux Poor Law Reports, M^{me} Austin n'est nullement coupable de leur non-arrivée. Permettez-moi d'écrire en mauvais français, quand je n'en ai pas de bon. Le fait est que mon ami Chadwick, qui vous envoya les Factory Reports, n'a pas envoyé ceux de l'Enquête des pauvres. Cependant, il m'a promis de vous envoyer incessamment le Rapport général; plus, un volume de rapports choisis des Assistant Commissioner; plus, son propre rapport en entier, dès qu'il en aura des exemplaires. C'est tout ce qui est en son pouvoir, bien qu'il soit nommé secrétaire du Bureau des pauvres, créé par la nouvelle loi.

Nous travaillons toujours à la cause de l'éducation. Cette année, Roebuck a prononcé un nouveau discours encore meilleur que le premier;⁴ et il a obtenu un comité d'enquête, qui a fait du bien et qui annonce un renouvellement d'enquête dans la session prochaine. Le système coercitif effraie surtout nos sectaires religieux, soit dans le sein de l'Eglise, soit hors d'elle. Le public l'a assez bien accueilli. En attendant, nous aurons, d'ici à la fin de l'année, un commencement d'écoles normales. En fait de fonds, les anciennes dotations suffisent, dès que le gouvernement les reprend d'entre les mains de mandataires infidèles, qui les gaspillent sans pitié. Je ne parle pas des Universités, mais des nombreuses Charity schools, et surtout des fondations, où des écoles devraient être et ne sont pas. Mais nos Universités, plus encore que nos Académies, ont besoin d'une réforme et même d'une réorganisation complète. L'Eglise seule s'y oppose, parce que les établissements d'Oxford et de Cambridge lui appartiennent; et s'ils ne forment pas de chrétiens, ils forment des churchmen.

2. Henry Dunn (1800–1878), religious and educational writer.

3. Joseph Cotton Wigram (1798–1867), religious and educational writer, secretary of the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church; later, Bishop of Rochester.

4. Roebuck's second major speech on education had been made in the House of Commons on June 3, 1834, in support of his motion for a select committee to inquire into the means of establishing a system of national education. His first speech on the subject had been made on July 30, 1833.

Malgré le retard que j'ai mis à répondre à votre lettre, j'ose encore vous prier que vous me chargiez de toute autre commission que vous auriez à faire ici.

Veuillez agréer ma plus haute estime.

J. S. MILL

111. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

London, 14th October, 1834.

DEAR SIR,

When I received your first letter on the subject of the office, I happened to be in Buckinghamshire, thirty-five miles from London, taking advantage of the short holiday time which we are allowed at the India House. I wrote immediately to my father. When I received your second note it was Saturday, and, of course, writing again to hurry him would have done no good, the election coming on so soon as Tuesday. I found yesterday on my return that he had actually prepared a letter, which he expected to get Mr. Senior to sign along with him, but was prevented by a sudden attack of illness, from which he has only just recovered; and it would at all events have been too late. So you see it was not from any want of zeal on his part or on mine, but from cross-accidents, that the certificate did not reach you; a circumstance which I should extremely regret if it had any influence on the result of the election. We are both of us very sorry that the Edinburgh Bailies did not do themselves the honour of electing you; but the office after all was no very advantageous one, and one at least equally suitable to you can hardly fail to fall in your way. My father thinks that a professorship in a Scotch university² would suit you; and it may be in his power to be of some aid to you in obtaining one, if it were vacant. He thinks you would promote your success by writing in some work more known and talked of among the people on whom such things depend, than any you write in now; as, for instance, if you were to write something for that new society of the chancellor's for the diffusion of Political Knowledge.³ For my part I feel certain, notwithstanding my father's name and Grote's, and those of several other Radicals,⁴ that the society in question

1. Published by Knight, pp. 668-70. MS not located.

2. Nichol in 1836 was appointed Regius Professor of Astronomy at Glasgow University.

3. One of Brougham's purposes in founding the Society for the Diffusion of Political Knowledge was to combat "the violent and slanderous press." See Aspinall, Lord Brougham and the Whig Party, p. 208.

4. For a list of the original members of the Society, see Companion to the Newspaper, II (Aug., 1834), 168. The Companion was thereafter published under the auspices of the Society.

will be thoroughly Whig; but Political Economy, at least, is of no party. I am satisfied that my father will do everything he can to serve you, whenever he can find any opportunity.

Your long letter, received last month, interested me very much. I am glad that so competent a person as you are, has turned his attention to the philosophy of mathematics. I have thought, and even written on the subject, ever since I began to speculate on metaphysics at all; but with very imperfect success. I think, however, that my logical speculations have at length given me a clue to that subject also, and that I shall be able to get to the bottom of it in time; but I shall need all the help I can obtain from you, and from any other of the very few who have any capacity for such enquiries. One thing which I had already meditated, your letter has determined me to do; and that is, as you have found my Political Economy speculations not uninteresting to you, to request that you will allow me to send to you as much as is written of my book on Logic; if book it can be called, which is but the raw material out of which I shall some time or other make a book.⁵ I anticipate the greatest pleasure and advantage from your remarks, whether they are in confirmation or contestation of my own ideas; and I see you are exactly in that stage of your enquiries, on this particular subject, in which what I have done may perhaps help you over some difficulties. You will then, I know, lend a hand to help me over mine.

For the present I am obliged to suspend this, which is my favourite pursuit, in order to stick to the Review. I am writing for it an attack upon Sedgwick's precious discourse,⁶ which you perhaps know. I am not yet convinced of the possibility of using that Political Economy discourse⁷ for the Review. The first part, on the definition, strikes me as being too technical; and the latter part, on the method of the science, though it may, as you suggest, admit of condensation, would I think, to produce any effect in a popular review, require amplification also, and illustration from the mistakes actually committed by individuals or schools of political economists. This might be done, though it scarcely suits my vocation, which is not for illustration or exemplification; I am always much too dry and abstract. But then I should be stirring up divisions among Political Econo-

5. Probably the MS in the Pierpont Morgan Library, which bears the following note on the first folio: "This copy of Mr Mill's Logic / being an early manuscript draft / was sent by the author to my Father / the late Professor J. P. Nichol. / J.N." The draft, not in JSM's handwriting, corresponds roughly to Books I to III, chap. 4, of the System of Logic.

6. The attack on Adam Sedgwick's Discourse on the Studies of the University (London, Cambridge, 1833) appeared in the first number of the London Review, I (April, 1835), 94-135; reprinted in Dissertations, I, 121-85.

7. Eventually published in LWR, XXVI (Oct., 1836), 1-29, and reprinted in Some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy.

mists, and giving a handle to the enemies of the science; which such men as Torrens⁸ and Malthus and even Senior are constantly doing, and which I systematically avoid. I am even anxious that in your article on the theory of a "glut of capital," you should avoid the phrase "glut" or any other which will bring you into seeming collision (though not real) with my father's and Say's doctrine respecting a general glut. It may easily be shown that they were right; and yet that Chalmers and Wakefield⁹ are not wrong. However, I need not say these things to you.

You were mistaken in ascribing the article on Bentham's Deontology¹⁰ to me; it was written by the Rev. James Martineau,¹¹ brother of Harriet Martineau, and a Unitarian minister at Liverpool. He is a clever man, and has consented to be a frequent contributor to our Review. I think him one of the best metaphysicians of the day; as he has shown by a series of articles on Dr. Priestley, which appeared in The Monthly Repository early in 1833,¹² and which if you have not read them, are worth your reading. I agree in your high opinion of much of the article on that unfortunate book, which Bowring has made out of fragments of Bentham;¹³ but I do not agree with him on all points. I dissent particularly from his adoption of what is called the selfish system, and which he has put under the same mantle as the utilitarian doctrine. I once wrote a brief statement of my views respecting Bentham's philosophy, and Bulwer printed it as an appendix to his England and the English,¹⁴ where, perhaps, you have seen it. It is not, and must not be, known to be mine. You will observe, if it fall in your way, that my views differ from Mr. Martineau's both in going further and in not going so far. On the whole, the article disappointed me. There are few who can grapple with first principles on any subject. Of all views I have yet seen taken of the utilitarian scheme, I like Austin's best, in his book on The Province of Jurisprudence;¹⁵ but even that falls very far short of what is wanted.

8. Robert Torrens (1780–1864), economist and advocate of Australian colonization.

JSM's first published letter to a newspaper had been a reply to an editorial by Torrens criticizing James Mill's views on the cost of production; see "Exchangeable Value," Traveller, Dec. 6, 1822, p. 3, and MacMinn, Bibliog., p. 1.

9. Edward Wakefield (1774–1854), economist and father of the colonial statesman, Edward Gibbon Wakefield.

10. MR, VIII (1834), 612–24.

11. Rev. James Martineau (1805–1900), Unitarian divine and philosopher.

12. "On the Life, Character, and Works of Dr. Priestley," MR, VII (1833), 19–30, 84–88, 231–41; reprinted in Martineau's Essays, Reviews and Addresses (4 vols., London, 1890–91).

13. Deontology or the Science of Morality . . . (2 vols., London, 1834).

14. See Letter 72, n. 12.

15. John Austin, The Province of Jurisprudence Determined (London, 1832).

The few sketchy paragraphs which I added to the notes on the *Phaedrus*¹⁶ do not give any just notion of my metaphysical creed, which is quite different from that of the Condillac school, and comes nearest to Hartley's and my father's. Have you ever read my father's metaphysical work?¹⁷ If not, let me send you a copy. I think it explains completely the cause of our attaching the ideas of infinity and necessity to space and time. I know not that anyone can analyse or explain succession and co-existence, when reduced to their simplest forms. The theory of association presupposes them both, and divides associations into synchronous and successive. We must, I think, rank them as ultimate laws of our minds, or (what is the same thing in other words) of the phenomena of nature.

Believe me, yours ever faithfully

J. S. MILL.

112. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

India House,
26th November, 1834.

MY DEAR SIR,

Your letter gave me all the pleasure such a letter from you must give. I feared I had made an unfavourable impression on you merely from consciousness of my own want of tact in expression, by which I continually give notions of my feelings and character different from the true ones.

I like your plan for the article on Chalmers exceedingly. I think, however, that the main point might be put in a more trenchant manner than you put it. . . . If you do not agree with me, write in your own way, which will probably in that case be the right one.

I should wish, if convenient to you, to have the articles on Tithes² first, and as soon as possible, because that is absolutely indispensable for the first number. The other, not being of temporary interest, we may be 16. "Notes on . . . Plato. No. 2. The Phaedrus," MR, VIII (1834), 404–20, 633–46.

17. Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind (2 vols., London, 1829).

* * * *

1. Published by Knight, pp. 670–71. MS not located.

2. An article on "Tithes, and their Commutation," signed J.P.N., appeared in the first number of the London Review, I (April, 1835), 164–73. No article on Chalmers was published. The only other article signed J.P.N. published under JSM's editorship was "The State of Discovery and Speculation concerning the Nebulae," LWR, XXV (July, 1836), 390–409.

obliged to postpone till No. 2, in consequence of the superabundance of serious, and, to the many, dull articles. I am obliged myself, having now finished a very long article on that precious "Discourse" of Sedgwick's,³ to turn to a literary subject,⁴ though out of my proper line, merely to give relief to the number. The article on Sedgwick will, I am sure, interest you. I have said a number of things in it which I have never put into print before, and have represented the "utilitarian theory of morals," as he calls it, I think for the first time in its true colours. At all events, I have incidentally represented my own mode of looking at ethical questions; having never yet seen in print any statement of principles on the subject to which I could subscribe.

I will send the Logic⁵ very soon. I anticipate the greatest help in it, both from your general powers of thought and from your peculiar acquaintance with the philosophy of algebra, in which I am myself far from profound, but yet have found the little I do know to be of the utmost possible use.

Well, here is the trial come at last,⁶ and has already done more good than the Whigs would have done in a twelvemonth. The movement has advanced several years by this universal demonstration throughout the country, at once of hatred to the Tories, dissatisfaction with the Whigs, and conviction of the necessity not only of reforms, but of further constitutional reforms. We begin to think here that Peel will not accept office and that there will be no Tory ministry. At all events, whoever is in place, the march of Reform is wonderfully accelerated. How nobly and with what wisdom the people have acted. In the meantime our friends, as individuals, have gained vastly in importance and reputation. You have seen how this crisis has called Buller out, and made him what I always knew he was capable of being. If he improves his position, as I think he will, he will now be a very important man in Parliament. Roebuck also has raised himself greatly. We now see the importance of the rallying point which Lord Durham⁷ has afforded. Any banner, placed so high that what is written upon it can be read by everybody, is all-important towards forming a party; but Lord Durham has really acted with consummate skill and in

3. See preceding letter, n. 6.

4. "Tennyson's Poems," which did not appear until the second number (July, 1835). See Letter 117.

5. See preceding letter, n. 5.

6. On Nov. 14, the King had suddenly dismissed the Whig ministry. This precipitate action took by surprise Tories as well as Whigs. Sir Robert Peel, who was to become the new Prime Minister, had to be summoned from Italy, where he was vacationing.

7. John George Lambton, first Earl of Durham (1792-1840), at this time emerging as a leader of the advanced Whigs. A few years later JSM became one of the staunchest defenders of Durham's Canadian policy (see Letter 228, n. 14).

the best possible spirit. Whether he is ever minister or not, we have a great prize in him.

I will not fail to send Malthus's book⁸ as soon as I can get a copy of it.

Believe me, ever faithfully yours,

J. S. MILL.

113. TO ADOLPHE NARCISSE THIBAU­DEAU¹

India House
28th November
1834

MY DEAR THIBAU­DEAU

I have not had a single line from you since you left London: however as I have myself been almost equally remiss, we will consider that account as balanced, & now I will proceed to business.

We are going to start our Review immediately. The first number will appear in two months unless we should think it necessary to postpone it till the public know who is to be minister, & are willing to read something besides newspapers. Now, it is of the utmost importance that we should have the best articles possible on France: & for this purpose we are anxious to keep up a regular communication with you & Carrel, or whichever of you has most leisure. It has occurred to me that the following arrangements might be made. 1. You, or Carrel, of both, might send articles, to be translated here, with liberty for us to make such alterations as are necessary to adapt them to the English public. In your articles, little alteration would probably be necessary, because you know England: in Carrel's, probably much more. 2^{dly}. In other cases, some one here might write the articles, from materials furnished by you, the payment being equally divided. To give you an idea of what I mean: We want an article on Henry Bulwer's France.² Now what I should like would be that you, or if you have not time, Carrel, should take the trouble to read the book attentively, & write down every remark of importance which occurs to you on it, particularly in the way of correcting matters of fact. With such annotations before me, I could venture to review the book, & I am sure that I could make a very good article & one which would serve both countries extremely. But without such help I should not like to attempt it. Now tell me what you think of such an arrangement.

8. Possibly, in view of their concern with definitions in the study of political economy, Malthus' Definitions in Political Economy (London, 1827).

* * * *

1. MS in the Hollander Collection, University of Illinois Library.

2. The first two volumes of Henry Lytton Bulwer, La France: sociale, politique et littéraire (4 vols., Paris, 1834–36). See Letter 172, n. 2.

In the second place—if you would not object to send me the National in exchange for the Examiner, I beg you will send it by post, & I will pay the expenses, reduced as they now are.

In the third place, there is now at Paris a Mr. Priaulx,³ a young man of a rich Guernsey family, who is a particular friend of Wilson,⁴ of the Globe, & a clever & interesting person. He is authorized to communicate with you on all subjects relating to the Globe. Wilson has asked me to give Mr Priaulx a letter of introduction to you. Will you be so kind as to consider this an introduction.

On the state of our politics⁵ you will learn as much from the English newspapers as I could tell you. The change of Ministry would have been a great evil if the people had remained quiet; but after the demonstration they have made, I think the effect will be very good. It is very probable that Peel will not chuse to accept office; if he does not, the whole thing is at an end. But if the Tories do come in, it must now be as Reformers, & even greater reformers than the poor Whigs were, otherwise they will be turned out on the very first day of the session. We might have waited whole years for such a unanimous declaration from the whole country in favour of the ballot, triennial parliaments & a further extension of the suffrage, as this has produced. We shall have no more now of the “final measure.”⁶ Be assured that the Movement has gained immensely by all this, & is gaining every day. In fact, it is impossible that anything which produces political excitement should not now do good. I am quite tranquil & easy about public affairs whichever way the present crisis terminates. We shall either have a Tory ministry granting large reforms, & a Whig & Radical opposition demanding larger; or we shall have the Whigs in again, & the two parties competing for the favour of the Radicals, who will evidently be the supreme power in the country; for all the present demonstrations are the work of the radicals; not a Whig stirs a finger even to bring the Whigs into place again.

Will you make my best regards to Carrel. I will write to him soon.—Pray write to me as soon as possible.

Yours ever

J. S. MILL

I send you the Examiners. I suppose it is to you & not to Carrel that they should now be sent.

3. Probably Osmond de Beauvoir Priaulx or De Preaux (1805–1891), barrister, author of Outlines of a System of National Education (London, 1834); of National Education (London, 1837); and of other works.

4. John Wilson. The London newspaper referred to should not be confused with the Saint-Simonian periodical, Le Globe.

5. See preceding letter, n. 6.

6. I.e., the position of the conservatives that the Reform Act of 1832 was a final constitutional change.

114. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

India House
29th November
1834

MY DEAR D'EICHTHAL

You would have a right to be greatly offended with me for having made no answer to two such letters as yours. I assure you my silence did not proceed from indifference; I was deeply interested in all the particulars you told me about Greece,² and highly gratified by the intelligence respecting yourself. I can only say that between my occupations, which have been unusually great, & my natural laziness, I always procrastinated, feeling that I ought not to write a short letter, & shrinking from the trouble of writing a long one: but I hope now that we shall correspond regularly. My present letter may be interesting to you, being written while we are in the midst of a political crisis. You have heard by this time of the dismissal of the Whig ministry & the reappointment of the Duke of Wellington, who however waits until Peel returns from Italy to form a Ministry. When this most unexpected event occurred, our friends were in some apprehension at first, because they knew how the lukewarmness, the temporizing, and general imbecility of the Whigs, had cooled the ardour of the people in their support, & it seemed not improbable that the people, thinking the Whigs no better than the Tories, might quietly look on. That was the hope of the Tories themselves. But the result has completely disappointed them. The conduct of the people has been noble. There has been one unanimous shout from the whole nation that they will not have the Tories on any terms; declaring at the same time that the Whigs have not satisfied them, & that they must have a ministry who will not only give them the consequences of the Reform Bill, but further organic reforms; the suffrage extended to all householders, triennial elections, & vote by ballot. Happily, Lord Durham had just before placed himself at the head of the radicals, first at the Edinburgh dinner to Lord Grey,³ by taking up the gauntlet which Brougham had thrown down; next at the dinner given to himself

1. MS at Arsenal. Published, with omissions, in Cosmopolis, VI, 363-66, and in D'Eichthal Corresp., pp. 164-71.

2. After the dispersal of the Saint-Simonians, D'Eichthal had gone to Greece and had become director of the "Bureau d'Economie politique," a kind of ministry of public works.

3. On Sept. 15, 1834. At the dinner, Brougham, already in trouble with the Grey faction of the party, counselled caution in the reform programme. Durham urged an immediate programme of sweeping reform. His speech was widely interpreted as a violent attack on Brougham; this was the beginning of the famous quarrel which led to the destruction of Brougham's political power. See C. W. New, Lord Durham (Oxford, 1929), pp. 244-79.

by the Glasgow Reformers,⁴ where he publicly declared for the three constitutional changes which I have just mentioned. His words have gone forth & been reechoed by the whole people, & the Movement party now everywhere look to him. There have been already some addresses to the King to appoint him Minister. Nevertheless, he will not be minister yet, nor perhaps ever: he is too vain, too imperious, & too much the slave of mere temperament. But you need fear nothing for us; the Tories, at first elated, are already crestfallen: the growing opinion is, that Peel, when he sees the state of the country, will not accept office; & if he refuses, the Duke of Wellington will not go on. At all events, if they do take office, they will not survive the first day of the session except by outbidding the Whigs in popular measures. Their own calculations do not give them a majority in the elections if they dissolve parliament at present, & my belief is that they will not. At any rate, be assured that the Movement has advanced exceedingly by these events. You will be glad to hear that Buller & Roebuck have taken a most conspicuous part in this crisis, & have distinguished themselves exceedingly, Buller especially, who has headed the London reformers throughout, even from the first day. Roebuck at that time was out of town. They are sure to be important men in the history of their country before long. Roebuck during the last two sessions has risen in reputation & influence both in & out of Parliament, in a degree which would astonish you. The other radicals have all disappointed us: even Grote, who has been very inactive. Only one other man in the House, Clay, from whom we expected nothing, has distinguished himself on the popular side. I consider it certain that either the Whigs will come in again, with the Tories no longer resisting them in front & the people more than ever pressing them on from behind; or there will be a Tory ministry which will do more for the people than the Whigs have yet done, & a strong popular opposition consisting of the radicals joined by the best of the Whigs.

And now for our personal share in the Movement. One of the radical members, a friend of Buller's and mine, Sir William Molesworth, is about to establish a review at his private expense, & all our friends are to write in it, as well as all the Movement writers whom we have thought it worth while to ask; not one has refused. It will, unless I am much mistaken, be infinitely the best review ever yet published. You must not look in it for a doctrine générale et unitaire; you know as well as I do that English minds are not yet ripe for that; but whatever vues d'avenir there are in England, will be presented there in full detail. The object is, to rally the instructed radicals round a common standard, & induce the other radicals to follow them. And now I have a request to make. You have it in your power to serve us and our cause & to serve Greece at the same time, by chusing our review as a means of making known here, the present state of Greece. If you would send us, either as a review of Thiersch's book,⁵ or in the form of an original essay, an article on the recent history, & present state & prospects of Greece, you will do us a great favour. We have no objection to publish the severest strictures on the conduct of our own Government or its functionaries, provided we are not committed to any facts which cannot be substantiated. We have the most perfect reliance on you, & should publish without hesitation any statement which came from you or recommended by you. The same article might be made a means of furthering your views of colonization, by giving publicity to the facilities & advantages the Greek Government affords to settlers, & by shewing the very favorable prospects which the state of Greece holds out to speculations of that kind. Our first number will be published in two months,⁶ but I hope you will be able either to write, or get written for us, a paper which can appear in the second.

4. On Oct. 29, 1834.

I suppose your plans of colonization are by this time in some degree matured. I have no doubt you are right in thinking it desirable that the first emigration should be of capitalists, & of mechanics and artizans. I have no doubt of your success. Numbers of both, are emigrating every year from this country, & if they feel any confidence in the security of person & property in Greece, they will emigrate thither as readily as to any other place. I can suggest no plan, except that of appointing some mercantile house in England the agent of the Greek Government for emigration, & making extensively known through them, the terms on which the Government will grant land, & the advantages of all other kinds which it will hold out. The main point is, to convince our capitalists that they & their property will be safe. This must be done by giving publicity, & repeated, continual publicity to all that the Government has done & goes on doing to restore order. I know no one thing so likely to have that effect, as the article I am proposing to you to write for our review, which we could get quoted & commented upon by the whole of the newspaper press, London & provincial. There are plenty of first-rate mechanics in Scotland who are ready to go, but they must be taken out by capitalists who will ensure them employment when there. The grand thing is to gain the confidence of capitalists. This depends wholly upon the impression you can make concerning the state of the country.

I am most truly glad that the Greek Government has had the good sense to place so important a department of its affairs in the hands of yourself, & of two such men as you describe your colleagues. If they chuse all their

5. Bernhard Thiersch, Ueber das Zeitalter und Vaterland des Homer (Halberstadt, 1832). No such review or article appeared in the London Review.

6. It did not appear until April, 1835.

other agents as well, I have no fear for the good administration of their country. The absence of a territorial aristocracy, & the deep root which popular municipal institutions seem to have in the country, are immense advantages. Have you seen Urquhart's book, "Turkey and its Resources"?⁷ If so, is it to be depended upon?—Pray do not imitate my negligence, but write to me soon, & believe me

Ever faithfully & affectionately yours

J. S. MILL.

115. TO EDWIN CHADWICK¹

I.H.

10 Dec. 1834

MY DEAR CHADWICK

Monsieur Guilbert,² one of the editors of the Bon Sens,³ has come over here to learn all he can of the present condition & prospects of this country and its people. Your assistance would be of great use to him, by indicating documents & letting him know your own general views, & you will much oblige me by doing anything to aid him which your occupations allow.

Ever yours

J. S. MILL

116. TO FRANCIS PLACE¹

[Dec., 1834?]

DEAR MR PLACE

M. Guilbert, one of the editors of the French newspaper, "Le Bon Sens," is desirous of the pleasure of your acquaintance. He is anxious to learn all he can about the state, moral, physical and intellectual of our working people, and nobody can tell him more on the subject than you can.

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL

7. David Urquhart, Turkey and Its Resources (London, 1833).

* * * *

1. Addressed: Edwin Chadwick / 7 Trevor Square / Knightsbridge. MS at UCL.

2. Aristide Mathieu Guilbert (1804–1863), writer, who because of the exile of his father, had lived in London from 1815 to 1830. In the spring of 1835 he became Paris correspondent for the new London Review (see Letter 127).

3. Le Bon Sens, established as a Sunday paper shortly after the revolution of 1830 by members of the popular party, became a daily in April, 1834. The Examiner, Feb. 8, 1835, p. 82, praised it warmly.

* * * *

1. MS at Brit. Mus. Undated, but presumably written about the same time as the preceding letter to Edwin Chadwick.

117. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

India House,
18th December, 1834.

MY DEAR SIR,

I am grieved to hear of your narrow escape, and most heartily congratulate you and myself that the danger is past. By all means keep yourself as quiet as possible, and do not even think of any intellectual exertion till you are completely recovered. I once lost a most valued friend, one of the most valued I ever had—though not to be compared with you in intellect—in consequence of a similar disease—the eldest son of Tooke, the political economist.² I believe he brought on the malady almost entirely by intense and unremitting study. I most earnestly entreat you, for the sake of us all, not to expose yourself to a similar danger. It is better that our first number should even appear without your article, than that your health should be exposed to the slightest risk. However, I hope that your health will be firmly re-established before we shall need your article. We do not think of publishing the first number while the crisis³ lasts; and on the whole, if your paper reaches us by the end of January, I have no doubt that it will be in time. When I know whether a still longer delay will be compatible with its appearance in the first number, I will let you know.

On the whole, our prospects grow better and better—those of the Review, I mean, though I might add, those of the nation too. The Review is, and will be, principally deficient in articles on literary subjects. If you have leisure, may I hope that you will give some assistance in that department, as well as in your own peculiar one? I am obliged to do the same; and I find that we can in general trust none except our scientific writers with even our literary subjects. I shall have two in the first number; one on Sedgwick, and one on Tennyson's Poems⁴—the best poems, in my estimation, which have appeared since the best days of Coleridge.

Have you seen Peel's address to the electors of Tamworth?⁵ Was there ever such empty mouthing? Nothing appears clearly in it but that he means to halve the reforms of even the poor Whigs. I hope they will dissolve Parliament. It will be a thousand pities now to lose the triumph which the elections will give us.

Yours in haste,

J. S. MILL.

1. Published by Knight, pp. 671–72. MS not located.

2. See Letter 29.

3. The political crisis brought on by the King's dismissal of the Whig ministry.

4. The article on Tennyson did not appear until the second number.

5. The famous Tamworth Manifesto, calling for a new Conservative programme of progressive reform, had just been published in The Times, p. 5, on the morning of this letter.

118. TO ALBANY FONBLANQUE¹

Kensington
25 Dec. 1834

MY DEAR FONBLANQUE

Could you insert the enclosed² in your next paper?

You are fighting the good fight nobly—and you are the only writer (except Buller occasionally in the Globe) who are doing it with any spirit.

I send copies of the Prospectus of the new review. Some notice of it in your paper would be useful—but perhaps not during the present excitement. We shall send round our advertisements presently; & the Prospectus will appear in the January periodicals.

We do not think of publishing our first number till after the crisis:³ & consequently not till after the meeting of Parliament, unless (which is most unlikely) the Tories should be so discouraged by the result of the elections as to retire.

Will you allow me to remind you of our hopes of an article from you for the first number? & to say that I am ready to work for the Examiner to any extent that could be needful while you are about it.

We have promises of support (as writers) from my father, Grote, John Austin, Bailey of Sheffield,⁴ Peacock,⁵ Fox, James Martineau of Liverpool, Nichol of Montrose, Cornewall Lewis, Buller, Roebuck, Wilson,⁶ Strutt, Mrs. Austin—everybody in short whom we thought worth asking, except Bulwer, and he has almost promised. But without you we should be weak in some very important departments—and there would not be sufficient relief to our heaviness & dulness.

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL

1. MS at LSE. Last two paragraphs published in Life and Labours of Albany Fonblanque, ed. E. B. de Fonblanque (London, 1874), p. 39.

2. Probably JSM's notice of Eliza Flower's Songs of the Months. A Musical Garland, in Examiner, Jan. 4, 1835, p. 4.

3. See Letters 112 and 114.

4. Samuel Bailey (1791–1870), philosophical writer greatly admired by James Mill. JSM reviewed favourably his Rationale of Political Representation in London Rev., I (July, 1835), 341–71, but attacked his Review of Berkeley's Theory of Vision, WR, XXXVIII (Oct., 1842), 318–86, reprinted in Dissertations, II, 162–97. No contribution by Bailey to the London Review has been identified.

5. Thomas Love Peacock (1775–1866), novelist, long associated with the Mills in the employ of the East India Company. He contributed several essays to the London Review.

6. Probably John Wilson, secretary to the Factory Commission, and an editor of the Globe newspaper.

. . . 1835 . . .

119. TO JAMES MARTINEAU¹

[1835]

The last two pages of the concluding paper² made an impression upon me which will never be effaced. In a subsequent paper of my own in the "Repository" headed "The Two Kinds of Poetry" (October, 1833) I attempted to carry out your speculation into some of those ulterior consequences which you had rather indicated than stated.

120. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
Saturday
[Jan. 17, 1835]²

MY DEAR SIR

When I had the pleasure of seeing you today, I forgot to mention that I shall not be here on Monday, as I am going with my brother³ (who is destined for the civil service in India) to the East India College near Hertford. We must therefore defer our next conversation till Tuesday.

Yours most truly

J. S. MILL.

1. Excerpt published in James Drummond and C. B. Upton, Life and Letters of James Martineau (2 vols., London, 1902), II, 276. MS not located. According to the editors the letter was to welcome Martineau as a contributor to the London Review.

2. "On the Life, Character, and Works of Dr. Priestley," MR, VII (1833), 19-30, 84-88, 231-41.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur Guilbert / 30 Red Cross Square. Postmarks: TP / CORNHILL /, and 183(?) . . . MS at King's. Published in Morrison, p. 253.

2. So dated in Morrison.

3. James Bentham Mill.

121. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

India House
26th February
1835

MY DEAR SIR

I am truly delighted to hear that you are willing to cooperate in the new Review. There are few persons whose aid could be of so much, or nearly so much, importance to it, both with reference to its usefulness & to its success.

I do not know if you have yet seen the Prospectus. It has appeared on the cover of most of the reviews & magazines. The spirit of the review will be democratic, but with none of the exclusiveness and narrowness of the Westminster Review; & the plan adopted of individual signatures enables the various writers to indulge the liberty of individual opinion within considerably less narrow limits than are imposed by the plan of most reviews.

I will immediately send you some copies of the Prospectus under Sir William Molesworth's cover. I suppose Senior² told you that Sir William is the founder & proprietor of the review.

We hope to publish the first number by the end of March. I fear its fault will be, a deficiency of literary & other light matter & a superabundance of politics. At our first starting there is no way in which you could be of so much assistance to us as by writing some of those excellence pieces of literary criticism several of which you wrote for the former London Review;³ such as that on Pollok's Course of Time,⁴ for instance. I am afraid of trespassing on your kindness & "riding a willing horse to death" but yet I cannot help saying that if you could be prevailed upon to write something of this kind, even though short, for the first number, it would be of so much importance to the review that we would gladly keep the number open for it even till the last moment.

1. Addressed: Rev. J. Blanco White / 5 Chesterfield Street / Liverpool. Postmark: LS / 26FE26 / 1835. MS in the Liverpool University Library.

For JSM's earlier acquaintance with White, see Letter 45. After embracing Unitarian views, White in Jan. of this year had left Dublin, where he had lived in the home of his patron Archbishop Whately, and settled in Liverpool.

2. Nassau Senior.

3. A short-lived review, edited by White himself in 1829; only two numbers were published.

4. Robert Pollok, The Course of Time: A Poem in Ten Books (2 vols., Edinburgh, 1827), one of the most popular religious poems of the period; twenty-five editions were published by 1868. White's unfavourable criticism of it was published in his London Review, I (Feb., 1829), 233-51.

I have not read Tocqueville's book,⁵ but from what Senior says of it, I have no doubt of the great value to us of such a review of it as you would make. For this we can give ample time, as it could not be printed before the second number.

The editor of the review is Thomas Falconer⁶ Esq. 7 Gray's Inn Square, a friend of mine whom I think very highly of. As I am in continual communication both with him & with Sir W. Molesworth, any letter to me answers all purposes, and I should be proud to increase our acquaintance by corresponding with you on review matters.

Believe me

Most truly yours

J. S. MILL

122. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

India House
2d March
1835

MY DEAR SIR,

The objection to "Pompeii"² is that Bulwer writes for the review; & it would be impossible to review it fairly without pointing out the gross blunders in scholarship & even in Latin grammar; now as no principle requires that we should point out errors of this kind in our friends, it is of no use wounding their amour-propre & depriving ourselves of their hearty cooperation.

But the other subject you mention, the works of Martinez de la Rosa,³ would suit the review perfectly. The prose translations which you propose will be quite sufficient.

5. JSM's first mention of Alexis de Tocqueville's De la démocratie en Amérique (2 vols., Paris, 1835), which was to influence profoundly his political philosophy. Later in the spring he met Tocqueville during the latter's visit to England and a correspondence ensued (see Letter 137 and others). JSM eventually decided to review Tocqueville himself (see Letter 135) for the Oct., 1835, number of the London Review; upon the completion of the second part in 1840 he wrote another article for the Oct., 1840, Edinburgh Review.

6. Thomas Falconer (1805–1882), brother-in-law of J. A. Roebuck, barrister and later judge of county court circuits, though nominally editor was really sub-editor under JSM.

* * * *

1. MS at John Rylands Library, Manchester; bears no indication of recipient, but see n. 3.

2. A revised and corrected edition of The Last Days of Pompeii, originally published in 1834, appeared in 1835.

3. White's review of the works of Francisco Martínez de la Rosa (1787–1862), Spanish statesman and dramatist, appeared in the first number of the London Review, I (April, 1835), 76–93, under the title "Recent Spanish Literature."

Mr. Falconer will see this note, & if you receive it you may know that he agrees with it. I have no doubt that if he can suggest any other subject which would to him appear preferable, he will not omit to avail himself of the kind disposition which you manifest towards the review.

You have, I presume, received some copies of the Prospectus by this time

Believe me

Most truly yours

J. S. MILL

123. TO RICHARD BENTLEY¹

India House
5th March
1835

MY DEAR SIR

I send M. Fiévée's memorandum on the nature of his work, and a note of my own stating what I know of M. Fiévée.² I should think the work might, if published in France, reckon upon a great sale in France itself, where the author does not wish to publish it himself, lest his work should be supposed to have some party object.

If Mr Bentley should wish for any further information I will give it, or obtain it from M. Fiévée, and if he thinks there would be any use in my meeting him I will (though it would be rather inconvenient) call upon him or should be glad to see him if he happened to be coming into the City.

Ever yours

J. S. MILL

[The enclosed note]³

Monsieur Fiévée is one of the cleverest and liveliest French writers of the present age, as his "Correspondance politique et administrative"⁴ published in the first few years after the restoration of the Bourbons sufficiently shews. His political opinions & the general character of his mind bear more resemblance to Burke than to any other English writer; though his great experience as a man of office & business, has supplied him with

1. MS in Bodleian Library.

Richard Bentley (1794-1871), publisher.

2. Joseph Fiévée (1767-1839). The memorandum has not been located. The work referred to was Correspondance et Relations de J. Fiévée avec Bonaparte . . . (1802 à 1813) (publié par l'auteur, Paris, 1836). See also Letter 146.

3. The MS of the note is in the Bentley Collection of the University of Illinois Library. The editor is indebted to Professor Jack Stillinger for supplying a copy of it.

4. Correspondance politique et administrative, commencée au mois de mai 1814 . . . (3 vols., Paris, 1815-19).

much more practical knowledge of the affairs of the world than Burke had. He was much trusted by Napoleon, although Napoleon knew him to be in correspondence with the exiled family. It is well known that Napoleon's conseil d'état was composed of all the ablest administrators in France: M. Fiévée, besides being one of his préfets, was for a long time a member of this body. M. Fiévée enjoys a very high character in France & his statements may be depended upon. His sentiments and personal connexions were mostly royalist, but he gradually became alienated from that party as he found that they could not be induced to govern in a manner suited to the wants & circumstances of the age. He has never attached himself to Louis Philippe or his government.

124. TO ALBANY FONBLANQUE¹

I.H.

Monday

[March(?), 1835]

MY DEAR FONBLANQUE

Thanks for the ticket. Thursday does quite as well. As you so kindly permit me I will some day soon ask for an order for Lestocq;² but I cannot yet say when.

I send a short paper on Swiss politics, which has been sent to me from (& is written by) Siebenpfeifer,³ one of the leading German radicals, & now a Professor in the University of Berne. If it suits you it can be published & I shall be happy to translate it if necessary but I suppose your subeditor now renders you independent of such help.

Molesworth I know means to send you the sheets of the London Review. I suppose you guess the authorship of the Dialogue on the Ballot.⁴ There are parts of it in which I do not wholly agree, but the speculations you allude to are not among them.

It is a great loss to the review not to have anything of yours in the first number—but if you could find time to write anything in the second, though I know how much you are occupied, your aid is too important not to be very urgently pressed for.

Ever faithfully

J. S. MILL

Bulwer will write for the 2^d number & is zealously with us.

1. MS at LSE.

2. Auber's opera, first performed at Covent Garden on Feb. 21, 1835.

3. Philipp Jakob Siebenpfeiffer (1789–1845), political writer.

4. In London Rev., I (April, 1835), 201–50; by James Mill.

125. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House
7th March [1835].

MY DEAR CARLYLE—I will endeavour as you advise, to think as little as I can of this misfortune,² though I shall not be able to cease thinking of it until it is ascertained how far the loss is capable of being repaired—or rather reduced to a loss of time & labour only—There are hardly any means I would not joyfully take, if any existed by which I could myself be instrumental to remedying the mischief my carelessness has caused—That however depends not upon me. But there is one part of the evil—though I fear the least part—which I could repair—the loss to yourself of time & labour—that is of income. And I beg of you with an earnestness with which perhaps I may never again have need to ask anything as long as we live, that you will permit me to do this little as it is, towards remedying the consequences of my fault & lightening my self-reproach. It is what you would permit as a matter of course if I were a stranger to you—it is what is even legally due to you—and to have brought an evil upon a friend instead of a stranger is already a sufficient aggravation of one's regret, without the addition to it, of not being allowed to make even the poor amends one would make to a stranger.

1. MS at NLS. Published, with slight variations, in Elliot, I, 100–101. Carlyle's answer of March 9 in A. Carlyle, pp. 109–10.

2. On the preceding evening JSM in great distress had called upon the Carlyles and, after begging Mrs. Carlyle to go outside to speak to Mrs. Taylor, who was waiting in a cab, informed Carlyle that the manuscript of the first volume of his French Revolution had through carelessness been completely burned.

D. A. Wilson, Carlyle to "The French Revolution" (1826–1837) (London, 1924), Book X, chap. xvii, and others have accepted the legend (which must have originated with Carlyle) that the accident was really Mrs. Taylor's fault and that JSM gallantly accepted responsibility. Against too ready acceptance of this should be placed the evidence of Letter 126 and of a letter of JSM's sister Harriet to Carlyle shortly after (May 15, 1873) JSM's death when the Daily Telegraph in an obituary article attributed the by then famous literary accident to Mrs. Taylor: "As far as my recollection goes, the misfortune arose from my brother's own inadvertence, in having given your papers amongst waste paper for kitchen use. I can, perfectly well, remember our search, and my dear brother's extreme distress, and I fancy, though of this I do not feel so sure, that some pages were found." (MS 666, No. 109, at NLS.)

Carlyle in a gracious and touching reply to Miss Mill (May 17, 1873, MS 1778, NLS, hitherto unpublished) admitted that "in fact my impression really was, that night when your Brother came to us pale and agitated, as I have seldom seen any mortal, that Mrs. Taylor's house and some trifling neglect there, had been the cause of the catastrophe;—but in fact, to prevent him almost perishing with excess of misery, we had to forbear all questioning on the subject, which indeed was of no importance to either of us, and to bid him 'Be of Courage, never mind, Be certain I can write it again, and will!' . . . Your dear Brother's conduct to me in this matter, as indeed in all others, then and afterwards, was conspicuously noble, generous, and friend-like,—conduct of the First, almost only Friend I then had in London, one who would have made any sacrifice for me and what I then had most at heart."

If I could convince you what a relief this would be to me, & what an act of friendship—to say nothing of justice—it would be on your part I am sure you would not hesitate—Yours affectionately

J. S. MILL.

126. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House
Tuesday
[March 10, 1835]

MY DEAR CARLYLE

Nothing which could have happened, could have been at this time so great a good to me as your note,² received this morning. I never thought it probable, & I wonder now how I could have thought it possible, that your answer would be different: it could not be so (gigmanity out of the question); but my anxiety made me exaggerate the chances against me.

Yes—when the thing is again done, & I have realised the feeling of certainty that another volume is there, as true & as beautiful as the former, all will be wholer than ever. I never before felt so fully the whole amount of the good of having somewhat more than one actually needs for urgent wants. That which can buy peace of conscience is precious.

You shall see or hear from me again almost immediately—but I will not take the *Fête des Piques*³—not that I believe such a thing could possibly happen again, but for the sake of retributive justice I would wear the badge of my untrustworthiness. If however you would give me the pleasure of reading it give it to Mrs. Taylor—in her custody no harm could come to it⁴—and I can read it aloud to her as I did much of the other—for it had not only the one reader you mentioned but a second as good. I can borrow De Stael's *Considerations*⁵ easily—as my father has them. I did not think of them when I sent you other books—as there are very few facts in them—they are mostly speculations.⁶

1. MS at NLS. Published, with slight omissions, in Elliott, I, 101–2.

2. Of March 9, 1835, in A. Carlyle, pp. 109–10: "You shall do the thing you so earnestly entreat for [i.e., compensate Carlyle for the time lost by the burning of the manuscript]: it is not unreasonable; ungigmanic [i.e., unconventional] it may either be or not be."

3. Carlyle had offered to let JSM take the manuscript of this first book of Vol. II he was then completing—"provided you durst take it."

4. This would seem to exculpate Mrs. Taylor though D. A. Wilson cites this as only another instance of JSM's gallantry in defending her.

5. Considérations sur les principaux événements de la révolution française (3 vols., London, 1818), by Anne Louise Germaine Necker, baronne de Staël-Holstein (1766–1817), writer and critic.

6. The letter is not signed.

127. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
19th March
1835

MY DEAR MONSIEUR GUILBERT

You have much reason to complain of me for not writing to you sooner. The fact is, I waited too long for an answer from the Globe, which I might have had sooner if I had taken a little more trouble. I got an answer the very day before I received your letter; & I have been so busy ever since, & have had to write so many letters that I was obliged to put off yours—knowing that you were already doing whatever was right, while others perhaps were not.—First, about the Review; I considered that from the first as certain. Molesworth, the very first time I mentioned it to him, agreed at once to your being our correspondent at Paris; & since receiving your letter he is very glad that he did consent. As for terms—you said, 150 or 200 francs per month; it will be either sum, according as you understood it. Your cooperation would be cheaply purchased at either price. Only, as our review is in some degree a doubtful speculation & our funds not unlimited, I have proposed to Molesworth & I now propose to you, to make the engagement at first for three months only. At the end of that time we shall know whether we can reckon upon sufficient assistance from French contributors to make it worth while retaining a French correspondent (though of this your letter leaves little doubt) & also, whether the success we can expect at first for our review, is such as renders it unnecessary for us to restrict our expenses to the utmost. If you agree, then, we will consider you as the correspondent of the review, from the 1st of this month (March) at 150, or 200 francs as you understand it. The payment will be made at the times & in the modes most convenient to you.

We are all much delighted with all you have done for the review, & with the prospects your letter holds out. The name of Carrel has done much for us already: his speech before the Chamber of Peers² has spread his fame in this country. The editor³ of one of our best journals, the Spectator, advises strongly that we should request Carrel's permission to print his signature at full length. We shall be delighted to have an article on *Courier*⁴ from him.

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / Rue Joquelet / No 8 / à Paris. MS at Arsenal. Guilbert had been in England recently. See Letters 115 and 120.

2. In defence of M. Rouen, the responsible editor of the National, on Dec. 15, 1834, on a charge of impugning the dignity of the Chamber. See L. Blanc, History of Ten Years (London, 1845), II, 304–7. The Examiner on Dec. 21, 1834, pp. 808–9, printed excerpts of Carrel's speech.

3. Robert S. Rintoul (1787–1858), founder and editor of the Spectator.

4. Paul Louis Courier (1772–1825), soldier, Hellenist, and pamphleteer. No such essay appeared in the London Review. Carrel's Essai sur la vie et les écrits de P. L. Courier is published in the latter's Œuvres complètes (4 vols., Paris, 1829–30).

Half a page, of the most general kind, will be sufficient on the subject of Courier as a Hellenist; you have judged quite correctly that it is not in that point of view we wish for an appreciation of that great writer. The plan you have marked out for M. Nisard's first article,⁵ seems very good. It is necessary to keep in mind that the English public are almost entirely ignorant that there exists a contemporary French literature; & their ideas of French writers are still those of the Voltaire period. The object therefore should be, first, in a general article, or more than one if necessary, to give a general view of the change which has taken place in French literature, & afterwards to follow this up by separate articles on separate writers. This, M. Nisard, from what I have seen of his writings, will I am convinced, do in the way best suited to us. I have seen a letter from him to his German friend, M. Garnier,⁶ which shews him to be extremely well satisfied with my letter, & I am therefore well pleased at that scène de comédie which you recollect. He expresses a wish to remain anonymous, & says that you agreed in the expediency of it—I dare say you suggested it to him, though he thinks the suggestion came from himself.

The changes in French philosophy I think I shall myself treat in the review,⁷ & shall be greatly indebted to you for all hints, & for suggesting to me all the books which I should read.

About placards, & advertisements, I will write to you again. There will be time, for the review will not appear for at least a fortnight. There will however be notices of it in some of the London papers before it appears.—We are anxious to have M. Nisard's first article in the second number, which will be published in June. Will you therefore beg him to set about it at his earliest convenience. The same request to Carrel; except that as his article is on a special subject, & not one of a series, we need not press him to have it ready by any given time, though of course the sooner the better. As both these articles will be very interesting, we will not limit them in point of space: say if necessary 30 to 40 pages of the review: & you know our pages are much larger than those of the French reviews.—We should like to exchange our review with any French reviews which may be willing, & which you may recommend. Carrel's offer of articles on the principal men of the Revolution is highly prized, & I will write to you again about it. We shall not want an article on the Salon this year at least; we must first prendre notre place as to Art in general. Cavaignac's writing

5. Désiré Nisard (1806–1888), literary historian and critic, was closely associated with Armand Carrel. His first contribution to the London Review, an essay on Victor Hugo, did not appear until Jan., 1836 (II, 389–417).

6. J. H. Garnier, a German refugee who supported himself by journalistic and translating work. JSM in the Examiner for Sept. 14, 1834 (p. 581), favourably reviewed Garnier's periodical, Deutsches Leben, Kunst und Poesie.

7. JSM seems not to have carried out this project.

I am afraid will not suit England; we will say nothing to him just yet, unless you have already spoken to him. Dussard⁸ will be of considerable use to us, though at present I will not propose any article to him, as we already overflow with the sort of articles which he would write. The fact is, his line is also the line of most of us. We shall have an article on the Liberty of the Press very soon; & at all events we shall not fail to notice Carrel's admirable speeches. Tell us how many copies you would like to have of the sheets of the review & through what conveyance.

The Globe, it seems, is not inclined to have a regular correspondent at Paris—but would willingly insert, & pay for, occasional articles written in English. You know the kind of tone which suits the position of that journal.

As for politics, my dear friend, the game is up, as we say. The Tories will remain in place. The Opposition have spoiled all by their want of spirit & courage. The day after their victory in the choice of a Speaker, they could have done anything they pleased: the prestige of strength was wholly on their side. This instead of giving them courage, made them tremble lest their small majority should escape from them: & by conceding every point to the most timid among them, lest they should lose one or two votes, they have made such perpetual demonstrations of a belief in their own weakness that instead of one or two they have lost scores. The attempt to expel the ministry has been abandoned; they now only harrass them in detail. This reproach I address to our own friends as well as to others. Grote, Clay, and Warburton have spoiled all. Roebuck & Molesworth are the only ones among our friends (Hume I do not reckon such, though I esteem him much) who have a grain of spirit or energy. Those two are staunch, & if need be we shall unfurl the banner of our review against the radicals as well as the Whigs and Tories. They are giving us *du Maughin et Odilon Barrot*⁹ over again. All parties are cowardly & torpid with us.

I am really grown so indifferent to all that these people do, that I cannot prevail upon myself to enter further into particulars; but you will see what we say in the review. The public mind, however, with us, is steadily progressive, & will force more & more improvements upon even a Tory ministry; for ministries, with us, always yield when they see that public opinion really requires it. We shall have either a Peel, or a Peel & Stanley¹⁰ ministry, for years to come, I think.

8. Hippolyte Dussard. Years later he collaborated with J. G. Courcelle-Seneuil in translating JSM's Political Economy.

9. François Mauguin (1785–1854) and Odilon Barrot, leaders of the moderate opposition.

10. Edward George Geoffrey Smith Stanley (1799–1869), later fourteenth Earl of Derby, had broken with the Whig leadership in 1834, though he did not formally join Peel and the Tories until July 1, 1835.

We shall be glad to have Paul de Kock¹¹ from M. Barba,¹² on the terms you mention. If the proprietors of the Histoire Parlementaire will send it to us we will promise to make it the text of our first article on the French Revolution.¹³ In general we shall be glad to receive any books which may be sent to us, though whether we can notice them will depend upon many various circumstances; but if not in the review, I can almost always, if they have any merit, get them favourably noticed somewhere. Will you thank all our friends for their kind interest in the review. The articles in the Bon Sens on England were true, & good: thanks for sending them. By the bye, do not write on the outside "for the Examiner."

Ever yours faithfully

J. S. MILL

128. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

I.H.

Monday [March 23, 1835]

MY DEAR CARLYLE

Notwithstanding all which you said on Thursday night, I cannot feel that I have made you anything like compensation by placing you exactly in the same pecuniary state as when you began to write, the time which you have expended in writing being lost and gone, without result either to yourself or any one else, except the doubtful one of your making a better book the second time.

It would be not only more accordant with my conception of the justice of the case, but would be a much more complete relief to my conscience and in every way more pleasant to me, if you would consent to receive the sum I first mentioned² or at least something intermediate between that & the smaller one. This would be a gratification to me only inferior to that of being permitted to make compensation at all.

Ever affectionately yours

J. S. MILL

11. Charles Paul de Kock (1794–1871), novelist. See Letters 134 and 140.

12. Possibly Jean Nicolas Barba (1769–1846), author of Vie et aventures de Pigault-Le Brun (Paris, 1836).

13. Carlyle eventually reviewed it in LWR for April, 1837, pp. 233–47.

* * * *

1. MS at Huntington Library.

2. JSM tried to persuade Carlyle to accept £200 but finally had to yield to the latter's refusal to accept more than £100. See Carlyle's letters to his brother and his mother in Letters of Thomas Carlyle, 1826–1836, ed. C. E. Norton (London, 1889), pp. 506 and 510.

129. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

India House
15th April
1835

MY DEAR SIR

I have learnt to my great surprise this morning, that owing to some inexplicable misunderstanding, Crabbe² has not yet been sent to you. You will, however, receive it immediately, along with your copy of the London Review and as we wish the second number to appear in June, we shall be very glad to have your article in the shortest time in which you can write it satisfactorily to yourself.³

Mr James Martineau, with whom I know you are in communication, has kindly offered to review for our next number, Bailey's excellent "Rationale of Representation".⁴ Perhaps you would do us the favour to say to Mr Martineau that after a good deal of deliberation among the three or four persons who take most share in the conduct of the review, it has appeared to us that a subject involving so directly and comprehensively all the political principles of the review, should be retained in the hands of the conductors themselves, rather than placed in those of a contributor, however highly valued, who is not in direct and continual communication with them. But for this consideration, there is no writer for the review in whose hands we would rather see such a subject. The objections which Mr Martineau thought might be felt to his undertaking an article on Robert Hall,⁵ we should not feel to be objections at all unless he himself felt them so, or unless he would feel bound to enter into a discussion of Hall's theological tenets, which probably he would not. In mentioning Hall, it was however, only intended to throw out a suggestion; & if Mr Martineau would either dislike that, or prefer any other subject, there is no wish to press it upon him. We are only anxious to have, at as early a period as may be convenient to him, some article from his pen. Anything similar or comparable to those admirable papers on Priestley in the Monthly Repository,⁶ would be of the greatest value to us.

Would you and Mr Martineau have the kindness to mention any quarters—especially public institutions & the like—to which it would be advan-

1. MS in the Liverpool University Library. A portion of White's letter in reply is in Thom, II, 121–22.

2. The Poetical Works of the Rev. George Crabbe; with his Letters and Journals, and his Life, by his Son (8 vols., London, 1834).

3. White's article appeared in the second number, I (July, 1835), 316–41.

4. The Rationale of Political Representation. By the author of Essays on the Formation of Opinions, etc. [Samuel Bailey] (London, 1835). JSM himself reviewed the book in the second number (I, 341–71).

5. Robert Hall (1764–1831), popular Baptist preacher.

6. See Letter 119.

tageous to send copies of the review. Molesworth is disposed to distribute it pretty extensively—the first number at least—as the cheapest, and most useful, mode of advertising it.

I have begun to read Tocqueville. It seems an excellent book: uniting considerable graphic power, with the capacity of generalizing on the history of society, which distinguishes the best French philosophers of the present day, & above all, bringing out the peculiarities of American society, & making the whole stand before the reader as a powerful picture.—Did you ever read Guizot's Lectures?⁷ If not, pray do.

Ever yours truly

J. S. MILL

130. TO ALBANY FONBLANQUE¹

I.H.

Monday

[April 20(?), 1835]²

DEAR FONBLANQUE

Thanks for your mention of the London Review.³ I hope you will give us a formal article besides⁴—as we shall have but a poor chance of success unless our friends exert themselves for us—some of them are treating us as friends usually do.

We all greatly regret that the review was obliged to appear without anything of yours in it; & we hope exceedingly that you will write something in the second number. Nothing has occurred to any of us which we should like so much, as an article on the magisterial interferences with the people. But as you are so fully occupied, we should be too happy to have anything which you could do most easily & in least time.

If you give us something, we shall have an excellent bill of fare for No 2, twice as good as No 1.

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL

7. Cours d'Histoire moderne . . . [consisting of] Histoire générale de la civilisation en Europe depuis la chute de l'Empire romain jusqu'à la Révolution française (Paris, 1828), [and] Histoire de la civilisation en France depuis la chute de l'Empire romain jusqu'en 1789 (5 vols. Paris, 1829–32). White wrote the review of Guizot in the Jan., 1836, London Rev. (II, 306–36), but with cuts and additions by JSM (see Letters 135, 149, and 154).

* * * *

1. MS at LSE.

2. See the following letter.

3. A long excerpt from JSM's "Postscript" to the first number of the London Rev. (I, 254–56) was quoted in Fonblanque's leading article, "The Administration," Examiner, April 19, 1835, p. 241.

4. Fonblanque obliged with a leading article on the Review in the Examiner, May 10, 1835, pp. 289–90.

131. TO ALBANY FONBLANQUE¹

[April 20, 1835]

How do you like the new Cabinet?² All things considered I am very well satisfied with it—but I hope you will push them to the ballot & a few other things—they can't stand without.

Ever yours

J.S.M.

132. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

I.H.

Saturday

[?Spring or summer, 1835]

MY DEAR CARLYLE

If you have no objection to receive the Chronicle instead of the Globe, for the next fortnight or thereabouts, I find that to be the most convenient arrangement now when the whole household except my father & myself are in Surrey & my brother² still at the East India College.

If however you would rather have the Globe I can still contrive to supply you with it.

Ever yours faithfully

J. S. MILL

I shall probably be with you on Monday evening.

133. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
8th May 1835

MY DEAR MONSIEUR GUILBERT

I yesterday, by making a casual enquiry, learnt to my extreme astonishment, that no remittance had yet been made to you. I imagined I had

1. Probably a postscript to the foregoing. Written on the inside of a cover of a letter addressed: Albany Fonblanque Esq. / 5 Pine Apple Place / Kilburn Road. Postmark: 4 EVEN 4 / AP 20 / 1835. MS at LSE.

2. Of Lord Melbourne.

* * * *

1. MS at NLS.

2. James Bentham Mill.

* * * *

1. Addressed: M. Aristide Guilbert / Rue Joquelet / no 8, / à Paris / Parti rue taken measures which had ensured its being done long ago. I have now set the matter to rights, & you will receive without delay 450 francs, for the months of March, April, & May. Pray let me know whether you have received copies of the review. They were sent, or at least orders were given for their being sent, through Black & Young, booksellers here. If you have received them I hope you have considered yourself at liberty to give them, in exchange or otherwise, whenever you thought it useful to the review to do so.

I have not written to you about the change of ministry² because I knew not what to write. I fear the whigs will do as little for the people as they possibly can: all their speeches & manifestoes indicate it, except Hobhouse's speech at Nottingham:³ & you will see, that even Lord John Russell's defeat in Devonshire by the intimidation practised by the Tory squires & parsons will not make him an advocate of the ballot. Brougham, however, being excluded from office, is putting forth pamphlets & articles of very decided radicalism to the extreme annoyance of his former associates. You see how justly I described him to you.

At the late change it was well understood that the radicals as a body would not consent to take office. They thought, justly, that they had more power out of office than in it. To several members of the body (but to none of the leaders) offers were made of places, which they all refused, unless the leaders came in too. Brougham is reported to have said to a near relation of a cabinet minister "this may succeed, but it is the first time the attempt has been made to form a ministry excluding the able men of all parties." I don't believe this, but the mot is excellent.

Toqueville's book, "de la démocratie en Amérique" is an admirable book. Can you tell me anything of Toqueville? What is his history? & in what estimation is he held in France?

We are anxious to receive the notice you promised respecting Paul de Kock. When & how is the copy of his works, to be paid for? We persist in our intention of bringing out our second number before the end of June.—Ever truly yours

J. S. MILL.

Joubert No. 47. Postmarks: 196 / F 35; 19 / 35; and Calais / 10 MAI / 1835. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, p. 253.

2. On April 8 Peel had resigned after a vain effort of six weeks to maintain a Tory administration. Melbourne then formed a straight Whig ministry which, though it did not include the Radicals, received their support.

3. On April 24 (see The Times, April 27, 1835). John Cam Hobhouse, later Baron Broughton de Gyfford (1786–1869), friend of Byron, Whig politician.

134. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
19th May
1835

MY DEAR GUILBERT

You may judge how much we have been annoyed by the neglect of the booksellers to send the copies of the review to Paris. It is one of numerous instances of such negligence which have occurred to us, proving the great difficulty of making a review succeed which is not the property of a book-seller. On receiving your letter I took immediate measures for having the omission supplied, & I hope it has been so. Pray apologize to our friends, & present copies to such of them, & of your editors & littérateurs generally, as you think ought to have it; obtaining for us in exchange, when you can, all your best periodicals.

You are aware that we do not want an article on Paul de Kock, but merely a short notice, to serve towards writing an article. The article itself is to be written by one of our English contributors, a man of great wit & learning.²

I have not received Carrel's letter. We attach great importance to having his article in our next number.³ You do not say anything about his autograph. I have done nothing with it as yet.

I am much disappointed that M. Nisard has been obliged to renounce an undertaking for which he was so eminently qualified. We gladly accept his offer of separate articles on Victor Hugo, Lamartine &c. but it appears to us indispensable that they should be preceded by a general article on the new French literature generally. We do not wish for a detailed history of its origin—since that would cost M. Nisard so much research—but a general character of the old, & of the new literature, could cost neither much time nor labour to the author of those admirable papers in the Revue de Paris.

I said nothing about the article which M. de Cormenin⁴ was so kind as to offer, because we should not have room for it for some time to come, & it is as well not to fix on a subject long beforehand. But his cooperation would be highly valuable to us.

As for politics—the grand struggle will be at the next registration. Peel's

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / Rue Joubert / à Paris / No 47. Postmark: 210 / F 35. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, p. 254.

2. Thomas Love Peacock. Although in both his article on "French Comic Romances," London Rev., II (Oct., 1835), 69–84, and the one entitled "The Epicier," ibid., II (Jan., 1836), 355–65, he promises to present an article on De Kock, none appeared.

3. No article by Carrel seems to have appeared.

4. Louis Marie de La Haye, vicomte de Cormenin (1788–1868), jurist and political writer.

speech at Merchant Tailors' Hall⁵ speaks the voice of the whole party. The Tories will strain every nerve to get a majority in the Commons—but we shall beat them.

Yours ever

J. S. MILL.

The review is exciting great attention here, & already possesses very considerable political influence, which every number we publish will still further increase—J.S.M.

We will send you all the affiches we can spare.

135. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

India House
19th May 1835

MY DEAR SIR

I should have written to you sooner, but I really could not make up my mind at once what to say about Tocqueville. I was quite ignorant of Falconer's intention to make such a proposition to you, & I am by no means confident that I can write such an article on the book as I wish to see written. It is not a subject requiring familiarity with the politics of the day, & I am far from being convinced that the Review will not be a loser by my writing the article instead of you. However if the subject is one on which you would rather not write, & it would be a relief to you to place it in other hands, that is decisive—& there are some disadvantages in having articles which involve the political principles of the review (though this does not involve them nearly so much as Bailey's book)² written at a distance from the conductors of the review & by contributors not in daily intercourse with them & with the details of whose opinions they are not conversant. I have therefore no objection to write the article if it be your wish & Falconer's also, for the third number.³

Many thanks for your remarks, which will be of great use to me.

Our second number is full—including your article on Crabbe, which I

5. On May 11. Peel urged Tories to seek control of the House of Commons in order to resist further constitutional reform. "We will not allow, if we can prevent it . . . such an infusion of democracy into the institutions of this country as shall essentially change their theory, and by slow degrees deprive us of the advantages we have so long enjoyed under our limited monarchy and ancient institutions" (The Times, May 12, 1835, p. 5).

* * * *

1. MS in the Liverpool University Library. White's reply of May 28, 1835, is in Thom, II, 126–27.

2. See Letter 129.

3. See Letter 121, n. 5.

hope the negligence of Willmer⁴ will not prevent us from having the benefit of. We confidently reckon upon some paper of Mr Martineau for No. 3. Would he review the "Second Travels of an Irish Gentleman"?⁵ It would be very important to make that book more known.

May we reckon upon your undertaking to give an account of Guizot's Lectures?⁶

I think our future numbers will far surpass our first—with which, though it was fully as good as I expected, on the whole I was far from being pleased.

Would you be kind enough to suggest to us any subjects on which we ought to have articles—& to Mr Martineau, any on which you think he might be induced to write.

Ever yours faithfully

J. S. MILL

136. TO JAMES MARTINEAU¹

May 26, 1835.

In the opinions you express respecting a Church Establishment I entirely agree, and though some of the habitual contributors to the review still differ from us, the general tone of the review will, I have reason to hope, be that which you approve. A considerable change is, I think, taking place in the tone of thinking of the instructed Radicals on that point. Indeed, as they have (very generally) so far departed from Adam Smith's doctrines as not to admit the voluntary principle even with respect to secular education, it would be very strange if they admitted it with regard to religious. The mistake, I think, is in applying the test to the doctrines which the clergy shall teach, instead of applying it to their qualifications as teachers, and to the spirit in which they teach. When you give a man a diploma as a physician, you do not bind him to follow a prescribed method; you merely assure yourself of his being duly acquainted with what is known or believed on the subject, and of his having competent powers of mind. I would do the same with clergymen. . . . One of the most important objects which the review could be instrumental to, would be to discredit dogmatic

4. Bookseller who served as Liverpool agent for the London Review.

5. Second Travels of an Irish Gentleman in Search of a Religion (2 vols., Dublin, 1833). This was White's reply to Thomas Moore's Travels of an Irish Gentleman in Search of a Religion (2 vols., London, 1833). James Martineau discussed these in his article "Catholic and Protestant Claims to Infallibility," LWR, XXV (July, 1836), 425-49.

6. See Letter 129, n. 7.

* * * *

1. Excerpt published in J. Estlin Carpenter, James Martineau (London, 1905), pp. 165-66. MS not located.

religion and encourage the boldest spirit of rationalism. This too is the spirit which is spreading among the young and cultivated members of the English clergy. This I know from my acquaintance with some striking instances of it. There will shortly appear a posthumous work of Coleridge² (which I saw in manuscript before his death) altogether smashing the doctrine of plenary inspiration, and the notion that the Bible was dictated by the Almighty, or is to be exempt from the same canons of criticism which we apply to books of human origin.

137. TO ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE¹

11 Juin, 1835.

Vous me demandez, mon cher Monsieur, dans quelles limites doit s'exercer la collaboration que j'ai osé vous demander en faveur du London Review. C'est une question fort naturelle, mais qu'il n'appartient pas aux rédacteurs de la Revue de résoudre. La Revue n'a pas pour but la propagation d'un système donné, d'une doctrine générale et unitaire; je n'ai pas besoin de vous dire que jusqu'ici cette doctrine est encore à créer. En défaut d'une théorie complète, les fondateurs du London Review ont désiré que cet ouvrage périodique devînt un recueil des meilleures idées du siècle, notamment en fait de philosophie politique: et dans ce but ils voudraient obtenir la coopération des plus forts penseurs et des hommes les plus éclairés de notre temps, du moins parmi ceux qui sympathisent avec les tendances dominantes du siècle. Cette seule condition est de rigueur, attendu que pour pouvoir travailler utilement avec des amis du mouvement il faut l'être soi-même.

Dans une réunion de pareils hommes il ne vous appartient pas de jouer un rôle secondaire. Aussi ce que nous vous demandons n'est pas une collaboration en second ordre: nous ne vous invitons pas à mettre votre talent à notre disposition pour exposer ou pour discuter telle ou telle série d'idées ou de faits. Nous vous engageons à fixer, de concert avec nous, ce que sera la Revue elle-même; dans quel esprit, et sous l'influence de quelles idées, elle sera faite. La Revue a la prétention de représenter ce qu'il y a de plus avancé dans les doctrines démocratiques: c'est précisément ce que vous avez, vous-même, ou créé, ou fait ressortir avec une vigueur jusqu'ici inconnue, des faits ou des principes connus. Vous êtes donc fait pour dicter des conditions à la Revue, et non pour en recevoir d'elle. Notre vœu serait que vous vouliez bien vous joindre à nous, et vous servir de la Revue

2. This work of Coleridge's eventually appeared under the title Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit, ed. H. N. Coleridge (London, 1840).

* * * *

1. Published in Mayer, pp. 291-93. MS in the Tocqueville archives. Tocqueville's reply is in Mayer, pp. 293-95.

comme organe de vos opinions. Elle est déjà l'organe de ce qu'il y a de meilleur parmi nos hommes du mouvement; mais ces hommes, avec de grandes connaissances spéciales, sont, du moins la plupart d'entre eux, tellement au-dessous de votre niveau quant aux idées générales, que la direction que vous pourrez imprimer à la Revue par vos articles et par l'influence qu'exerceront ces articles sur les autres rédacteurs, décidera peut-être si ce journal servira à éclairer le public anglais sur les questions de haute politique, ou seulement à exciter l'esprit démocratique sans lui donner des principes capables de régler sa marche.

Quant aux moyens particuliers de présenter vos idées, aux questions particulières à traiter, etc., il ne nous appartient pas de vous les indiquer, encore moins d'y mettre des bornes. Un esprit comme le vôtre sait toujours ce qu'il peut et ce qu'il lui convient de faire, mieux que ne pourrait le lui indiquer même son plus intime ami. Tout ce que nous pourrions, c'est de vous dire de quoi nous avons le besoin le plus pressant. Il y a deux pays très importants à bien comprendre, ce sont la France et les Etats-Unis : nous ressentons un grand besoin d'expliquer ces pays à nos compatriotes; nous-même nous ne les connaissons pas assez pour cela et il n'y a peut-être que vous au monde qui soit capable de la faire. Ce serait déjà un cours de haute politique qu'une série d'articles de vous sur ces deux pays; vous avez assez fait vos preuves pour que nous ayons dans la justesse et dans la profondeur de vos vues, ainsi que dans leur impartialité, une confiance que nul autre écrivain ne saurait nous inspirer; vous êtes, enfin, précisément l'homme qu'il nous faut pour écrire sur ces deux pays, et s'il nous fallait désigner un sujet, c'est par là, et en premier lieu par la France, que nous vous prions de commencer.

Veillez, mon cher Monsieur, agréer l'hommage de mon estime et de mon attachement.

J. S. MILL

India House.

138. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

India House
23^d June
1835

MY DEAR SIR

Such a letter as your last might well have called forth an earlier acknowledgment than this. I assure you if I have delayed writing to you it was not for want of sympathizing in the warmest manner in all the feelings which your letter expresses. I wish to heaven there were more persons capable of feeling & thinking in the same manner—& most earnestly do I hope that your sufferings bodily & mental may come to an end, & give you many years of tranquillity & activity at a time when such men are more than ever needed.

1. MS in Liverpool University Library. In reply to White's letter of June 10, 1835, in Thom, II, 134-36.

As for Guizot—there can be no objection whatever to making two articles provided each can be made in form independent of the other. English readers do not, I think, like articles which are ostensibly continued through several numbers of a periodical, but to the reality they do not object, only to the appearance. Therefore pray adjust it in the manner you find most convenient. I quite agree with you that only the most scanty justice can be done to the subject in one article.

I have not yet read Lord Brougham's Discourse² but the opinion of all competent judges with whom I have conversed accords with yours, which is besides in accordance with the character of his mind. He knows no subject well, having never seriously studied anything: he has more half knowledges than perhaps any man of our time, but I never could perceive that he had any complete knowledges at all, & I observe, all who really know any one of the subjects he writes about, think him a very wonderful man, but wonder why he is so unwise as to write on that particular subject.

Is there any literary subject which you would undertake for No. 3, in addition to Guizot? Forgive my encroaching upon you in this stile!³

139. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

India House

1st July

1835

MY DEAR SIR

I write chiefly to inform you that I am about to set out for the Rhine next Saturday,² & shall not be back till the 10th of August, therefore till

2. Henry Brougham, A Discourse of Natural Theology (Brussels, 1835). White had written: "What do you intend to do with Lord Brougham? I have been sadly disappointed by his Discourse on Paley—so much so, that I almost fear I may be under some delusion. To find such a collection of crudities coming from a man of his talents and reading, is quite startling. . . . It appears to me that Lord Brougham has treated most branches of physical and metaphysical science, as briefs put into his hands, upon which he must say something plausible—just enough for the satisfaction of people not much above the juries he has addressed in the course of his life."

3. The end of the letter is missing.

* * * *

1. MS in Liverpool University Library. In reply to White's letter of June 27, 1835, published in part in Thom, II, 137–38.

2. A MS journal (82 pp., 2 vols., 4to, sewed) of this tour of the Rhine was sold in Sotheby's auction of March 27–29, 1922, as lot 716 (third day); its present location is unknown.

that time it will devolve upon Falconer to correspond with you respecting the review.

Lamb³ will be immediately sent—before sending Anster's *Faust*⁴ we are anxious to know in what way you think of treating it—for it would seem too difficult to make an article on one of the most celebrated of Goethe's works, without entering into a complete examination of Goethe himself, his writings & his influence—& that is so great a subject, that we must think of it, & discuss it among ourselves for a good while before we can safely embark upon it. Will you write to Falconer expressing your views & inclinations as to the matter?

The review will be published next Wednesday unless something unexpected should delay it. I am anxious to know what you think of the article "The Church & its Reform";⁵ it is not such as you, or such as I would have written, & perhaps is too brusque in manner, but I think it will do us no discredit.

I should gladly write to you many more things but I am pressed for time. I shall read your work with great interest when I return.

Ever most truly yours

J. S. MILL

M. de Tocqueville will be at Liverpool in a few days. I suppose he has an introduction to you from Senior, but I will at all events write to him & ask him to call upon you.

140. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
14th August
1835

MY DEAR GUILBERT

I yesterday remitted to Mons^r Delamarre Martin Didier, a banker of Paris, for you, the sum of 870 francs, which, with about five francs overpayment last time, will about make up,

3. Charles Lamb, Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakespeare (new edition, 2 vols., London, 1835), which White reviewed in the London Rev., II (Oct., 1835), 51–69.

4. Dr. John Anster's translation of Faust (London, 1835) was eventually reviewed in "Translations of Faust," LWR, XXV (July, 1836), 366–90, probably by J. H. Garnier.

5. The article (I, 257–95, signed P.Q.) was by James Mill.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / Rue de Joubert / 47 / à Paris. Postmarks: F 35, and Paris / 16 AOUT / 1835. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, pp. 254–55.

1. the 400 francs for Messrs Maurel & Blanchard²
2. the 300 francs due to yourself for the months of June & July, & 150 francs for the present month
3. the 25 francs due from myself to M. Faucher³ for the notice on the subject of M. de Tocqueville.

When I asked you to procure notices of Paul de Kock, & Leclercq,⁴ I did not contemplate their being so elaborate as those which you have furnished nor costing so much to the review. Both works are already in the hands of a distinguished English writer,⁵ & of course we could not use, & did not wish to pay for, two criticisms of the same author: but as English reviewers are often ignorant of various things, necessary to be known in reviewing a French author, I was anxious that any particulars, the ignorance of which might expose our English reviewer to the commission of blunders, might be supplied to him from France. I do not say this by way of complaint; you did the best you could for the review, & the articles, that on Paul de Kock especially, are worth much more than we are to pay for them. I mention it only to account for your misunderstanding with Falconer. I never told him of the articles, but gave them at once to the gentleman who is reviewing Paul de Kock & Leclercq for us. The review will only pay for them when the articles are finished, & that was always my intention: but I always intended to advance whatever money might be needful from my own funds, being indemnified by the review hereafter; and this I have done by the remittance I have made to you. By applying to M. Didier you will be able to receive the money immediately.

How do you like our second number? It is well liked here, but has not yet acquired a large circulation, & its progress is so slow that we are obliged to economize our funds as much as possible. I consequently do not like to recommend to Sir William Molesworth to be at any further expense for a Paris correspondent. We originally hoped for some sale at Paris & for considerable aid from the Paris literary men of our own way of thinking: but we do not seem likely to have any sale at all, nor any literary assistance of much importance except from M. Nisard, even if we succeed in obtaining his. I feel myself very strictly accountable for the expenditure of funds which are not my own, & as Sir W. Molesworth is only willing to risk a limited sum on this experiment, I should regret much if that sum were not made to go as far as possible.

We have not yet received any French newspapers or reviews in exchange for our review: have you been able to effect any exchanges?

2. Unidentified. Morrison has "Manuel" instead of "Maurel."

3. Léon Faucher (1803–1854), economist and statesman.

4. Michel Théodore Leclercq (1777–1851), dramatist. No article on him appeared in the London Review.

5. Thomas Love Peacock.

Will these odious laws against the press pass?⁶ & if they do, will any person of the least public spirit or love of freedom, consent to live in France under them?

Our Lords will pass the corporation bill,⁷ with modifications, very bad in themselves, but leaving much good. They will not pass the Irish Church Bill. Have you taken notice of the numerous public meetings, & how the speeches & petitions almost always declare the House of Lords a nuisance.

Have you seen any of Roebuck's pamphlets?⁸ They now sell 10,000.

Ever yours J. S. MILL

141. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

India House
28th August
1835

MY DEAR SIR

I have now been about a fortnight returned from my continental excursion, but have been too much occupied in various ways to be able to write to you before: & I must now for the same reason cut this note very short.

I write in the first place to say how exceedingly pleased I have been with your pamphlet on Heresy & Orthodoxy.² It seems to me one of the most efficient protests which have been made in our time against the doctrine which has been the bane of Xianity, the doctrine that religious duty consists in the reception or adoption of a particular set of opinions, & not in the state of the affections & will.

In the next place, as we are obliged to think seriously now about our third number, we are anxious to know whether we can expect from you either the paper on Guizot,³ or any literary article, which, as we are scant of such articles for this number, would be particularly precious.

6. A projet of sternly repressive laws against the press proposed early in Aug. in the Chamber of Deputies and finally adopted in Sept.

7. Royal assent to the Municipal Corporations bill was given on Sept. 9.

8. Pamphlets for the People, of which thirty-six weekly numbers appeared, began publication on June 11, 1835. In addition to Roebuck, its writers included Henry Chapman, Thomas Falconer, and Francis Place. See R. E. Leader, Life and Letters of John Arthur Roebuck (London, 1897), pp. 71, 75-78.

* * * *

1. MS in Liverpool University Library. An excerpt from White's reply, inexplicably dated Aug. 25, 1835, is in Thom, II, 143.

2. Observations on Heresy and Orthodoxy (London, 1835).

3. See Letter 129, n. 7.

You mentioned Lamb's Specimens of early English Dramatists as a subject—have you written anything upon it?

Believe me

Ever yours

J. S. MILL

Pray inform me particulars of the state of your health.

142. TO ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE¹

[Sept., 1835]

MY DEAR M. DE TOCQUEVILLE,

I write in English because it takes me so much more time to write in French. To you who understand English so perfectly I need not apologise.

Your letter² was most grateful to me on every account—for the expressions of personal friendship, which I hope I shall never deserve to forfeit—& which I trust I may some day have it in my power to prove to you how deeply I value. Next to that I was most delighted with the sure prospect your letter affords of our obtaining from you a cooperation which, while it would be of the greatest importance to the London Review would probably do more good in this country than the London Review itself; for, while a strong & general desire has of late years grown up here, to know something about France, there is as yet no source from which knowledge can be drawn. We have not so much as one readable history of the Revolution; & not our people merely, but our politicians & publicists, know about as much of France as they do of Timbuctoo. They do not even know the titles of the most celebrated books, or the names of the most celebrated men. Hardly any, even instructed Englishmen . . .³ even looked . . . [at] Paul Louis Courier,⁴ or Guizot's lectures,⁵ or Thiers' history.⁶ I do not think there are two hundred who if you spoke to them of these works would not be obliged to ask what they were. Therefore you see, my dear M. de Tocqueville, you need [not] be afraid of being tedious, or telling a twice told tale, if you write to the English about what France was before the Revolution. I should ask you to do so, even if it were not necessary as a preparation for

1. Published in Mayer, pp. 297–99. MS in Tocqueville archives.

2. Dated 12 7^{bre} 1835, in Mayer, pp. 295–97.

3. Ellipsis points here and elsewhere indicate missing portions in the MS, which is torn.

4. See Letter 127, n. 4.

5. Lectures formed the basis of Guizot's Histoire des origines du gouvernement représentatif (1821–22), Histoire générale de la civilisation en Europe (1828), and Histoire de la civilisation en France (1829–32).

6. See Letter 61, n. 7.

understanding the France of the present day. In itself it is a matter most necessary to be set forth & interpreted to the English. And besides, if the mere facts, the mere husk of the ancien régime, were ever so stale to us, it would come fresh & with all the colours of youth out of your hands; for the oldest thing seems new when shewn as you shew it, in all kinds of previously unsuspected relations to all the other things which surround it.

Either the form of letters, or that of articles, would suit the plan of our review; perhaps that of letters, which you suggest, would be best, as leading the reader to feel that each paper is part of a series. Do not restrain yourself in space. We can afford you on an average between 30 & 40 pages of each number, & a page of the L.R. is equal to at least two of your book.

Almost everybody here thinks that the ministers, & the House of Commons, have shewn a deplorable want of energy & courage in the contest with the Lords.⁷ It is not that. . . . However . . . the Lords & the Tories are the sufferers, in this instance. You can hardly conceive how the tone of the public about them is changed since I last saw you. Six months or a year ago, everybody would have been satisfied with a journée of peers; now nobody mentions, or thinks of such a thing; everybody is full of the necessity of an absolute reorganization of the House: & by this time next year everybody will be for abolishing it, (at least as a hereditary & aristocratic body) altogether.

What you say of the probable effect of these . . . laws against the Press,⁸ is encouraging, & in itself . . . highly probable. I know, too, that Carrel thinks . . . as you do on the subject—and him I conceive to be, next to you [the] best authority I know on the state of France. He has been desirous to moderate his tone, & this gives him an opportunity of doing so without loss of influence.

I have nearly finished a review of your book [for the] L.R.⁹ The chief merit of it will be in the extracts: if I [have] succeeded in introducing them so as to excite attention to them I have done all I have aimed at. My article will be, as you [will] see, a shade or two more favourable to democracy than your book, although in the main I agree, so far as I am competent to judge, in the unfavourable part of your remarks, but without carrying them quite so far. The third number will appear in a fortnight & we shall endeavour to bring the fourth out in December, in which we hope to have your first article. Apropos, did M. de Beaumont. . . .

Ever, my dear M. de Tocqueville, yours faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

7. The House of Lords had succeeded in carrying certain amendments to the Corporation bill passed on Sept. 7. The Radicals maintained that the amendments nullified the reforms of the evils of the municipal corporations which the original bill was designed to eliminate (see Annual Register for 1835, pp. 242 ff. and 265–68).

8. See Letter 140, n. 6.

9. See Letter 121, n. 5.

Pray make my kindest remembrances to M. de Beaumont.¹⁰ I will write to him very soon.

Is there a chance of your writing anything about Ireland for the French? It would be very instructive.

J.S.M.

143. TO THOMAS FALCONER¹

I.H.

Saturday

3^d Oct. [1835]

MY DEAR FALCONER

I write to report progress. D'abord I wish you would by the first post, write to Pringle,² to say that from the length to which some of our articles have gone, & the great quantity of matter not acceptable to light readers, which the number will contain, we are obliged to put off his article to No iv.³ which is the less to be regretted as matter of the kind will be likely to be more read then than now. You may add (if you will venture to do so on my testimony) that the article is very good, & will be useful to us.—I want him to receive the first notice of the postponement from us, & not from the advertisement.

We shall be out next week. The only matter not sent to press is my Postscript⁴ (which I think you will like) & the last half of Buller's article,⁵ which he promised sh^d have been here yesterday. What we have of it is very good, & pleasantly written. On the whole it is a good number. We shall rather exceed our 16 sheets, though we must omit the Nebulae.⁶ By the bye, Nichol sent to me by post the first sheet of the Nebulae, saying that an accident had rendered his MS. illegible & that he was obliged to recopy it: & would send by every post one sheet, using thereafter alternately Grote's & Roebuck's frank: consequently I have received no more, both being out of town. But as we have not room for it, that is of no consequence.

10. Gustave de Beaumont de la Bonninière (1802–1866), politician and writer, associate of Tocqueville who accompanied him to America in 1831 and collaborated with him in publishing their Du Système pénitentiaire aux Etats-Unis et de son application en France (Paris, 1833).

* * * *

1. Addressed: T. Falconer Esq. MS in the possession of F. A. Hayek.

2. John Pringle Nichol.

3. "State of Discovery and Speculation concerning the Nebulae." It did not appear until July, 1836 (XXV, 390–409).

4. "Postscript.—The Close of the Session," London Rev., II (Oct., 1835), 270–77.

5. "Journal by Frances Anne Butler," ibid., pp. 194–227.

6. See n. 3 above.

Chapman⁷ goes on very well.

Molesworth wants to write on Orangm.⁸ & I should like him to do so, but as the Atlas man⁹ wants the same thing, & as it may be good to have a friend in the Atlas—will you tell me how I can manage to get a sight of some numbers thereof, that I may see how he writes.

Nichol says his mode of treating the subject, being scientific & a priori, will not interfere with Wakefield's.¹⁰

We are to print 1000 of Law Reform¹¹ & sell it for 6^d. That was Chapman's ultimate opinion. We must distribute it very largely. Could not you send some to the agents for the Political Pamphlet?¹²

I have set on foot a greater quantity of advertising than usual, as people complain of our not being advertised enough.

Ever yours

J. S. MILL

144. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

India House

7th October, 1835.

MY DEAR NICHOL,

In consequence, I suppose, of Grote's and Roebuck's absence from town, I have received no part of your article on "Nebulae"² except the first sheet, which you sent to me direct. This, however, is of the less importance, as the unexpected length of some other articles would at all events have compelled us to omit it from this number. We will have it set up as soon as we receive it, and send you a proof—for we mean to bring out No. 4 in December. I hope your article on "Chalmers" will be ready by that time. The one on "Quetelet"³ would in that case be better postponed.

7. Henry S. Chapman (1803–1881), journalist in Canada, 1823–34; closely associated with the LWR (see Letters 162 and 163); later, judge of Supreme Court of New Zealand.

8. Molesworth contributed two articles: "Orange Societies in Great Britain. Their Illegality and Criminality," London Rev., II (Jan., 1836), 480–513, and "Orange Conspiracy," LWR, XXV (April, 1836) 181–201.

9. Possibly Robert Bell (1800–1867), editor of the Atlas, a weekly journal.

10. Probably Edward Gibbon Wakefield, but no article by him can be identified in the London Review.

11. A reprint of James Mill's article of that title, London Rev., II (Oct., 1835), 1–51.

12. Roebuck's series, "Pamphlets for the People." See Letter 140, n. 8.

* * * *

1. Published by Knight, p. 672. MS not located.

2. See preceding letter, n. 3.

3. L. A. J. Quetelet (1796–1874), Belgian astronomer, meteorologist, and statistician. No article on either Chalmers or Quetelet appeared.

You will, I think, like No. 3; and No. 4 will be excellent. De Tocqueville has promised us a set of articles containing all that he knows and thinks about Maree.⁴ Grote has promised one on "Greek History;"⁵ and we have many other good articles, either ready or in prospect. But we are particularly anxious for the one on "Chalmers."

I shall read Combe's book⁶ with a pleasure increased by receiving it from you. Phrenology, no doubt, may be to a certain extent reconciled with analytical psychology, that is, if it can be discovered that certain nervous peculiarities, affecting the kind or the intensity of our sensations, have to do with peculiar conformations of the brain. Thus, for instance, what they say about their "organ of amativeness" has some foundation, because we know that nymphomania can be traced to inflammation of the cerebellum. It is, I believe, ascertained that the nerves of external sense terminate mostly, if not wholly, in the cerebrum, those of internal in the cerebellum and spinal marrow. What or how much can be inferred from this I do not know. But the difficulty I feel in limine about phrenology is the insufficiency of the induction. I do not believe in anybody's judgments of the characters of individuals from anything the public ever know of their history. Besides, many of the skulls they argue from are not sufficiently authenticated as belonging to the persons to whom they ascribe them; e.g., the skull of Raphael—when his tomb was lately opened his real skull was found there.⁷ I can easily imagine, however, that fine perceptions of sight may be connected with peculiarities of the optic nerve, probably continued into the adjacent parts of the brain, and so on. My opinion on the subject is not that of a competent judge, but I will read Combe without prejudice, and tell you my opinion of what he makes out.

Touching my outward man, which I wish much I could show you in propria personâ, if I can get any competent person to describe me to myself, I will give you the benefit. I do not know anybody that I am like, and am neither able to describe my own physique nor that of anybody else.

We print one thousand separate copies of an article of my father's on "Law Reform"⁸—the best popular paper ever written on the subject. We

4. Inexplicable as spelled here. If this is an error for Marie, JSM may be referring to the novel by Tocqueville's friend Gustave de Beaumont: Marie, ou l'Esclavage aux Etats-Unis (Paris, 1835). On the other hand, however, there is no reference to this work in the extant letters of Tocqueville to JSM. In his letter of 12 7^{bre} 1835 (Mayer, pp. 295–97) Tocqueville proposed that he should write on the political and social condition of France before the Revolution, a proposal subsequently carried out (see Letters 142 and 169, n. 2). JSM included Marie in the books he reviewed in his "State of Society in America," London Rev., II (Jan., 1836), 365–89.

5. No such article appeared.

6. George Combe (1788–1858), phrenologist. Which book of his on phrenology is referred to is uncertain.

7. See "Raphael's Remains," Athenæum, Nov. 16, 1833, p. 780.

8. The leading article in the London Rev., Oct., 1835.

sell it for 6d. How many can you dispose of usefully by distribution? and do you think Mr. Tullis⁹ can sell any?

I will write again soon.

Yours faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

145. TO AN UNIDENTIFIED CORRESPONDENT¹

I.H.

13th October
1835

MY DEAR SIR

I have not had time before now, to fulfil my undertaking on the subject of the book I wrote to you about. Neither have I now time to write anything elaborate on the matter—but if a rather slight article would suit you, combining the trumpery book in question, with another called “Thoughts on the Ladies of the Aristocracy by Lydia Tomkins”² & made up, in considerable part, of extracts from the latter, I think I should now have time to undertake it.

Will you oblige me with a speedy answer & believe me

Ever yours truly

J. S. MILL

146. TO JOHN MURRAY¹

India House

13th October, 1835

Mr. John Stuart Mill presents his compliments to Mr. Murray, & begs to inform him that he is authorized (through a common friend)² by the

9. Robert Tullis, publisher of the Fife Herald, and Nichol's father-in-law.

* * * *

1. MS in the possession of Professor Henry William Spiegel of the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. The person to whom JSM was writing may have been someone connected with the Globe newspaper, for which he wrote occasionally at this period. JSM apparently never wrote the proposed article.

2. This book evidently sought to capitalize on the popularity of Isaac Tomkins' (i.e., Henry Brougham's) Thoughts upon the Aristocracy of England, which reached at least eleven editions in the year of its publication, 1835. Lydia Tomkins' work appeared in at least three editions that year. Also published under the pseudonym of Isaac Tomkins in the same year was: “We Can't Afford It!” Being Thoughts upon the Aristocracy of England. Part the second. For a letter of James Mill to Brougham on Tomkins' works, see Bain, James Mill, pp. 380–81.

* * * *

1. MS in 1944 in possession of Sir John Murray, 50, Albemarle St., London, W.C.1.

John Murray (1778–1843), founder of the publishing business that bears his name.

2. Aristide Guilbert. See Letter 148.

well known French writer M. Fiévée, to propose to Mr. Murray the publication of a work³ which he has prepared for the press containing the particulars of his conversations & confidential communications with Napoleon during a series of years.

Mr. Fiévée is doubtless well known to Mr. Murray, as not only one of the cleverest & most spiritual writers but one of the most experienced & most practical politicians in France. Although Napoleon knew him to be a decided royalist, & a correspondent of the exiled Bourbons, he made him not only a member of his conseil d'état (a body to which none but men of great & tried capacity were admitted) but also, as is well known, consulted him confidentially on many of the transactions of his reign. There is more to be learned of Napoleon's system of government from M. Fiévée's *Correspondence politique et administrative*⁴ (published soon after the restoration) than from almost any other work; & the publication which he has now in contemplation must be still more valuable and interesting.

M. Fiévée's tone of thought & political opinions at the time when his Correspondence appeared, were very like those of Burke. He became more & more alienated from the royalists as they, having more & more chance of keeping in power, clung closer & closer to Napoleon's monstrous centralisation system of which M. Fiévée has always been a most decided and efficient enemy.

If Mr. Murray should be inclined to undertake the publication of the work, M. Fiévée will immediately send the manuscript, and place himself in direct communication with Mr. Murray.

147. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

I.H.

17th October 1835

MY DEAR CARLYLE

If I had not promised to write to you I think I should hardly have written; for I have scarcely a simple fact to communicate, and as for sentiments and speculations one is not so desirous to communicate those by letter when one has and expects to have ample means of doing it by word of mouth. The only event in my history, of the slightest interest to you, which has occurred since you went away,² is the coming out of the 3^d

3. See Letter 123, n. 2.

4. See ibid., n. 4.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq. / Scotsbrig / Ecclefechan / N.B. Postmarks: FREE / 17 OC 17 / 1835, and ES / 17 OC 17 / 1835. Franked by G. Grote. A MS copy is at NLS; the original of the latter half of the letter is at the Pierpont Morgan Library, New York. Carlyle's answer of Oct. 30, 1835, is in A. Carlyle, pp. 115-19.

2. On Sept. 21 Carlyle completed the rewriting of the burned manuscript of Vol. I of The French Revolution. Early in Oct. he went to Scotland to recuperate from the ordeal.

number of the London Review; whereby I have a little breathing time before I am obliged to busy myself about another. I cannot yet tell you either how the number is selling or how it is liked, but I expect a [. . .]³ that those who read it, who I fear will not be many, will like fully better than it deserves. I hope I shall soon write something for it myself, much better than anything I have written in this number.

Buller is now in town, on his way to the Exeter sessions, and is in capital health and spirits. I have no news to tell of anyone else—almost everybody is out of town, and of those who are here I have seen scarcely anything.

I suspect you must be nearly confined to indoor pleasures in Dumfriesshire now, for there can be little comfort in ranging the moors with such weather as we have had, of which you have probably had an enlarged edition. You have the good fortune at any rate to be free from newspapers: you have heard nothing about Don Carlo's [sic],⁴ nor about O'Connell's dining with Lord Mulgrave,⁵ nor the enormity of his calling the Duke of Cumberland a "mighty great liar,"⁶ and you have remained a stranger to the infinite quantity of railroad projects which fill all that part of each day's newspaper which is not engrossed with the above topics. There has been nothing endurable but an article or two of Buller's in the Globe, and I fancy he will not write much more, in that newspaper at least.

Perhaps, by the bye, you did⁷ not see, before you went away, the announcement that Bulwer is to publish a *History of Athens*⁸—what will this world come to! but I much wonder what it will be like.

Louis Philippe threatens to interdict even English papers which attack his government. I should much like to know what old Sieyès⁹ thinks of the present state of France. That man's thoughts must be worth knowing. Austin's brother¹⁰ who has been travelling in France says that all the people he conversed with at inns &c. though many of them disapproved

3. Two words illegible.

4. Don Carlos (1788–1855), after the death of his brother, King Ferdinand VII of Spain, provoked the first Carlist war (1833–39) by his efforts to gain the Spanish throne. Don Carlos had visited England in 1834.

5. On Oct. 7, 1835. Constantine Henry Phipps, second Earl of Mulgrave, later first Marquis of Normanby (1797–1863), had recently been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. His friendly meetings with Daniel O'Connell were being attacked at Protestant meetings and by The Times (see second editorial, p. 2, Oct. 10, 1835).

6. On Oct. 5 O'Connell, in an address to the Trades Political Union, said: "If they [the Orange faction] could, they would change the succession to the throne. They would do so, too, in favour of the white-whiskered Duke of Cumberland, because he is a bigot. Prince of the blood he is, to be sure, but, saving your presence, he is at the same time a mighty great liar" (reported in The Times, Oct. 10, 1835, p. 3).

7. The MS fragment at the Pierpont Morgan Library begins with this word.

8. Athens: Its Rise and Fall (London, 1837).

9. Comte Emmanuel Joseph Sieyès (1748–1836), journalist and statesman.

10. Charles Austin (1799–1874), lawyer.

of the conduct of the government, yet insisted on the necessity of standing by it, for fear of worse—he also says that the Gov^t people are trying to revive the anti-English feeling—& that one can see in their newspapers. They are adopting all Napoleon's maxims of internal policy—but one could see all this in Thiers' book.¹¹ What a curious page all this is in the history of the French revolution. France seems to be désenchanté for a long time to come—& as the natural consequence of political disenchantment—profoundly demoralized. All the educated youth are becoming mere venal commodities.

Grant¹² desires to be remembered to you. I have nothing else worth saying till we meet, which will be I suppose in a fortnight or so—.

Ever affectionately

J. S. MILL.

This letter would not be worth paying for so I have taken care to procure a frank.

148. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
19th October
1835

MY DEAR GUILBERT

I have delayed writing to you so long, hoping that I might be able to tell you by what means the Review will be sent to you—but unhappily I cannot yet tell you. As for Bennis,² I have tried him, & know that he cannot be relied on. A parcel which was delivered to him in Paris for me, did not reach London till three months after. However we will employ him if we find we can do nothing better.

I am well acquainted with M. Fiévée's writings & have a very high opinion of him. I have written to Mr Murray,³ whom you know of course by name, proposing to him to publish M. Fiévée's work; & I expected to have had his answer before this; but it has not yet come.

11. Probably his History of the French Revolution.

12. Horace Grant.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / 47 Rue de Joubert / à Paris. Postmarks: E / IH and 1835. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, p. 255.

2. George G. Bennis (1790–1866), writer, and from 1830 to 1836 director of a librairie des étrangers, Paris.

3. Letter 146.

I send herewith, letters to M. de Cormenin, M. Garnier-Pagès,⁴ & M. Nisard, as well as to another friend of mine, M. de Beaumont.⁵ In the letters to the first three I tell them that you will give them copies as soon as they reach you: to M. Nisard the last number, & the present, to the others a complete set.

I will write to y[ou]⁶ again almost immediately.

Believe me
Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

149. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

I.H.
21st October
1835

MY DEAR SIR

I have been thinking for some days past what subject I could propose to you for a literary article, but almost every thing lately published is so worthless that there is much difficulty in finding a dignus vindice nodus. I have been able to think of nothing better than the republication of Charles Lamb's own works. Is there not matter for some good & curious articles in Spanish literature? If you would give us specimens & criticisms of the principal Spanish authors, or articles on Spanish history, I think they would be interesting to the public and one is obliged to go abroad now for subjects for the literary critic.

Your article on Guizot is excellent as far as it goes but something seems still wanting to give a complete notion of the nature & value of Guizot's historical speculations. I will not ask you to take in hand again a subject of which I do not wonder that you should be tired, but if you would permit me, I should like much to add, mostly at the end of the article, a few more observations & specimens—especially that noble analysis of the feudal system in Lecture 4 of the first volume. The whole should then be submitted for your approval, either in MS. or in type.² If you consent to this do not trouble yourself to write only on purpose to say so as I shall consider silence as consent.

4. Probably Etienne Joseph Louis Garnier-Pagès (1801–1841), writer and politician, rather than his half-brother, Louis Antoine Garnier-Pagès (1803–1878), also a political figure.

5. Gustave de Beaumont.

6. Page torn by seal.

* * * *

1. MS in Liverpool University Library.

2. See Letter 154.

Your remarks in your last letter respecting the conduct of persons in the position of Bishop Coplestone³ are profoundly true & admirably expressed.—I think you mention that you have not read the article which the Archbishop complained of—if you have time to read it, I should much like to know your opinion of it.

I hope you have duly received No. 3. If not, apply at once to Willmer for it, and make him send one to Mr Martineau likewise. You had better always apply to W. at once for books as we cannot depend on our publishers. They have too much to do.

Ever truly yours

J. S. MILL

150. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
30th October
1835

MY DEAR GUILBERT

I wrote to you a few days ago through M. Fillonneau,² sending at the same time letters to MM. de Cermenin, Garnier-Pagès, and Nisard. I had written a short letter to M. Nisard some time before.

I now write to say that 20 copies of No 3 & some copies of Nos 1 & 2 of the London Review have been sent to Galignani³ in a packet addressed to you. I have made enquiry respecting the non-arrival of the copies of No 2, & I find that (while I was in Germany) they were sent, not to Baillièrè⁴ but to Galignani, viz. 20 copies for sale, 8 addressed to you, a copy addressed to Carrel & another to M. Nisard. If you find any difficulty in getting the packets with your name & address on them from Galignani write to me directly. They have arrived at Paris or they will soon arrive. The parcel from Mess^{rs} Baldwin & Cradock booksellers, Paternoster Row.

When they reach you would it be too much to request the favour of you to give copies to those who ought to have them? in particular Carrel, Nisard, MM de Cermenin, Garnier-Pagès, Charles Comte, Odilon-Barrot, Alexis

3. Edward Copleston (1776–1849), Bishop of Llandaff.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / Rue de Joubert / No 47 / à Paris. Postmarks: I NOV / 1835 / Angleterre / Par / Calais / and 297 / F / 35. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, p. 255. Lacunae in the MS have been supplied from Morrison.

2. Unidentified.

3. Jean A. (1796–1873) and William G. Galignani (1798–1882), publishers.

4. J. B. M. Baillièrè (1797–1883), publisher.

de Tocqueville (Rue de Verneuil No 49) Gustave de Beaumont (rue du Bac, no 36 bis) Dussard (rue Richer No 22) & any other persons or periodical works whom you may select. I wish you would also give copies of all the three numbers to M. Gustave d'Eichthal, Rue Lepelletier No 14 & to M. Fiévée.

I mentioned in my letter that I had written to Mr Murray,⁵ one of our leading booksellers, respecting M. Fiévée's work. I am much astonished at not having yet received an answer from him. If I do not speedily, I shall apply to another bookseller. The little essay which you sent by Madame Foulon,⁶ is very good, it seems designed as an introduction to a set of Exercises: were the Exercises ever completed? If so, I think you should publish them here & I have little doubt of their success. For separate publication the essay would require some alterations, & would suit various other periodicals better than the London Review. But I could probably procure its insertion somewhere.

You said once that the proprietors of the "Histoire parlementaire de la révolution"⁷ would be willing to send us that work if we would undertake to notice it. I already have it from the commencement to the close of the Constituent Assembly. If the proprietors would promptly send all the following volumes, & would continue to send the remainder, I will undertake that it shall be noticed, not only in the London Review but in other works. I say promptly, because if they do not send it I must buy it and then I shall not take any trouble to get it noticed.

Our third number is much more generally liked, I find, than our second.

Yours ever faithfully

J. S. MILL.

151. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
11th November
1835

MY DEAR GUILBERT

Mr Murray, the bookseller, is unluckily out of town, & the only answer I have been able to get from his son, is a recommendation to M. Fiévée to

5. Letter 146.

6. Unidentified. Morrison prints the name as Toulon.

7. See Letter 101, n. 12.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / Rue de Joubert / No 47 / à Paris.
Postmarks: Angleterre par Calais / 13 NOV / 1835 / and F 35 / 226. MS at King's.
Printed in Morrison, p. 256.

send the manuscript for Mr Murray to see.² I think it would be advisable to send it, or at least part of it, as I am, myself, quite convinced that it will suit Mr Murray, but in case it should not, I could then apply at once to some other bookseller.

Have the copies of the London Review No 3, which were sent to you through Galignani, yet reached you? Pray enquire for them & let me know. I do not know exactly on what day Mess^{rs} Baldwin & Cradock sent them—but they were addressed to you, at your own residence, Rue de Joubert No 47.

M. Nisard has positively promised an article on Victor Hugo for the next number.³ The letter he wrote to me on the subject amused me extremely—it quite corresponded with the character you gave him.

Our politics are in appearance sleeping—the ministry doing all they can to stop the discussion on the reform of the peerage—& they have succeeded, with respect to the daily newspapers—but not as to the weekly, or the country papers—& public opinion has in reality, fully decided the question, as you will see in a year or two.

Ever yours

J. S. MILL

152. TO ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE¹

19 novembre 1835.

Permettez-moi, mon cher M. de Tocqueville, de vous adresser les plus vives félicitations sur l'événement que M. de Beaumont m'a annoncé dans sa lettre du 8 de ce mois.² Puisse-t-il réaliser tous vos vœux et vous assurer le bonheur que vous méritez si bien et qui échappe si souvent à ceux qui, dans notre temps, et peut-être de tout temps, se sont occupés de faire quelque chose pour le bien de l'humanité.

Comme il se peut très bien, par la négligence des libraires, que vous n'ayez point encore reçu l'exemplaire qui vous était destiné du London Review, je vous en envoie un autre, accompagné d'un exemplaire de mon article sur la « Démocratie en Amérique »³ que je sou mets à votre bienveillante critique, en désirant vivement de votre amitié la communication

2. See Letter 146.

3. It appeared in the Jan., 1836, number (II, 389–417).

* * * *

1. Published in Mayer, pp. 301–2, as is also Tocqueville's answer of Dec. 3, pp. 302–4. MS in Tocqueville archives.

2. In Oct. he had married an English girl, Miss Mary Mottley.

3. "De Tocqueville on Democracy in America," London Rev., II (Oct., 1835), 85–129.

de toutes les observations qui pourront naître dans votre esprit des doutes que j'ai exprimés sur une petite partie seulement de vos conclusions. Je suis loin d'avoir des idées fixes sur les questions dont il s'agit, et je suis avide de tous les renseignements qui pourraient m'aider à en former, et que personne autant que vous n'est dans le cas de me donner. Si je me trompe dans quelques-unes de mes observations, je le regrette d'autant moins que les lecteurs du London Review ne sont guère encore capables d'accueillir des opinions plus conformes aux vôtres que celles que j'ai exprimées, et je pourrai, avec le temps, rectifier mes erreurs.

Vous pensez bien que je ne veux pas, dans les circonstances présentes, vous importuner au sujet des articles que vous voulez bien destiner au London Review. Je vous dirai seulement que nous nous sommes décidés à ne faire paraître la 4^e livraison que le 31 décembre, ce qui nous permettrait d'attendre plus longtemps un article dont il nous serait si avantageux d'enrichir cette livraison.

Croyez toujours, mon cher M. de Tocqueville, à ma haute estime et à mon amitié dévouée.

J. S. MILL.

India House.

153. TO HENRY S. CHAPMAN¹

I.H.

Monday.

[Nov., 1835]

DEAR CHAPMAN,—

I send two articles which should be set up directly. One by J.R.² and another (the one on Guizot which I have, I think, with tolerable success) manufactured from a so-so article into a good one.³ If they cannot print from the pencil I wish you would get somebody to put my alterations into ink.

Let me have proof as soon as possible of both these and of the "Aristocracy"⁴ in which my father wishes to make some corrections.

I shall have an opportunity in a day or two for Mrs Austin, and I will send her one of my copies.

Yours ever,

J. S. MILL.

1. From copy in the possession of Professor J. M. McCrimmon, University of Illinois. Dated by reference to Guizot article in the next letter.

2. Probably John Robertson's article, "Lives of Bacon," London Rev., II (Jan., 1836), 513-32. The article is signed "M.R.," a signature used by Robertson for other articles clearly identified as his.

3. See Letters 149 and 154.

4. [James Mill], "Aristocracy," London Rev., II (Jan., 1836), 283-306, signed "P.Q."

154. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

India House
24th November
1835

MY DEAR SIR

I have now the pleasure of sending you a proof of the article on Guizot,² in which I hope you will point out every, the smallest, thought or expression to which you in the slightest degree object, & will make any suggestions for the improvement of the article, which may occur to you. I think it will be very interesting & instructive & it is a kind of article which the review much wanted.

Perhaps the few remarks which I have inserted near the beginning of the article, respecting M. Guizot's political conduct, are not sufficiently in the tone & spirit of the rest of the article—if you think so, pray cancel them & substitute anything which you prefer—but it strikes me that something on that topic was wanted in that place.

I return, at the same time, a few pages of your MS. which I was obliged to omit in order to make room for what I added & to render the general character of the article less discursive.

Joanna Baillie³ is just about to publish three more volumes of plays: would that not be a good opportunity for a review of her? She has never been properly reviewed. If you think so, I will undertake it, we will get them from the publisher & send them to you.

Ever yours truly
J. S. MILL

Let me hear from you soon respecting your health.

155. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
5th December
1835

MY DEAR GUILBERT

I think precisely as you do about M. Nisard's article.² We shall insert it, almost unaltered.

1. MS in Liverpool University Library.

2. See Letter 149.

3. Joanna Baillie (1762–1851), Scottish dramatist and poet, whose work JSM had admired since boyhood; he regarded her Constantine Paleologus as “one of the best dramas of the last two centuries” (Autobiog., p. 11, n.). Her forthcoming publication was Dramas (3 vols., London, 1836). It was not reviewed in LWR.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / Rue de Joubert / 47 / à Paris. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, p. 256.

2. “Victor Hugo,” London Rev., II (Jan., 1836), 389–417.

We have also the promise (but do not mention this) of several articles on French society & civilization by M. de Tocqueville,³ author of "La Démocratie en Amérique."

These articles & those of M. Nisard, are likely so much to increase the interest taken in the review in France, that we certainly ought to have a regular agency at Paris, & that of M. Paulin⁴ is the one we should desire above all others. I do not however quite understand his conditions. Are the 600 francs you mention, 600 francs per month? If so, the expense is greater than we can afford; & we can hardly hope for advertisements enough to pay that expense when the tax on advertisements is deducted. And in regard to our "good offices for the books published by him" an English review which is more political & philosophical than literary, & does not notice, even English books unless they fall in its way while writing for some other purpose, could hardly, even with the best inclinations, engage to notice every book published by a particular house at Paris—neither could we undertake to notice any book with praise unless we thought the praise merited; but perhaps all that is meant is, to notice it in the advertising sheet—that we will readily do, though we shall have to pay taxes for all such notices as advertisements.

Let me hear from you again immediately on this subject.

I will get a written authority for your receiving the books from Galignani. I sent 20 copies of No 3. by M. Fillonneau.

I have not heard further from Mr Murray—I wait for M. Fiévée's note descriptive.

Ever yours truly

J. S. MILL

156. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
9th December
1835

MY DEAR GUILBERT

I suppose you have seen Falconer's brother & that he has told you all about Paulin. His name will appear as Agent on the cover of the forthcoming review, & I will thank you to conclude with him on the terms he proposes. It will be as well to have a written agreement merely as a memo-

3. Only one appeared that can be attributed to Tocqueville: "Political and Social Condition of France," LWR, XXV (April, 1836), 137–69, signed Δ.

4. J. B. A. Paulin (1796–1859), publisher.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / Monsieur Aristide Guilbert / Rue de Joubert / 47 / à Paris. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, p. 256.

random for both parties. It will suit us best to pay the money four times a year, 250 francs on the publication of each number. Will you likewise request M. Paulin, as our agent, to expend a sum not exceeding 125 francs in advertising the present number. I will remit to you the money both for M. Paulin & for M. Nisard to any banker you may name, or we can remit it to M. Paulin that we may not give you trouble now when we have a paid Agent. Unless M. Paulin names some other banker—we will remit to M. Didier as before.

The fourth number is not yet out, owing to extreme misbehaviour on the part of our printer, which we shall not suffer to be repeated. Falconer has some arrangements in view at Dover & Calais by which we may ensure the rapid conveyance of our copies to Paris. We will send 30 copies to M. Paulin as soon as possible after the review appears. Should we send 30 copies only or 30 for sale in addition to, how many? for contributors, & exchanges.

M. Paulin is at liberty to sell them at any price (not lower than three francs) which he thinks most advisable, with a view as well to the reputation of the review as to its pecuniary profit.

Immediately on receiving M. Fiévée's paper, I forwarded a copy of it to Murray, from whom I have not yet received any answer. If one does not come soon, I will wit[hout] further delay, try an[other] bookseller.²

How goes on "le Progrès"?³

I suppose you hear sometimes of or from Mad. Foulon—I have done all I could for her, & I think Mrs Hume⁴ or M^{rs} Grote will be of some use to her if she should not, as there is reason to hope, attain her object without them.

Ever truly yours

J. S. MILL.

157. TO ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE¹

11 Décembre, 1835.

MON CHER AMI,

Quand votre lettre est venue j'étais au lit et souffrent par une maladie dont je suis maintenant complètement rétabli. Votre lettre m'a causé la plus vive satisfaction. Rien ne pouvait m'être plus flatteur que l'appro-

2. Brackets indicate where page has been torn by seal.

3. Unidentified, but possibly the projected journal mentioned in Letter 157.

4. Wife of Joseph Hume, Radical MP.

* * * *

1. Published in Mayer, pp. 305–6, in reply to Tocqueville's of Dec. 3, ibid., pp. 302–4. MS in Tocqueville archives.

bation que vous avez donnée à mon article.² Tout ce que j'ai dit, je l'ai senti, et j'aurais pu dire davantage sans dépasser l'admiration que je ressens pour votre ouvrage et pour son auteur. Quant à la discussion que j'ai ouverte avec vous sur plusieurs points, ne croyez pas que j'aie une conviction pleine et parfaite sur ces questions. Je les regarde certes comme très susceptibles d'une discussion ultérieure, et vous êtes, mon cher Tocqueville, un du très petit nombre de ceux avec une pareille discussion pourrait mener à quelque chose. J'en attends avec impatience l'occasion.

Je regarde avec vous la distinction entre délégation et représentation comme capitale. Ce n'est pas d'aujourd'hui que je tâche de la mettre en avant. Déjà en 1830 j'ai vivement soutenu dans l'Examiner la même opinion;³ et en 1832, époque où l'on discutait beaucoup ici le mandat impératif, M. Fonblanque eut assez de patriotisme pour imprimer dans un journal deux longs articles de moi,⁴ qui offensèrent beaucoup le public radical et lui fit perdre plusieurs de ses abonnés. Mon père, qui au reste est beaucoup plus démocrate que moi, partage très décidément la même opinion, seulement il pense avec une certitude que je suis loin de partager au même degré, que le peuple confondra rarement cette distinction.

Je n'ai senti aucun étonnement de ce que votre premier article ne nous soit pas encore parvenu. On ne peut pas faire vite, et faire aussi bien que vous faites; et ce sentiment consciencieux, qui vous empêche de faire les choses à demi, je l'éprouve moi-même; traiter un sujet moins bien que j'aurais pu le traiter, c'est une nécessité à laquelle je suis forcé quelquefois de me soumettre mais je la subis toujours avec une peine extrême. Si nous avions pu faire connaître publiquement votre nom, cela nous aurait été très utile, je crois même que cela aurait décidé le succès matériel de la revue, car vous êtes maintenant assez connu ici, et pas trop connu, pour que votre apparition dans une revue anglaise piquât vivement la curiosité publique par le double attrait du mérite reconnu et de la nouveauté. Cependant les raisons que vous me donnez sont trop fortes pour que je tâche de vaincre votre répugnance. Nous userons de votre permission en laissant percer votre nom. La prochaine livraison doit par des raisons d'affaires se publier le 31 de ce mois, par conséquent elle devra paraître sans votre

2. See Letter 152.

3. "Prospects of France," No. IV, Examiner, Oct. 10, 1830, pp. 642-44. "The true idea of a representative government is undoubtedly this, that the deputy is to legislate according to the best of his own judgment, and not according to the instructions of his constituents, or even to the opinion of the whole community" (ibid., p. 642).

4. "Pledges," Examiner, July 1, 1832, pp. 417-18, and July 15, pp. 449-51. "The true idea of popular representation is not that the people govern in their own persons, but that they choose their governors. In a good government public questions are not referred to the suffrages of the people themselves, but to those of the most judicious person whom the people can find. The sovereignty of the people is essentially a delegated sovereignty." (Ibid., p. 417.) See Letter 54, n. 12.

article à moins qu'il ne soit déjà fait. C'est une perte pour nous, mais nous sommes consolés un peu par la réflexion que notre marché avec le Westminster Review n'est pas terminé encore et le sera probablement avant la livraison d'Avril.⁵ Votre article obtiendra par là dès le commencement une publicité plus étendue.

Rien ne me serait plus agréable que de faire un voyage à Paris et de vous y voir—Hélas! je suis lié pieds et mains pendant onze mois de l'année et il me faut attendre jusqu' à l'été prochain, alors je serai peut-être à Paris au moins plusieurs jours.

Tout à vous de cœur, mon cher ami, je vais signer ma lettre quoique vous n'ayez pas signé la votre.

J. S. MILL.

India House.

Mille amitiés à Beaumont. Je n'ai pas encore une réponse de M. Crawford.⁶

158. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
26th December
1835

MY DEAR GUILBERT

I was just writing to you when I received your note. I am most happy to hear of the journal you are about to establish² & of the excellent plan on which it is to be carried on. I am concerned that the popular party should now use les intérêts matériels as one of their main levers. "Il faut arriver à la république par les épiciers." You can with the more propriety announce yourself as a writer in our review, as your observations on l'épicier will appear in the present number as part of an article on that personage.³

5. See Letter 165, n. 2.

6. Probably William Sharman Crawford (1781–1861), Protestant liberal Irish politician, then MP for Dundalk; but possibly William Crawford (1788–1847), philanthropist, then inspector of prisons for the London and Midland districts, who shared with Beaumont and Tocqueville an interest in American prison practices. Beaumont was engaged at this time on a book on Ireland and may have sought information from W. S. Crawford.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / Rue de Joubert / 47 / à Paris. Postmarks: F 35 / 243 and Angleterre / Par Calais / 28 DEC. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, p. 257, but dated there Dec. 20, 1835.

2. Unidentified, but see Letter 156.

3. Guilbert's "observations" are presumably the section headed "Political Physiology of the Epicier," quoted (pp. 359–61) from a "French MS. communication," in Thomas Love Peacock's "The Epicier," London Rev., II (Jan., 1836), 355–65.

I shall advise the proprietor of the review to accept M. Paulin's proposition. In the meantime write directly & tell me—considering the interest likely to be excited by M. Nisard's article—how many copies you would advise us to send—& what advertisements to insert in the Paris journals—& what you think would be the cost, & in what way the copies would get to Paris quickest & at what price you would advise that they should be sold.

Falconer would have sent the order upon Galignani, by his brother who has just gone to Paris, had he not set out in an unexpected hurry. Falconer told me some days ago that he would send it by letter to his brother at Paris, & I trust he has done so.

Was it 300 francs per sheet that you agreed were to be paid to M. Nisard? We will send the money either to him or to you, through any banker that you may prefer.

I have been waiting for M. Fiévée's paper—rather impatiently as our publishing season is approaching. There was no use in speaking again to Murray, or to any other bookseller, till the paper arrived. I am glad it is so soon coming.

Our forthcoming number will be far the best we have yet published, & will greatly eclipse all the other reviews. We have three articles on France: one on Guizot's Lectures, one on l'Epicier & the one on Victor Hugo.

I shall probably be able to send a positive answer to M. Paulin on Monday. In the meantime as we publish next Thursday without fail, pray write directly.

I shall write to M. Nisard on Monday—I have myself translated his article.

Ever truly yours my dear Guilbert

J. S. MILL.

. . . 1836 . . .

159. TO [ADOLPHE NARCISSE?] THIBAUDEAU¹

India House
Samedi
[1836?]

MON CHER THIBAUDEAU—

Ce serait une chose utile à la Revue de Londres si nous pouvions y insérer un bon et amusant article biographique et critique sur Thiers.² Ce n'est pas que ce petit fripon en vaille la peine, mais c'est que cela serait lu, chose très essentielle quand on écrit. C'est pourquoi je m'adresse à vous pour vous demander l'indication des renseignements nécessaires pour cela, et vos bons offices pour en obtenir. Ecrivez moi, je vous prie, un petit mot là-dessus, ou faites mieux, venez me voir, soit ici, soit à Kensington. J'irais vous chez vous si je le pouvais, mais il y a quinze jours que je le désire et que je ne le puis pas tout à vous

J. S. MILL

160. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

India House
9th January
1836

I wrote to you, my dear Mütterlein, by Mr. Barry² but owing to his unexpectedly going away without seeing his brother to whom my letter was delivered he never received it, & it was brought back to me next day—so here goes to repair it.

Thanks for your kind note. I was only confined at home for a week, by a slight stomach attack, which as they tell me & I believe, has probably saved me from a much worse one—but I fancy I resumed my ordinary amount of bodily exercise too soon, & thereby retarded the recovery of

1. MS in the possession of Arthur Pforzheimer, Bookseller, 26 East 56th Street, New York City, in March, 1944.

2. No such article appeared.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Madame / Madame Austin / à Boulogne-sur-Mer. Postmark: Boulogne-sur-Mer / 10 / [...] / 1836. MS at Yale.

2. Unidentified.

my strength, & I am still by no means completely reestablished.³ My father has had no returns of unfavourable symptoms for many weeks now, but his recovery is very slow, & I do not expect that he will quite get rid of the cough before the warm weather. He does not feel the cold much, as while it lasts he does not stir out of a room which is kept of uniform temperature—& he does not suffer from the confinement nearly so much as I should have expected. He frequently enquires about you and Mr. Austin from every person whom he thinks likely to have heard from you.

I told Chadwick of the opportunity by Mr. Barry, & as I understand several parcels went to Boulogne with him I hope C. sent what you wanted. I did not send anything except my letter, literally because I knew nothing worth sending. The books & periodicals are even worse than they were before you went away. Even the Examiner has degenerated, & grown comparatively tame & dull. Fonblanque is using himself up by writing in the Chronicle,⁴ the euthanasia of those who live at a greater expense than they can wisely afford—they kill themselves, or at least the best part of themselves, their minds, by demanding too much of them—"to this favour they must come" if they do no worse. The fourth number of the London Review, which is really a good number, would be better worth sending than anything else, but unluckily it was not, & is not even yet, out, thanks to the scurvy conduct of the printer. I will send it by the first opportunity I have, & if there is anything else in particular that you or Mr. Austin feel any curiosity about, tell me & I will be sure to send it.

What you say about my coming to see you is very kind of you my dear Mütterlein but I am not fit for travelling, nor yet unfit to be at the India House from which in my father's absence I could ill be spared.

I hope Von Raumer⁵ is worth all the trouble you take about him—but heaven knows whether our stupid public will read or buy a book by a German gelehrte who is neither prince nor minister & whom they never heard of. My father suggested the other day that you should translate Thiers' history—it has never been translated, & would be sure to sell.

I grieve to hear that Mr. Austin is not well, though all I have heard of him since he was at Boulogne has been favourable as compared with his health anywhere else. What does he mean to do about the Examinership?⁶

3. This is the first indication in the extant letters of the onset of the serious illness that was to afflict him for much of the rest of the year and to leave him with permanently impaired health. In April his physician ordered him to Brighton to recuperate, and at the end of July the East India Company gave him a three months' leave of absence to seek health in travel on the Continent.

4. The Morning Chronicle.

5. Mrs. Austin's translation with H. E. Lloyd of Frederick L. G. von Raumer's England in 1835 (3 vols.) was published in March, 1836.

6. Austin evidently declined the position, for later that year he accepted an appointment with Sir George Cornewall Lewis to investigate the government of Malta.

that is a sort of employment which probably would not knock him up, like writing—and the improvement in his circumstances with leisure & freedom from anxiety, might give him a better chance than he ever had before of being well in London.

I have nothing new to tell about Carlyle, Sterling, the Bullers, Grotes, &c.

My brother James has left Haileybury⁷ with very great credit, & goes to India in about a month. The rest of the family are much as usual, except Jane, who is in indifferent health. Give my love to Lucy.⁸ Farewell

Your Söhnchen

J. S. MILL

161. TO THOMAS FALCONER¹

[Jan. 27, 1836]

DEAR FALCONER,—

A strange fatality attends our review. I do not believe there ever was any undertaking in which every single thing which ought to be done was so regularly left undone. We advertised the number as out when it was not out,² and to make amends (I suppose) I have not been able to find a single advertisement that made known the fact since it actually happened.³ There was no advertisement in the "Examiner" on Monday,⁴ nor in the "Chronicle" yesterday or to-day. It is true, as Peacock says, that "the London Review comes out surreptitiously." I also ascertained yesterday that at least two contributors, Bisset⁵ and Garnier, had no copies sent to them. Bisset asked Chapman for one, and got it, and I shall give one to Garnier to-day, but for aught I know, not a single contributor has received a copy, except Peacock, who had one already. You have not answered my note enquiring whether Sterling and W. H. Smith⁶ have had copies.

7. The East India College there.

8. Mrs. Austin's daughter, later Lady Lucy (or Lucie) Duff Gordon (1821–1869).

* * * *

1. From copy in the possession of Professor J. M. McCrimmon, University of Illinois. The dating is based on the remarks about the advertising of the London Review (see notes 2, 3, 4).

2. An advertisement in the Examiner for Dec. 27, 1835, p. 830, announced that the Review would be published on Dec. 31.

3. The Examiner for Jan. 17, 1836, p. 46, announced that the Review would be published on Jan. 18.

4. Really Sunday. The Examiner for Jan. 24 carried no advertisement of the Review, but the Jan. 31 number, p. 80, announced it as published.

5. Andrew Bisset (1803–?), barrister and historian.

6. William Henry Smith (1808–1872), philosopher and poet, writer for Blackwood's Magazine.

I wish you would get a copy of the Index of Vol. 2 for Peacock, as his copy being an early one, was destitute of that appendage.

Ever yours,

J. S. MILL.

We are the laughing stock of everybody who knows us, for our way of doing business.

162. TO HENRY S. CHAPMAN¹

I.H.,

Tuesday.

[Feb. (?), 1836]

MY DEAR CHAPMAN,

I received your note only yesterday evening, at Kensington. I will endeavour to arrange matters with Falconer on the footing which you approve of. I quite agree with you as to what should be the limits of my own interference. The reading of proofs only devolved upon me because there were often alterations to be made after the article was already set up, and because time often pressed and it was desirable to make the alterations before sending the author his proof. We are now, however, so much in advance with our stock of articles that we need not hereafter be pressed for time as we have been hitherto.

As to any other interference on my part, it has been completely forced upon me against my will, and has been progressive with the necessity for it. When I began I counted upon Falconer's saving me the trouble either of acting or thinking as to business matters; and for a time I left him to himself. I presently found that nothing whatever was done by him unprompted. I therefore, to my great annoyance, had to suggest everything that occurred to me, but I now found that suggesting was not enough, for the suggestions though not objected to, were never acted upon. I supposed that this was for want of remembering them, and in this way I got the habit of reminding him continually, and asking him if the things were done or not. Finally, I found on asking, that in many cases they were not done even after numerous remindings, and thus has been brought about a relation between us so distasteful to me that I never will allow it to go on. At the same time I cannot sit calmly and see the thing go to the devil for want of doing a single thing that is necessary. Every person I know is continually complaining to me of the mismanagement; our utter incapacity is become a subject of general sarcasm and jokes, and at length our printers and publishers have such a contempt for us as men of business that they will not attend to a single one of our orders. If this is the case when I am continually dunning Falconer, what would it be if I intrenched myself in my own department and let the thing go to ruin, saying it was his concern not mine? If Falconer had not been a friend, and of my own choice, and a person I like much and think very highly of, I should have spoken to Molesworth and said "find me another editor, or I give it up." The contrary being the case, I spoke to Falconer himself, and resolved to take upon myself the trouble he ought to have saved me, and if even that had produced any tolerable management I would have let the thing go on. But as even that will not, it must be changed.

1. From a copy in the possession of Professor J. M. McCrimmon.

Senior has some copies of his article,² but his publishers made such objections to the circulation of them here, that he has scarcely been able to give any away except to foreigners. He gave me one because I wanted to review it; if you like I will lend it to you.

I am still far from well—indeed rather worse than better, and I fear I shall be unable to write anything for No. 5,³ and shall have to go into the country and give up for a time all work. I am the more anxious to have the editorship placed on a satisfactory footing that I may not feel anxious while I am away about the mode of its going on.

Will you oblige me by sending the enclosed to Liverpool.

Ever truly yours

J. S. MILL

163. TO HENRY S. CHAPMAN¹

I.H.

Friday

[Feb., 1836]

DEAR CHAPMAN,

I have just written to Falconer to propose your being Sub-editor.² In the way I have put it, it cannot possibly hurt his feelings. In case he should not object what salary (disinterestedness apart, for Molesworth is anxious to give you the full value of your time and labour) should you consider adequate?

2. Nassau Senior, An Outline of the Science of Political Economy. This was first published as the article on political economy in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, 1836, and a few copies were struck off for private circulation (see Marian Bowley, Nassau Senior and Classical Economics [London, 1937], p. 340). JSM seems not to have carried out his intention of reviewing Senior.

3. He did contribute, however, two articles to this number (April, 1836) of the LWR: "Civilization," pp. 1–28, and "The State of Politics in 1836," pp. 271–78.

* * * *

1. From copy in the possession of Professor J. M. McCrimmon.

2. The original bears a note by H. S. Chapman: "Memo: No communication ever received from Falconer."

So Pam.⁸ is at an end,—it serves us with its dying breath. Is there to be a Sunday paper or not?⁴

Ever faithfully yours,

J. S. MILL.

We shall get the Westminster, Molesworth says—he has brought them almost to terms by giving them money in hand.⁵

164. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

I.H.

17th February
1836

MY DEAR MUTTERLEIN

Your letter is kind as you always are—& you know how great a pleasure it always is to me to be with you & Mr Austin. I am however so decidedly better within the last few days that I can perhaps do without going into the country at all, & certainly a few days in the country would quite reestablish me—against going so far there are therefore two reasons—the great inconvenience that even a week's absence is to my father while absent from the India House—& that the fatigue of the journey would do me more harm at present than a very short stay would do me good—the great thing I have to do is to avoid fatigue—there is nothing the matter with me but want of tone and strength. I certainly shall not allow myself to get into bad health, & I should [have]² gone out of town before this if it had not been for the inconvenience to my father—and you may be sure he would not have allowed me to make that a reason, if I had been seriously ill.

Pray write again & give me more news of yourself & of Mr Austin. I seldom hear about you except in the most general terms.

3. Roebuck's series, Pamphlets for the People, ended with the number for Feb. 11, 1836. See Letter 140, n. 8.

4. Molesworth, Roebuck, and J. T. Leader were projecting a new radical paper on which Chapman was to be engaged. Professor McCrimmon possesses a copy of an unpublished letter from Molesworth to Chapman, dated March 3 [1836], which begins: "Roebuck has I presume informed you that we shall establish a paper—success to us—. Leader expects you on Saturday at two o'clock when all will be arranged." The plan apparently did not materialize at this time, but Molesworth, Leader, and others established a weekly newspaper The Guide in 1837 (see Letter 415, n. 2).

5. The merger of the London Review and the Westminster Review became effective with the April, 1836, number. See Letter 165, n. 2.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Madame Austin / à Boulogne sur Mer. Postmarks: ANGLETERRE / PAR / CALAIS; BOULOGNE-SUR-MER / 19 / F36 / 184; UR MER / 1836 / (61); BOULOGNE. MS at King's.

2. Page torn.

My father gets on very slowly—but he does get on. There is no news—as to public matters, the ministry are more popular & the radicals in better humour than at any time since the Reform Bill.

Your Söhnchen

J.S.M.

165. TO ALBANY FONBLANQUE¹

I.H.

Friday

[Feb., 1836]

MY DEAR FONBLANQUE

Molesworth has just bought the Westminster Review to merge it in the London.² As the sole radical review we shall surely now have a good chance of success; but we have more need than ever of good articles, that the first number after the junction may be a striking one. You have now rather more leisure, I suppose, than you had during the last year—it would be of the very greatest importance to us if you would write something for the next number. Had you been able to write for us from the commencement it might have made a great difference to us. There are very few of the good radical writers who have not written for us—but you who for popular purposes are universally allowed to be the best, have not. I wish you would.

Yours ever faithfully

J. S. MILL

P.S. Was the article on the “Fudges in England” in the last *West*³ by Mr. Savage?⁴ If so, I wish you would tell him that my father was greatly struck with it.

So they blackballed [Fellowes?] by 47 & [Hill?] by 67.⁵ The radicals should blackball all Tories till they put down the conspiracy. I shall go there on purpose whenever I can & shall proclaim my intention.

1. Part published in Life and Labours of Albany Fonblanque, ed. E. B. de Fonblanque (London, 1874), pp. 39–40. MS at LSE. Bears pencil mark, 1834, but internal evidence establishes early 1836 as the proper date.

2. Molesworth paid the proprietor of the Westminster £1,000. The Examiner on March 20, 1836, p. 192, carried an advertisement announcing the merger. The first issue of the London and Westminster Review was that for April, 1836.

3. A review of The Fudges in England (London, 1835) by Thomas Brown the Younger (i.e., Tom Moore, the poet), WR, XXIV (Jan., 1836), 79–92.

4. Probably Marmion W. Savage (1803–1872), Irish journalist and novelist, editor of the Examiner, 1856–59.

5. The reference is to an election of members to the Athenæum, to which both JSM and James Mill, as well as Fonblanque, belonged (see T. Humphry Ward, History of the Athenæum, 1824–1925 [London, 1926], pp. 41–42). The names are barely legible, but the conclusion seems warranted that the blackballed candidates were Robert Fellowes (1771–1847), philanthropist and liberal, and Matthew Davenport Hill, QC (1792–1872), reformer of criminal law.

166. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

I.H.

Tuesday

[Feb. 23, 1836]

You know that Molesworth has bought the Westminster & that it is united with the London? That gives us a better chance of success—I should hope a very good one—but which depends entirely on our being able to make the combined review a striking one. I know that you do not like the London Review & I do not know how it is possible you should—still I hope you do not dislike it so much as to be unwilling to write in it—do not suppose that any article of yours would have the fate of Horne's.² There is nothing to induce one to put in his articles unless one completely agrees with them, but such articles as many of yours would be desirable for the review even if one differed from every word of them. I should differ from them occasionally, but not nearly so much as I differ in a contrary way from many which I am obliged to put in now—& I am the more desirous to throw something into the other scale.

You know I suppose that you are put upon the list of the Reform Club³ as an original member.

How striking some of your Lectures must have been to hear. I admire them exceedingly. It is a pity the first two,⁴ from the comparative triteness of the subject have less in them than the rest will you⁵ give him this? & will you try to persuade him to do as it asks him to?

[J?].S.M.

she⁶ is well—that is as well as she ever is—I am still out of health—

J.S.M.

1. But addressed: Miss Flower / 5 Craven Hill / Bayswater. (Note postscript.) Eliza Flower lived in Fox's home. Postmarks: T. / Leadenhall, and 2 AM 2 / FE 23 / 1836. Published in Garnett, p. 183, except for postscript. MS at King's.

2. Richard Henry, or Hengist, Horne (1803–1884), miscellaneous writer and poet, took over the editorship of the Monthly Repository from Fox in July, 1836, and conducted it until July, 1837, when Leigh Hunt became editor.

3. Established in 1836 under the leadership of such reformers as Edward Ellice and Sir William Molesworth.

4. Fox's Finsbury Lectures were published separately from time to time between 1835 and 1840. The first two were: No. 1. "The Morality of Poverty"; No. 2. "Aristocratical and Political Morality." The Examiner for Jan. 3, 1836, p. 16, announces the sixth, "On the Morality of the Press," and lists the previous five.

5. Eliza Flower.

6. Mrs. Taylor.

167. TO ALBANY FONBLANQUE¹

I.H.

Friday

[Feb. 27, 1836]

MY DEAR FONBLANQUE

I would have answered for Carlyle with the most perfect assurance on the points you mention, but as I anticipated, it does not suit him. He recommends Craik,² late of the *Printing Machine*³—of whom he says “he is a man limited, but honest, & singularly healthy & even robust, within his limits. He cannot be brilliant, but he can be decided, clear, & even emphatic. I should think him a believer with his whole heart in such policy as this present Russel-Melbourne & open to all manner of further light. The man is good tempered, courageous; can take a handsome lift of anything. If I mistake not, such an offer would be excellent news to him at present: I have not heard of him for months; which means, I fear, that he is in straits & uncertainty.”

I am delighted to hear of the Selection from the Examiner⁴—many of your papers in it are too good to be let die. The selection will live as long as any such collection in our language. I am glad too for another reason—that we will have a swinging review of it in the “London & Westminster.”

Pray let me know when the question you allude to is decided & in the meantime is there anything Mr. Savage⁵ would write? He once offered to write for us & would have been asked to write on Orangeism then, if Molesworth had not wanted to do it himself.

I have given your message to my father & it was received as you would wish—but I think there was more need for him to send such a one to you—because you have seemed once or twice to think that when he attacked an opinion of yours, e.g. on the Pension List—he felt or thought with less estimation of you than I know he does. Now the fact I believe is that on that point of the P. List & on some others he had actually forgotten that you were of the opposite opinion—& being accustomed to find you on

1. MS at LSE. Dated by the passage quoted in first paragraph from Carlyle's letter, dated Thursday [Feb. 26, 1836], in A. Carlyle, pp. 120–21.

2. For what Carlyle in his letter calls “the Lichfield Editorship.” George L. Craik (1798–1866), journalist and literary historian.

3. The Printing Machine; or Companion to the Library and Register of Progressive Knowledge (3 vols., London, 1834–35) had merged with Leigh Hunt's London Journal (2 vols., 1834–35) in 1835, but the combined Leigh Hunt's London Journal and the Printing Machine survived only until Dec., 1835.

4. Published by Fonblanque with the title England under Seven Administrations (3 vols., London, 1837). JSM reviewed it, LWR, XXVII (April, 1837), 65–98.

5. See Letter 165, n. 4.

what he thought the right side, he instinctively concluded you were so on these points. About the Pension list if he had anybody in view it was Grote, with whom he had previously had some personal discussion about it.

Ever yours

J. S. MILL

If you are at the Athenæum on Monday I wish you would vote for John Sterling⁶—& get anybody else you can to do so.

168. TO LORD WELLESLEY¹

India House
31st March
1836

Mr John S. Mill is instructed by his Father, who has been for several months confined at home by illness, to express to Lord Wellesley his sense of the honour which his Lordship has conferred upon him by presenting him with a copy of his Dispatches,² and to say that he will do himself the honour of writing as soon as his health permits, to make his personal acknowledgments to Lord Wellesley.

169. TO ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE¹

2 avril 1836.

MON CHER TOCQUEVILLE,

Le London and Westminster Review N° 5 L 48 vient de paraître. Votre article² en est le principal ornement. J'ai moi-même surveillé la traduction que nous en avons fait faire, et j'espère que nous avons pu rendre vos idées avec fidélité et que nous n'avons pas absolument gâté le reste: nous avons au moins soigneusement suivi la clarté et la simplicité de votre style, que je regarde comme bien près de la perfection du style philosophique. Nous avons fait imprimer séparément quelques exemplaires de l'article, et

6. According to the secretary of the Athenæum, the name of Sterling was entered as a candidate for membership, but his name was subsequently withdrawn and not brought forward for election.

* * * *

1. MS in Brit. Mus.

Richard Colley Wellesley, Marquis Wellesley (1760–1842), Governor General of India, 1797–1805.

2. The Dispatches, Minutes and Correspondence of the Marquess Wellesley During his Administration in India, ed. M. Martin (5 vols., London, 1836–37).

* * * *

1. Published in Mayer, pp. 307–8. MS in Tocqueville archives.

2. "Political and Social Condition of France," LWR, XXV (April, 1836), 137–69. Reprinted in Mayer, II, 1.

nous nous permettons de vous en faire l'hommage; ils vous parviendront en même temps que la Revue elle-même, du moins je l'espère.

Nous sommes aussi vos débiteurs d'une somme de 600 francs que vous toucherez chez M. Delamarre, banquier. Ce n'est pas sans honte que je vous parle d'argent et surtout d'une si faible somme lorsqu'il s'agit d'un travail comme celui dont vous avez enrichi notre recueil.

Pourrons-nous espérer que la prochaine livraison offrira à notre public la suite de ce travail?³

Vous verrez que nous n'avons pas donné à l'article (comme nous avions pensé à le faire) la forme d'une lettre, puisqu'il n'y avait ni dans le style, ni dans le fond rien qui exigeât un changement dans la forme ordinaire de nos articles de la Revue.

J'apprends de M. Gustave de Beaumont qu'il s'occupe d'un ouvrage sur l'Irlande;⁴ cette nouvelle m'a fait un plaisir extrême. Il me demande des renseignements; je me suis adressé à M. Cornewall Lewis pour en avoir, et j'ai appris qu'il avait déjà envoyé à M. de Beaumont tout ce qu'il jugeait utile, et notamment le livre qu'il vient de livrer au public et qui me paraît fort intéressant. Au reste j'écrirai très incessamment à M. de Beaumont.

C'est ici seulement un petit bout de lettre fait à la hâte; je vous en promets un meilleur en quelques jours.

Votre dévoué

J. S. MILL.

India House.

170. TO JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE¹

India House

9th April

1836

MY DEAR SIR

I quite agree with you as to the desirableness of striking more directly than we have hitherto done against the prevailing tendencies of English religion.² Mr Martineau has at my request written an article on your two

3. The hope was unfulfilled. Tocqueville contributed no more to the Review; for the next four years he was too much occupied with the concluding volumes of his work on democracy.

4. Eventually published as L'Irlande sociale, politique et religieuse (2 vols., Paris, 1839).

* * * *

1. Addressed: Rev^d Blanco White, Upper Stanhope Street, Liverpool. Franked by Wm. Molesworth. Postmark: 9AP9 / 1836. MS in Liverpool University Library. In reply to White's letter of April 4, 1836, in Thom, II, 208-9.

2. White had written (Thom, II, 208): "It appears to me, that our Review avoids too much a direct collision with the mischievous system of religion, which the State supports. You—the leaders—are too much away from the mass of bigotry and superstition existing in the country, and, as it were, disdain the subject. . . . The Theologians should be routed: the evil they are doing is immense."

books, the "Second Travels" & the "Heresy & Orthodoxy" which breaks ground on the subject very well.³ It could have been ready for the 4th number, but we were obliged to omit it even from the 5th, to make room for political or literary matter of a temporary kind. It will certainly be in the next, & I will suggest to him to append something on the Hampden controversy.⁴ But I have long looked forward to having the same subject treated by yourself, whom from your published writings I cannot but regard as the best writer by far whom the country at present has on such topics. I hope you will think of it. We can, you see, afford you ample time, & you can yourself chuse the mode & the opportunity. It is only necessary to avoid directly expressing any opinion on points of faith or rather of dogma; that the review in attacking sectarianism may not get the character with the stupid part of the public, of being itself connected with any sect.

With regard to an article for our next number I have had some scruples about proposing anything to you so long as the article on Lamb remained pending. I never had more difficulty in making up my mind about any article than I have about that. It is an article which on many accounts it would be a great loss to the review not to insert—besides which it would be a thousand pities that all the trouble you have had about it should be lost. On the other hand I foresee that it will do us very serious injury with a large class of those who take most interest in literature & who as being friendly to the cause of movement are friendly to us—and will raise a storm about us which however ready to encounter when required by duty, I do not so much like to face on a matter on which even after all the modifications & explanations you have so good-naturedly given, I still find that my own views differ fundamentally from yours. I take it that in our estimation of the class of writers called humourists you & I should hardly ever agree⁵—

3. See Letter 135, n. 5.

4. Both Evangelicals and Tractarians joined in protesting Lord Melbourne's appointment in 1836 of Renn Dickson Hampden (1793–1868) as Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, because of the unorthodox views he had expressed in his Bampton Lectures of 1832. See R. W. Church, The Oxford Movement, 1833–1845 (London, 1891), chap. ix.

5. JSM had apparently raised earlier questions of White's treatment of Charles Lamb's humour in an article proposed for the Review. On Feb. 7, 1836, White wrote (Thom, II, 183): "I certainly thought that the observations from which my disapprobation of Lamb's style of humour proceeds, were more generally received than your remarks imply. I ought, however, to have remembered that there is a set of very able men, writing constantly as critics, whose principal fund of humour arises from the roystering, (I use their own descriptive word,) carousing, eating, and drinking spirits, which they take a pleasure to bring out before the public. . . . Their humorous writing is a kind of Row. It is unquestionable that much of the talk which you find, especially in Blackwood, would be impertinent and coarse in refined company; how then can it be tolerable when addressed to the public? I cannot bear Fielding in many parts of his works, though I greatly admire his talent."

Though White promised to rewrite the article, he did not succeed in satisfying JSM and it was not published.

& that you dislike everything which has not a serious & truthful object. Do you not (I should think you did) prefer Schiller to Goethe? & do you like Falstaff & Pains—I should think not. I am obliged in these embarrassments to take a little more time for consideration.

As for any other subject, I can at present think of none but Joanna Baillie. What is your general notion of her merits? I ask this because you see we have broken ground at last on the subject of the greater poets of our age,⁶ & it is therefore more necessary than heretofore that we should maintain in our future judgments, a consistency with what we have said in the literary articles of this number.

I believe Schmidt-Phiseldek is a very good view of Kant.⁷

I sympathize in your annoyance about your house.⁸ How the vices of English law shew themselves in every relation of civil life.

I am slowly getting rid of my ailment. To accelerate the cure I am going for a short time to Brighton—probably on [Thurs]day.

What would you think of a historical subject? That is the kind of articles we now most want—for the first time we are at length able, though by no means desirous, to give you a holiday in pure literature. But there is a noble field open in European history which hardly any of our writers are able to tread.

I am delighted that you approve of my “Civilization.”⁹

Ever yours

J. S. MILL

171. TO HENRY MILL¹

[Brighton, April, 1836]

There seems to be a change considerably for the better in my bodily state within the last three days; whether it will last, I cannot yet tell; nor do I know whether the place has contributed towards it, as the more genial weather of yesterday and to-day is probably the chief cause. [He then says

6. In an article, “The Poets of our Age, Considered as to their Philosophic Tendencies,” signed D., in the April number of LWR, pp. 60–71.

7. Conrad Friedrich von Schmidt-Phiseldek, Philosophiæ criticæ secundum Kantium expositio systematica (2 vols., Hafniae, Altonae, 1796–98).

8. White had written (Thom, II, 209): “I have had to learn experimentally the abominable state of the law in regard to landlord and tenant. . . . But I opened my eyes to the danger after I had put myself into the power of the landlord.”

9. The leading article in the April, 1836, number of his Review, pp. 1–28.

* * * *

1. Excerpt published in Bain, JSM, p. 43. MS not located. The portion in brackets is Bain’s summary. JSM had been sent to Brighton to recuperate from a severe illness (see Letter 160, n. 3).

Henry Mill (1820–1840), JSM’s favourite younger brother.

that he will continue his stay if the improvement goes on, but is reluctant to be long absent, partly on account of his father's illness and partly on account of his tutoring "Mary and George". He trusts to Henry to keep him informed on the state of matters, and if he can be of any use to his father, he will forego the present advantages and trust to getting well as the summer advances.]

172. TO ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE¹

[Brighton]

27th April 1836.

MY DEAR TOCQUEVILLE,

You must be surprised that I did not immediately answer your letter—& so I would, if it had not found me ill & in bed—I have been in indifferent health all the winter & have lately had a short attack of rather a sharper kind. I now write to you from Brighton where I have come to try to get well—and I am just now too tired to write in French, but for that I need not apologize to you, though I ought for the shortness of this note.—As for the delay of your second article in the Review—I am less sorry for that than I am glad of the cause—I anticipate from the continuation of "La Démocratie" a more than ordinary share of the pleasure & instruction your writings always give me—I have more to learn of the influence of Democracy on private life & individual character than of its influence on political interests & you have taught me so much on the last that I hope you will teach me still more on the first.

Your article in the review though generally considered a little abstract (as the people here say of anything which is consecutive & methodical) has on the whole been very successful here; all who have read it admire it, & its successors are likely to have a still more numerous class of readers as they will relate to circumstances of more immediate & contemporaneous interest. Though we should have liked much to have had the second in our next number, we can very well wait for it till the number after, & should accept it most thankfully however long it might be delayed. The only thing that embarrasses us is—we want to review Bulwer's France² & cannot do it because we cannot interfere with a subject which we wish to have entirely in your hands. Could you—I will not ask you to suspend your labours even for a day—but could you persuade Beaumont or any other judicious friend, to send us a few cursory remarks on Bulwer's book which

1. Published in Mayer, pp. 310–11, in reply to Tocqueville's of April 10, ibid., pp. 308–9. MS in Tocqueville archives.

2. See Letter 113, n. 2. The request for help from Beaumont proved unavailing, but eventually Tocqueville sent notes on Bulwer's book, which are printed in Mayer, pp. 318–24. No review of the book appeared in the Westminster, however.

we might work up into an article of our own—of course not entering philosophically into the subject, as that will be so much better done by you—we only wish to do justice to what is useful & meritorious in the book, & to correct any gross errors. Do not however give yourself any trouble or gêne about this, but I am sure your friendship will not feel itself taxed by my asking your advice how we may best treat Bulwer's book.

A letter which must have reached you immediately after writing your last will have explained to you about the 600 francs which were as much a debt as anything could be, though we were almost ashamed to offer you so mere a trifle—I will write again soon—I always say so, but this time you shall find me as good as my word.

Yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

173. TO HENRY MILL¹

[Brighton (May?), 1836]

[John was at Brighton for his own health during his father's last illness; but wrote assiduously to Henry, to know whether his hurrying back would be of any use.] As to my father, tell me as fully as you can how he is, both as to his illness itself, and as to spirits, and what you think would be pleasantest to him; not what he would wish or say out of kindness to me.

174. TO ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE¹

India House

15th June 1836.

MY DEAR TOCQUEVILLE,

Many thanks for your very kind note. I would not on any consideration be the cause of your interrupting for ever so short a time, meditations so important to the world as those must be which are to give rise to the second part of La Démocratie en Amérique. We have ample time before us, as it is already too late for the July number of the review, & perhaps Beaumont will be able to finish his article in time for the 30th of September. Will you oblige me by offering to him my best thanks for his kindness in having undertaken & commenced an article of so much importance to us & my warmest congratulations & wishes for his happiness.²

1. Excerpt published in Bain, James Mill, p. 409. MS not located. Bracketed portion is Bain's introduction to the excerpt.

* * * *

1. Published in Mayer, pp. 312–13, in reply to Tocqueville's of June 5, ibid., pp. 311–12. MS in Tocqueville archives.

2. Beaumont was to marry Clémentine de Lafayette, grand-daughter of the General, on June 29.

There is not much happiness in our home at present. My father is sinking to his grave under a lingering pulmonary complaint—I fear there is no chance of his recovery. My own complaint does not cause me any uneasiness, it is slight, & not painful, & there is nothing serious in it but its obstinacy. It has hitherto resisted all remedies—if I should be obliged to travel, which I think not unlikely I must I fear go further off than Paris or any part of the north of France—not so much for climate as for a complete change of scene—.

I will write soon again at greater length.

Yours ever faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

175. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

Friday

[June 25, 1836]

There is nothing, that I am aware of, my dear Mütterlein, that requires the help you so kindly offer—we have been so long expecting this that most of the necessary arrangements were made, or ready to be made, at once. But you may be sure that if we do need anything which you can do for us there is no one we would more confidently apply to.

I am grieved that Mr. Austin is again ill—I thought him so well yesterday. He will receive an invitation to the funeral, but of course he will not come if he is ill or if it is inconvenient.

Your proposal about Derry² is very kind but quite impracticable—some time hence such a thing might be beneficial to him—but now I am sure he would dislike to leave us & his younger brothers & sisters would be made quite unhappy by his absence—he is their great friend, companion and teacher. We mean to send them all to Mickleham directly—where all, especially Derry, are anxious to go. If I should be obliged to travel for a longer time than a month or two I shall take the two boys with me for the whole or part of the time.³

Ever affectionately yours

J. S. MILL

1. MS in collection of autographs formed by Mrs. Richard Ford, sister of Sir William Molesworth. Collection in 1945 in possession of Sir John Molesworth-St. Aubyn, Pencarrow, Washaway, Bodmin, Cornwall. The letter is on black-edged notepaper, undated, but was apparently written very shortly after the death of James Mill on Wednesday, June 23, 1836.

2. The family's name for Henry Mill.

3. Ordered away for three months by his physician, JSM at the end of July took his two younger brothers Henry and George to the Continent.

176. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

I.H.

Wednesday

[July 20(?), 1836]

MY DEAR CARLYLE My annotations, & proposed alterations in phraseology, amount as you will see, to but little; less than I expected—and you will probably think most of them trifling. My object has been to remove, when it can be done without sacrifice, anything merely quaint in the mode of expression—but I have very often not ventured to touch it for fear of spoiling something which I could not replace. The only general remark I have to make on the stile is that I think it would often tell better on the reader if what is said in an abrupt, exclamatory, & interjectional manner were said in the ordinary grammatical mode of nominative & verb—but on that as on everything else I ask nothing but that you will deal with it as you like, disregarding all my observations if you do not think them just—and in any case that you will not make the thing an annoyance to you. It is quite good enough & too good for us as it is. Ever faithfully yours

J. S. MILL

177. TO CLARA MILL¹

Paris

3 August 1836

One having written to W[illie] & one to H[arriet] I must write to Clara—so here goes—We are all quite as well, perhaps rather better than was to be expected. George & Henry do not seem at all struck with Paris—they are I think too young to care much about it or to be impressed by it at all.

1. MS at NLS. Published in Elliot, I, 100, but dated as probably of 1835 and annotated as referring to the MS of the French Revolution. Carlyle's letter of Friday, July 22, 1836 (in A. Carlyle, pp. 133–35), however, is clearly an answer to this. The MS discussed is that of Carlyle's article on Mirabeau, which appeared in LWR, XXVI (Jan., 1837), 382–439. For Carlyle's scornful reception of the corrections, see Thomas Carlyle: Letters to His Wife, ed. Trudy Bliss (London, 1953), pp. 112–13.

* * * *

1. MS at LSE. Addressed: Mrs. Mill / Kensington / London / Angleterre / , but latter three lines have been crossed out and Mickleham / Surrey substituted. Postmarks: BIRFA . . . / 4 / A . . . / 183 . . . ; LONDON / 6 / AUG / 1836; and 10FN10 / AUG / 1836. Published, with minor variations, in Hayek, pp. 101–2.

Accompanied by his younger brothers Henry and George, JSM had left England on July 30 to seek recovery of his health on the Continent. They met Mrs. Taylor and her children in Paris, evidently by prearrangement. To the letters which George and Henry wrote their sisters Wilhelmina and Harriet, JSM added this note to Clara.

Subsequently, leaving the children in Switzerland in the care of a nurse, JSM and Mrs. Taylor proceeded to the north of Italy, where they spent two months. At the end of Oct. they rejoined the children in Lausanne and returned to England (Nov. 12) by way of Paris (see next letter).

They seemed pleased with the country, & on the whole their excursion has been hitherto tolerably successful. But the only piece of thorough solid delight that George seemed to have was in meeting with a playfellow² about his own age whom he likes & who likes him very much. Nothing is settled yet about our travelling further—it is not finally settled whether we shall go alone or with our friends here, much less when we shall go & how—the places are all taken by the diligence for nearly a week to come, & posting so far is very expensive—but we shall see. One thing seems certain—that both Derry & I can stand travelling. We have not tried any night work to be sure yet. We will write you again from Geneva.

ever affectionately yours

J.S.M.

178. TO MRS. JAMES MILL¹

[Paris]

[Nov. 4, 1836]

As we shall so soon be at Kensington there is not much to write. I have no doubt you did the best you could as to the house, & the sale;² & as the house is taken we will stay there till we can find another that we thoroughly like—& as we do not know how long it may be first, I shall have the bookshelves put up. You may as well do it before I come unless you have any doubt how I should like it to be done. I am much the same as to health—my head is often rather bad, otherwise I am as well almost as I ever was.

J.S.M.

179. TO ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE¹

Lundi.

[Nov. 9, 1836]

Après avoir été bien près de vous en Suisse, mon cher Tocqueville, sans vous rencontrer, j'arrive à Paris et vous êtes encore à la campagne, ainsi

2. Mrs. Taylor's son Herbert.

* * * *

1. MS at LSE. Addressed: Mrs. Mill / 18 Kensington Square / London / Angleterre. Postmarks: PARIS / 4 / NOV / 183 . . . and LONDON / 7 / NOV / 1836. Appended to a letter from Henry Mill to his sister Wilhelmina.

2. After the death of James Mill the family disposed of the house in Vicarage Place, Church Street, Kensington, in which they had lived since 1831, and moved to a smaller house in Kensington Square.

* * * *

1. Published in Mayer, pp. 299–301. There dated Nov. 9, 1835, but JSM was not in France in 1835 though he was in 1836. For other evidence that the date should be 1836, see notes below. Also, Tocqueville's letter of Nov. 19, 1836 (Mayer, pp. 313–16), appears to be a reply to this. MS in Tocqueville archives.

que Beaumont, et par là je me trouve privé du plaisir de voir, pendant le très peu de jours que je reste ici, presque les deux seules personnes que je tenais beaucoup à y trouver. Je regrette beaucoup de ne pas vous voir, et j'aurais voulu vous voir à Paris—nous ne nous sommes encore connus qu'en Angleterre, et cela aurait aidé à combler le vide que laisse pour moi à Paris la mort funeste de Carrel²—le seul homme en France, excepté vous, mon cher Tocqueville, pour qui je ressentais une véritable admiration—et cependant vous savez que j'aime les Français—la nation en général, et un grand nombre d'entre eux en particulier. J'ai à vous dire mille choses, mais avant tout j'ai à vous demander comment va la deuxième partie de la Démocratie. Je l'attends avec impatience, pour les lumières qu'elle répandra sur bien des questions dans mon propre esprit, pour le bien qu'elle fera à notre siècle et aux temps à venir, et pour l'intérêt que je porte à votre gloire. Je crains que votre voyage en Suisse, dont j'ai appris avec peine le motif n'ait dû retarder un peu la complétion de votre tâche. Moi-même j'ai été forcé de suspendre mes travaux par des motifs de santé, et de faire un voyage en Suisse et en Italie, qui m'a fait du bien mais qui ne m'a pas guéri; mon mal pourtant n'a rien de très sérieux, c'est un dérangement local de la circulation du sang dans la partie droite de la tête; il a duré une année, c'est ma première maladie, mais elle se montre obstinée et il faut que je me résigne à la subir. Je m'y accoutume peu à peu et je crois que cela ne m'empêchera pas de travailler beaucoup cet hiver. Je suis assez content de la livraison de la revue qui a paru dans mon absence; je ne l'ai vue que chez Bennis,³ depuis mon arrivée à Paris; mais comme, moi absent, on néglige tout, il s'est trouvé qu'on a négligé d'envoyer des exemplaires à nos amis d'ici et entre autres à Beaumont et à vous; je vais écrire à Londres pour mettre ordre à cela: dans huit jours vous aurez des exemplaires. Nous aurions bien besoin de votre secours pour le prochain numéro; mais si votre grand travail n'est pas encore achevé, nous ne sommes pas assez peu modestes pour vous en demander. Seulement je vous engage beaucoup à faire usage de votre influence auprès de notre ami Beaumont pour tirer de lui un article ou au moins des notes sur la "France" de M. Henry Bulwer.⁴ Tout en faisant de la haute philosophie historique sur la France au moyen de vos articles, nous voudrions en même temps nous trouver dans le cas de rectifier en passant les erreurs qu'on commet en écrivant sur la France, et rendre justice à ce qu'il y a de bon (et il y en a beaucoup) dans les idées de M. Bulwer. Nous ne pouvons pas faire cela sans la coopération de nos amis en France et j'ai une confiance dans les jugements de Beaumont que ne m'inspirerait nul autre à qui je pourrais m'adresser, confiance qui est due autant à son propre mérite

2. Carrel died on July 24, 1836, as the result of a duel with Emile de Girardin.

3. George G. Bennis.

4. See Letters 113, n. 2, and 172, n. 2.

qu'à l'étroite union qui existe entre lui et vous, union qui lui donne toujours l'occasion et l'habitude de comparer ses idées avec les vôtres. J'ai lu chez Bennis deux notices sur la Démocratie: l'une dans le Quarterly Review, qui est évidemment de Basil Hall;⁵ tout ce qu'il a mis de lui est pitoyable, mais heureusement il y a mis beaucoup de vous, et il parle de vous et du livre comme il le doit. L'autre article est du North American Review;⁶ j'attendais celui-là avec beaucoup d'intérêt pour savoir le parti que prendraient les écrivains américains sur le livre: j'ai été très content de voir que l'article est fait dans un esprit favorable; on y dit seulement que vous généralisez quelquefois un peu trop, et j'aurais voulu qu'on eût dit en quoi. A propos, j'observe que le American Quarterly Review, dans sa dernière livraison, s'élève très fortement contre le système des pledges:⁷ cela m'a charmé, d'autant plus que cette revue passe (n'est-ce pas?) pour être démocrate, et pas fédéraliste comme le North American.

Ecrivez-moi vite, je vous prie: je serai ici pour deux ou trois jours. Parlez-moi de votre santé, de celle de Madame de Tocqueville, de vos travaux, de vos idées sur l'état de choses actuel et de sa durée probable; parlez-moi aussi de Beaumont et enfin de ce que vous ou lui pourrez faire pour la revue.

Avez-vous vu Senior en Suisse? Vous savez qu'il est Master in Chancery⁸ et très content de l'être. Cela le rend plus riche et plus indépendant aussi.

Tout à vous mon cher Tocqueville.

J. S. MILL.

Hôtel Mirabeau, rue de la Paix.

(Compiègne November 9 1835.)⁹

180. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House.
22^d Nov^r 1836

MY DEAR GUILBERT

I write to you in great haste, to say that I have this day directed Mess^{rs} Prescott & Grote & Co to remit to you £25. I presume it will be receivable at Delamarre's as usual.

5. QR, LVII (Sept., 1836), 132–62. Basil Hall (1788–1844), naval officer and writer of Tory views.

6. North American Rev., XLIII (July, 1836), 178–206.

7. "The Rationale of Political Representation," American Quar. Rev., XX (Sept., 1836), 174–216.

8. Senior had received the appointment on June 10, 1836.

9. Sic, but see n. 1 above.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / 47 Rue de Joubert / à Paris.

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / 47 Rue de Joubert / à Paris.
Postmarks: LONDO... / 22 NOV 1836 / and ANGLETERRE PAR CALAIS / 24 NOV 1836. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, p. 257.

If your article² is to be inserted in the forthcoming number, we must not only have the article itself by the 15th of December, but we must have it soon enough to be translated before the 15th of December.

With many apologies for the brevity & abruptness of this note believe me my dear Guilbert

Ever yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

181. TO EDWARD LYTTON BULWER¹

India House
23^d November
1836

MY DEAR SIR

I have just returned from an absence of nearly four months on the Continent, rendered necessary by an obstinate though in no way alarming indisposition, which has lasted for more than a twelvemonth & which together with another far more melancholy circumstance² had obliged me during that period to put aside all occupations which could be dispensed with & among other things to leave my friend Molesworth's review³ very much to shift for itself. Now, when I am sufficiently recovered to be able to revert to my former interests & pursuits, one of the things I am most concerned about is how the greatest value & efficiency may be given to that review—I am sure that I speak the sentiments of all connected with it, when I say that nothing would conduce so much to either end as your hearty cooperation, if we could be so fortunate as to obtain it. I have, since my return, read your article on Sir Thomas Browne⁴ with an admiration I have seldom felt for any English writings on such subjects—I did not know, at the time, that it was yours, & could not conceive what new accession had come to the Edinburgh Review. I first thought it might possibly be Macaulay's, but as I read on I felt it to be far too good for him—it has much of the same brilliancy, but not his affected and antithetical stile, & above all a perception of truth, which he never seems to have, & a genuine love of the True & the Beautiful, the absence of which in him,

2. The Jan., 1837, LWR contains no article that can be attributed to Guilbert.

* * * *

1. MS in the possession of Bulwer's great-grand-daughter, Lady Hermione Cobbold, Knebworth House, Knebworth, Herts. Collated by Dr. Eileen Curran, of Colby College. Published in Elliot, I, 102–5, and, with several omissions, in Earl of Lytton, Life of Edward Bulwer, First Lord Lytton (London, 1913).

2. The death of his father in June, 1836.

3. LWR.

4. ER, LXIV (Oct., 1836), 1–35.

is the reason why among his thousands of clever things & brilliant things there are so few true things—& hardly one which is the whole truth, & nothing but the truth. I could not help saying to myself, who would look for these qualities in the Edinburgh Review? how the readers of that review must be puzzled & bewildered by a writer who actually takes decided views, who is positively in earnest, & is capable of downright admiration & even enthusiasm! I am sure your writing must be lost upon them; they are not people who can recognise or care about truth; your beautiful things will be to them merely clever things & amusing things comme tant d'autres. Among us you would at least find both writers and readers who are in earnest. I grant that you, & such writing as yours, would be nearly as much out of place in our review as it has been, as in the Edinburgh: but not, as I hope it will hereafter be. As good may be drawn out of evil—the event which has deprived the world of the man of greatest philosophical genius it possessed⁵ & the review (if such little interests may be spoken of by the side of great ones) of its most powerful writer, & the only one to whose opinions the editors were obliged to defer—that same event has made it far easier to do that, in the hope of which alone I allowed myself to become connected with the review—namely to soften the harder & sterner features of its radicalism and utilitarianism, both which in the form in which they originally appeared in the Westminster, were part of the inheritance of the 18th century. The Review ought to represent not radicalism but neoradicalism, a radicalism which is not democracy, not a bigotted adherence to any forms of government or to one kind of institutions, & which is only to be called radicalism inasmuch as it does not palter nor compromise with evils but cuts at their roots—& a utilitarianism which takes into account the whole of human nature not the ratiocinative faculty only—the utilitarianism which never makes any peculiar figure as such, nor would ever constitute its followers a sect or school—which fraternizes with all who hold the same axiomata media (as Bacon has it) whether their first principle is the same or not—& which holds in the highest reverence all which the vulgar notion of utilitarians represents them to despise—which holds Feeling at least as valuable as Thought, & Poetry not only on a par with, but the necessary condition of, any true & comprehensive Philosophy. I know I am writing very loosely & expressing myself very ill—but you will understand me—& as I have, through Molesworth's confidence in me, complete power over that review whenever I chuse to exercise it, I hope you will believe, that if the review has hitherto been too much in the old stile of radical-utilitarianism with which you cannot possibly sympathize very strongly (nor I either) it is because the only persons, who could be depended upon as writers, were those whose writings would not tend to give it any other tone.

My object will now be to draw together a body of writers resembling the old school of radicals only in being on the Movement side, in philosophy, morality, & art as well as in politics & socialities—& to keep the remnant of the old school (it is dying out) in their proper place, by letting them write only about the things which they understand. But this attempt must fail unless those who could assist it, will. Why should you not write, for us, a series of articles on the old English writers, similar to that on Browne? They would be quite invaluable to us: we have not among our habitual writers any who could be trusted to write on such subjects—those who would have enough of the requisite feelings & talents, have not the requisite reading. We have now, since the junction with the Westminster, readers enough to make it worth while; & readers who are in earnest, readers by whom what you write would be taken au sérieux & not as a mere play of intellect & fancy. Your writing for us need not hinder you from writing for the Edinburgh also if you like it—but I am sure you must often feel that not to be a fitting vehicle for anything not of a stationary character either in literature or politics—passe encore if you could hope by your writings to modify the character of the work itself—but that is hopeless. Now among us you could.

Do pray think of it & tell me the result of your thought. The time is evidently approaching when the radicals will once more be a distinct party & when people will look to the review as their organ—& much will depend upon its being an organ which represents the best part of them and not the narrowest & most repulsive.

Ever yours faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

182. TO EDWARD LYTTON BULWER¹

I.H.

Tuesday

[Nov. 29, 1836]

MY DEAR BULWER—Accept my best thanks for the kind expressions in your letter. Nothing could be more gratifying to me than the whole tone of it & I could not be so unreasonable as to ask, under the circumstances you mention, for any greater degree of immediate cooperation than that which you so kindly offer. I have been long looking for your work on Athens,² & rejoice in the prospect of its being out so soon. If it be not delayed longer than the time you mention we may perhaps hope for something from you for our April number? Everyone who writes criticism worthy the name, must write it as you say "slowly & with great labour" for it is precisely, of all things, that which it is most difficult to write well, & which is least supportable when slovenly—but a greater number & variety of important truths, (truths too with their application annexed) may be thrown into circulation in that way than in almost any other mode of writing. Though I shall in common with most people lose a great deal of pleasure when you leave off writing romances, it is still very good news that you are looking forward to an early time at which your powers will be devoted—I will not say to nobler, or more important objects, for Politics are not intrinsically nobler, & as usually pursued are far less noble than Art, but at least to objects of more pressing exigency, & where there is a wider field of usefulness open just at the present time. Nobody can doubt that whenever you do make politics & the things which are to be effected through politics, your principal object—and pursue that object with the energy & perseverance which you have so conspicuously shewn in the application of the same powers to other objects—there is a place reserved for you in the political history of this country which will not be a humble one.

1. Addressed: Edw. Lytton Bulwer Esq. M.P. / Reform Club / Pall Mall / to be forwarded. Postmark: 7NE[?]7 / NO 29 / 1836. MS in the possession of Lady Hermione Cobbold. Collated by Dr. Eileen Curran. Published in Elliot, I, 105–6.

If you do not find the atmosphere of the L. & W. Review more & more congenial to you it will not be my fault. Even at present when bad things are put in, it is not because they are liked, but for want of better—your aid, to whatever degree afforded, much more if (may I say, when) it may hereafter be habitually afforded, would of itself supersede, & displace much that it would be very desirable to see displaced. It would also conduce extremely to the success of the review, but the great thing is that it would conduce, more than any other literary assistance I can think of, to render the review what it is not now even in the slightest degree, an organ of real literary & social criticism.

What you say of the radi[cal]s³ is too true—but I think they are, now, bestirring th[em]selves in all quarters—and as their jealousy is, I think, chiefly the natural carping of those who do nothing against all which is done, as they grow more active they may shake it off. The most active among them are the least capable of jealousy even now. I think they would all follow a good leader & would not be jealous of one whose power they felt & saw to be exerted in their behalf. They are really sincere men, & would value a man who worked vigorously in the cause.

Ever yours faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

2. See Letters 147, n. 8, and 206, n. 4.

3. Paper torn.

183. TO SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH¹

I.H.

3rd December 1836

DEAR MOLESWORTH,

I send you some more of your article.² Do not be frightened at the number of pencil marks. This part bears the proof of being more hastily written than the preceding part. The ideas are not presented in so lucid an order. My suggestions will do something to do this: but you probably could do more.

You have, I believe, an article of Bisset's on the Universities: is it good for anything? would you send it for me to see?

I want your permission to propose you for the Political Economy Club. What think you of it?

Ever yours
J. S. MILL.

184. TO DAVID BARCLAY¹

[1836]

The chief points are the time and place of his birth; who and what his parents were, and anything interesting that there may be to state about them: what places of education he went to: for what professions he was educated. I believe he went through a medical course, and also that for the Church, and I have heard that he was actually licensed as a preacher, but I never heard him say so himself, and never heard of it till after his death. I do not know whether it is true or not; perhaps you do. How long did he remain at the University, or prosecute his studies for the Church? The history of his connection with the late Sir John Stuart.²

184A. TO THOMAS CARLYLE (see page 743)

1. MS in 1945 in the possession of Sir John Molesworth-St. Aubyn.

2. Probably "Terms of Alliance between Radicals and Whigs," LWR, XXVI (Jan., 1837), 279-318.

* * * *

1. Excerpt published in Alexander Bain, James Mill, p. 11 n. MS not located.

David Barclay, an early friend of James Mill, occupied the farm upon which stood the cottage in which Mill had been born. Bain says that JSM, largely ignorant of his father's early life, wrote this letter to obtain information for Andrew Bisset, whom he had invited to write a biography of his father for the Encyclopædia Britannica (the seventh edition, published in parts between 1830 and 1842). The volume containing Bisset's biography of James Mill (with some passages by JSM) appeared in the summer of 1837. Bisset also contributed a biography to the volume of the Penny Cyclopædia published in 1839.

2. Sir John Stuart (originally Belsches), of Fettercairn (1753-1821), James Mill's early patron, for whom he named his eldest son. Two others of the Mill children were named for this family: for Lady Jane Stuart, and for her daughter, Wilhelmina, who became the wife of Sir William Forbes.

185. TO ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE¹

7 Jan. 1837.

MY DEAR TOCQUEVILLE,

This is the first moment in which I have been able, with any comfort to myself, to take up my pen in order to write to you. And now, it is rather to ask for news of you than to say anything from myself. I am anxious to hear how you are getting on with the second part of La Démocratie—& when there is a likelihood of its appearance. I look forward with great eagerness to the pleasure first of reading it, & next of reviewing it. A propos, it would be of the greatest importance to the London & Westminster Review, to be the first English periodical that contained a notice of it, & if that notice could be given before the publication of the work, it would be a very great benefit to us indeed. Would this be possible? Could you send it to me in sheets? Or even by piecemeal, in order that I might be studying it & preparing myself to have an article ready at the first moment. One of the great secrets of success for a review in this country, is to have early notices of books that excite a general interest, & as often as possible to notice them before publication. Murray continually keeps back the books which he publishes, in order that the article in the Quarterly Review may precede the book it reviews.

The number of the review which has just appeared, & which if you have not yet received you soon shall, will I think interest you very much. The first article² in it is a coup de parti, a manifesto as we say of the radicals (or rather for the radicals) on the subject of the Whigs—intended to awaken the slumbering energy of the radical leaders, & to force the Whigs to take a decided part. It is written by Sir W. Molesworth, who has been making a considerable figure for the last few months—if you have seen English papers during that time. You will have marked the gradual development of the plan which he & several other of the radical members have formed and are executing. I think them quite right. Whatever may be the appearances do not suppose that the mass of the middle & working classes are indifferent to the movement: they seem so, because, at elections & otherwise, everything they do for reform costs them immense sacrifices of their personal interests, sacrifices which they are ready to make for a great object but not for a small one. If any ministry would now bring forward the ballot, they would excite greater enthusiasm than even that which was excited for the Reform Bill. But as matters stand, the Whigs' majority is slipping away from them, & nothing will keep the Tories long out of power except either the adoption by the Whigs of a more radical policy, or the rise among the radicals themselves of able & energetic leaders, acting quite independently of the Whigs, as Molesworth, Roebuck, Leader & others are doing now. Of these two outlets from our false position, if we can but gain the last, we shall soon have the first two. You will soon see the ballot a cabinet measure, & then reform will have finally triumphed: the aristocratical principle will be completely annihilated, & we shall enter into a new era of government. The approaching session will be next to that of 1830/1831, the most important since 1688—& parties will stand quite differently at the commencement & at the close of it.

1. Published in Mayer, pp. 316–18; in reply to Tocqueville's of Nov. 19, 1836, ibid., pp. 313–16. MS in Tocqueville archives.

2. "Terms of Alliance between Radicals and Whigs," LWR, XXVI (Jan., 1837), 279–318.

Did you see Buller when he was at Paris? I have seen him but once since his return, & forgot to ask him. He arrived at Paris, & at the very hotel where I was, the day after I had left it. He will I think play a very conspicuous part hereafter in our politics—he rose exceedingly in public estimation last year. At present his rôle is that of a mutual friend, or conciliator, between the Whigs & radicals—it is very desirable that there should be such a person, & he is well suited to the character. As for your politics—they seem to be still in the same torpid state.

I send today, to Beaumont, through the embassy, a very important pamphlet on Ireland, by the Secretary to the late Commission of Poor Law Enquiry.³ I am not able to send a letter along with it, for I positively have not time. Pray make my excuses to him & tell him that it would be of the greatest use to the review if he (or you) would furnish at least notes for a review of Bulwer's book.⁴

Is there a chance of your coming here soon? I hope very much that we shall have Beaumont for a few months in the spring. Ever, my dear Tocqueville, yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

India House.

3. John Revans, Evils of the State of Ireland, their Causes and the Remedy—a Poor Law (London, 1837).

4. See Letters 113, n. 2, and 172, n. 2.

186. TO EDWARD LYTTON BULWER¹

18 Kensington Square
Saturday
[Jan., 1837]

MY DEAR SIR—Your note found me laid up with the influenza, which must be my excuse for not having immediately answered it. I had not previously contemplated a review of LaValliere,² for the same reason which has prevented our reviewing any former writing of yours: a critical estimate of you & your works was too serious a task to be lightly ventured upon, & your reputation had long passed the stage at which the cursory notice of a review could promote the success of any of your writings. However since an occasion has arisen on which you think that something we can do may be of service, the case is altered, & since I received your note I have been considering what would be the best way of having it done. I have good hopes, & I can promise that nothing shall prevent it, unless the very few persons who could do it as it ought to be done, should all fail me.³

There can be but one opinion as to the attacks in the Times;⁴ those in the *Spectator*⁵ I have not seen: but nobody can well doubt that if such a play as LaValliere had been written by anybody against whom there was no personal or political jealousy or hostility it would have obtained the loud encomiums of the whole press. You can however well afford to despise such attacks. Nobody whose judgment one cares for pays the least regard to the theatrical criticisms of newspapers—how they may affect the playgoing public I do not know.

I have been looking impatiently for some token of the appearance of "Athens"⁶—& did not like to say anything more to you about articles till I was sure that was off your hands but I have been thinking very much about subjects, & now when your most welcome announcement comes, I can suggest two, viz. Goldsmith, (Prior's Life)⁷ & Cowper, a propos of the two new editions of him.⁸ Either would be an excellent subject for an article of

1. MS in the possession of Lady Hermione Cobbold. Text provided by Dr. Eileen Curran.

2. The Duchess de la Vallière, published in 1836, but first produced, at Covent Garden, on Jan. 3, 1837.

3. He persuaded W. J. Fox to write the review. See Letters 187 and 200.

4. "It is in the worst taste of the worst school—the school of modern French romance" (The Times, Jan. 5, 1837, p. 3).

5. "We cannot pass uncensored the dramatist who calls upon us to sympathize with the woes of a discarded mistress and a disappointed voluptuary. It is the pathos of the stews." (Spectator, Jan. 7, 1837, p. 10.)

6. See Letter 147, n. 8.

7. James Prior, The Life of Oliver Goldsmith (2 vols., London, 1837).

8. Neither suggestion was adopted by Bulwer. The new editions of Cowper were those edited by Robert Southey in 15 vols. (1835–37) and by T. S. Grimshawe in 8 vols. (1835, 1836).

philosophical & imaginative criticism. But I have no preference for them, if you should like anything else better, especially any old writer.

Molesworth has not measured his words very scrupulously,⁹ but the object was to act upon the radicals, who are people not easily moved. He wanted to give them a violent shake, in order to set them going. You will not find him at all intemperate now, or in the least desirous of turning out the ministry.

Ever yours faithfully

J. S. MILL.

I am concerned to see your note edged with black—whom have you lost?

187. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

18 Kensington Square

[Jan., 1837]

I hope our Poor Law offences² have not made it hopeless to induce you to write for us a notice of Bulwer's play³—no one but you can do it in the only way in which it ought to be done, that of setting the stage in its proper position of worthiness, and encouraging the best writers to write for it. Bulwer wishes that we should notice it, because he is rather more sore than need be at the newspaper attacks, & thinks his play needs support against them—if it can need support against such attacks it should have it. You I believe think highly of the play—& if so there would be nothing to guard against, except that we should not seem to be paying him in puffs for an article of his which we shall probably have in the very same number—& that we should not seem to sanction as much as is merely conventional in the morality of that LaValliere story—but this is a point on which it is quite unnecessary to say anything to you—

You have no conception how much you would oblige me if you could manage to do it—though I know well what it is to ask more work from an overworked person—

I am here laid up by influenza, & have been so for some days.

J.S.M.

9. Probably a reference to his speech at a Reform Dinner at Bath on Jan. 5, 1837, but perhaps to his article in the Jan. LWR. See preceding letter, paragraph 2.

* * * *

1. Published, except for last sentence, in Garnett, pp. 183–84. MS at King's.

2. "Fallacies on Poor Laws," LWR, XXVI (Jan., 1837), 357–82, signed W. E. H[ickson].

3. See preceding letter, n. 2, and Letter 200, n. 2.

188. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹

18 Kensington Square

Friday

[Jan. 27, 1837]

I feel the position you are in with regard to Horne²—& all the rest of what you say on that subject. I feel it to my cost too. What to do I do not know. There is not a creature living who would do that for me, & whom I could trust to do it, unless it be you. Is there no remedy? could I in any way forward it? is there anything I could do for your paper³ that would give you a few hours respite from it? or is there no hope?

I put "our" to the "poor law offences"⁴ because it would be cowardly not, since I am as much responsible for them as any one can be. I hope you believe without my saying it, that I should not have put the article in, if it had appeared to me as it does to you, personally disrespectful to yourself—& this not because you are a contributor, but because you are you. The two between whom you are placed⁵ may be "thieves"—I do not know them—and if so, it is natural you should feel offended—but I am persuaded the writer of the article does not think them such; in fact he compliments one of them, & I have reason to think, has a good opinion of at least the intentions of both. Neither did it seem to me that the T[rue] S[un] was spoken of disparagingly on the whole, though a difference of opinion was expressed with much warmth on a particular point.

I differ from you as entirely as the writer does, on the Poor Law question, & on a whole class of questions therewith connected. Nor have your articles in answer to the review, though I recognize in them your best & most effective stile of discussion, at all narrowed the difference between us, but rather widened it. But I hope there is no reason against letting this be an "open question" both among radicals & among London reviewers.

J.S.M.

I am not out yet—I mean not at the I.H. but I shall on Monday, I hope. she⁶ is much better—how are you & yours?

1. Published, except for postscript, in Garnett, pp. 184–85. MS at King's.

2. R. H. Horne, with whose editorship of the Monthly Repository Fox was dissatisfied.

3. The True Sun. See Letter 200, n. 3.

4. See preceding letter.

5. The article had alluded to "the doctrines maintained, and the tone assumed by 'the London Dispatch,' 'The True Sun,' 'The Weekly Dispatch.'" Fox himself later wrote also for the Weekly Dispatch.

6. Mrs. Taylor.

189. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

18 Kensington Square
28th January 1837

MY DEAR MÜTTERLEIN—I could not send you the review last month, as I could not get a copy soon enough. If you ever see English newspapers, you will have seen that Molesworth's article² has been making considerable noise—as indeed it ought. His letters, speeches, & conduct in all respects for the last three months, have raised every one's opinion extremely of his talents & caractère & made him a sort of hero of the day—which however he is not intoxicated by, but as docile & modest as any one can well be.

You may wonder that I have been so long in writing to you—though after all, I write first: but you would not wonder if you knew the endless drudgery I have had upon my hands, with arrears of India house business, & private affairs, without counting review matters or any other writing. I came back with my general health & strength everything that could be wished for, though the complaint in my head, as a mere local affection, did not give way & is still nearly as troublesome as ever;³ that is, would be troublesome if I had not learnt not to mind it. I saw Switzerland well, & Milan & the Italian lakes, & Piedmont & the bay of Genoa thoroughly, but could not get further unless I had chosen to pass a fortnight in a lazaretto. Pray tell Mr Lewis⁴ that I gave his present to M. Lacroix⁵ at Nice whom I found a very obliging good natured old gentleman & liked very much: he spoke with much regard of M^r Lewis.

I have heard nothing of you, any of you, subsequent to your arrival at Malta—& wish very much to hear of everything which concerns you but especially about Mr Austin's health. I wish to ask his advice too about an inscription on a marble slab we are going to erect in the church where my father was buried. Nobody's opinion in such a matter would be of a tithe of the value of Mr Austin's, & I certainly will not do anything in the matter without his approbation. What has occurred to me is, to add after the usual particulars, these words—

“His life was one of consistent usefulness, and history will appreciate its results.
His works are his best monument.”

1. Addressed: Mrs. Austin. MS at King's. Mrs. Austin's unpublished letter in reply from Malta, March 3, 1837, is at LSE.

2. See Letter 185, n. 2.

3. His illness had produced a chronic facial twitch, an affliction from which he suffered the rest of his life.

4. George Cornewall Lewis. He and John Austin were then in Malta as commissioners to inquire into the administration of the island.

5. Unidentified.

If Mr Austin does not like this, or not so well as any other, perhaps he could in some interval of his laborious duties, find five minutes to think of something better—He perhaps alone of all persons living is as much interested in the matter as I am.

There is a review just started called the "Church of England review" the first number of which contains an attack on Lewis's last article⁶—pray tell him this. I have not seen it.

I can tell you little of any one in whom you are interested—for I see nobody but those who come to me. I have time to go to nobody. I must except Carlyle who has finished his book⁷ & is in great joy thereat—not for any hope he may have of its success, but for having done with it.

I do hope I shall hear from you some time—though I am a bad correspondent I am always your Söhnchen

J.S.M.

190. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

18, Kensington Square,
29th January, 1837.

MY DEAR NICHOL,

You must think me sadly neglectful of you, for I have not written to you a single line since that from Milan, although I knew how much you would wish to hear something about my health, at least. My excuse is, the quite oppressive weight of business I find resting on me. Till now I never knew what it was to be a thorough mechanical drudge. The accumulation of India House business from my long absence, and slack performance of duty for nearly a year previous, leaves me none of the occasional hours and days of respite I used to have there; above three hours a day are taken up by exercise; my occupations, pecuniary, preceptorial and other connected with my several trusts as executor, guardian, and so forth, take up much time; and I have not needed your caution against writing much for the Review, for the mere mechanical drudgery connected with editorship has so filled up the chinks of my time that I have hardly written a line since I returned. You saw the very little I wrote for the last number;² even that was all prepared last spring, though I had not put any of it on paper. And then you would hardly believe the quantity of letters I have to write—

6. "The London and Westminster Review for October 1836—The Voluntary Principle," Church of England Quar. Rev., I (Jan., 1837), 121–40, was an attack upon Lewis' "Endowment and the Voluntary Principle: Separation of Church and State," LWR, XXVI (Oct., 1836), 244–77.

7. The French Revolution.

* * * *

1. Published by Knight, pp. 673–74. MS not located.

2. "Thoughts in the Cloister and the Crowd," LWR, XXVI (Jan., 1837), 348–57.

further, I am general referee, and chamber counsel to Molesworth and others of the active Radicals—whenever anything is to be done, I am to be asked whether it is right—whenever anybody is to be moved to do anything, I am to be moved first to move him—then I have to prepare myself for the Political Economy club every month—in short this will not do—and shall not. As for my health—I returned with my head no better,³ but my general health and strength quite restored—nor has my head got at all worse since; indeed, no quantity of thinking or writing affects it at all; reading India House papers, beyond a certain number of hours, affects it, but on the whole I have to keep any tendency to increase (if there be any) completely under. I have not contrived, however, to keep off the influenza, which has run through our family as through most others, and has kept me in confinement here for the last fortnight, with cough, catarrh, sore throat, feverishness, and disordered stomach, the usual pleasures which accompany it. I have got quite rid of it now, or next thing to it, and shall go to the India House to-morrow to resume my drudgery.

And you—how are you? and what are you thinking of? Your class,⁴ of course, in the first instance, but that can give you so little trouble that you cannot need to think of it much. What think you of the last number of the Review? What of the aspect of politics? What do people in your part of Scotland think of the Molesworth controversy?⁵ Here there is a great outcry against Molesworth by all the Whigs and the timid Radicals, but for all that those very Radicals are making note of preparation for the active and unshackled line of conduct which Molesworth inculcates, and which they never would have felt themselves either prompted or compelled to if he, or some person of mark, had not taken a decided position, and so forced them to do the like. Whoever takes a step boldly in advance, risks much for himself, but is sure to do good to his cause. One thing is certain, Molesworth has greatly raised his character for judgment and tact—all those letters of his he wrote down in Cornwall with nobody near him to consult except Leader,⁶ and yet how skilfully they were all worded—not a false step, except, indeed, that pettish letter to Fonblanque,⁷—and there he saw his error, and has since sent an ample apology, and they are now friends and will soon be allies. He is trying to form a party. I do not

3. See preceding letter, n. 3.

4. Nichol had become Regius Professor of Astronomy at the University of Glasgow the preceding year.

5. After announcing in Sept., 1836, that because of loss of support by old-line Whigs he would not again seek to represent East Cornwall in Parliament, Molesworth had become a candidate for Leeds. He was pursuing an intransigent Radical line, especially on the question of the ballot, which was threatening to destroy the uneasy alliance between the Whigs and the Radicals.

6. John Temple Leader (1810–1903), then MP for Westminster.

7. See Examiner, Dec. 25, 1836, p. 819. Molesworth had been irked by Fonblanque's criticism of him in the leader of Dec. 18 (ibid., p. 801).

know what chance he has. Hume and Grote are with him, and Hume will act up to what he professes; whether Grote will, time only can show; Grote's was a good speech at the dinner.⁸ You probably have not heard Molesworth's last move; he refused to go to the dinner at Leeds because the Radicals and Whigs jointly had sent resolutions to him pledging him to support ministers. He told them what kind of support alone he could give; thereupon they held a meeting, and the Radicals carried resolutions by an immense majority against the Whigs, concurring completely in his views, and sent a deputation to him to communicate them. This has broken the union of parties at Leeds, but he has the Whigs in his hands, for if he stands and does not turn out Beckett⁹ he will turn out Baines,¹⁰ therefore, the Whigs must end by coming to a decided coalition with him. I do think something will come out of the Radical party in this session, but I cannot foresee exactly what. I often wish I were among them; now would be the time for knitting together a powerful party, and nobody holds the scattered threads of it in his hands except me. But that cannot be while I am in the India House. I should not at all mind leaving it if I had £300 a year free from anxiety and literary labour, but I have at most £100. Sed tempus veniet. Write to me soon.

Yours affectionately,

J. S. MILL.

191. TO FRANCIS PLACE¹

I.H.

Thursday.

[Feb. 9(?), 1837]

DEAR PLACE

I do not above half like Roebuck's speech²—but friends, & radicals, should stand by one another—& therefore if it be decided to reprint the speech, there shall be no obstacle from the want of a pound from me.

8. At a great Reform Dinner at Drury Lane Theatre on Jan. 23, 1837. See Examiner, Jan. 29, 1837, pp. 71–73.

9. Sir John Beckett (1777–1847), the Tory candidate, head of the Leeds banking firm of Beckett & Co., was defeated in the General Election held in July. Molesworth and Baines were elected.

10. Edward Baines (1774–1848), journalist and MP for Leeds, 1834–41.

* * * *

1. MS at Brit. Mus.

2. At the opening of Parliament on Jan. 31, 1837, in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, Roebuck had sharply attacked the Whig ministry from the Radical, democratic point of view and had charged that there was a virtual alliance against further reform. Place greatly admired the speech; he at once wrote Roebuck a congratulatory note: "God bless you, my dear boy" (Brit. Mus. Add. MSS 35,150, f. 238).

I heartily wish that those who did such great things for the Stamp Question³ would set about doing the same thing for the Ballot. It seems to me of infinite importance that Grote's motion⁴ this year, should be preceded by a strong demonstration from the country in the form of public meetings & petitions. There are a hundred reasons for this, which to you, I need not state. Perhaps with the ballot might be joined repeal of the rate paying clauses—& if they were also to moot the question of a new schedule A for the small boroughs (where the ballot would have no effect)—either abolishing those boroughs, or throwing them (together with other unrepresented towns) into districts of boroughs, like the Scotch & Welsh—so much the better. I would not meddle with household suffrage at present. It raises enemies & does no good that would not be done by repealing the ratepaying clauses, though this appears so much smaller a change. Do not you think it was injudicious in Hume⁵ to give notice of a motion for household suffrage?

Yours ever

J. S. MILL.

192. TO FRANCIS PLACE¹

I. H.

Thursday

[Feb. 9(?), 1837]

MY DEAR PLACE

I am very glad to hear of the Ballot meeting—there should be a Common Hall, after the West² meeting.

If you lose that £10, or any part of it, I will ask permission to divide the loss with you.²

The meeting should not merely vote resolutions & a petition, but should name a deputation to go to Lord Melbourne & Lord John Russell & badger them on the subject. That is the way to bring them to terms—but I am speaking to you who know all these things far better than I do

ever yours

J. S. MILL.

3. On the repeal of the stamp tax on newspapers.

4. Grote had already announced his intention to present a bill for the election of members of Parliament by ballot. See Examiner, Feb. 5, 1837, p. 87. A similar motion had failed the preceding year.

5. Joseph Hume had announced his intention to introduce a bill to extend the elective franchise to householders in general.

* * * *

1. MS at Brit. Mus.

2. See the two following letters.

193. TO FRANCIS PLACE¹

I.H.

Friday

[Feb. 10, 1837]

MY DEAR PLACE

It is disgraceful that those who rendered so great a service should be out of pocket.² Since there is a loss I must be allowed to bear my part of it to which purpose please to apply the enclosed.³

As for the ballot—there is nothing like timing the matter well. If £100 would suffice this time as well as last, I am convinced it might be raised in two days, for the radicals are feeling at last the necessity of doing something, & they want public meetings & petitions now to help them on.

As for Roebuck's speech⁴—it has greatly raised his character, & will do good—but in so far as it goes beyond Molesworth, I do not agree in it.

I think Fonblanque in the wrong,⁵ but you need not I think regret having served him, for he is still as radical as ever & will be with us again soon, I am convinced.

Pray do not think of hibernating.⁶ Radicalism seems to me to have a better chance just now than it has ever had before—the few who are active, having now determined to go on without the rest, which will soon oblige the others to follow.

Ever truly yours

J. S. MILL.

194. TO ALBANY FONBLANQUE¹

I.H.

Monday

[Feb. 13(?), 1837]

DEAR FONBLANQUE—I called on you yesterday, (which I had not been able to do any evening last week) wishing to talk over a hundred things with

1. Addressed: Francis Place Esq. / 21 Brompton Square. Postmarks: 2 AN 2 / FE 10 / 1837, and TP / Cornhill. MS at Brit. Mus.

2. See Letters 192 and 194.

3. £5. See Letter 194.

4. See Letter 191, n. 2.

5. Fonblanque in the Examiner's leading article for Feb. 5, 1837, had been critical of Roebuck for his attack on the Whig ministry.

6. Place retorted: "I have no present inclination to waste my time with men who are infirm of purpose, and worry myself to no useful purpose" (quoted in Graham Wallas, Life of Francis Place [London, 1898], pp. 351–52). The full draft of Place's letter is in Brit. Mus. Add. MSS 35,150, ff. 241–42.

* * * *

1. MS at LSE. Excerpts published in Life and Labours of Albany Fonblanque, ed. E. B. de Fonblanque (London, 1874), pp. 30–31.

you—but there is one thing which cannot wait, & which I must write to you about.

Unless you and a few others bestir themselves, & give the word to the people to meet & petition for the ballot during the next three weeks, Grote's motion² will go off as flatly as it did last year & if so, the consequences will be unspeakably mischievous. I reckon a Tory majority, & a Tory ministry almost certain at a very early period, unless we have a government which will propose the ballot. I know nobody at all acquainted with the constituencies who does not think the same. Buller for instance is half mad about it, & is for throwing overboard Reform of the Lords & everything else & pushing for the ballot & the ballot only. As for Ministers—I have advised Molesworth & shall advise every radical I know, to be guided in his tone & conduct about the ministry, mainly by the part they take on Grote's motion.

It is enough to drive one mad to see everybody thinking of everything except the precise thing which is of importance at the time, & so every opportunity lost.

I wrote to Place³ to see if the Committee who managed all the correspondence & petitioning on the newspaper stamps for two sessions & only spent £110, would do the same for the ballot—he answered, that even those £110 they had not been able to raise & were £20 out of pocket! I had subscribed both years, that is £2, which was in proportion to my means, but I could not help sending him £5 now⁴ for my share of the loss. In answer I received the enclosed which I shall keep as a memorial of the spiritless, heartless imbecility of the English radicals.⁵ Pray read it & send it back to me, as I mean to fling it in the teeth of some of them.

I shall be surprised if after reading this you still think that it was not worth while risking something in order to awaken the people from their torpor.

Ever faithfully yours

J. S. MILL

I am delighted with the three volumes⁶—everything in them is quite fresh, & as good as new.

2. It was due to be presented on March 7.

3. Letter 191.

4. Letter 193.

5. Ibid., n. 6.

6. Fonblanque's England under Seven Administrations, a three-volume collection of his political pieces in the Examiner. Published this month, the book was reviewed by JSM in LWR, XXVII (April, 1837), 65–98.

195. TO ALBANY FONBLANQUE¹

I.H.

Thursday

[Feb. 16(?), 1837]

MY DEAR FONBLANQUE

Since I wrote to you I have heard again from Place, who says—but I had better enclose what he says. I do so that you may be au courant of what is doing as a word in the Examiner would be of great importance to the object.

Please return this & Place's other letter, which I want to shew to Molesworth & others.

It was a good debate on the qualification²—& a good division but Warburton, I think, played the fool³—& his bill must be watched. If they get the law merely relaxed, so as to include personal property, they will enforce it, & so make it practically worse than at present.

Ever yours

J. S. MILL

196. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

[Feb. 23, 1837]

Mr Hunt's Article² will be in time if it be not later than the 12th of March: and whether it be printed or not in this N^o (tho' I am anxious that it should) I undertake that he shall be paid for it.

1. MS at LSE.

2. In the House of Commons on Tuesday, Feb. 14, Molesworth had moved for leave to bring in a bill to abolish the property qualification of members of Parliament. The motion lost by a vote of 104 to 133.

3. Henry Warburton, who had previously given notice of a motion to amend the property qualification, supported Molesworth's motion, but suggested that in Committee some alteration of the qualification might be substituted for abolition of it.

* * *

1. MS not located. An excerpt quoted in an unpublished letter by Carlyle to Leigh Hunt, dated Friday morning [Feb. 24, 1837], in Cornell University Library: "I have just received a letter from Mill; of which this is the first paragraph: [quoted paragraph] Hand to the work, therefore! And best speed to you! So says, / Yours always / T. Carlyle." JSM's letter was in answer to Carlyle's of Wednesday [Feb. 22, 1837], in A. Carlyle, pp. 147–48.

2. "Lady Mary Wortley Montagu," published in LWR, XXVII (April, 1837), 130–64.

197. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

India House

3^d March

1837

MY DEAR D'EICHTHAL

I have indeed been very remiss in answering the letter which you wrote to me from Ems. But if you knew how completely my time has been occupied all this winter, I am sure you would pardon me. I was absent from the India House full five months last year & from England 3½ months in hopes of getting rid of a troublesome local affection of the head, which has not even yet left me. Since my return I have had arrears of all sorts of business to clear off, & have been obliged to put off everything which could be put off. I did not however postpone reading your book.² The copies you ordered to be sent to me I have never received, & I should not have known that the book existed, if I had not, in passing through Paris in November last, called upon your brother Adolphe, who gave me a copy. This I have read & read with very great interest indeed. It would be very difficult without going through the whole book chapter by chapter, to say exactly how much of the book I agree in—but in the main it appears to me very valuable: & your views respecting the difference between the Oriental & the European character, seem to me perfectly just. I quite agree with you that an infusion of the Oriental character into tha[t]³ of the nations of northern Europe would form a combination very much better than either separately. All the doubt I have, is, whether any considerable effect of that kind can be expected from the causes you contemplate—But doubtless whatever promotes friendly intercourse between these two varieties of mankind, & whatever teaches them to know & to like one another, must have a certain tendency of that sort.

In your little note from Vienna you do not tell me anything of your health—I am very anxious to hear whether it is completely reestablished.

I am forced to write to you very hastily & very briefly, as I am still so busy, I actually [do?] not know which way to [turn?]. You I suppose have more leisure, at least for the present, & I hope to hear from you soon at greater length.

I cannot close this note without saying how sincerely I lament the loss of your excellent Mother—

ever yours faithfully

J. S. MILL

1. Addressed: Monsieur / Monsieur Gustave d'Eichthal. MS at Arsenal.

2. Probably Les Deux Mondes par M. Gustave d'Eichthal . . . , servant d'introduction à l'ouvrage de M. Urquhart "La Turquie et ses ressources," though the only copy located bears the imprint, Leipzig, 1837.

3. Brackets indicate where page is torn.

198. TO LEIGH HUNT¹

India House
Monday
[March 13, 1837]

MY DEAR SIR

I regret much that I was from home when you took the trouble to call—but I hope to be indemnified another time & that our personal acquaintance thus begun will henceforth grow & prosper.

I am just about to send your MS.² to press with very great satisfaction at our having got it, & still more so at our having enlisted you as a contributor, I hope a frequent one. The remainder will be quite in time tomorrow there being no probability that there will be any points requiring discussion.

Ever truly yours

J. S. MILL

199. TO LEIGH HUNT¹

India House
Wednesday
[March 15, 1837]

MY DEAR SIR

If my letter gave you pleasure I am sure yours gave as much to me independently of the very great value to us of the MS.² which accompanied it & which it was delightful to have to read among so many bad articles or (worse still) articles which required a world of trouble to make them good.

It is part of our plan to have signatures—what shall yours be? your sign manual?³

In answer to your P.S.—I believe in the practice of most reviews, & certainly of ours, the book reviewed belongs to the reviewer, & we should never think of deducting its price from our payment.

Ever truly yours

J. S. MILL

1. Addressed: Leigh Hunt Esq. / 4 Upper Cheyne Row. MS at Brit. Mus. Carlyle, on Saturday, March 11, had urged Hunt to get his article to JSM that very night (see A. Carlyle, p. 149). On the outside of the letter is written: "I send you this back to read, because giving pleasure to others I knew it would give pleasure to yourself / L.H. [Leigh Hunt]"; and in pencil in yet another hand: "This moment arrived / ½ past 6. / T. C."

2. See Letter 196, n. 2.

* * * *

1. MS at Brit. Mus. MS dated in pencil in another hand: [?] circ 1840; the reference to Hunt's first contribution to the London and Westminster Review (see Letters 196 and 198), however, permits the inference of the date here assigned.

2. See Letter 196, n. 2.

3. Hunt continued to use this as his signature for other articles in the Review.

200. TO WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX¹Wed^r

[March 15, 1837]

Thanks—it² is beautifully done, & will illuminate our number. I would gladly, whenever possible, give a good many articles to T.S.³ for such another.

Probably the Cromwell extracts⁴ with such comment as they may need, may be added at the end without altering anything. At all events, the alteration can be made in the proof.

Thanks once more—I feel them—& the more because I have given you so little to thank me for—

J.S.M.

201. TO JOHN MACRONE¹

Kensington

Thursday ev^e

[March 30 (?), 1837]

MY DEAR SIR

As you are acquainted with the nature of my connexion with the London & Westminster Review, & are also, I believe, aware that Mr Falconer is about to resign the editorship, I need not apologize for addressing myself to you instead of to Mr. Falconer, to save time. The review will, from a concurrence of very untoward circumstances, be delayed beyond the proper day.² Now it occurs to me that the best thing to be done in this case is to put a bold face upon it, & to tell all the booksellers that they need not wonder at not getting the review exactly to a day as it is intended hereafter

1. Addressed: Rev. W. J. Fox / 366 Strand. Marked: private. Postmarks: T. P. / Leadenhall, and 4 EG4 / MR 15 / 1837. MS at King's. Published in Garnett, p. 185.

2. "Bulwer's Tragedies," LWR, XXVII (April, 1837), 247–70. See Letters 186 and 187.

3. The True Sun. JSM made at least one contribution to this newspaper to free Fox to write the review; it was an unheaded article on the sale of public lands in the colonies, True Sun, Feb. 22, 1837, p. 3.

4. Fox's review contained generous extracts of Bulwer's tragedy Cromwell, which was not published until four years later in The Dramatic Works of Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer (London, 1841).

* * * *

1. MS at LSE.

John Macrone (ca. 1810–1837) best known as the early publisher of Charles Dickens, had published the Westminster and continued as publisher of the London and Westminster until his death in Sept. of this year.

2. Originally announced for publication on March 31, the April number did not appear until April 6. See Examiner, March 26, 1837, p. 208; April 2, p. 224; and April 9, p. 240.

not to publish on a fixed day, but to regulate the bringing out of the review with a view to the timing of the articles which it contains. This you may safely say; because it is the determination of the gentleman³ who is to succeed Mr Falconer, that the review shall always be ready for publication by the 20th of the month so that it may be brought out at whatever may appear the most advantageous moment between that & magazine-day.

I hope you will excuse my making this suggestion to you, but it seems to me of great importance & it is at the suggestion of the gentleman who is to be the future editor, that I make it. We are also, both of us, anxious that the country copies should not wait for the next monthly parcels, but should be sent off in separate parcels, the expense of which the review will of course pay.

I think you will have reason to be much pleased with the new editor. I am satisfied you will find him a most efficient man of business, & a man of infinite resource for the management of a review.

Believe me

very truly yours

J. S. MILL

John Macrone Esq.

202. TO LEIGH HUNT¹

I.H.

Thursday

[April 6 (?), 1837]

MY DEAR SIR

Many thanks for all the kind & agreeable things in your note, which I have not had time to acknowledge sooner.

You will have perceived that I had only cancelled a single sentence,² & that for reasons which I think you will assent to, the first time I have an opportunity of stating them to you.

We have been thrown out this time by a concurrence of accident & I fear mismanagement. Some of our most important articles were thought of too late—others were accidentally delayed—& the holidays make printing establishments unusually inefficient.

3. John Robertson (d. 1875), a native of Aberdeen, who had been called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn and who had been working on the Morning Chronicle. He was to remain as nominal editor until JSM relinquished control of the Review in 1840.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Leigh Hunt Esq. / 3 Upper Cheyne Row / Chelsea. MS at Brit. Mus.

2. In Hunt's article, "Lady Mary Wortley Montagu." See Letter 196, n. 2.

We shall hereafter avoid I hope all such inconveniences—The present managing editor is about to retire & we have got a most efficient man, who understands the business in hand most perfectly, to supply his place.³

Ever yours truly

J. S. MILL

203. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

India House
26th April 1837

MY DEAR MUTTERLEIN

You may believe how glad I was to read your long letter & to learn all that it told me. Most of all I was delighted, & so were all to whom I have told it, that something has been already done,² & that a thing which, once done, is done for all countries & not only for poor little Malta. What you say of the feelings of the English to the Maltese³ is all that one expected in kind but much worse in degree—it makes Canada quite intelligible to one—a subject on which our ministers have been dragging themselves & their supporters through the dirt, including Strutt & some other apostate radicals.

I send you the review—the last number to be brought out by Falconer⁴—he & I have all along differed completely as to the management & the difference at last came to a crisis & he resigned. It is now in the hands of a man⁵ as efficient as he was inefficient, a man who seems made by nature to conduct the detail business of a review, & who (he is very young) promises, I think to be fit for much better things too. He is the author of the article on Shakespear's life,⁶ in the October number. The present number has, I think, less intrinsic merit than most of the preceding, but is much more calculated for success. A propos of your remark on Carlyle's

3. See preceding letter, n. 3.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Mrs. Austin. MS at King's. Sent in parcel by Henry Reeves to Malta (see Letter 204). In reply to Mrs. Austin's unpublished letter of March 3 (MS at LSE).

2. Mrs. Austin had written: "With this packet they [John Austin and G. C. Lewis] send home their report on the Liberty of the Press & a draft of a Libel law which is entirely his [Austin's] & which Lewis says he believes to be the most perfect specimen of legislation in existence."

3. Mrs. Austin had written: "If I escape poisoning you may rejoice. . . . I am sorry to be an object of hostility to anybody, but civility to the Maltese is an inexpressible offence in the eyes of the English ladies, and I had no choice."

4. The April, 1837, number.

5. John Robertson.

6. "Shakspeare," LWR, XXVI (Oct., 1836), 30–57, signed M.R.

article Mirabeau:⁷ I am not at all surprised that Mr Austin or that Lewis should dislike it, but it has been the most popular article we ever had in the review & I think has been extremely useful to us. Except Roebuck, Grote, & Senior, I have met with nobody here, of any account, who disliked it: & those three dislike everything, the style of which is not humdrum: for instance, Grote thinks the style of Henry Taylor's book⁸ affected, & Senior thinks it execrable. Of course I do not mean that the same is the case with Mr Austin or with Lewis; I know the contrary; but I think, generally speaking, those who have disliked the article Mirabeau are those who cannot endure any peculiarities of style. On the other hand we have never had any article which has been so much admired by so many people. I do not think with you that Carlyle's usual peculiarities are exceeded in it, I think it falls greatly short of the average degree of them.

I have consulted Lord Langdale about the epitaph⁹—he thought mine a good one if there was to be any but on the whole preferred to have none—saying “I incline to think that a monumental inscription should contain no more than is required for the identification of the man. If the name does not live in history, we see what monumental inscriptions come to—if the name does live, as your father's will, the inscription however short which identifies it, excites the interest & awakens the recollections which are desired.” This I think is an instance of his usual good sense & I have at length determined to abide by it. I do not however think that it is a fault in an epitaph to be pretentious (if I may coin such a word), provided it does not pretend to more than is thought just by friends & admirers. People expect that an epitaph shall contain what a man's admirers think of him—not what is thought by all the world.

The radicals as you will have seen have been unusual[ly] active, & Roebuck & Charles Buller are now in ver[y] high reputation everywhere—those two in particular, & th[e] party in general.¹⁰ It is all owing to Molesworth, & to what he wrote & did during the three months previous to the opening of parliament. You say he is too fond of going to dinners—it may seem so at a distance, but to us who are here it is plain that he did not

7. “Memoirs of Mirabeau.” LWR, XXVI (Jan., 1837), 382–439. Mrs. Austin had written: “Mr Lewis & my husband are clamorous against poor Carlyle's article & say you will ruin the review if you admit any more. I am afraid this is a very general opinion, though I grieve it should be so. I am anxious to see his book [The French Revolution] and yet I dread to see it. The article is certainly one of his most extravagant as to style.”

8. The Statesman (London, 1836), reviewed by Grote (and in part by JSM) in the LWR, XXVII (April, 1837), 1–32.

9. For James Mill. See Letter 189. Mrs. Austin had written with reference to the proposed epitaph: “What does Lord Langdale say? He really knew & loved your father.”

10. Brackets in this sentence indicate where page is torn.

go to one dinner too many—he went only when a demonstration was needed, & has produced an effect through the country which will be permanent. That, & its consequences, have altered the whole aspect of politics here, as you would feel if you could hear the things now said of radicalism & the radicals, by people not at all partial to them. I have been driving them these four years to what they have now at last done, & done most successfully.

I am quite well now except the merely local ailment in my head, & so are the boys & all the family. I have much more to say but have not time to say it.

Yours affect^y

J. S. MILL

Henry Taylor & some other people have been arranging for Carlyle to give lectures on German literature¹¹ next month & with considerable prospects of success—there are about 100 tickets taken, many of them by people of note—

204. TO SARAH AUSTIN¹

I.H.

28th April

1837

MY DEAR MÜTTERLEIN—I have written to you by Henry Reeve's² parcel, but I have something to say which induces me to write again.

Would Mr Austin like to be the Professor of Moral Philosophy at Glasgow? The chair is vacant, & it is worth £700 a year, but so long as old Mylne³ lives (he is 83 years of age) it will only be worth £300. It is in the gift of the Professors, & one of them, my friend Nichol, who is an admirer of Mr Austin has written to me to ask if he would like it & to say that he could perhaps carry Mr Austin's election to the chair with such testimonials as it would be easy to get. If Mr Austin declines, he has nobody better than Bailey of Sheffield, & means to try for him.

Pray answer this as soon as you are able

YOUR SÖHNCHEN

11. This was the first of four series of public lectures Carlyle delivered annually, 1837–40. The first lecture was delivered on May 1, 1837.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Mrs. Austin / Malta. Franked by H. Taylor. MS in the possession of Mr. Gordon Waterfield.

2. Henry Reeve (1813–1895), man of letters, editor of the Edinburgh Review, 1855–95. He was a nephew of Mrs. Austin.

3. James Milne (1754–1839), who held the chair from 1797 until his death. He was succeeded by William Fleming (1791–1866).

205. TO HARRIET GROTE¹

May, 1837

What you say of W.² accords with my expectations. I consider him, with his crotchettiness, and his fussiness, and his go-between inclinations, to be the evil genius of the Radical party. . . . He is "out of my books," as completely as Strutt and the rest of the pseudo-Radicals who voted for the extinction of popular government in Canada.³

206. TO EDWARD LYTTON BULWER¹

I.H.

Wednesday

[May or June (?), 1837]

MY DEAR SIR

I have read your article² with great eagerness & delight—it is such as I expected from you & if we could have one such article in every number I should have no misgivings respecting our critical reputation.

I have hardly found a sentence in the article which has not my heartiest concurrence except perhaps some part of what you say of Shelley,³ & there I am not sure that there is any difference—for all that you say to his disparagement, I allow to be true though not I think the whole truth—it seems to me that much, though not most of Shelley's poetry is full of the truest passion, & it seems to me hardly fair to put Shelley in the same genus as Gray when the imagery of the one however redundant & occasionally farfetched is always true to nature, that of the other as you say yourself drawn from books, & false—the one the exuberant outpouring of a seething fancy, the other elaborately studied & artificial.

But perhaps you think all this as well as I—if so, & only if so, would not some little addition or qualification give a truer impression?

1. Excerpt published in [Mrs. Harriet Grote], The Philosophic Radicals of 1832 (London, 1866), p. 34. MS not located.

2. Probably Henry Warburton.

3. On March 6 Lord John Russell for the Whig ministry had presented to the House of Commons a set of ten resolutions dealing with the troubled affairs of Lower Canada and in effect declaring an intention to suspend representative government in the province. The House approved the resolutions by a large majority on March 8 despite the strenuous opposition of such Radicals as Roebuck, Hume, and Molesworth.

* * * *

1. Published in Elliot, I, 107. MS in the possession of Lady Hermione Cobbold. Corrected by Dr. Eileen Curran.

2. "The Works of Thomas Gray," LWR, XXVII (July, 1837), 1-16.

3. Ibid., pp. 14-15.

I had not time the other evening to tell you how much I am delighted with "Athens"⁴—the book is so good, that very few people will see how good.

Ever yours,

J. S. MILL

207. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
19th June 1837

MY DEAR GUILBERT

I have been so busy, such a mere mechanical drudge all the winter & spring, that I have neither had time nor energy to take pen in hand for any purpose which could possibly admit of postponement, & I was still in this condition when I received your letter of the 26th of last month. I have now, by seven months hard labour, acquired something of a respite & though I have been made rather unwell by this disagreeable, strange, irregular season, I have been able to find courage to write to you.—Do not vex yourself about any delay in your article on the Army;² even when we have it we may not be able to publish it immediately, for we must watch our opportunity & bring it out at the time when the public mind is turning to that class of subjects & when consequently it is most likely to be read. Of course the sooner we have it the better but I beg you by no means to put your health to any hazard for the sake of finishing it earlier—nor even to neglect any occupation which circumstances may render more pressing.

I cannot account for your not having received the Review. It has been regularly sent through M. Fillonneau, with the usual understanding that all who were on the list were to have copies. Perhaps M. Paulin can explain it. (Is he satisfied with the article on the Histoire Parlementaire?)³ But at all events the matter shall be set right, for the review is now under a new editor; printer, publisher & everything else is changed, & it will not, I trust, be mismanaged in future. Whoever is our agent, you & all our other friends shall have written orders, on presenting which you will receive your copies.

Under the new management we have prospects of much greater pecuniary

4. Athens, Its Rise and Fall was published in May, 1837.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Monsieur / M. Aristide Guilbert / recommandé aux soins de / Monsieur Peschot / Propriétaire / 5 Rue Jadot / à Paris. Postmarks: E 21; 19 / JUNE / 1837 /; and Angleterre / Par Calais / 21 / JUIN / 1837. MS at King's. Printed in Morrison, p. 257, but dated June 29, 1837.

2. No such article appeared in LWR.

3. By Carlyle, LWR, XXVII (April, 1837), 233–47.

success than before—that is we may hope to pay our expenses, which we have never yet done.

The radicals, as you have seen, have been much more active this year than ever before, & have shewn, in parliament, much more talent. They are however much divided; some of them are for giving more, & others less, support to the ministry. As for me I am with the extreme party; though I would not always go so far as Roebuck, I entirely agree with those who say that the whole conduct of the Whigs tends to amortir l'esprit public, & that it would be a good thing for invigorati[ng]⁴ & consolidating the reform party if the Tories were to come in. But the country does not go with us in this & therefore it will not do for the radicals to aid in turning out the ministry; by doing so they would create so much hostility in their own party, that there would be no hope of a real united reform party with the country at its back, for many years. So we must linger on, each man doing for the present such good work as lies nearer to his hand—ever yours my dear Guilbert

J. S. MILL.

208. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

Kensington
Friday night
[June, 1837]

DEAR ROBERTSON

Pray read Clarkson's article² & say what you think of it. I am sure you will agree with me that it is, in its present state, totally inadmissible. I think it much worse on the whole than Atkinson's,³ though better in some respects. I am anxious for your opinion as to whether it is possible by any omissions & alterations to make it tolerable. I am sure it will require many hours continued labour of a ready writer who knows a good deal about the subject himself. There is nothing good in the article that I can discover except an expression here & there, & the evidence he extracts from the Report.

4. Page torn.

* * * *

1. Addressed: J. Robertson Esq. MS at LSE. Dated by the references to the July, 1837, LWR.

2. Probably "The School of Design," ibid., pp. 116–39, signed E.C., which contained an analysis of a recent parliamentary inquiry and report on arts and manufactures.

3. Not identified.

There is the devil to pay on another score—the new printers have begun with page 1 instead of page 285—and if Bulwer's article is printed off, that error is so far irremediable.⁴

These said new printers are dreadfully inaccurate—so were Clowes's at times, but generally not. They will do better when they know the hand-writing. Some of their blunders in my article were however very unaccountable to me.

My article I am sorry to say reads damned bad—not so the extracts, which are splendid.⁵

I have sent back one sheet, the only one I had, corrected, at nine this evening & shall call tomorrow morning for another.

I have an offer of twelve pages on the immediately present state of French politics, the marriage of the Duke of Orleans &c.⁶ written republicanly by Thibaudeau one of the liveliest & wittiest writers now in France, & translated by Leader⁷—to be ready by Wednesday morning. I have not said yea or nay. Think of it & if you cannot come, send me word to the I.H. what you have thought.

Yours

J.S.M.

209. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House
30th June 1837

MY DEAR CARLYLE

I send you the review. The article on your book² is I think producing a good effect, although the opinions which have reached me concerning the article either in print or orally are mostly unfavorable.

There has been a review of the book in Fraser,³ evidently by Heraud. He labours a good deal to prove, that you are very like him, & therefore

4. Evidently it had been printed off, for Bulwer's "The Works of Thomas Gray" begins on page 1 of the July number.

5. JSM's review of Carlyle's The French Revolution (LWR, XXVII, 17–53) contains copious extracts.

6. No such article appeared.

7. John Temple Leader.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq. MS at Brit. Mus. One passage published in William Foster, The East India House (London, 1924), p. 214. Carlyle's answer of July 18, 1837, in A. Carlyle, pp. 153–56.

2. See preceding letter, n. 5.

3. Fraser's, XVI (July, 1837), 85–104.

very good; but that you want something of being entirely like him, & therefore are not altogether perfect; & towards the end he prophesies for you & other writers in Fraser (apparently himself) present neglect & future undying fame. There is in Heraud a placid disregard of contemporary opinion, which would be greatness if he were not so quite sure of living for ever. But now he reminds one of the dying penitent's answer to his confessor who proposed to him, as a motive for patience, the example of Christ: "Ah, mon père, quand J.C. mourut le vendredi, il savait bien qu'il resusciterait le dimanche."

There are one or two good thoughts, well expressed, in the article too: but on the whole it will do the book little good: for instead of resting the justification of the unfamiliar, on familiar principles, he rests it on principles ten times more remote from common apprehension than the book itself, & has defended the book in an article ten times more unintelligible than it, with none of the beauty & not more than a tenth part of the truth.

Henry Taylor whom I met the other day has not read much of the book & has not made much of it, but he says it makes a very strong impression indeed upon some people, among whom he mentioned Frederic Elliot.⁴ He says that Lockhart told him he found in every page something that offended him most exceedingly but yet he could not lay the book down. I hope Lockhart will review it himself & say so, though we thereby lose Croker.⁵ Taylor did not know whether there would be a review or not. T. says that your lectures⁶ have made a very favorable impression, except upon two or three people who did not attend after the first two lectures & had not sufficient common sense to see what ailed those.

Everybody is hurrying away to get reelected or elected. As for me I shall be here till the middle of September, though I have very little to do here at present. I have worked off my arrear of business at this office, & the work does not now come in nearly so fast as I can do it. It is the way of my work to go in that sort of manner—in fits—and I like that well enough, as it gives me intervals of leisure. I am using this interval to get on with my book—a book I have done little to since the review began, & which you will think very little worth doing—a treatise on Logic. I hope I do not overrate the value of anything I can do of that kind but it so happens that this, whatever be its value, is the only thing which I am sure I can do & do not believe can be so well done by anybody else whom I know of. In regard to all things which are not merely for the day, that seems to be the best rule for chusing one's work.—Further, I do it in order to deliver myself of various things which I have in my head on the subject. As for its being

4. Thomas Frederick Elliot.

5. John Wilson Croker. The Quarterly did not review the book.

6. See Letter 203, n. 11.

read, it will be so by fewer people than even yours, but it may be of use to some of those few.

Write soon & tell me how you enjoy your repose—ever faithfully J. S. MILL.

too late for *S & M's*⁷ parcel.

The Times says, your book “sometimes excites our admiration by its original eloquence & powerful thinking, sometimes offends us beyond endurance by its extravagant caprices of style & expression. The diction is sometimes almost monstrous.”⁸

209A. TO HENRY MILL (see page 743)

210. TO LEIGH HUNT¹

India House
7th July 1837

MY DEAR SIR

I fear you have not had your copy of the Review. We have adopted the plan of not sending copies to our contributors but letting them send for them—on the ground that it is less inconvenience to each of them to send to one place, than to us to send to many. But as the reason of the practice does not apply to contributors living so far off as you do, neither is it fit that the practice should, & I will therefore take upon myself individually to see you supplied.

I hope we shall have something from you in our next number²—does anything occur to you? & most sincerely do I now wish that you had written an article for us on Lamb, instead of Bulwer,³ who has done it very little to my liking.

Believe me

Ever yours truly⁴

I wish all success to the old Repository in your hands.⁵

7. Simpkin and Marshall, Booksellers.

8. Not located. It is not from the long review (by W. M. Thackeray) in The Times, Aug. 3, 1837, p. 6.

This postscript is written on the outside, diagonally, above the address.

* * * *

1. MS at Brit. Mus.

2. It was to be over a year before another of Hunt's was to appear in the LWR. See Letter 240, n. 2.

3. “Letters of Charles Lamb,” LWR, XXVII (July, 1837), 229–43.

4. The signature has been cut out.

5. Hunt had just taken over from R. H. Horne the proprietorship of the Monthly Repository. See Mineka, The Dissidence of Dissent, pp. 382–93.

211. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

July 12, IH [India House], 1837.

DEAR ROBERTSON,

[...] I have had a letter from Tocqueville which shows that we can scarcely have his book² before our April number, and one from Nisard, alluding to a previous letter, which I never received, coming into our plans, and having no doubt of his being in time for this number. I send you a letter to him.

I do not think I can write anything worth having about Whewell³ this time. Blackie's⁴ I do not think will do, for an article on Menzel⁵ is an article on Goethe, of whom Menzel is the great literary enemy. Moore,⁶ if favorable, is not worth doing; if unfavorable, Peacock should do it, and it should not be in the same number as Southey⁷ [...]

If I had known you meant to write to Harriet Martineau, I should have wished for a consultation first, as the manner of doing it is of considerable interest to me personally. She and I are not upon terms, and I know her too well to make it likely that we ever shall be. I am therefore desirous, 1st, that she should not be identified with the Review more than its interest requires; 2d, that all communications with her should take place through another medium than mine; 3d, that nevertheless she should not think, as she is exactly the person to think, that her connection with the Review is in spite of me,—that I would prevent it if I could, but am unable.

If I knew exactly how you have written to her, I should know how to comport myself with a view to making the other impression. There is a letter for you from her at Hooper's:⁸ have you left any instructions with Hooper about forwarding letters? I have read her book,⁹ and like it less than I expected. I like all the feeling of it, but not the thought; but I should

1. Published by Towers, pp. 58–59. MS not located. Mrs. Towers says that it was addressed to Robertson at Boulogne, France, where he was vacationing. The bracketed ellipses indicate Mrs. Towers' deletions.

2. Tocqueville in his letter of June 24, 1837 (Mayer, p. 324), had expressed his hope that the second part of Démocratie en Amérique might be published by the spring of 1838; it did not appear, however, until 1840.

3. William Whewell (1794–1866), later Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, published his History of the Inductive Sciences this year.

4. John Stuart Blackie (1809–1895), Scottish professor and man of letters, who had published a verse translation of Faust in 1834.

5. Wolfgang Menzel (1798–1873), poet, critic, and historian, had published his Die deutsche Literatur in 1836.

6. Tom Moore.

7. No article on either Moore or Southey appeared in LWR.

8. Henry Hooper, bookseller, had recently become publisher of LWR.

9. Presumably her Society in America, published in May, 1837.

think an article by her on Miss Sedgwick's writings,¹⁰ such as you suggest, would be interesting and useful to us.

Besides the letter to Nisard I send you one to Guilbert; if he is not in town he is at Saint-Germain, and you should go to him there. Those will be the most useful letters to you. Both Guilbert and Nisard speak English well; Guilbert excellently, and Nisard is married to an Englishwoman. I do not know anybody else who is likely to be in town except the d'Eichthals: Adolphe is too busy to be of any use to you, and Gustave you can always, if you like, call upon and use my name; he is the ex-St. Simonian author of a book on Greece¹¹ (and the East generally) which he wants reviewed, but which will scarcely do for us[. . .] I advanced £25 to Bisset¹² on my own account, not for the Review. I do not wish to have anything more to do with the Review in that capacity[. . .]

I saw Dickens yesterday; he reminds me of Carlyle's picture of Camille Desmoulins,¹³ and his "face of dingy blackguardism irradiated with genius." Such a phenomenon does not often appear in a lady's drawing-room.

Yours ever,

J. S. MILL.

212. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

July 28, 1837.

[. . .]² Guilbert's offer, however, promises fair, but I have never found that a Frenchman's promise to do anything punctually could be depended upon. They promise everything and do nothing. They are not men of business. Guilbert is better, being half an Englishman. Do you, however, decide.

The sheets of Mignet³ will be a catch. Those of Hugo not, because he is exhausted and effete. Châles⁴ is a humbug, whom I showed up in a letter

10. Miss Martineau's first contribution to LWR, "Miss Sedgwick's Works," appeared in the Oct., 1837, number, XXVIII, 42-65. Catherine Maria Sedgwick (1789-1867) was a popular American novelist.

11. Les Deux Mondes (Leipzig, 1837).

12. Andrew Bisset, a contributor to the Review.

13. In Bk. IV, chap. iv of The French Revolution. Dickens at this point was at the height of his early fame because of the extraordinary popularity of his nearly completed Pickwick Papers.

* * * *

1. Published by Towers, p. 59. MS not located.

2. Mrs. Towers summarizes the first part of the letter as saying that Guilbert has been vexed to have missed seeing Robertson, who has by this time left Paris.

3. F. A. M. Mignet (1796-1884), historian, associated with Le National. The work referred to cannot be identified.

4. Philarète E. Chasles (1798-1873), journalist, librarian, and later professor at the Collège de France.

intended for the National, but published in the Monthly Repository,⁵ and the bare idea of his reviewing George Sand is enough to make one split. I would not give a farthing for the opinion of Galebert,⁶ or anybody connected with his review, about writers, for they are mere milksops themselves; and Hugo's opinions, like most French literary men's opinions of one another, are affairs of coterie and puffery. I thought your Statistical Society article was for the January.⁷ I of course defer to you about all questions of timing. But I differ from you about geology not being called for. I think the zoölogical speculations connected with geology are quite in season just now, and Nichol, I am sure, would do it with originality and well, judging from his articles for us, both of which were written when ill or in a hurry.⁸ You may think him not a popular writer, but you will think quite differently when you read his Architecture of the Heavens.⁹

The falling off to be guarded against in substantial merit and originality does not arise from our having lost any of our writers, but in our not using them. I do not understand the false position you speak of, nor do I know what friends of ours we have attacked. Written, as you see, in a great hurry, and just as one chatters in walking quick from the India House to Hooper's.

Ever truly,

J. S. MILL.

213. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

India House, Saturday,
August 6, 1837.

DEAR ROBERTSON,

I entirely approve your intention of remaining at Boulogne as long as possible, and I hope you will remain as long as what requires to be done here can be done by me, of which you are the most proper judge.

None of the three articles you expect are at Hooper's, nor any other article except one on Poland by a Pole,² which I have not looked at. There

5. "Letter from an Englishman to a Frenchman, on a Recent Apology in 'The Journal Des Débats,' for the Faults of the English National Character," MR, VIII (June, 1834), 385-95.

6. Probably Léon Galibert, editor of the Révue britannique.

7. "Transactions of the Statistical Society of London," signed R., did not appear in the LWR until April, 1838 (XXIX, 45-72).

8. In the numbers for April, 1835, and July, 1836.

9. Views of the Architecture of the Heavens (Edinburgh, 1837).

* * * *

1. Published by Towers, p. 60. MS not located.

2. No such article appeared in LWR.

are a few books, chiefly Spencer's *Circassia*³ (from Colburn) and a translation of the King of Bavaria's Poems.⁴ Hooper says he was mistaken about 1025 copies having been sold; it was only 925. That is only 25 since you went away. . . . Nichol says his article will be here next week. You do not know Nichol. He is one of the three or four persons living for whom I would answer that whatever they think and say they can do they can. He says: "I expect that the article will direct scientific attention to some few moot points in a mode not quite so limited as that of existing discussion regarding them. At all events, I shall show general readers at what geology has arrived." I will write to him immediately about connecting it with the geological transactions.⁵

As for me, I am so immersed in Logic and am getting on so triumphantly with it that I loathe the idea of leaving off to write articles. I do not think you are right about the elections. The Tories, where they have gained, have gained impartially from the Whigs and Radicals, and so where they have lost. The only exceptions are Middlesex and the City; in both of which many Tories chose to split with Whigs for the express purpose of turning out Hume and Grote.⁶ Whenever the Tories choose to do this, of course the Radical candidates will, in the present state of parties, be in great danger. The Radicals seem to have lost most only because they have lost some of their most leading men, but those will come in again for some other place very soon; and a great number of the new members are very decided Radicals, though generally not intemperate ones. Neither are the Tories who are turned out the extreme Tories. They almost all belong to the hack official jobbing adventurer Tories, who are seldom ultras, as Twiss,⁷ Bonham,⁸ Ross,⁹ and such like. On the whole, this election will so increase the already great difficulties of the Whigs that they must either propose the ballot and dissolve on it, or contrive to divide the Tory party, and make a compromise with one section of it. They stand much nearer to both goals than they ever did before, and have, I think, got clean up to the parting of the two roads. Either would be a decided improvement on the present aspect of affairs. For the present politics are wonderfully dull; and for the first time these ten years I have no wish to be in Parliament. If the offer

3. Edmund Spencer, Travels in Circassia, Krim Tartary, etc. (2 vols., London, 1837).

4. A Selection from the Poems of Louis the First, King of Bavaria, Imitated in English Verse, by G. Everill (London, 1837).

5. See Letter 228.

6. Joseph Hume was defeated for Middlesex, but was almost immediately returned for Kilkenny; George Grote barely escaped defeat for the City of London.

7. Horace Twiss (1787–1849), wit and politician, vehement opponent of reform, defeated for Nottingham.

8. Francis R. Bonham, defeated for Harwich.

9. Charles Ross (1799–1860), defeated for Northampton.

you speak of is made me, which I shall not think at all probable until it is done, I shall not accept it unless I find by inquiry here that I can hold it with my situation in this house. For an object of importance I should not mind sacrificing my own pleasures and comforts, and obliging all connected with me to alter their style of living and go (as the vulgar phrase is) down in the world; but I certainly would not do it in order to exchange the speculative pursuits which I like, and in which I can do great things, for the position of a Radical member of this coming Parliament.

Ever yours faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

I can do nothing about Hanover¹⁰ without you. Châles is the man I mean.¹¹ He writes in the Journal des Débats and is a humbug; his reputation is, however, high.

214. TO THOMAS CARLYLE¹

India House
8th August 1837

MY DEAR CARLYLE

The immediate object of my writing to you is to ask you whether you can manage to give me (if it be still in existence) a letter which I wrote to you in 1833² after my return from Paris, in which I said a great deal about Carrel. I have to write something about him for the review,³ & it would be of great service to me were I able to refer back to what I wrote in the freshness of my impressions.

It is a great bore to me having to write anything just now, except my book,⁴ which I am getting on with, fast & satisfactorily. But it cannot be helped.

The book I think will be a good book; which is more than I would venture to say of any other book which I could attempt to write just now. One good thing that it will do is, it will let you & me see whether we really differ, & if so, how far, without the fruitless attempt to become intelligible

10. Presumably the article, "History of Hanover," signed S.R.T., LWR, XXVIII (Oct., 1837), 198-216.

11. See preceding letter, n. 4.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Thomas Carlyle Esq. / Scotsbrig / Ecclefechan / N.B. Postmark: LS / 8 AU 8. MS at Pierpont Morgan Library, New York. Carlyle's reply of Aug. 10, 1837, is in A. Carlyle, pp. 157-59.

2. Letter 91.

3. "Armand Carrel," LWR, XXVIII (Oct., 1837), 66-111.

4. On logic.

to each other by spoken words on a subject so complicated & on which so many of the premisses have to be settled beforehand. Certainly we should, at present, differ much in our language, but I question whether our opinions are so widely apart as they may seem. You call Logic the art of telling others what you believe. I call it, the art, not certainly of knowing things, but of knowing whether you know them or not: not of finding out the truth, but of deciding whether it is the truth that you have found out. Of course I do not think that Logic suffices for this without any thing else. I believe in spectacles, but I think eyes necessary too. Neither do I mean by Logic, the Aristotelian way solely, or even mainly; nay, that I do consider to be only a way of stating a process of thought, not itself a process of thought at all. I do not think that I can explain myself any farther in fewer words than my book will consist of. Thanks for your promise of reading it, which I did not more than half expect, & did not at all think myself entitled to claim.

I suppose you saw the three columns of the Times⁵ on your three volumes. Mr Sterling I suppose wrote it, & no doubt sent it to you—at least that is the belief I try to entertain whenever my conscience twits me that I did not. In case you have not seen it, I can give you in few words a summary of its contents: That the style is nearly the worst possible, everything else nearly the best possible. The writer does not seem to be aware that this is something very like a contradiction in terms. But it is well meant, & cannot but give you many readers & Fraser some buyers who would not otherwise have been had.—However I fully sympathize in your wish to forget the book entirely—I promise you I shall forget mine, soon enough after it is published—nay probably before.

I am very glad you are resting yourself by doing nothing. I am resting myself by doing something—something which is not mere every day business, but allows me & requires me to exert my best (or some of my best) faculties. In truth I have not, for years before, had a mind free from occupation with pettinesses. That is the only true meaning of leisure—choice of work. It is not good for everybody, nor for anybody at all times: for me, just at present, it is good, & I am consequently happier than I have ever been since I had it last. I get a great deal into the country too, among trees & green fields, though with a very small share of rivulets & altogether without the Solway tide waves you speak of.

On the whole things go well with me, not the less so because I am as you say of yourself “sadder” than I have ever been—

Ever affectionately J. S. MILL

5. Of Aug. 3. JSM was mistaken as to Edward Sterling's authorship of the review; it was by W. M. Thackeray.

215. TO GUSTAVE D'EICHTHAL¹

24 août 1837

Soyez persuadé mon cher ami que si je ne vous ai pas écrit c'était seulement par excès d'occupations: j'ai sur les mains l'India house, la revue, et un traité de Logique que j'avais commencé il y a longtemps, que j'ai repris dernièrement et qui s'avance rapidement vers sa fin. Par suite de cette préoccupation j'ai ajourné de jour en jour la réponse à vos lettres. Je les ai reçues, ainsi que trois exemplaires des Deux Mondes,² qui me sont parvenus successivement à de très courts intervalles. J'ai placé un exemplaire à la revue d'Edinbourg, un autre au British & Foreign Review. Pour en parler dans notre revue j'attends une occasion quelconque qui permette de la rattacher à quelque intérêt du moment: règle essentielle à observer chez nous, où les revues en général ne font pas bien leurs affaires et surtout essentielle pour nous, qui l'avons trop négligée et qui sommes forcés à présent de nous populariser autant que possible.

Avez vous reçu la dernière livraison de la revue? Sinon, demandez-en un exemplaire à M. Aristide Guilbert, Rue du Clos-Georgeot, No. 4. Si vous l'avez reçu vous aurez vu que Carlyle vient de publier un ouvrage fort remarquable sur la révolution française. Il se souvient toujours de vous avec plaisir. Il demeure 5 Cheyne Row Chelsea; M^{me} Carlyle y est à présent, son mari est pour le moment en Ecosse.

Je voudrais bien avoir le temps de vous écrire sur les questions générales, et encore plus de causer avec vous. Mais cela ne se peut pas pour le moment. Je dirai seulement que depuis bien des années je suis au même point que vous sur le repos: comme le sont en général tous ceux qui ont été formés à l'école poétique de Wordsworth et de Shelley. Mais j'avais ajourné cela comme n'étant pas de notre temps, et je ne sais pas si le commerce avec l'Orient nous y amenera—il me semble que nous n'y arriverons que par les changements sociaux qui peuvent progressivement arriver chez nous. Il y a des bornes très étroites à ce qu'un peuple ou même à ce qu'une personne peut apprendre des autres: Si nous pourrions apprendre cela en Orient, nous la pourrions en Italie—le dolce far niente n'est autre que le Kilif.³ Je dis cela sans déroger à la valeur de votre ouvrage qui me semble un morceau de haute philosophie sociale, mais (chez nous au moins) en liant ces idées à la question d'Orient vous devez nécessairement nuire à leur succès.

1. MS at Arsenal. Letter bears no salutation or address.

2. See Letter 197, n. 2.

3. Sic. Professor Georg Iggers has pointed out that this is probably intended for kief (modern form keyif), a Turkish word defined by D'Eichthal as "cette heureuse disposition à jouer de ce qu'il y a de bon dans toutes les situations où l'on se trouve, sans trop s'inquiéter de ce qu'elles ont de mauvais" (Les Deux Mondes, p. 240).

Bien des amitiés à Adolphe—quand vous aurez un chemin de fer au Havre ou à Dieppe, et nous à Brighton, je viendrai quelquefois passer le dimanche avec vous—

J. S. MILL

216. TO ARISTIDE GUILBERT¹

India House
29th August
1837

MY DEAR GUILBERT

It will be quite impossible to insert M. de Cormenin's article² in the next number, because we shall have an article on Carrel,³ which will fill all the space we can devote to French politics. In the January number there will be room for it, & if M. de Cormenin will trust me with it I should like much to read it. You are aware how highly I think of M. de Cormenin as a thinker & as a political writer for France—but to say the truth I do not think his mode of treating his subject at all suitable to England. However since the article is already written, there is no occasion to judge upon presumptions. Ever yours my dear Guilbert—in great haste

J. S. MILL

Without hurrying you, we should like to have your article on the French army soon.⁴

217. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

Leamington
Friday evening
[Sept. (?), 1837]

DEAR ROBERTSON

I agree with you in thinking the Sedgwick² quite unobjectionable, though there is less in it than I expected, & the extracts given do not inspire me with

1. Addressed: Monsieur / Aristide Guilbert / Rue de Clos Georgeot / à Paris. Postmarks: 29 / AUG / 1837 and 31 / AOÛT / 1837. MS in the possession of Dr. James M. Osborn, Yale University.

2. Unidentified; no article by De Cormenin appears to have been published during JSM's editorship.

3. See Letter 214, n. 3.

4. See Letter 207, n. 2.

* * * *

1. Published, with omissions, by Towers, p. 61. MS at King's.

2. See Letter 211, n. 10.

any admiration for the books praised. I think your Theodore Hook³ a much better article, though I have cancelled one or two portions of sentences positively (for various reasons too long to be mentioned here) & proposed to you to cancel or alter one or two more. There are one or two ideas which I think questionable, but with those I have not meddled, nor do I propose to do so. In reading the article this time it has struck me that there is a fault in some of your best sentences, which there used to be very often in mine, & perhaps is still, that of crowding too much into them, & in doing that, falling into a Latinism of construction, which in our non-inflected language, leaves it doubtful what substantives some of your adjectives are intended for. In this article there is also I think, (but not so often as I should have expected in an article written as you said this was, invitâ Minervâ) the fault of using three or four words which do not exactly fit, instead of one which does. In the few instances where this fault appeared to me to amount to a serious one I have tried to correct it, & I hope you will find, not at the sacrifice of any portion of your meaning. In other respects I like the article. The subject is I think viewed in the right light, & disposed of by making a few points & those the important ones, & treating them in a decided manner.

The Italian article⁴ came to me I suppose in a proof from which corrections had already been made, but as I have made many more it will require to be carefully gone over. The translation, for instance, of the verses on Napoleon, required a great deal of correction. I doubt very much the expediency of the deviation from the old plan of keeping the same heading throughout a whole article: I think in our last number the headings puzzled & displeased people, & though the modification you now propose is not so objectionable, I think it is still rather so & I do not see any sufficient advantage to be gained by it—but if you wish decidedly to try the experiment I do not object, provided you will follow the old plan as to my own particular articles, for I don't like people not to see at once what they are about.

I hope exceedingly that you will be able to finish your other article⁵ as it was begun, & for this number. If you cannot, it must lie over to the next, for the subject is not pressing & it is much better to have it later in time than inferior in quality in which case it will not do us the good we expect from it. I shall be much disappointed however if we are obliged to adopt either alternative & I will hope the contrary. Of course you have carte

3. "Works of Theodore Hook," LWR, XXVIII (Oct., 1837), 169–98. Theodore Edward Hook (1788–1841), novelist, wit, founder in 1820 of the John Bull newspaper, and editor of the New Monthly Magazine, 1836–41.

4. [Angelo Usiglio], "Italian Literature since 1830," LWR, XXVIII (Oct., 1837), 132–68.

5. Presumably "Congregational Dissenters," ibid., pp. 217–60.

blanche about fill-up matter, as long as I see it at some stage or other. I would not be particular about going to the extent of our 16 sheets when we have a good number, & plenty of bills to make it look thick.

As to the order of the articles, I think Usiglio & Carrel⁶ should not immediately follow one another, therefore if "Position of Parties"⁷ goes first, Usiglio third, Carrel fifth, the only question is if Sedgwick should be second & Hook fourth, or the reverse. I should have been glad if Wheatstone⁸ could have gone in either place & Sedgwick or Hook been left to follow Carrel: but I suppose that was not to be. You will make it all right I have no doubt & I sh^d have said nothing about it if you had not asked me.

I have seen all there is to see at Leamington, & there being nothing that interests me in this dull part of England I am going to shift my quarters, & in doing so shall pass through town, of which opportunity I shall make all the use I can for the review. I expect to be at Kensington on Monday evening & will call at Hooper's some time in Tuesday forenoon where if I do not find you I hope I shall find a packet from you, & directions for finding you somewhere else.

I have written to Napier,⁹ most likely his terms are per article & may not be higher than ours when the article is long which I hope this will be. You will see that I have attended to your suggestions about the political article & have altered, besides, some passages which were rather declamatory. Pray attend carefully to the revise—I tremble for it.

As we shall so soon meet I leave off—ever yours

J.S.M.

218. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

Ross, 28 September, 1837

DEAR ROBERTSON,

I have read Harriet Martineau's article² with the greatest desire to do it justice, and the result is more unfavorable to it than ever before. I always thought the notion it presupposes of the Queen's position an incorrect one,

6. JSM's "Armand Carrel," ibid., pp. 66–111.

7. JSM's "Parties and the Ministry," ibid., pp. 1–26.

8. [Charles Wheatstone], "Willis on Reed Organ Sounds," ibid., pp. 27–41. Charles (later Sir Charles) Wheatstone (1802–1875), scientist and inventor.

9. Sir William F. P. Napier contributed an article to the next number: "The Duke of Wellington," LWR, XXVIII (Jan., 1838), 367–436.

* * * *

1. Published by Towers, pp. 62–63. MS not located.

2. An article on the new Queen, which never appeared in LWR. Mrs. Towers prints (p. 62) part of a letter of Miss Martineau's, dated Aug. 26, 1837: "Here is my say about the Queen. It will appear to you very obvious, I fear, and perhaps too sermon-like; but indeed I think this strain of meditation much wanted to be uttered."

and I now think that even if that notion were correct she does not speak to the Queen in the right tone or give her the right advice. It seems to me that if we occupy ourselves with the Queen at all, we ought to make her believe that people feel interested about her just at present from mere curiosity, and not because they really believe she can do much; and that unless she has the qualities of Elizabeth she will be nothing, but that she should aspire to have these qualities, and that if she has she may be as great a ruler as Elizabeth.

Instead of that, H.M. says to her that Elizabeth in these days could do comparatively little for us, and that she must not aim at being like her; and why? Because she has many wills besides her own to consult—as if Elizabeth had not!—and a giant democracy to struggle with; yes, to struggle with! (is that what we should teach her?) as if Elizabeth had not Catholicism and Puritanism, and Philip and Catherine di Medici and Mary! I think this paper altogether contrary to the character which we are trying to give to the Review, namely, a character of dignity, and besides of practicalness. It is most completely unpractical; it is what a woman's view of practical affairs is supposed to be, and what the view of a person ignorant of life always is. She always treats the Queen like a young person. Now the Queen cannot be young, except in ignorance of the world, and kings and queens are that even at sixty. She always treats the Queen as artless. She cannot be artless, as a person full of anxieties, or who will be so, about doing her duty to her subjects. I am convinced she is just a lively, spirited young lady, thinking only of enjoying herself, and who never is nor ever will be conscious of any difficulties or responsibilities,—no more than Marie Antoinette, who was a much cleverer woman and had much more will and character than she is ever likely to have. She is conscious, I dare say, of good intentions, as every other young lady is; she is not conscious of wishing any harm to any one, unless they have offended her, nor of intending to break any one article of the Decalogue. That is the nature of the well-meanings of a person like her, and if we wish to give her any higher feelings or notions about her duties, we cannot go a worse way to work than H.M. does. If she reads us, she will not recognise any one of her own feelings in what the article says, and therefore will not mind us at all; besides, the article is a ready-made apology to her for being and for doing nothing.

This is a very small part indeed of what this last reading of the article has made me think to its disadvantage. It seems to me childish, and if we take away the prettiness and masculine structure of some of the sentences it is what people may forgive and like well enough in a woman, but not in a parcel of men. There is continual trying hard for philosophy in the article, and not an opinion or observation that you may not drive a coach and six through. I could not have believed how much this was the case till I examined it minutely, for I was imposed upon at first by the writing, which is in the style of a better kind of thought, and yet just the writing one would expect from Miss Mitford,³ or any other woman who has written tragedies, and learnt to put good woman's feelings into men's words, and to make small things look like great ones. It is not like a person who knows what she is writing about, or who knows life in the world or the feelings produced by particular circumstances, and it will give us an air of attempting and not attaining, the sort of ignorance of courts which most excites the ridicule of those who know them, especially when exhibited in sententious, goody, small moralizing.

Altogether I cannot reconcile myself to its insertion in any shape, nor can I think of any note to prefix to it which would not in my view have a still worse effect, if possible, than inserting it just as it is, though even Dilke,⁴ you see, thinks we ought to separate ourselves from it to a certain extent; and Dilke's opinion in favor of inserting it may be influenced by a wish to do her a good turn which might serve his turn in many ways, and this without any impeachment of his sincerity. I would not tell H.M. all I think of the article, but I would tell her what is true,—that I think it all very well from a woman to a woman, but not such as should be addressed by a body of men who aim at having authority to a woman and the public of that woman. We want now to give a character to the Review, as Carrel gave one to the National; and I am sure, if you attempt to scheme out to yourself the sort of article which with that view it would suit us to write to and of the Queen, you would arrive at an idea of one which this would not at all answer to. I dare not violate my instinct of suitableness, which we must the more strive to keep up the more we are exposed to swerve from it by our attempts to make the Review acceptable to the public. If you are not convinced by my reasons, consider it as a caprice which I cannot help. I hope you do not consider my putting a negative upon any article on such grounds as inconsistent with our conventions. . . .⁵ I will write to you from Chepstow to tell you where next to write to me. I want to hear how you are getting on, and whether your foot is recovered.

Ever yours,

J. S. MILL.

I will try to send you my article⁶ from Chepstow further improved.

3. Mary Russell Mitford (1787–1855), novelist and dramatist.

4. Charles Wentworth Dilke (1789–1864), editor of the Athenæum, 1830–46.

5. The omission is Mrs. Towers'.

6. Probably his political article for the Oct. number; see preceding letter, n. 7. The Oct. number was not published until Oct. 23.

219. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

Brecon
Thursday
[Oct. 5, 1837]

DEAR ROBERTSON—

I sent off my article from Chepstow yesterday by the Pembroke & Milford Haven mail—and I hope it arrived safe. I got your letter the same morning. I detest that vile Queen thing² more than ever for being the cause of the first real difference we have ever had about the review. But I cannot see the force of what you say about our being committed. I am not committed, nor are you in any way which you cannot get rid of by throwing all upon me. You cannot be serious in what you say about Dilke: asking his opinion was not undertaking to be bound by it, & we never either of us looked upon it in that light: you will remember I am sure, that if we had, I should not have consented to his being asked, for I said over & over that I did not consider his opinion decisive, & that I expected him to take the same view with you. We never thought of taking his opinion but in conjunction with others. As for H.M. you have only to say to her that it is necessary for the review to ménager me, & that I have seen the article & decidedly object to it: you may say if it will assist you, that you tried to overcome my objection & thought you had succeeded, but were mistaken. This will relieve you entirely, at the price only of admitting yourself to be under the restraint of considerations of expediency from which no editor is or can be free. As for me, I am willing, as in this case I am bound, to take entirely upon myself the resentment of a very spiteful person, rather than admit the article. The truth is, I feel that I never can have stronger objections to any article, nor justified to myself by stronger reasons, & that to let them be overruled would be to give up all power whatever over the review, for a power which does not amount even to the right of excluding, in an extreme case, is no power at all. You completely misunderstood my meaning in what passed between us that evening: I never considered anything as settled, & I expressly said, two or three times, that I would take time to consider. I did think, towards the end of the evening, that you were assuming rather too confidently, that the compromise we proposed would be adopted, & I blame myself exceedingly that I led you into mistake by a foolish repugnance to put myself on the defensive, & weigh my words

1. Addressed: John Robertson Esq / 4 Grove Place / Brompton / London. Post-marks: TP / Rate 2^d; 10 FN 10 / OC 6 / 1837; and BRECON. Published with omissions by Towers, pp. 64–65. MS at King's.

2. See preceding letter.

when I was discussing confidentially with you. Until I had made up my mind to say no decidedly, it was unpleasant to be constantly pulling up & drawing in. We should never have been in this embarrassment if I had not been so extremely averse to bring a matter about which you had so strong an opinion, to a direct "collision" as they say in Parliament; one house throwing out a bill which the other has passed. I caught eagerly at every straw which offered in the shape of a compromise, & the one you suggested, of sending the article forth as H.M.'s, & not as our own, seemed to me the last chance of our settling the matter "without a division." But on reading the thing again I felt my objections to it so much strengthened, & my idea of its counterbalancing good qualities so much lowered, that nothing could reconcile me to its being inserted with any note which did not express dissent from it, with the reasons—& you must see how ridiculous that would make us. Putting it in an obscure place only adds a fresh ridicule to the rest—no place but a conspicuous one suits the subject—the first place or the last. I did not think that anything relating to the review could have given me the worry & annoyance this has, from first to last. It was in an evil hour we asked her to write. But it was she who proposed the subject, I only said it promised the best of several which she proposed. If it is but left out of this number, we will leave the question open for next number if you like. If we cannot settle it so I must come to town though that will be a great bore to me.

I wrote to you on Tuesday from Chepstow telling you that Aberystwith is the place to send to me. I shall wait there or thereabouts till I receive your answer to this letter

Ever yours

J.S.M.

220. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

Farnborough

Sunday

[Oct. 29(?), 1837]

DEAR ROBERTSON

I do not think Garnier has any claim to be paid for the article on the Tyrol, unless we use it, which will depend upon your view of its suitability.

1. Addressed: John Robertson Esq. / care of Mr Hooper bookseller / 13 Pall Mall ness to us.² I see no objection whatever, but no immediate demand. The article was not written in any way at our suggestion, but was brought to me ready written—I took it only for consideration, & gave him no reason direct or indirect to believe that it was accepted, unless our keeping it so long without returning it can be so considered—which it cannot, as it would have been returned to him & a positive answer given to him at any time if he had expressed any wish to that effect. So unless you think it will suit us he has I conceive no claim on the review—but if he thinks he has, & can make out any shadow of a case, pay him for it & charge it to me—and at any rate if he is going away for any length of time or for good, & you think he is in need of money, I shall be glad if you can find any pretext to make him take any sum he may require not exceeding £25 or £30, on my private account, though nominally it may be from the review.

As to the H.M. matter³ I have no objection to discussing it in any way you think best, though if your feelings did not appear to be so much involved in it I should say the way you propose was making very much of a small matter. At all events I can say little about it until I know how & why you consider your honour implicated or your self respect endangered. To me these seem words greatly disproportioned to the occasion which appears to me a very simple one—a mere question of fact—Did I, or did I not, give you sufficient reason to think that I had waived my objection to the insertion of the article? I say I did not—you, I suppose, say I did—if so we have only for the future to take care to understand one another better, & to settle every thing finally & clearly between us two before we implicate ourselves with contributors—a caution which it would have been well if I had observed with Bisset as well as you with H.M. Unless indeed you understood our conventions to be such that while they lasted I could not exercise any veto. [But]⁴ if you understood that, then certainly [we] quite misunderstood each other: [I] not only [did] not, but could not, so long as I was carrying on the review for another person (who looked [to] me & not to you as responsible for its maintaining a certain character & a certain general spirit) give up all control over the contents. But it is of no use saying any more about it till I hear from you

Ever yours

J. S. MILL.

East. Postmark: [. . .] 8 / [. . .] 31 / 1837. Published in part by Towers, p. 65; there dated as of Oct. 31, but the nearest Sunday fell on Oct. 29. MS at King's.

2. No such article appeared in LWR.

3. See the two preceding letters.

4. Page torn. Words in brackets appear in Mrs. Towers' published version.

221. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

Saturday
[Nov. 11, 1837]²

DEAR ROBERTSON,

To my great satisfaction Carlyle consents to do at least the Scott,³ and wishes to begin on Monday morning.

I should not like to baffle him in that, but in order to do it he wants Volume I of the Scott; so, pray, if you can buy, beg, or borrow it before that time, do. He has also a great wish to have the two books of and about Colonel Crockett,⁴ and I think has a "month's mind" to write about them. So, pray, send those too, and if the Review does not find its account therein I will pay for them.

Yours in haste,
J. S. MILL.

222. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

India House
Saturday
[Nov. 18, 1837]

MY DEAR SIR

I write to you in greate haste just after receiving your letter—to say that before I can undertake what you propose, I must understand the circumstances better. I always fancied that a Life of Bentham by Bowring was to form part of the collected edition of his works:² was I mistaken? and next: This publication is in obedience to Mr Bentham's will, & by virtue of an engagement between you & his executors: how would they like my intermeddling? & on the other hand, neither do I like intermeddling

1. Published by Towers, p. 61. MS not located.

2. Mrs. Towers dates as probably of Sept., 1837, but Carlyle in a letter of Friday, Nov. 10 (in A. Carlyle, p. 162), alludes to JSM's talk with him on Nov. 9 about the review of Lockhart's Life of Scott.

3. Carlyle's review, "Lockhart's Life of Scott," appeared in the Jan., 1838, LWR, XXVII, 293–345.

4. David Crockett (1786–1836), American frontiersman. One of the books must have been A Narrative of the Life of David Crockett, Written by Himself (London, 1834), which was written to correct erroneous impressions created by an unknown writer's Sketches and Eccentricities of Colonel David Crockett (London, 1834).

* * * *

1. Addressed: William Tait Esq. / Bookseller / Edinburgh. Postmarks: LS / 18N018 / 1837; and NOV / C20F / 1837. MS at LSE.

2. John Bowring's Memoirs of Jeremy Bentham was eventually published in 1843 in vols. X and XI of The Works of Jeremy Bentham (Edinburgh and London, 1838–43).

with them, nor being in any way mixed up with their proceedings as I like to avoid getting into a hornet's nest.

Believe me

Yours ever

J. S. MILL

223. TO WILLIAM TAIT¹

India House

Monday

[Nov. 20, 1837]

MY DEAR SIR

I wrote you a short & hurried note on Saturday, immediately after receiving your letter, in which I stated some difficulties about undertaking what you proposed to me. I have since considered the subject more fully & the result is that even independently of those difficulties, I am obliged to decline your proposition. I have several reasons for this, among which I will only mention, that the proper place for me to speak about Mr Bentham is the Review; that I intend, & have long intended, to write a very elaborate article, speaking my whole mind about him, on the occasion of the appearance of your edition of his works; & that I desire to reserve for that opportunity all I have to say.²

Regretting my inability to oblige you, believe me

Yours ever truly

J. S. MILL

224. TO LEIGH HUNT¹

India House

Monday

[Nov. 20, 1837]

MY DEAR SIR

I observed in a recent number of the M.R.² a complaint made by you, in your usual gentle & kindly manner, of some reviewer who had lately

1. Addressed: William Tait Esq / Bookseller / Edinburgh. Postmarks: LS/21N021/... / and NOV / 23 / 1837. MS at LSE.

2. This eventuated in his article "The Works of Jeremy Bentham," LWR, XXIX (Aug., 1838), 467-506.

* * * *

1. Addressed: Leigh Hunt Esq. / 3 Upper Cheyne Row / Chelsea. Postmarks: 4 EG 4 / NO 20 / 1837, and Leadenhall St. MS at Brit. Mus.

2. "Explanation and Retrospection—The Examiner Twenty Years Ago," MR, Enlarged Series I (Oct., 1837), 225-35.

spoken of Mr Fonblanque as having rescued the journalism of the (radical) party from contempt, an expression which by whomsoever used would be grossly unjust to several writers & to yourself more than any, & which I will venture to say never could have been used by any one not grossly ignorant of the history of radical opinions. It did pass through my mind that the party complained of might be myself, but feeling sure that I had made no such misstatement, I dismissed the idea—however I have since been led to believe that I was the person meant & I have searched through my article³ on Mr Fonblanque's late publication to ascertain what ground I had given for the mistake & how much I have to apologize for: but I have not found that I had anything to reproach myself with, beyond omitting an opportunity which I might fairly, & indeed ought to, have used for putting upon record my sense of your great merits as a political journalist, & of what you have done & suffered in the cause, in these very times the badness of which is dwelt upon in the article in question. I am sure if you will do me the justice to refer again to the article, you will not find it said, even by the most distant implication, that the journalism of the party, as such, was an object of contempt to anybody: what is said is, that radical opinions were an object of contempt to almost all persons of station & consideration; which I think you will allow they were, notwithstanding the exertions of a few persons, whose merits as writers even those same classes were constrained to allow: & it is no more than might have been said of Christianity after it had produced several generations of heroes & martyrs. It was not yourself only,⁴ & Hazlitt, & Cobbett; Godwin, & Bentham, & my father, & various others, had laboured for radicalism with more or less of acceptance, & had gained or were gaining reputation to themselves individually, but the cause had not yet profited much by them: it has since, & we are now benefitting by what was then done—

Believe me with best wishes for yourself & the M.R.

ever truly yours

J. S. MILL

Have they sent your copy of this number of the Review?

3. "Fonblanque's England under Seven Administrations," LWR, XXVII (April, 1837), 65–98.

4. Hunt as the original editor of the Examiner had suffered various prosecutions and had been imprisoned for two years (1813–15) for a libel on the Prince Regent.

225. TO GEORGE CORNEWALL LEWIS¹

India House
24th November
1837

MY DEAR LEWIS

I was out of town at the end of last month, otherwise I should have written to you in the packet containing Mrs. Austin's copy of the review.² I hope you liked the number. The political article³ is I think in complete accordance with the views which you expressed in your little note to me which I wish had been a long letter. The article has had great success & the review is rising both in sale & in influence. A completely new tone must now however be taken, since the suicidal declaration of the Whigs against the reform of the reform bill.⁴ I do not yet know what the radical members will do, though I know what they ought to do. They are in a great state of excitement. I hope it will not all end in a whiff of smoke.

I am chiefly desirous to speak to you of your article, on Authority in matters of Belief.⁵ It is the first thorough & elaborate discussion of the subject that I have seen, & I think it admirable as an essay, nor is there I think one word in it that I do not concur in. But I see an insuperable difficulty in its appearing in our review. It seems to me suited only for students, & not for the public. Such articles however excellent are more than a dead weight, they are a positive injury to a popular periodical; our review must by this time have been abandoned if we had gone on publishing dissertations on abstract subjects, & on our present system, by which for the first time we are beginning to gain a footing with the public, neither my own article on Civilization nor that on Political Economy⁶ would have been published. I am now convinced that this is a salutary necessity; doctrines make their way best with the public when they are introduced a propos of something in which the public is feeling an immediate interest; & we are forced upon the most effectual way of promoting

1. MS at Columbia University.

2. Both Lewis and the Austins were still in Malta.

3. See Letter 217, n. 7.

4. On Nov. 20, at the opening of the new Parliament, Wakley and Molesworth for the Radicals had attempted to amend the Address to the Throne by making it advocate extension of the franchise, vote by ballot, and shortening of the parliamentary term. Lord John Russell, for the Whig ministry, took a stand against further alteration of the Reform Act on the ground that "entering into this question of the construction of our representation so soon again would destroy the stability of our institutions" (Examiner, Nov. 6, 1837, pp. 757-58).

5. Not published at this time. Probably an early version of chap. iv ("On the Applicability of the Principle of Authority to Questions of Religion") of Lewis' An Essay on the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion (London, 1849).

6. In the LWR for April and Oct., 1836, respectively.

our ends, by the happy impossibility of attaining them at all in any other. If you will publish your paper in a volume of Essays, the review shall do all it can to attract notice to it—and the principles it inculcates are, as I have long thought, so extremely needed at the present day, that I am most eager to aid in promulgating them in any way which would give them a chance of being read by any considerable number of readers.

I have not time to write to Mrs. Austin this month, but I will not fail next month unless I have reason to suppose you are about to return. I hear good news of them from Henry Taylor.

ever yours

J. S. MILL

226. TO JOHN HILL BURTON¹

India House

29th November 1837

SIR

If it is proposed to reprint, along with the Rationale of Evidence,² my preface & notes, I should like much to see the proofs, as there are various things in the notes which I regret having published. Otherwise I have nothing to suggest.

1. Addressed: J. H. Burton Esq. / 9 Warriston Crescent / Edinburgh. Postmarks: LS / 30 NO 30 / 1837, and DEC / C2F / 1837. Original in possession of Professor John Burton Cleland, of Adelaide, South Australia, the grandson of J. H. Burton. Copy supplied by Professor Cleland's son-in-law, Professor J. A. La Nauze of the Department of History, University of Melbourne.

John Hill Burton (1809–1881), Scottish historian, at the time of this letter was engaged in the editing of the collected edition of The Works of Jeremy Bentham, published under the superintendence of Bentham's executor, John Bowring.

2. Bentham's Rationale of Judicial Evidence, ed. JSM, 5 vols., 1827, was reprinted in the collected edition, vols. VI and VII. To the reprinted original Preface was added the following note, presumably by JSM: "At an interval of more than ten years from the first publication of this work, the original Editor feels that an apology is due from him for the air of confident dogmatism perceptible in some of his notes and additions, and for which he can only urge the palliation of their having been written in very early youth—a time of life at which such faults are more venial than at any other, because they generally arise, not so much from the writer's own self-conceit, as from confidence in the authority of his teachers. It is due, however, to himself to state, that the tone of some of the passages in question would have been felt by him, even then, to be unbecoming, as proceeding from himself individually: he wrote them in the character of an anonymous Editor of Mr. Bentham's work, who, in the trifling contributions which the author desired at his hands, considered (so far as mere manner was concerned) rather what would be accordant with the spirit of the work itself, and in Mr. Bentham admissible, than what would be decorous from a person of his years and his limited knowledge and experience. His name was subsequently affixed, contrary to his own strongly expressed wish, at the positive desire of the venerable author, who certainly had a right to require it." See also Letter 13.

I should rather have suggested putting the "Introduction"³ after the Rationale itself—as being a sort of summary or résumé of it, a kind of Table Analytique, as I imagine it to be—& more dry & more abstruse than the work itself, consequently rather calculated to repel readers from it. But without having read the Introduction (except a small portion which was printed in Mr. B.'s lifetime) I cannot presume to judge.

With thanks for the attention shewn me by your troubling to write to me on the subject

believe me
your obed^t Serv^t
J. S. MILL

227. TO JOHN ROBERTSON¹

Friday
evening
[Dec., 1837]

DEAR ROBERTSON

I have gone carefully over the Caricatures² & have cut out two or three sentences that struck me as feeble or superfluous & transposed a few more. On the whole I like it very much, though the Grose part³ is a little in the way, as the matter explanatory of it is thrown into a note, where I could have wished that it also had been relegated. However I did not venture to do this without you, nor do I think it necessary to detain the MS from press, whither I shall tomorrow morning convey it, all except the last three or four pages which I keep to enable me to understand better what follows.

At present I think the article might stand first in the N^o. but I wait to see it as a whole.

I return Chorley⁴ with the first two pages cancelled & no other alteration except taking out a word here & there—The article improves upon

3. Bentham's An Introductory View of the Rationale of Evidence is placed at the beginning of vol. VI in the collected edition.

* * * *

1. Addressed: John Robertson Esq. MS at King's.

2. Robertson's article, "Caricatures," LWR, XXVIII (Jan., 1838), 261–93.

3. Discussion of the theory of caricature expounded by Francis Grose (1731?–1791), antiquarian and author of Rules for Drawing Caricatures, 1788.

4. The article was eventually published in the Aug., 1838, LWR (XXIX, 352–72). Bearing the title "England and Britany," it compared books on rural life by the French novelist Emile Souvestre (1806–1854) and the English miscellaneous writer William Howitt (1792–1879).

Henry Fothergill Chorley (1808–1872), miscellaneous writer and music critic for the Athenæum, 1830–68.

acquaintance. I hardly agree with him in the operatic & dressed out character he ascribes to Souvestre's writing, the passages from which seem to me to come from an article of quite a superior order to Howitt. I wish you would compare the two & tell me if you do not think so.

The Hoskins you sent is the wrong book: I want the Travels in Ethiopia, not the visit to the Oasis.⁵ If you have not got it I will procure it somehow—

J.S.M.

228. TO JOHN PRINGLE NICHOL¹

Kensington,
21st December, 1837.

MY DEAR NICHOL,

First as to the "great subject", I will read Peacock's Algebra.² Meanwhile, have you read a book termed Cours de Philosophie Positive by Auguste Comte,³ the same Comte whose Traité de Politique Positive you have among the earlier of the St. Simonian tracts (by-the-bye, I should like soon to have these St. Simonian books⁴ again, one is always wanting them)? This said book is, I think, one of the most profound books ever written on the philosophy of the sciences; and that of the higher branches of mathematics it appears to me to have created; the elementary and purely metaphysical parts it leaves nearly as it found them. I shall be much astonished if this book of Comte's does not strike you more than any logical speculations of our time. There are two enormous octavo volumes out, and two more to come.

Do by all means send both your articles, and the sooner the better: before the 1st of January if you can. If we are only able to take one this time, it will probably suit us best to take the Double Stars,⁵ being a fresher subject. With regard to the Geological article, the present editor, Mr. Robertson—a countryman of yours, and a man who has a decided genius for managing a Review—says, "I would not insert an article by an angel on Geology, unless it reviewed and estimated the 'Geological Society'";⁶ as he has a project for successively stirring up all the learned Societies, by articles

5. G. A. Hoskins, Travels in Ethiopia (London, 1835); Visit to the Great Oasis of the Libyan Desert (London, 1837).

* * * *

1. Published by Knight, pp. 674–76. MS not located.

2. George Peacock, A Treatise on Algebra (Cambridge, 1830).

3. Two volumes of the eventual six had been published by this time: I. Les Préliminaires généraux et la philosophie mathématique (Paris, 1830); II. La Philosophie astronomique et la philosophie de la physique (Paris, 1835).

4. See Letter 102, postscript.

5. No such article appeared in LWR.

6. See Letter 213.

which would excite a personal as well as scientific interest among bodies of men whom our Review has scarcely yet reached, a thing which in his opinion would do very much for our sale. Will you meditate on this suggestion, and consider whether your article admits of being adapted to it? You can send the articles under cover to Buller, 1, Queen Square Place, Westminster; or Molesworth, 79, Eaton Square, with the words Review written somewhere conspicuously (not on the outside).

The Review is at present in a transition state. Molesworth is tired of spending money on it; and although there are hopes that this would not be necessary much longer, he does not like to be identified, now, with opinions which often differ from his. I do not choose to ask any new person to spend money on it, as I am going to try it myself. Our last number rose very decidedly in sale, and made a deep impression in many new quarters; it brought Robertson and me into communication both with the dissenters and the working-classes⁷—who are now courting us—and has made me a sort of puissance among the Radical members, which I was not before. Altogether it is a lever not to be let go, and I trust to vigour and energy in the prosecution of our improved plans of management to carry me through without sinking much money; especially if a few among those of our friends who can afford it will help us for a time with articles of the kind we want, to be paid for only in case of success, and at the convenience of the Review. Our plans are (1) in our literary articles to make freshness a primary object, never following on in the wake of other publications when the public curiosity is already sated; (2) always, if possible, to address a pre-existing curiosity; (3) in our serious articles to make our abstract speculations (except on purely scientific subjects) grow out of special occasions, and track the principle chiefly through the application; (4) to make all large bodies of people, of whatever kind, find something in our Review to interest them in particular; (5) to make ourselves a rallying-point for every section of the multifarious Radical party by thorough discussions, in a catholic spirit, of the particular questions most interesting to them. There are many other points, but it would be too long to enter into them, and it has taken us nearly a year to work the system into shape, and new points to be attended to are rising up every day.

You can be eminently useful to the Review by doing and by suggesting things in the spirit of this plan—among other things, by looking out for, and enabling us to give the earliest popular account of, the most interesting scientific novelties. If we could get the sort of scientific character which Playfair⁸ gave The Edinburgh it would have a great effect on our sale.

7. Presumably Robertson's article, "Congregational Dissenters" in the Oct., 1837, LWR, had helped to bring this about.

8. John Playfair (1748–1819), mathematician and geologist.

The Radical members ought to have done at once, after Lord J.R.'s declaration,⁹ what you say. I urged it upon them, and raved and stormed with no effect, but that of being thought an impracticable enthusiast. Molesworth, Leader,¹⁰ Harvey¹¹ and Wakley¹² alone went with the things proposed. M.'s address to the Leeds people¹³ was put forth on the failure of our attempt to obtain a collective demonstration. But the movement in the country has acted strongly upon them since, and I was yesterday at a meeting at Molesworth's of the above four, with Grote, Warburton and a few other Radical members, together with Roebuck, Rintoul, Fox and myself at which they showed a good deal of spirit, and resolved to form a party, and quitting the Ministerial benches, take up a separate position in the House. Grote in particular has got on wonderfully; and I think something will come of it.

There is much to be said about Ireland. I myself have always been for a good stout Despotism—for governing Ireland like India. But it cannot be done. The spirit of Democracy has got too much head there, too prematurely. I should much enjoy going there with you, but I have demands on my vacations (short as they are) which tie me up very much as to such journeys, and this year I believe I shall hardly get away for more than short periods of time, nor for any long distances.

I am delighted with what you are doing about Canada. I do not know what statistical materials there are, but Roebuck does. Talking to him by a third party is not enough; write to him using my name—he knows yours very well—tell him what you are about, and ask him to tell you what information would be of use to you and can be got. I do not myself think much information needful now; it has come to a fight, and right or wrong originally, the question now is, will this country give men and money to prevent a colony by force from separating when it has a mind to it?¹⁴

9. See Letter 225, n. 4.

10. John Temple Leader.

11. Daniel Whittle Harvey (1786–1863), then MP for Southwark.

12. Thomas Wakley (1795–1862), medical reformer, founder of the Lancet; MP, 1835–62.

13. "To the Electors of Leeds," in the advertising columns, Spectator, Dec. 3, 1837, p. 1149. Except for a few words at the beginning and end, it was written by JSM (see MacMinn, Bibliog., p. 49).

14. Word had just been received in London that armed rebellion against the government had broken out in November in Lower Canada. The rebellion had actually been suppressed by Canadian forces by mid-December, but the news of its outbreak arriving on the eve of a parliamentary recess for Christmas led to much speculation whether the Whig ministry would resort to war. JSM earlier in the year had indicated his opposition to Whig policies on Canada (see Letter 205), and throughout 1838 he devoted much of his political activity and writing to the support of the Radicals' position and the work of Lord Durham, who on Jan. 15, 1838, accepted appointment as High Commissioner and Governor General of British North America (see Letters 231, 239, 248, 249, 250, and 252).

Tell me all that you would suggest about publishing arrangements for the Review. We have, on much consideration, abolished the system of agencies, i.e. of sending out copies for sale or return—but having lately received an application from Adam Black's¹⁵ house to be our agents, we thought their name so valuable to us that we made an exception to our rule in their single instance. Tell me your opinion fully on the whole thing.

You are interested, I know, about Henry.¹⁶ He is in excellent health, bringing up his mathematics by attending De Morgan¹⁷ at University College. I have carried him through the Aristotelian logic this year, and he is now working at Hobbes.

Ever yours faithfully,

J. S. MILL.

15. Adam Black (1784–1874), Edinburgh publisher and politician.

16. JSM's brother.

17. Augustus De Morgan (1806–1871), professor of mathematics at University College, London, 1828–31 and 1836–66.